Digitized by the Internet Archive
in 2013

http://archive.org/details/ladieshomejourna64janwyet

For Reference

Not to be taken from this room

238503

Every person who maliciously cuts, defaces, breaks or injures any book, map, chart, picture, engraving, statue, coin, model, apparatus, or other work of literature, art, mechanics or object of curiosity, deposited in any public library, gallery, museum or collection is guilty of a misdemeanor.

Penal Code of California, 1915, Section 623.

Ladies' Home

The Magazine Women Believe In • January, 1947 • 25c

JOURNAL

238508

COPYRIGHT THE FRICK COLLECTION, NEW YORK

Mother and Children

BY PIERRE AUGUSTE RENOIR

T CUT, TEAR OR MUTILATE
OKS OR MAGAZINES

PUBLIC LIBRARY
Burlingame, Calif.

PUBLIC LIBRARY
BURLINGAME CALIF.
NO

"I'm an old newspaperwoman who toured Europe on a Pulitzer traveling scholarship, did a stint on a New York paper when I got back in the U. S., and eventually ended up in Hollywood writing song lyrics for the movies," says SELMA HAUTZIG BRENNER (Just What She Wanted). "My best career caught up with me nine years ago in the form of a husband. He works at his insurance agency from 9 to 5 while I concentrate on writing short stories and my second novel. The rest of the time we concentrate on each other."

FRANCES GRAY PATTON, author of The Terrible Miss Dove, might have been on Broadway if it hadn't been for love. After two seasons in a stock company, she gave up the theater to marry a young Duke professor. But because she still wanted a hobby—"mainly to avoid housework"—she tried writing. "And it's fun!" says Mrs. Patton. "Everything I do has to be sandwiched in between bringing up three children, a son 17 and twin daughters 12, but a hectic life agrees with me. My one aim now is to make the JOURNAL again before I die."

SUSAN ERTZ, author of Mary Hallam, is an American who's spent most of her life in England, where she was born and educated. She began writing for a career in 1922. Her first novel, Madame Claire, was published the next year, and has been followed by many short stories and novels, among the latter Now East, Now West; The Galaxy; Woman Alive; and No Hearts to Break. She's interested in literature and painting, and has traveled widely in America and Europe. Her husband is Maj. J. Ronald McCrindle, Managing Director of British Airways.

JOURNAL Contents

JANUARY, 1947

Vol. LXIV, No. 1

NOVEL COMPLETE IN THIS ISSUE PAGE

AFRAID OF HAPPINESS . . . . . Dwight Hutchison 20

FICTION

MARY HALLAM (First part of three) . . . . . Susan Ertz 17
THE RIGHT WORD . . . . . Mildred North Slater 22
JUST WHAT SHE WANTED . . . . . Selma Hautzig Brenner 24
THIS IS FOR KEEPS . . . . . Frank O'Rourke 30
THE TERRIBLE MISS DOVE . . . . . Frances Gray Patton 34

SPECIAL FEATURES

DON'T DIVORCE YOUR CHILD . . . . . Dorothy Thompson 6
LAWRENCEBURG VERDICT . . . . . Vincent Sheean 6
HOW LOVABLE ARE YOU? . . . . . James C. Adams 26
AMERICAN ART . . . . . John Walker 27
WHAT'S WRONG WITH HIGH SCHOOL? . . . . . George H. Henry 28
IF I WERE 21 . . . . . Gretta Palmer 36
IF YOU ASK ME . . . . . Eleanor Roosevelt 46
HOW AMERICA LIVES: MEET THE BELTZHOOVERS, OF NATCHEZ, MISSISSIPPI . . . . Struthers Burt 129
FEMININITY BEGINS AT HOME . . . . . Louise Paine Benjamin 136
I NURSED MY BABIES . . . . . Gladys Hasty Carroll 162

GENERAL FEATURES

UNDER-COVER STUFF . . . . . Bernardine Kielty 4
I, SUSIE SUB-DEB (The Sub-Deb) . . . . . Edited by Maureen Daly 8
OUR READERS WRITE US 10
FIFTY YEARS AGO IN THE JOURNAL. JOURNAL ABOUT TOWN 15
REFERENCE LIBRARY 72
BRINGING UP PARENTS . . . . . Dr. Barbara Biber 125
DIARY OF DOMESTICITY . . . . . Gladys Taber 146
ASK ANY WOMAN . . . . . Marcelene Cox 153
YOUNG BONES MEND QUICKLY . . . . . Dr. Herman N. Bundesen 164
THIS IS A NIBBLER . . . . . Munro Leaf 166

FASHIONS AND BEAUTY

SOUTHERN ACCENTS ON BEAUTY . . . . . Dawn Crowell 32
PARIS FASHIONS NEVER MORE LOVELY . . . . . Wilhela Cushman 47
COLOR AND CHANGE . . . . . Ruth Mary Packard 50
WILD ABOUT WINTER . . . . . Josette Daly Lutz 127

INTERIOR DECORATION AND ARCHITECTURE

NATCHEZ MANSIONS . . . . . Richard Pratt 38

FOOD AND HOMEMAKING

TIMEPIECES . . . . . Ann Batchelder 52
LINE A DAY . . . . . Ann Batchelder 54
KITCHEN IN A PACKAGE . . . . . Gladys Taber 78
CONVERSATION PIECE . . . . . Ruth Mills Teague 110
SHINING EXAMPLES . . . . . Judy Barry 138
CULINARY COLLECTION . . . . . Louella G. Shouer 140
QUICK AND EASYS FOR TWO . . . . . Louella G. Shouer 142

POETRY

HINT . . . . . Goldie Jane Feldman 62
TWO CLOCKS . . . . . Doris Cone 77
WHO WOULD BE FREE . . . . . Leonard Snyder 83
MUTTERED WHILE MANIPULATING A GRANNY KNOT . . . . . Georgie Starbuck Galbraith 90
LESSON . . . . . Elizabeth-Ellen Long 101
SONNET . . . . . E. V. Griffith 106
THIS KIND OF GROWING PAIN . . . . . Mary Poole 120
OLD MAN IN THE SHADE . . . . . Ethel Barnett de Vito 124
YOU ARE THESE THINGS . . . . . Joseph Auslander 144
DINNER À DEUX . . . . . Ethel Jacobson 158

Cover: Painting by Pierre Auguste Renoir

LADIES' HOME JOURNAL, copyright 1946 by The Curtis Publishing Company in U. S. and Great Britain. All rights reserved. Title registered in U. S. Patent Office and foreign countries.

Published on last Friday of month preceding date by The Curtis Publishing Company, Independence Square, Philadelphia 5, Pa. Entered as Second Class Matter May 6, 1911, at the Post Office at Philadelphia under the Act of March 3, 1879. Entered as Second Class Matter at the Post Office Department, Ottawa, Canada, by Curtis Distributing Company, Ltd., Toronto, Ont., Canada.

Subscription Prices: U.S. and Possessions, Canada, Newfoundland, Labrador, Costa Rica, Cuba, Nicaragua, Dominican Republic, Guatemala, Haiti, Mexico, Panama, Republic of Honduras, Salvador, Spain and South America except the Guianas, 1 yr., $3; 2 yrs., $5; 3 yrs., $7; 4 yrs., $9. Other countries, 1 year, $4. Remit by money order or draft on a bank in the U. S., payable in U. S. funds. All prices subject to change without notice. All subscriptions must be paid for in advance.

UNCONDITIONAL GUARANTY. We agree, upon request direct from subscribers to the Philadelphia office, to refund the full amount paid for any copies of Curtis publications not previously mailed.

The Curtis Publishing Company, Walter D. Fuller, President; Fred A. Healy, Vice-President and Advertising Director; Mary Curtis Zimbalist, Vice-President; Cary W. Bok, Vice-President and Treasurer; Lewis W. Traysser, Vice-President and Director of Manufacturing; Benjamin Allen, Vice-President and Director of Circulation; Robert E. MacNeal, Secretary; Richard Ziesing, Jr., Manager of Ladies' Home Journal. The Company also publishes The Saturday Evening Post, Country Gentleman, Jack and Jill, and Holiday.

CHANGE OF ADDRESS: Send change of address (naming magazine) to

THE CURTIS PUBLISHING COMPANY
Independence Square, Philadelphia 5, Pa.

at least 30 days before the date of the issue with which it is to take effect. Send old address with the new, enclosing if possible your address label. The post office will not forward copies unless you provide extra postage. Duplicate copies cannot be sent.

The names of characters in all stories are fictitious. Any resemblance to living persons is a coincidence.

238508

METRO-GOLDWYN-MAYER'S LION'S ROAR

Published in this space every month

The greatest star of the screen!

Ah! Just wait "Till The Clouds Roll By"—and the stars come out!

★ ★ ★ ★

M-G-M's love-and-song story of Jerome Kern is on its way . . . teeming with talent and Technicolor and twenty-five Kern hits.

To make hearts go pitter-patterer, June Allyson sings "Cleo-patterer".

★ ★ ★ ★

Lucille Bremer pleads lyrically for "One More Dance" and Van Johnson replies with "I Won't Dance"—but he does, and how he dances!

★ ★ ★ ★

Then there's Judy Garland as Marilyn Miller, singing the haunting "Who?" and "Look For The Silver Lining". Something to look for.

★ ★ ★ ★

Kathryn Grayson and Tony Martin, as the melodic romancers of "Showboat" thrill you with beautiful "Make Believe".

★ ★ ★ ★

Torchy Lena Horne sings "Can't Help Lovin' Dat Man". Angela Lansbury swings "How'd You Like to Spoon With Me?"

★ ★ ★ ★

Virginia O'Brien does a fine job on "A Fine Romance"! Dinah Shore stops the show with "The Last Time I Saw Paris".

★ ★ ★ ★

"The Voice" is in wonderful voice. Frank Sinatra provides a spectacular musical climax with "Ol' Man River".

★ ★ ★ ★

All this as you laugh and sigh and thrill to the colorful events in the life of Jerome Kern who is portrayed with warmth and understanding by Robert Walker.

★ ★ ★ ★

As Kern's arranger and best friend, Van Heflin returns to the screen in triumph.

★ ★ ★ ★

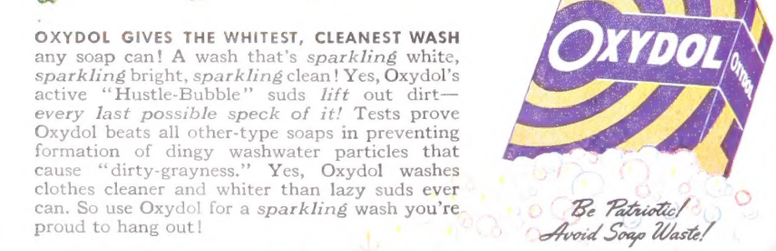
We extend accolades to Director Richard Whorf and Producer Arthur Freed who, with screenplay writers Myles Connolly and Jean Holloway, wove story and song and splendor so miraculously together.

★ ★ ★ ★ ★

Yes, just wait "Till The Clouds Roll By". It's pure sunshine!

—Lea

SEE, OXYDOL GETS ALL MY LINENS SPARKLING WHITE!
OXYDOL WASHES MY COLORED THINGS SPARKLING BRIGHT!
WHY, OXYDOL WASHES WORK CLOTHES SPARKLING CLEAN!



OXYDOL GIVES THE WHITEST, CLEANEST WASH any soap can! A wash that's sparkling white, sparkling bright, sparkling clean! Yes, Oxydol's active "Hustle-Bubble" suds lift out dirt—every last possible speck of it! Tests prove Oxydol beats all other-type soaps in preventing formation of dingy washwater particles that cause "dirty-grayness." Yes, Oxydol washes clothes cleaner and whiter than lazy suds ever can. So use Oxydol for a sparkling wash you're proud to hang out!

Be Patriotic! Avoid Soap Waste!

Give your wash THAT OXYDOL SPARKLE!

UNDER-COVER STUFF

By Bernardine Kielty

ONE of the Big Three American dress designers for the elite is dark-eyed, dark-haired, slender Fira Benenson, the Countess Hinska in private life. Being a Russian and married to a Pole, she is bound to be viewed politically, except by those who can afford to buy her dresses; and to those brides, debutantes, fortunate young matrons and perspicacious dowagers, she is the frosting on the cake, the shine on the bubble, the ripple on the wave. Her clothes are notable for their subtlety. She can make anyone look a lady. Countess Hinska is the magnet for all visiting Poles and all strata of settled Russians. At her house one may see, at a sitting, the Grand Duchess Marie, Maurice Hindus, Louis Fischer, Kerenski. One evening there was a typical Hinska party which included Kerenski, just back from Australia, Cecil Brown (SUEZ TO SINGAPORE), Quincy Howe (ENGLAND EXPECTS EVERY AMERICAN TO DO HIS DUTY), a Time correspondent, a Fortune writer, and various others. The Fortune writer was doing a piece on the Countess for his magazine, and much as it went against the grain, Countess Hinska had told her guests when she invited them what might happen. And happen it did. A fine Russian meal was served—for she cooks as well as she sews; that is, she can tell anyone exactly how to go about either—and conversation flourished. It was serious conversation, about the atom bomb and about international suspicions: how a Russian sees the U. S. A., how Russia looks to an American. Voices grew loud, gestures were dramatic. And, through it all, like fireflies in the night, flash bulbs went on and off. An attractive girl photographer stood beyond the circle, her helper beside her holding high two flash bulbs while she, with another clamped to her arm, took probably a hundred shots. Unbelievable though it is, the guests hardly noticed. Not for a minute did the blinding light dislodge an argument. If a camera can catch the esprit of intellectuals in action, there is one of the finest portraits of a general conversation on record.

• • •

The books on houses, planning, building, decorating are many. But they aren't helping people find homes. Just how far the housing shortage has gone in other parts of the country we wouldn't know, but in our bailiwick things have come to a pretty pass. Near by in New Jersey, a family has set up housekeeping in a sedan. Daytimes they cruise looking for a home, and nights they sleep in the car parked behind a local gasoline station. This family consists of a husband, wife and two children. But the prize story—for ingenuity—is that of the woman who has taken over the New York Municipal Building. She sleeps there, on which of the twenty-four floors she does not say, uses the washrooms as a laundry, and hangs out her clothes to dry on the iron fences of City Hall Park. This is a former city employee who cannot find a room and considers that the city owes her a home.

• • •

No one could write a dull book about Balzac—any more than about Lincoln or Henry the Eighth or Sarah Bernhardt. The vitality is so enormous, the accomplishment, in whatever field, so definite. Now we have BALZAC, by Stefan Zweig, biographer par excellence, a book worthy of both the subject and the author. Zweig had worked on it for ten years and, when he died, left the manuscript to his friend, Richard Friedenthal, who edited it.

Balzac, whom Maugham calls the greatest of novelists, lived and worked to the hilt. Stefan Zweig tells again the vital story.

Balzac was an indomitable man. He wrote sixteen hours a day, sometimes not leaving his room for three days at a time. He ate very little, slept very little and drank cup after cup of black coffee. His routine was a dinner of sorts at five in the afternoon, sleep until midnight, then work all night and most of the next day. At the age of thirty he started writing LA COMÉDIE HUMAINE, worked on it almost without stop for twenty years, and died at fifty-one, worn out.

Somerset Maugham calls Balzac the greatest novelist who ever lived. But it is less Balzac the writer, than Balzac the man, of whom Zweig writes. Nothing was simple in Balzac's life. The harder he worked, the more inextricably he got into debt. He had innumerable love affairs, wooed one woman for twenty years and died five months after he married her. He had friends. He traveled. All of which Zweig weaves into the complicated pattern of his biography.

Stefan Zweig himself was one of the most conspicuous victims of Nazism. A typical Viennese, he lived the charming, cultivated, lighthearted life of Vienna, and later of musical Salzburg. The great artistic and intellectual figures of the Continent—Toscanini, Freud, Romain Rolland—were his friends. He traveled about the world, lived in England while doing his research for MARY, QUEEN OF SCOTLAND AND THE ISLES and in France when working on MARIE ANTOINETTE. Then came the threatening shadow of Hitler, persecution of Jews and liberals, and the war. Zweig was a man lost. He became a British citizen, but was still bereft. Marry-

(Continued on Page 154)

THE NEIGHBORS By George Clark

© NEWS SYNDICATE

"Tom and I haven't quarreled since we were married. We're afraid his parents will throw us out of their house."

ay met Joe, a doctor, at a hospital dance. This was it! e asked her to a Columbia football game—then another -and on Christmas their engagement was announced. ay is tall, dark and stunning. She's one of the most teresting-looking girls you ever saw!

Kay Baudo's brunette complexion is thrillingly smooth and soft. Modestly, she thanks Camay. In fact, she tells us: "My very first cake of Camay made my skin look smoother, feel softer. Just one cake seemed to bring my skin to life!"

The site is chosen for the Baudos' new home—in Great Neck, with a view of Long Island Sound. They'll build the first day they can. And in the meantime, lovely Kay stays on the Camay Mild-Soap Diet, morning and night. Let it help your skin, too!

Softer, Smoother Skin can be yours with just One Cake of Camay!

Lady, if you'd be lovely, look first to your complexion. A soft, clear skin is beauty's first essential. Yes, and you can have a softer, smoother skin with just one cake of Camay . . . if you'll forego careless cleansing . . . be faithful to the Camay Mild-Soap Diet! Really, it's so simple. Morning and night, spread Camay's creamy lather on your face. A gentle massage, then rinse warm. If your skin is oily, dash with cold. Camay—so mild it cleanses without irritation—can give your skin that thrillingly softer, enchantingly smoother look!

MRS. JOSEPH S. BAUDO
the former Kathryn M. Cheetham of Forest Hills, N.Y.
Bridal portrait painted by Hilly Ross

LADIES' HOME Journal

BRUCE GOULD AND BEATRICE BLACKMAR GOULD, Editors

MARY BASS, Executive Editor LAURA LOU BROOKMAN, Managing Editor

Associate Editors: HUGH MAC NAIR KAHLER, BERNARDINE KIELTY, ANN BATCHELDER, WILHELA CUSHMAN, FRANK ELTONHEAD, ALICE BLINN, RICHARD PRATT, HENRIETTA MURDOCK, LOUELLA G. SHOUER, MARY LEA PAGE, MAUREEN DALY, DAWN CROWELL, JOHN MORRIS. ● Contributing Editors: GLADYS TABER, LOUISE PAINE BENJAMIN, GLADYS DENNY SHULTZ, BARBARA BENSON, MARGARET HICKEY. ● Assistant Editors: JOHN WERNER, CHARLOTTE JOHNSON, ROBERT ATHERTON, DONALD STUART, RUTH MARY PACKARD, RUTH MATTHEWS, NORA O'LEARY, ALICE CONKLING, MILDRED ARNOLD, JUDY BARRY, JUNE TORREY, MARJORIE LEDERER LEE, EVELYN G. SAGER, LILY GLENDINNING, DOROTHY COUNSELMAN SELBY, JOAN YOUNGER. ● Editorial Assistants: BETTY NILES GRAY, KATHERINE WEST MILLER, SELMA RUTHERFORD BURGESS, ALICE KASTBERG, ANNE EINSELEN, DOROTHY VOORHEES, FRANCES RODMAN, JAN WEYL, EMILY ELMORE MACY, JOSEPH DI PIETRO, MARGARET WINSLOW O'NEILL, JOSETTE DALY LUTZ, IRIS WILKEN.

LAWRENCEBURG VERDICT

BY VINCENT SHEEAN

THE verdict given at Lawrenceburg on the case of the twenty-five Negroes from Columbia, Tennessee, at the climax of a trial bizarre beyond precedent, was the kind of thing that makes us realize the full splendor of our destiny as a nation. Disregarding the whole farrago of sectionalism which had constituted the closing argument for the prosecution, this jury—twelve good men and true—brought in a verdict of not guilty for twenty-three of the accused men, and held two guilty.

It would probably have been impossible under the conditions to free them all, and the two who were found guilty were in fact the only ones against whom the state brought any kind of proof connecting them with the shooting of Will Willsford. It was not very good proof and is unlikely to engage the approbation of the Supreme Court of Tennessee, but at any rate these two (Bob Gentry and John McKivons) were involved by testimony, such as it is.

But hitherto it had been generally assumed that these twenty-five men would be condemned indiscriminately, that they would receive maximum sentences and that this case would have to be carried all the way to the Supreme Court of the United States. The prosecution demanded maximum punishment; the defense asked, but without much hope, for acquittal. The week of terror in Columbia last February, from which this trial arose, was not calculated to inspire much trust in the law-enforcement officers, at least on the part of helpless people. And the atmosphere of the courtroom, to put it mildly, was not encouraging to the defense.

Yet twelve citizens of Lawrence County had the courage and decency to disregard all that. They were able to rise above a really terrifying flood of hatred let loose in the courtroom by the closing speech for the state by Mr. Paul Bumpus, the attorney general for this circuit. In all probability the jury resented the tirade.

The effect of the verdict upon those who heard it was stunning. I doubt if anybody in the courtroom expected the result. My own faith in our people is so great that I believed all along that an acquittal was possible; but this opinion was not shared by others who knew the case and its social origins better than I did.

A more stinging rebuke to the prosecution would have been difficult or impossible under the social conditions of the time and place. And it was administered not by any of the long-nosed carpetbaggers Mr. Bumpus was talking about, but by twelve good men and true, citizens of Lawrence County and citizens of the nation. Seven of these men are farmers. They have no real use for the kind of racism and sectionalism that flowered so luxuriantly in that courtroom. Into their hands and into the hands of the white youth of the South this problem must, (Continued on Page 118)

Reprinted with Mr. Sheean's permission from the New York Herald Tribune.

Don't Divorce Your Child

By Dorothy Thompson

AMERICAN women have had the vote for almost a full generation. But one sometimes wonders at how little they have used their political power to remedy matters of vital concern to themselves. The first concern of women is the family and family relationships. Yet they have made no powerfully organized and hence no successful attempt to bring some order into the chaos of American marriage laws, which necessarily entail divorce laws.

I know that this is delicate ground on which to tread, because various religious bodies hold various views toward marriage and divorce. Nevertheless, the fact is that all but one state of the Union (South Carolina) have divorce laws, and actually nearly a third (31 per cent) of all American marriages end in divorce.

It is not the purpose here to dwell upon this disturbing social phenomenon, but only to point out that forty-eight separate divorce laws in forty-eight separate states do nothing whatever to mitigate the growing divorce rate, but contribute greatly to exacerbating the evil social consequences.

The extreme difficulty of obtaining divorces in some states, compared with the assembly-line process of doling them out in others; the irrationality of almost all the divorce laws, consequently encouraging mendacity, perjury and many shyster practices, and unnecessarily adding humiliation and indignity to a situation painful in itself; the lack of any single law enforceable in all states with respect to the rights of the children of a divorced couple, and the possibility of escaping the intent of the court granting the divorce, by merely moving to another state; the greatly differing views of certain courts and certain states in respect to alimony—all these are but symptoms of national chaos in a very important matter.

It seems to me that what is needed is not only a single Federal divorce law, but an opening of the whole question of family relationships and responsibilities, with a view to creating fitting institutions, both legal and social-advisory, to deal with them in a more inclusive manner, with the object of decreasing hasty and ill-considered marriages, and hasty and ill-considered divorces, with the welfare of the children as the central social concern

Divorce is a primary American problem if only for the demonstrable relation it bears to another leading American problem: juvenile delinquency. The experience of the juvenile courts shows that a large majority of youthful delinquents come from homes broken by divorce.

The only normal life for a child is in the family, and the minimum description of a family is a father, a mother and a child. When the father goes, the chief element of security goes, whether actual or psychological. If he goes by death, the child at least retains the image of the father, as a memory and example. If he goes by an act of his own will, or the will of the mother, the child, consciously or unconsciously, feels bereft and cheated, and this feeling awakens in him asocial instincts of revenge.

Furthermore, in many cases, the child loses not only one parent by divorce; he loses both. For the mother, deprived, as she usually is, of adequate support, must seek it, or seek to supplement it, outside her home. The divorced mother is usually a working mother, or becomes one.

To keep a mother in her home is the single justification for alimony for young able-bodied women. When alimony is awarded to mothers of small children, and in a sufficient amount to make this possible, this condition should be attached to it. Otherwise "alimony" should be awarded exclusively for the support of the child, and with continued protection of the child.

There are other things, however, that the divorced wife is likely to seek when separated from her wedded mate. She seeks love, and too often finds it in a series of transitory "gentleman friends" whose relations to the mother are a source of juvenile speculation, mental distress and cynical precocity.

A decent Federal divorce law should therefore start with better marriage laws, and better education for marriage.

Very few runaway marriages—elopements—last. Few very young marriages last, except in cases where the couple have really known and admired each other from childhood.

American marriage suffers much, I believe, from the overplaying of romantic love. To be madly in love is considered by our youth sufficient grounds for choosing a partner presumably for life, and proceeding on that basis to start a family.

Young people ought to be carefully and sensitively instructed—by their parents, their pastors, their teachers, and possibly by premarriage counselors to whom they must go before obtaining a license—that a passionate attachment is not sufficient grounds for a marriage. (Continued on Page 148)

ENJOY IT MORNING, NOON AND NIGHT

Libby's *TWICE-RICH Tomato Juice

*RICH IN FLAVOR

*RICH IN VITAMINS

It's the perfect "wake up" drink—this sparkling Libby's with that zest, brighter, more tomato goodness! So satisfying with a lunch-time sandwich, too. And such a smart and appetizing starter for dinner. Here's real round-the-clock refreshment that's good for the whole family!

In Libby's you get extra Vitamins A, B_1, B_2 and C! For instance, on the average, a single 6-ounce glass provides your normal daily requirement of Vitamin C; just three refreshing glasses a day supply a grownup's minimum need for Vitamin A!

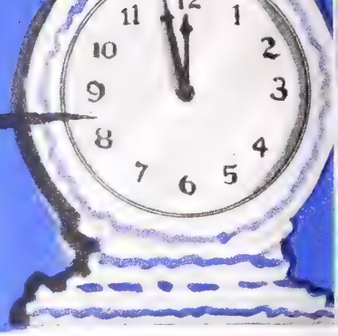
So keep this buttered tomato juice chilling in the refrigerator...ready to serve morning, noon and night. Unless you've tasted Libby's you can't know how wonderfully good tomato juice can be!

LIBBY, MCNEILL & LIBBY
Chicago 9, Ill.

LOOK TO Libby's FOR PERFECTION

LISTEN TO "MY TRUE STORY"

I, Susie, Sub-Deb



HEREBY RESOLVE

to act like a "big girl" this year. No more mooning before the mirror about why I don't look more like Lana Turner and no more daydreaming about out-Hayesing Helen on Broadway or rescuing Guy Madison from a burning building just to get on the front page of the papers. I'm going to find out what I can really do. It's always an A in English for me, so maybe I could try a short story or two outside class. My dancing is good, but it could be better. And it's over six weeks since I tried to play Clair de Lune on the piano, but I'm sure I could fit in one hour a day for practicing. And about the school dramatic club—say, maybe that Broadway deal isn't such a bad daydream after all!

. . . TO BE MORE HONEST. It's true that the alarm clock didn't go off the other morning when I missed the bus and was twenty minutes late for history class. (Never even set it, you see.) But it's not true that the paper on "Underwater Plant Life in the Great Lakes" for biology was as hard to write as I pretended it was. It might have been only two weeks late if I hadn't sat next to Alice in the library listening to her jokes every day. And about that two dollars I borrowed from my mother when last month's allowance ran out (not to mention the extra two-fifty the month before). It's true that I needed a new pair of brown gloves, but I guess I could have made ends meet if I'd cut myself down to three movies a week (unless Gregory Peck comes to town, of course). What this gal needs is a better budget!

. . . TO BE A BETTER FRIEND. Each girl in our Sub-Deb Club is my special friend, but—well, catchatter does start up occasionally, and sometimes I'm even the one to start it! Last Saturday afternoon I had a movie date with Miriam, and then that evening I didn't even say a kind word when her name came up at a party and someone said she was no fun. And those things I said about Alice after she got the date I wanted with Johnny! After all, she's been my friend since grade school. So what if she did tell everyone I looked awful with my hair cut in bangs? After this, I'm going to mean it when I say "glad to see you" to somebody.

. . . TO WORK HARDER AT SCHOOL. My grades are good enough to keep mother and dad happy, but I know I could learn a lot more if I didn't write letters in study hall and keep thinking about last night's date while the teacher is talking. And I guess for this year I'll try to do my homework without listening to the Bob Hope and Fibber McGee programs at the same time. And maybe (got my fingers crossed on this one) I can learn to get through just one evening without calling up the gals three or four times to see what answer they got to problem 14 in algebra or whether the history assignment begins on page 231 or 232!

. . . TO BE A PRETTIER GIRL. I know I can look almost like a small-sized angel on the night of a big dance. But I'm not always so good to look at in between. Sometimes I get so sleepy, after going through my homework, reading the papers and everything, that I skip the brush-and-bobby-pins routine that would make me neat and curly in the morning. And maybe I wouldn't have complexion troubles at all if I didn't skip those before-bed scrubbings once in a while. I could probably be the sharpest girl in school (who looked like me, that is!) if I spent a little time at it. And no other girl in my school can make that statement!

. . . TO GIVE UP MOPING. Right now half my time is spent nursing the blues. If I'm not feeling like Lena the Hyena just because Johnny doesn't call till seven-thirty when he promised to call at seven, then I'm worrying about whether or not I'll have a date for Friday night or for the Senior Prom in May, 1947. Or my feelings are hurt because my mother says, "Must you trip over that rug?"; or because my English teacher marks "Is this your best work?" on a theme that took me ten minutes to write. If I figure out why I'm blue, I might even be able to laugh it off!

. . . TO HAVE MORE DATES. Sure, Johnny's fun, but—since we're not going steady—why do I depend on him for my one-a-week date? Maybe Pete would like to take me to the movies sometime, if I let him know I'd like to be friends. And it might be fun to ask the gang over to my house, instead of just waiting for someone else to make a party. And when I do have a date I'll skip the joey clothes and look smooth; I'll act my best and say, "Oh, wonderful!" even though I don't like to go bowling. I guess I could have more fun, if I was more fun, couldn't I?

. . . AND ABOUT MY FAMILY. This isn't just for the new year, it's for all time, so—okay, Sister Anne, put your clothes in my half of the closet if you insist, and wear my blue sweater just once, if you want to! I won't complain. And if you insist on chattering when I want to sleep, putting up your hair with my bobby pins, and talking and talking on the phone when I'm waiting for a big call—well, I guess it's all right. And if I'm part of the family, I guess I can dry the dishes, make my bed in the morning, and eat up my oatmeal just as well as anybody else. I'm at home about one half the time, so why not have fun while I'm there?

And if I'm a smart Sub-Deb, with my eyes wide open, I'll pick up a few answers for myself—and maybe this list of supersolemn resolutions won't be so long next year!

DON'T BE A LONE RANGER

Get your gal pals together and form a Sub-Deb Club! Send for a registration blank to the Sub-Deb Department, LADIES' HOME JOURNAL, Independence Square, Philadelphia 5, Pennsylvania, and we'll send you, each month, the newspaper, The Sub-Deb Scoop, and a club letter filled with ideas for fun to keep your club going. And once you've organized your club, you can own Sub-Deb Club pins. Write for a Sub-Deb Club pin and blank. We'll be waiting to hear from you!

IRVING—HURLICK

Your Cold...

the part germs play and precautions against them

Can you avoid catching cold? And if you do catch one is it possible to reduce its severity? Oftentimes*—YES.

IT IS now believed by outstanding members of the medical profession that colds and their complications are frequently produced by a combination of factors working together.

1. That an unseen virus, entering through the nose or mouth, probably starts many colds.

2. That the so-called "Secondary Invaders," a potentially troublesome group of bacteria, including germs of the pneumonia and streptococcus types, then can complicate a cold by staging a "mass invasion" of throat tissues.

3. That anything which lowers body resistance, such as cold feet, wet feet, fatigue, exposure to sudden temperature changes, may not only make the work of the virus easier but encourage the "mass invasion" of germs.

Tests Showed Fewer Colds

The time to strike a cold is at its very outset . . . to go after the surface germs before they go after you . . . to fight the "mass invasion" of the tissue before it becomes serious.

The ability of Listerine Antiseptic as a germ-killing agent needs no elaboration. Important to you, however, is the impressive record against colds made by Listerine Antiseptic in tests made over a 12-year period. Here is what this test data revealed:

That those who gargled Listerine Antiseptic twice a day had fewer colds and usually had milder colds, and fewer sore throats, than those who did not gargle with Listerine Antiseptic.

This, we believe, was due largely to Listerine Antiseptic's ability to attack germs on mouth and throat surfaces.

Gargle Early and Often

We would be the last to suggest that a Listerine Antiseptic gargle is infallibly a means of arresting an oncoming cold.

However, a Listerine Antiseptic gargle is one of the finest precautionary aids you can take. Its germ-killing action may help you overcome the infection in its early stages.

LAMBERT PHARMACAL COMPANY, St. Louis, Mo.

THE "SECONDARY INVADERS"

Here are some types of the "Secondary Invaders" which many authorities say cause much of the misery of a cold. As you can see from their names, they're threatening in character.

TOP ROW, left to right: Pneumococcus Type III, Pneumococcus Type IV, Streptococcus Viridans, Friedlander's Bacillus. BOTTOM ROW, left to right: Streptococcus Hemolyticus, Bacillus Influenzae, Micrococcus Catarrhalis, Staphylococcus Aureus.

Gargle with LISTERINE ANTISEPTIC

What do your Face and your Figure tell you about your Future?

Do you want to know what's ahead for you, in your happiness at home—your business success? Here's a telling test:

Look in your mirror. Is your skin smooth and lovely, your hair gleaming, your make-up glamorous? Are you slender enough for your height? Do you stand erect, poised, confident? Yes? Then you are on your way to success as a woman.

But if your skin is dull, your hair unlovely, your make-up all wrong, if you are out of proportion and "bulge in the wrong places," then no wonder you are worried about your future. For you can't compete, in love or in life, with the attractive women who get the compliments, with the smart, slender, vital girls who are getting the jobs and getting ahead.

But if you are unhappy about what your mirror tells you—there's a plan to help you. It's the DuBarry Success Course. It analyzes your problems—then shows you how to achieve your ideal weight, remodel your figure, have a softer, smoother skin, style your hair becomingly, use make-up for glamour—be yourself at your best. It brings to you in your home the methods taught by Ann Delafield at the famous Richard Hudnut Salon on Fifth Avenue, New York.

Is it hard to take? No—it's easy and it's fun. It can be the most exciting experience of your life.

Does it take long? Results come surprisingly soon. In as little as six weeks, many women completely make themselves over.

Does it cost much? So little it will surprise you. And you'll say it was the best investment you ever made.

What to do? Send at once for the Free Booklet containing the full story of the DuBarry Home Success Course—what it has done for others—what it can do for you. Use the coupon NOW.

SHE'S A DuBarry Success!

"Now I have the job I wanted!"

—SAYS ELEANORE OBIE

MISS ELEANORE OBIE, Grand Rapids, Michigan, knows what your face and your figure can mean to your future. "I had the special training for a 'front-office' job," she says. "But I lost out in competition with girls who appeared smarter and were more attractive. And no wonder. In my early twenties, I looked middle-aged. I weighed 236 pounds and wore a size 46. The DuBarry Success Course brought me just the help I needed.

Before After

"Today, with 81 pounds gone, I wear a size 18. My skin has a new glow and I know how to apply make-up to appear always at my best. I look and feel vibrantly happy. Most important, I am the woman I wanted to be—a success, with the job I wanted."

Eleanore Obie's Measurements

	Before	After
Height	5'7½"	5'7½"
Waist	50	30
Chest	48	36
Wrist	8½	6
Arm	17	11
Abdomen	47	28
Hip	49½	39

DuBARRY SUCCESS COURSE

ANN DELAFIELD, Directing

Yours, with your DuBarry Success Course
This handsome new DuBarry, Dressing Table—packed with DuBarry Beauty and Make-up Preparations selected for your type. It comes to you beautifully furnished, complete with the DuBarry Success Course.

RICHARD HUDNUT SALON, Dept. SX2
693 Fifth Avenue, New York, 22, N. Y.

Please send booklet telling about the DuBarry Home Success Course, including the new Portable Dressing Table.

Name _____

Address _____

City _____ State _____

Guaranteed by Good Housekeeping

© 1941, Richard Hudnut

Our Readers Write Us

No Cash, No Kids?

Detroit, Michigan.

To the Editor: The problems you have been stressing about the high cost of living seem to have a simple solution. Have no more children than you can afford. If your income permits your having two children, have two, and raise them to the best of your ability, but don't try to have three, four or five.

Sincerely yours,
ANNE SANFORD COTTER.

Having a lot of mouths to feed accelerates papa. ED.

Wanted a Baby

Denbighshire, England.

Dear Anonymous: Your article We Wanted a Baby was of tremendous interest—you might have been quoting the case of my husband and self. Mentally, I waded through the various stages again—the perpetual bowl of lettuce, wheat-germ tablets, vitamins, tests—and later the similar injections, which I was told with a shrug "met with a certain measure of success and then generally in the younger element." And I was nearing forty!

Four months after the injection I was pregnant; and that, I think, supports the Dunbar theory which you quote. Our baby is now a sturdy little fellow of eighteen months.

Yours sincerely,
Name withheld on request

Hopes We Have Plenty

Paris.

Dear Editors: In the French newspapers I saw a picture of housewives in New York standing in a queue for meat. I hope it is exaggerated. If shortage comes to you, what will Europe become? It is such a consolation to know that somewhere there is plenty. Though we are better off with fuel than last year, we still must be very economical. Winter and the real cold days are still to come. I sometimes look melancholily at the radiators of the central heating. Once upon a time we had only to turn a handle (is this the right word, it sounds queer) and warmth was there, to open a tap to have hot water.

Now the bath is filled with potatoes (and glad we are of it). We covered the bath, once filled, with planks and thereupon we store the faggots to light the fire. The modern apartments here have no closet space or storage room and now ours is crowded, especially the kitchen, with all we have to store for the winter: potatoes, oignons, dried beans, salted stringbeans, pots with conserved eggs therein.

My daughter looking through your magazine just said to me, "If you look at those American houses, one thing is sure—they are heated."

I will end now. I have to unravel two old and very worn out sweaters to make a new one.

Sincerely yours,
M. RADEMAKER.

Likes Real Life

Peoria, Illinois.

Dear Editors: It sometimes occurs to me that it's a good idea to pass on a bit of praise, even to an institution.

I like your attitude against liquor advertisements, not that I'm a prohibitionist, but because you still hold to the best standards in living. I like especially the series you are running about "How America Lives." I like people and I thoroughly enjoy knowing how they live, how they are rearing their children, what their standards of life are. I like hard down-to-earth reality!

For my money you are now and have always been the finest women's (or men's) magazine on the market!

Sincerely,
ELLONA M. BUECHELE.

Are Atheists Sincere?

High Point, N. C.

Dear Sirs: I thoroughly agree with Dorothy Thompson's article, "Woe To Those Who Destroy the Altars!"

Frankly, I can't believe there is such a thing as a real earnest atheist.

Sincerely,
MRS. FRANK GRANT.

Atheists, if there are such, are probably a little like Mark Twain's 14-year-old boy who was contemptuous of his father's ignorance. But when the boy reached 21, he was amazed at how much his old man had learned in seven years. ED.

Say it Now—or Even Sooner

Brooklyn, New York.

Dear Editor: I have deepest sympathy for Mr. K. R. Stewart, who wrote that he lost his wife during the menopause. For his advice to husbands to ignore the word that the menopause is not serious, and to shower their wives with "understanding, patience and endearment," I have great appreciation.

But I would carry his advice a little further. Why doesn't a man shower his wife with love and affection all the time? A woman's menstrual period, pregnancy, raising of children and general household activities are a tax on her strength, her stamina, her patience—and her husband's inattention, however unwitting, does not help. It's not enough to wait till she asks "Do you love me?" and toss her a meaningless "Of course I do," and then forget about it till she asks you again.

It ought to be part of the marriage service—it ought to be a husband's eleventh commandment—"Don't wait to carve it on a stone, tell her so!"

Very sincerely,
EVE JACOBS.

Mother's "Little Stinkers"

Chicago, Illinois.

Dear Editors: What in the name of goodness do you do—scour the country with a fine-toothed comb to find families with the most angelic children? It is most discouraging to read of so many "obedient" youngsters as your articles talk about.

I know, from observation, that I have two of the world's prize stinkers, but surely there must be lots of other small fry who daily reduce their mothers to tears. My youngsters are past masters in the art of evading discipline by crying till they vomit. And picking them up produces a miracle: they quiet down in a split second. Twelve o'clock at night finds me washing or cleaning or ironing.

Without a long-suffering husband, the realization that I am a failure as a mother would be tragic. Once I thought babies would be wonderful. Today two are too many. To my kids, a "no" means "yes"; toys don't interest them; they are not "reasonable" or "obedient." I eat dinner at 9 P.M.—after the kids are in bed. Movies, church, evenings spent with my husband—such things are just dreams. The kids are a nightmare. Evenings they yell till we take them for a ride in self-defense.

Sometime, please couldn't you find a family with problem children and make a few suggestions as to how to handle such stinkers? Yours very truly,
MRS. E. P.

Dorothy's Grandson Christened

The Duke's Cottage, Rudgwick, England.

My dear Bruce and Beatrice: I have just had a passionate letter from June, saying why did I never tell her that in America there were hydrangeas growing as big as trees, and why did I never tell her Michaelmas daisies and goldenrod grew wild in the field, and why did I never tell her that there were wild grapes growing in the hedges? Bitter is the answer. I did not know. I have always been over in early spring or fall. How much I have missed. But I don't intend to miss it much longer.

The ticket collector on my local train told me that life isn't as easy as it was, now the Commandos have got back into private life. One of the things they were taught was how to travel everywhere without a ticket! It seems quite a few of them still get around. Just for the fun of the thing, and to make sure their skill is not going rusty.

Mary's son was christened on Saturday, Anthony St. George. He behaved very well, but Annette strolled around and chatted a good bit, and ended up by taking a seat on the steps of the font and Breathless beautiful moment. This sweet "togetherness"... with the softest touch of your hands answering the words he whispers.

(Continued on Page 13)

Hands so gentle and appealing for you've discovered the special "beforehand" way to guard their loveliness... with Trushay.

Trushay's a different sort of hand lotion. You use it before soap-and-water tasks, before dishes or light laundering, to help prevent roughness and dryness.

Always count on creamy, fragrant Trushay... whenever, wherever you need it.

TRUSHAY

The "Beforehand" Lotion

"Certainly it's to sleep in!"

1.

Part of the fun of visiting home is startling my mother with new ideas. Like the turquoise nightie I brought her—just like an evening dress! "You mean it's to sleep in?" mama gasped. "Gracious—you'd think I belonged to the Percale Sheet Set!"

2.

I thought about that remark as I hustled mama upstairs. "For a smart lady," I told her, "you have some awfully cobwebby ideas. Now, percale sheets are for everybody—when they're Cannon Percale Sheets! And are they soft and smooth and sweet-sleeping!"

3.

Mama waved the hairbrush. "Don't try to sweet-talk me," she laughed. "You know how your father is about the budget!" "But, Mom," I said, "luscious Cannon Percale Sheets give you percale's own luxury for just a trifle more than you'd pay for best-grade muslins."

4.

Mama's eye glinted. I continued, "Cannon Percale Sheets are nice and light weight too—easier for bedmaking and on washday. And believe me, they wear like everything!" The glint got brighter. "I always thought I was the percale type," she said dreamily. "Now I'm going to do something about it!"

TRADE MARK
CANNON

Cannon Percale Sheets

Cannon Towels • Stockings • Blankets ★ CANNON MILLS, INC., NEW YORK 13, N. Y.

Copr. 1947, Cannon Mills, Inc.

P. S. Another real Cannon value: Cannon Muslin Sheets. Woven of sturdy American cotton; well-made, long-wearing!

(Continued from Page 10)

inviting me to join her there. We had a small tea party after, and a chocolate cake. How laughable an affair is a sponge-cake made of National flour. It looks rather like a well-used bath sponge from a family bathroom.

Love and love to you all,
DOROTHY BLAKE.

De Gustibus

Monroe, Louisiana.

Dear Editors: I am bored by the monotony of your illustrations. You nearly always show a glamorous young woman in any picture. Sometimes a man is included; if so, the picture is of an embracing couple. Much of the advertising, both text and illustration, borders on pornography. Can't you get an art editor with a little more taste and imagination?

Sincerely,
WINONA RIGGS.

Responding to the cry of "Author! Author!" on an opening night, George Bernard Shaw stepped out in front of the curtain to be greeted by loud applause and one dissenter in the balcony who cried, "I think your play stinks!"

Shaw's reply was, "I agree. But what can you and I do against so many?" ED.

He Agrees

Hewlett, L. I., New York.

Dear Sir: I. A. R. Wylie's article, Germany, Nation of Nazis Still, is the first thorough analysis of the German "soul" since V-E Day. I was an intelligence officer in Germany for almost a year with the Information Control Division, and it was our main job to take scientific samplings of German opinion throughout the American zone. Our samplings are those of Miss Wylie's observations! Take a look at some of them:

"Was National Socialism a good thing or a bad thing?" 42% between 19 and 40 said "good thing"; 58% under 19 said "good thing."

"Do you think Germany needs a strong new leader?" 68% of males under 19 favored a new Führer; 75% of females under 19 favored a new Führer.

Know what a Social Democrat told us? "Waging a war which Germany was bound to lose from the very beginning is a crime against Germany!" Miss Wylie has done an admirable job.

Sincerely yours,
JOSEPH CONGRESS.

She Denounces

Chicago, Illinois.

Gentlemen: I have just read I. A. R. Wylie's article on Germany -and I'm boiling over with disgust and horror at the hatemongering of this supposedly Christian woman, calmly stating, "It is my suggestion that if the German children aren't sometimes a little hungry, they ought to be." Many a Buchenwald guard said, "Let the little Jewish children starve because their parents are our enemies."

You cannot argue politics or morality with a hungry stomach. Do you teach children the benefits of "American democracy" by starving them? Or do you teach them that the only crime in this world is to be on the losing side? As an American woman I sincerely hope that I. A. R. Wylie is one of a few and not to [illegible] humane people.

Disgustedly yours,
FRANCES CAMPBELL SCHROEDER.

She'd Say it Louder

Roxbury, Massachusetts.

Dear Editors: Your Child Needs Better Teachers in the November Journal should be banner headlined.

Sincerely,
STERNE E. BARNETT.
Parents' Federation of Greater Boston.

How to Live on Your Income

Penrose, Colorado

Dear Editors: I have just finished reading How America Lives, and frankly I am puzzled. Our income [illegible] against the Sheils' $4200, and yet we have all the necessities and [illegible] luxuries they are denied. Why?

We have four children, three girls and one darling baby boy [illegible] and 8 months. My children have daily [illegible] of good food, clothing, skates, tricycles, wagons, and yet we are buying our home (FHA) [illegible] and [illegible] and managed to [illegible] of $200 or more for [illegible] end jaunt.

We have a baby sitter hired by the week, we go out regularly on Tuesday and either [illegible] on Sundays and Saturday afternoons.

I know we aren't the world's best managers and there shouldn't be that much difference in the two localities. Then what is the difference?

Sincerely,
MARGARET CARL.

How to Wake Up Mother

Middlebury, Vermont.

Dear Editors: Your October issue certainly solved the problem of how to get college sons and daughters to write home, but this question comes from a college daughter: How do you get mothers to write to lonely college daughters?

Yours truly,
JOAN BISHOP.

Write her you're about to elope with a man twice your age who drinks. ED.

No Cause for Alarm

Town Park, Texas.

Dear Editors: Several friends and I view with alarm the new column by Gladys Taber. We are alarmed because we wonder if these articles foretell the beginning of the end for Diary of Domesticity. If these new articles are to be additions to the familiar column, splendid. However, if there is a question of replacing Diary of Domesticity, please reconsider.

Very truly yours,
MARION T. BRYANT.

Verbal Journal

London, England

Dear Ladies' Home Journal: The war has finally ended for me and my family! Its end was not announced by a fanfare of trumpets, but simply by the postman ringing my bell. I had two copies of the JOURNAL in my arms and so the long war was over. Because of this wonderful fact, I wish to tender my resignation from a six-year-old, unpaid, self-appointed reader-editorship you never knew I held.

In August, 1940, I bought a copy of the JOURNAL and was told "No more for the duration." How could I do without you?

A month later the raids began. I was a lone American woman with my two small daughters, Swanhild and Angela, in the little village of Old Woking, Surrey. I had to do something to give us courage. And suddenly I was inspired. We would make you up for ourselves. The siren became the exciting signal for a visit with you. We never wrote a word of copy. We just sat down and took turns talking as if we were reading you. Any hour of the day or night, any day of the week you appeared. Sometimes you were a thin pamphlet and once, when we had ten raids in a day, you rivaled a mail-order-house catalogue. I am afraid we took terrible liberties with you. You blossomed out with strange new features. You had an uncanny knowledge of all the strange, brave people of our village. Your recipes were born in our own kitchen and made from ever-diminishing rations. You let yourself go in your fiction. There was never a rejection slip.

And suddenly, LADIES' HOME JOURNAL, we had our courage back. We weren't afraid any more. Instead of listening to the ack-ack and the swish of bombs, we pretended that the infernal noise of war outside our shrouded windows was the busy hum of the giant presses. What if you were cradled in a cannon's mouth and "put to bed" in a shower of incendiary sparks? You were our own make-believe JOURNAL.

You were the herald of the good things coming back into our lives. We have less food and clothes even than during the war. I have forgotten how it feels to drink a glass of milk. For six years I have not been able to buy shoes to fit my 8AAA feet, and I simply dream of a pair of nylons. I think I would cry if I tasted ham again. But somehow those things don't seem to matter any more.

Yours sincerely,
NOREEN CASTLE.

Matchless Music for Every Mood

LESTER Betsy Ross Spinet

You will have music for every mood right at your fingertips with a Lester Betsy Ross Spinet in your home. Children and adults will reap the full benefit of the best in musical enjoyment from this beautiful piano . . . it will be the focal point for pleasure, inspiration and entertainment.

The full, brilliant tone will be a permanent delight; and the easy, responsive action makes the Betsy Ross Spinet the preferred piano with beginners and accomplished musicians. Styled by decorators, its superb appearance will lend importance to your home; and its compact size enables you to use it to advantage in both large and small rooms.

Made ONLY by the Lester Piano Manufacturing Company, makers of the renowned Lester Grand Pianos, each Betsy Ross Spinet is moderately priced and guaranteed for ten years.

ONE { name / quality / price }

Foreign Sales Office:
H. A. ASTLETT & CO.—27 William St., New York 5, N.Y.

MAIL THIS COUPON FOR ILLUSTRATED BOOKLET T

LESTER PIANO MANUFACTURING CO., LESTER 13, PENNSYLVANIA

Send me your 24-page illustrated book showing piano arrrangement in the home.
(Enclose 10c for postage)

NAME_____
ADDRESS_____
CITY_____ STATE_____

Hawaiian Tapa cloth background painted by Everett Henry.

SURPRISES FROM PINEAPPLE LAND

What this country needs are more pleasant surprises at the dining table... salad surprises... dessert surprises! As an enthusiastic contributor of such surprises, Patricia Collier, Dole Home Economist, presents three new pineapple recipes for you to try. And for surprisingly pleasant refreshment during the day, she suggests you drink cool glasses of Dole Pineapple Juice.

CHICKEN SALAD PLATTER

Cut Dole Pineapple Slices in halves and arrange around edge of a large plate in scallop design, as shown. Combine coarsely-cut leftover roast chicken or turkey, chopped hard cooked egg, sliced celery, and strips of sweet pickle in desired proportions; dice 1 or more pineapple slices, and add; mix with French dressing, season well, and heap in center of pineapple-bordered plate. Serve mayonnaise or Thousand Island dressing separately.

DOLE RECIPE 46-13

BAKED PINEAPPLE-DATE PUDDING

Combine 1 cup drained Dole Pineapple Chunks, 1 cup chopped dates, 1 cup coarsely chopped walnuts. Sift ½ cup flour with 1 tsp. baking powder and ½ tsp. salt, add to fruit, mix well, and set aside. Beat 3 egg whites stiff; set aside. With same beater beat 3 egg yolks with 1 tsp. vanilla; gradually beat in ¾ cup sugar. Stir in fruit and flour mixture, then fold in beaten whites; bake in a greased shallow 8" x 12" pan in moderately slow oven (325°) about 35 minutes. Break in pieces, serve warm or cold with whipped cream. Serves 8 to 10.

DOLE RECIPE 46-14

PINEAPPLE-BEET RELISH SALAD

Pineapple Layer: Add 1 tbsp. plain gelatin to ¼ cup cold water; set aside. Heat 2½ cups (a No. 2 can) Dole Crushed Pineapple just to boiling, remove from heat, stir in gelatin and 1 tbsp. lemon juice. Pour half this mixture into 9" x 4" x 4" loaf pan, chill until firm. Beet Layer: Add 1 tbsp. plain gelatin to ¼ cup cold water. Heat 1¼ cups beet-liquid-and-water to boiling, remove from heat, stir in gelatin. Add 1 tsp. salt, 3 tbsps. sugar, 3 tbsps. vinegar or lemon juice, and remaining pineapple-gelatin mixture. Cool until it begins to thicken, then fold in 2 cups chopped cooked beets, 1 cup diced celery, 2 tsps. minced onion, 2 tsps. horseradish. Pour over pineapple layer in pan, and chill. Serve sliced, with mayonnaise. Serves 8 or more.

DOLE RECIPE 46-15

DOLE

HAWAIIAN PINEAPPLE PRODUCTS

FIFTY YEARS AGO IN THE JOURNAL

IN January, 1897, Lillian Russell was Broadway's darling in American Beauty, and writer Kate Field died. Buffalo Bill was trying to get wealthy sportsmen interested in financing a 100,000-acre game preserve (enclosed by an eight-foot fence!). The Clevelands' New Year reception was termed one of the most brilliant ever seen in Washington. The Times reported that in 1896 over 1500 New Yorkers died of diphtheria. There were only 70 homicides.

In the January, 1897, JOURNAL, Stephen Fiske describes the Prince of Wales' visit to America. "As soon as the Prince left a hotel, women would rush into his rooms and seize all sorts of articles, from a furniture button to a soiled towel, as souvenirs, and even bottled up the water with which he had washed his face."

Wedding cake: Cream a pound and a half of butter with the same amount of sugar, add ten eggs . . .

The growing male readership of the JOURNAL resulted in two columns for men in this fifty-year-old issue.

Advises Walter Germain in the column What Men are Asking: "The proper attire for church is a frock coat, gray cashmere striped trousers, top hat, buttoned patent-leather shoes."

Decoration note: "Old-fashioned" marble mantels draped with embroidered fringed scarfs, striped turban cloth, or covered with peacock feathers.*

Sarah Tyson Rorer, "the most famous cook in America," joined the JOURNAL staff this month. Mrs. Rorer was one of the first persons to make this country food-value conscious. She abhorred the twelve-course dinner, suggested one entree instead of three or four. "Her favorite assertion," remarks the JOURNAL, "is that everything depends upon the food a person puts into his stomach."

From the RCA tower's distance lends added enchantment to the view, dulls the city's roar.

Gossip about people you know, editors you like and what goes on in New York.

IF you want to get away from the crowds here New Year's Eve, the most exciting spot we know is the top of the building next door to the Workshop. The air is fresh, the noise that splits your ears at street level comes up like something symphonic, and the view is the most breath-taking in the world, as you can see. The only trouble is trying to get quietly home to bed before the spell is broken—or a good resolution.

Out at Iowa State University, according to a report Henrietta Murdock has been reading, two scientists, after studying ninety-five infants for two and a half years, have discovered that while boys and girls begin with the same number of phonetic sounds during the first year, all girls, after the first year, can outtalk the boys. No figures on adults, but Miss M. surmises those go without saying.

The Workshop's most recent bride, Judy Barry, can't wear her wedding ring. Turns out she's allergic to gold.*

In spite of the fact that Eleanor Roosevelt, like all Presidents' widows, has a mail franking privilege from the Government, her correspondence is so tremendous it costs her about $20,000 a year to handle it—pays her own foreign postage, air mail, registered and special delivery. Most people seem to think she gets a pension. She doesn't.

When the Goulds went the other night to see Eugene O'Neill's The Iceman Cometh with Mr. and Mrs. DeWitt Wallace, editors of The Reader's Digest, Mrs. W. told Mr. G., however since she was a schoolgirl she's been a passionate theatergoer—completely carried away by almost every play she sees. Remembered being in the middle of a performance of Paid in Full, years ago, while the memory of the Iroquois Theater's tragic fire in Chicago was still fresh, when a blaze broke out up in the balcony where she was sitting. Everybody else went into a panic. All she could think, she said, was, "Oh, now I won't see the end of the play!" But she did. The fire was put out, and the play, fortunately, went on.

Wandering through the Egyptian section of the Metropolitan Museum of Art recently, Frank Eltonhead bumped into a cocktail party the museum was throwing to introduce a game new to him, called Senít, something like backgammon, played with a small board, markers and dice. A little surprised at such levity amid the monuments, Frank lingered and learned the game wasn't really very new—was a favorite with the Pharaohs five thousand years ago, in fact. Anyhow, thanks to the Egyptologists at the museum, Senít has now been revived, in case you're looking for something to give to a game-loving friend.

Senit, old game comes back.

One reason why overalls are as scarce for working men as soap powder is for women is the teen-age craze for jeans.

Just back from a flying visit to Europe, Louise Paine Benjamin tells us that in Sweden she saw a set of 487 pieces of glassware being manufactured for Haile Selassie, and that in a London beauty salon she sat next to the English writer Edith Sitwell, who was having her finger nails done in iridescent ginger.

If in the course of time you notice a helicopter hovering just overhead, the occupant peering down will probably be George P. Brett, Jr., president of Macmillan, who sat next to Mrs. Gould the other day and told her he was through with automobiles, wants to fly leisurely just above the treetops, and settle down to earth whenever he sees anything that really attracts his attention, catching up with all the wonderful sights which he has always missed from the highways.

George Bernard Shaw had only five years of formal schooling. . . . High heels were first used by King Louis XIV, who wanted to be taller than a statuesque beauty he was courting. . . . The doorbell of Hoagy Carmichael's house plays the opening strains of Stardust. . . . The U. S. has 6 per cent of the world's area, 7 per cent of its people, 60 per cent of its telephones, 80 per cent of its motorcars, 35 per cent of its railroads and two thirds of its banking resources. . . . After a good night's sleep you may be as much as half an inch taller than when you went to bed. . . . A common needle consists of a butt, shank, slot, latch, eye, rivet, throat and hook. . . . Cat racing is a popular sport in England, where cats chase a mechanical mouse over a 220-yard course. Female cats are the speedier. . . . The number of births registered in the U. S. currently averages 225,000 a month, which is more than double the present death rate—and means 1,250,000 additional population a year. The total population of the U.S. has increased approximately 8,000,000 since 1940. . . . Alaska is a woman's paradise: ten men to every woman.

Holiday Headlines

No other shampoo leaves your hair more lustrous, yet so easy to manage!

Christmas at its merriest . . . New Year's at its happiest . . . and lovely you at your loveliest . . . your Drene-clean hair shining-bright, alight with all its natural lustre!

Here, famous Magazine Cover Girl and Drene Girl, Arline Dahlman, shows you the three holiday hair-dos she likes best. "But first," suggests Arline, "make sure your hair is at its gleaming, glamorous best . . . by using Drene Shampoo with Hair Conditioning action." No other shampoo leaves your hair more lustrous, yet so easy to manage.

Drene Shampoo with Hair Conditioning Action

RING IN THE NEW . . . with a new beauty-thrill for you! Besides revealing up to 33 percent more lustre than any soap or soap shampoo, Drene, with Hair Conditioning action, leaves your hair smoother, silkier, easier to manage right after your shampoo. For this party hair-do, Drene Girl Arline Dahlman ties all her hair high in back and swirls it around on top.

ON CHRISTMAS MORNING, Arline sweeps her hair into two side loops, the left front section a top curl for added height. "And for added glamour," she says, "I always keep my hair Drene-clean." Drene is not a soap shampoo . . . and therefore leaves no dulling film on hair as all soaps do.

•

ARLINE LOVES VARIETY in hair-dos, as well as in Christmas decorations. Here her luxurious upswept curls are kept in place by hidden bobby pins. "But don't let dandruff hide the beauty of your hair," she says. Drene removes unsightly dandruff flakes the first time you use it.

Mary Hallam

THE STORY OF A GIRL WHO TRIED TO SENTENCE HER HEART—TO A LIFE WITHOUT LOVE.

THE FIRST OF THREE PARTS.

By Susan Ertz

IN the spring of 1939 Maud Cotter was in London again, after spending nearly two years at her home in Boston. The time had passed pleasantly enough, but it was not her habit to be long away from Europe. A lover of her own country, her palate pleased and stimulated—so that the patriotic juices were kept flowing—by the good salty flavor of American life, she had other needs which could be satisfied only by Europe.

Crossing the Atlantic, she thought, This may be the last time, and felt like a hungry man confronted by more food than he can eat today, knowing that there may be none tomorrow. And, now that she was in London for a short stay only, she wanted to leave herself free to do the things she had planned, so she was busy seeing certain old friends whom she could not come to

★ ★ ★ Copyright, 1940, by Susan Ertz ★ ★ ★

ILLUSTRATED BY AL PARKER

England and not see. The first of these were Lettice (Letty) and Nelson Hallam. She had telephoned to Letty that morning and Letty had insisted that she come to tea that same afternoon. "I want to be the first of your friends to see you," she said, at the same time asking a favor and conferring one. And Maud told Lowell Pierce, who had come from Boston with her, that she would have to go, speaking with some reluctance, though she had every intention of going.

She had an elder-sister feeling toward Letty, a little sentimental because of old memories and mixed often enough with irritation, but nevertheless tough and enduring. As she waited now in Letty's drawing room, it amused her to note what new objects had attracted Letty's magpie eye. What Letty liked, she liked; no one could tell her anything. No one ever could. The lamp shades made Maud think of Burmese temples done in silk, with points and knobs and fringes. On the great Bechstein grand piano—did Mary, she wondered, still play it?—was a cut-glass bowl full of tulips, arranged, she felt sure, by the accurate eye and careful unloving hand of Burroughs, the elderly parlormaid. The house looked as though it had been "done" by some big department store. Everything bore witness to it: the shiny brocades, the rugs—crudely colored imitations of Aubusson carpets, covering the parquet floor almost from wall to wall—the new and glossy walnut furniture, the tall red-lacquer Chinese Chippendale secretary desk which looked as though it had just come from the manufacturers and was probably as expensive as a genuine piece would have been.

"WHY," Letty had once asked, "should I pay good money for wormholes and dry rot?" Letty knew the goodness of money. She had once ached and yearned for it. Over the handsome Adam fireplaces which were an original part of the house were huge French mirrors in elaborate gilt frames. There were oil paintings to which Maud's eye was drawn again and again with something of the painful fascination with which the eye is drawn to some abnormality, or to the body of a dead animal in the road. These, Maud thought, had doubtless come from the art department of the same large store. One was of woolly Highland cattle surrounded by mists and woolly heather, another a blatant garden scene loud with delphiniums, lupines and crimson ramblers. And Maud asked herself, not for the first time, Well, why shouldn't Letty like what she likes? And to that there was no answer.

She let her mind run back to her first meeting with Letty Parrish in the Bois de Boulogne in Paris in the spring of 1914. Mrs. Parrish, her pretty, long-suffering mother, had been in the habit of taking the eleven-year-old Letty into the Bois every morning, for the child loved to ride on the roundabouts and catch rings on a stick, winning prizes of sugar candy. Maud, twenty-one and old for her years even then, had stood watching one day at her mother's side, half wishing she were young enough to take a turn. They saw Letty get down when the music stopped, present her rings and receive her prize. The day being warm, she was coatless and hatless and her light brown hair hung down her back. She had evidently been aware of their interest, for she came up to them and said, holding her stick of candy, "I've seen you here before. I'm English and my name's Letty Parrish. You're American, aren't you?" She spoke without a trace of shyness, and led them purposefully to where her mother sat reading under a chestnut tree. A few days later the Cotters went to lunch with the Parrishes in their small flat in the Île de la Cité, and a friendship was thus begun.

The meeting turned out to be providential for Mrs. Parrish. Leonard Parrish, her husband, had lost his job as agent for a firm of Yorkshire woolen merchants and was in debt and in other difficulties of whose nature Mrs. Parrish was only just becoming unhappily aware. Paris had been the undoing of him, a process which had been gathering momentum for over five years. Now the rot had gone too far, and not long after the Cotters appeared on the scene Leonard Parrish disappeared, leaving a note to say that he had no intention of returning and that it would be useless to look for him. Mrs. Parrish did, nevertheless, ask the police to trace him, and he was found living with a dancer in the Montparnasse quarter. That was the end.

Thanks to Mrs. Cotter's financial help, all four presently returned to London. But her kindness did not stop there. She was the friend of all women who had suffered through no fault of their own from light-minded husbands, and she championed Mrs. Parrish with a missionary zeal lightened by humor. After considering various alternatives, she finally bought the lease of a house in Richmond and turned it over to Mrs. Parrish to run as a select boardinghouse, with herself and Maud as the first boarders. Once the establishment began to pay, Mrs. Cotter was to receive an agreed percentage of profits.

Then came the war, and somewhat reluctantly—for it annoyed her that her actions should be dictated by outside events—Mrs. Cotter took her daughter back to Boston.

They did not return to England till the summer of 1920, and on their arrival they learned that Mrs. Parrish had decided to marry again, Leonard Parrish having been killed fighting with the French in the Battle of the Marne.

They found Letty, now seventeen, in furious revol against her mother and the man her mother wanted t marry, a kindly, cultured bachelor of fifty named Eva Fulbright, who was head of a preparatory school fo boys in Gloucestershire. It was clear to the Cotters tha a very real happiness was in danger of being wrecked b Letty's intransigence, so they took her away with then to Cornwall while poor, harassed Mrs. Parrish closed th boardinghouse, married her schoolmaster and went fo her honeymoon to the lake district. By the time th newly married pair were settled in Gloucestershire, more or less reconciled Letty was ready to join them.

But Mrs. Parrish's marriage had quickened Letty' determination to provide herself with a home of her own She proposed to marry, at the first opportunity, a ma already settled in life and considerably older than herself The Cotters were not surprised to hear, therefore, i 1921, that she was engaged and that her marriage woul take place as soon as they paid their annual visit to Eng land. Maud could still recall the wording of her letter

You've heard of Hallam Typewriters, of course. Everyon has. Well, that's Nelson. His uncle died a few years ago an left him the business and a lot of money. I met him at m first grown-up dance, a hunt ball in Warwickshire. He is widower and has a six-year-old daughter, so I shall be a step mother at eighteen! We will live in London and Nelson wi expect me to entertain a good deal.

Much the same sort of letter she would have writte today, with no attempt made to cover up her unashame edly practical outlook.

They had gone to the wedding, which took place a the village church near Evan Fulbright's school. Nelson' little daughter Mary, a dark, delicate-looking unsmilin child, was bridesmaid. Mrs. Cotter did not take to he but she interested Maud, who noticed a look of appre hension in her eyes, though she seemed not to hav lacked care and attention.

MAUD yawned, the open, satisfying yawn of the unob served, and took out her engagement book. This was th tenth of April and the year 1939. She was going to Pari the following week with Lowell Pierce. The prospect wa an extremely agreeable one. She had between fourtee and fifteen weeks in which to do what she pleased, pro vided she went the rounds of the picture exhibition made some purchases for a Boston art gallery and ser off a monthly article for the Amateur Collector. Here duty and inclination were in complete accord. "Bliss, she said aloud, and put her engagement book back int her handbag. Then she heard Letty's step on the stai

One of the first things Maud had noticed about Lett was her way of walking. It was (Continued on Page 5

"This is no good for you," reason said. But her heart beat a warning: "Love comes only once."

Maid

SIDNEY GREER hesitated and then turned down the right corridor. That way he would pass Mathilda's office. He made a point of dropping in several times a day to tell her a bit of gossip, a joke he had just heard, anything to take that lost look from her eyes for a minute.

He looked through the glass. Sweet little kid! The desk light shone on her satiny brown hair, her skin was like a flower. That's what she was, a crushed flower. She looked up and with sudden inspiration he saluted her smartly, seriously, as though she were chief of police and he a passing rookie. She returned his salute just as seriously and he went on down the corridor pleased. She'd smile. She'd say, "Good old Sidney."

Good old Sidney. Mathilda smiled to herself. If only he wouldn't attempt humor. And his efforts to cheer her were so obvious. Dear Sidney, with a heart of pure crystal—transparent. She remembered the day he brought Press in that door, Sidney all puffed up at playing Cupid. He was in love with her himself, but that was Sidney, selfless. "I want you to meet Prescott Avery, our new junior executive."

She drew little circles on the paper, smiling, remembering. "This is Junior calling." Press said when he phoned asking for a date. She knew before that evening was over. They had the same sense of what was funny—more important than anything else in marriage. Let Fate sling anything at them; they could take it—laughing. Lost jobs, lost collar buttons. Broken contracts, broken coffee cups. Big disasters or little—they could take them. She hadn't thought—she never foresaw —— The pencil dropped from her fingers and she sat paralyzed. It never left her, never for one minute.

Someone in her doorway. She looked up. "Have you seen Mr. Gree-eer?" Sidney's secretary, Winnie Logan, was very, very refined—especially when talking to Mathilda, who presumably represented gentry.

Mathilda jerked her thumb. "That way."

Winnie didn't approve of her boss' straying about the office. If he was good and did as she said, he would be president of the company someday. I hope Sidney appreciates her, Mathilda thought. I hope he pays her enough. The two went back by the window, Winnie's high pompadour making her look like a drum major. This time Sidney did not glance in. He was being Sidney Greer, vice-president of the Eastwood Agency.

The phone burred. "A bit of luck, Mrs. Avery. I was able to make that Wy-pit appointment for Friday. You know how hard it is to pin old Silsbee down."

"But, Mr. Gorman, I told you we couldn't have the campaign ready until next Monday."

"I know, I know—but with a clever little lady like you on the job ——"

She cut him off. It meant asking the studio to work late tonight and tomorrow night. It meant working late herself. Not that that mattered—she might just as well spend the evenings here as at home—but she hated having things put over on her. She hated having to jolly the artists.

She called the apartment to break the news to Cloon.

Mrs. Cloon said oh, no, she couldn't possibly stay. If Mrs. Avery had spoken of it last week now —— "Anyway, I don't think Johnny is feeling so well."

Mathilda knew Mrs. Cloon and her tricks too well to fall for that. "Have you taken his temperature?" she asked sweetly.

"Oh, he isn't that sick," the fool answered.

It took six calls to get a sitter. From then on it was as though the fiends had got her range. . . . Now everything you've got, boys. . . . More things can go wrong in a studio! Every artist concentrated on getting his sizes mixed, on inventing his own spelling, on losing his copy. She kidded them, wanting to throw things. Once let them see she was bothered and she was lost.

"It's funny about men," she thought. "They don't do things to themselves to make themselves attractive—and yet they can be so very attractive."

At eight-thirty the sitter phoned. She was seventeen and shy. "I'm terribly sorry to bother you, Mrs. Avery. I didn't know just what to do. I'm afraid Johnny has a fever—and he's breathing funny—and sort of crying in his sleep."

Mathilda said she would be right home and shoved the phone across the desk. Why couldn't Cloon have put her story over? Why did Johnny have to choose tonight? He'd had tonsillitis only two weeks ago. He was so difficult when he was sick. She sat and stared at the drawing she was mounting. A can of kitchen cleanser twenty stories tall against a post-card sunset, with a ring-around-a-rosy of women and children about it. She studied the thing. The dawn of a new day for womanhood, it represented. At last they could get out in a field and gallop around a tin can!

She got up; she was certainly in a bad way looking at her job like that. She left her little cell and went over to the artists' spacious quarters. "I have to leave, friends. Johnny is sick—nothing much, but I seem to be needed. You'll keep at it until you see the whites of your eyes or something, won't you? Maybe the building will burn down and we won't have to work tomorrow night. Sorry to desert."

They called out varied sympathetic comments and gave her that look, that look everyone in the agency gave her even now after two months. She could hear them as plainly as though she hid behind the door. Poor kid. Tough luck. Press Avery was a swell guy too. She held her teeth tight together and stuck her chin high. What right had they to be here? Damn every man on earth who still lives and breathes! she thought.

HER LOVE, SHE SAID, WAS A LIVING THING . . IN THE HOUSE OF THE DE

"The first day I saw her, I knew her for my love," he thought. "It was like a curtain pulled—a revelation of what life might be."

Loginess

Sidney in the elevator. "Why, Mathilda, I didn't know you were working tonight. I just dropped in for some papers." He waved them to prove it. "Anything wrong?"

A silly question to ask of a girl with whom nothing could ever be right again. She shook her head.

Sidney wore shell glasses, the bands behind his ears wide as drive shafts, the lenses large as driving wheels. He had a schoolgirl complexion with sandy hair and lashes. Lots of the girls in the office thought him very good-looking.

She told him about Johnny when she had swallowed her voice back to normal.

"But you know Johnny. He runs a temperature at the drop of a hat. I'm just tired. It's been quite a day."

He didn't smile back, but studied her, deadly serious. "I'll buy you a taxi."

As a rule at one lift of Sidney Greer's finger taxis poured up out of manholes, dropped from roofs. Not tonight. He waved and signaled, looking sillier and sillier. She'd much rather go home alone in a bus.

"Would you take a week if I could arrange it—you and Johnny go somewhere?" he asked when they were settled in a rackety, smoke-filled number.

"No—oh, no. I'm all right. I get a vacation this summer. And the company was so decent to me—then. I took a week."

"Decent!" Sidney exploded. "Why shouldn't they be decent to the bravest little kid——"

"Oh, Sidney—cut it," she said rudely. Hatefully. It was just tiredness. Sidney was sweet.

The stairs looked endless. When they were first married Press used to carry her up the first long flight.

"Show-off," she would taunt him then. "He-man."

"You can carry me up the next flight," he told her, being big.

She would pretend to take him seriously. "I'll tr-ry. I'm not sure I can carry you all the way," she'd say.

He would hug her and roar with laughter at the thought of her lifting him off the ground. She heard his laugh ahead of her, behind her, up the stairs.

Johnny woke when she came into the bedroom.

"He's much cooler," Rose, the sitter, apologized.

"You din ca hoh," Johnny protested around the thermometer.

"I must have come home. Here I am."

Johnny smiled weakly. He watched as she examined the thermometer. "May I shake it down, mother?"

"No—you'll drop it."

"No I won't." He grabbed it and hit the edge of the table. The glass stick snapped.

"Johnny!" Much too loud, too sharp. He burst into tears. She comforted him—inadequately. "I broke four pencils today. One of the artists dropped a bottle of ink—indelible ink."

From the living room she could still hear his smothered sobs. And I'm the girl who was going to be such a swell mother. Everyone would say, "Press and Tilda are bigger kids than their children—wonderful, isn't it? Lucky children!" They were going to have six. She stared unblinking at the floor. It would have been better if Johnny had never been born. It was his hard luck he was to have a bitter mother, as it was his hard luck never to have a real home, or brothers and sisters. As it was her hard luck that she was to have nothing—nothing ever again.

CLOON had left a small fire in the grate and the room was cozy. She sat in Prescott's chair—if you sit in a chair you don't have to look at it empty. Outside taxis honked.

The first night they moved in here they had hung out those windows, two kids scared of their own happiness, looking down on ordinary earthbound creatures.

"Can you live on bread and kisses, Mrs. Avery?"

"I don't care so much for bread," she said and he kissed her and kissed her.

She closed her eyes and tried to hold to the feel of his arms—his lips.

The apartment had been bare at first: no rugs, no curtains, a few pieces of furniture their friends gave them, the desk Press had in college. They bought the couch secondhand, Press got the rug with his first bonus. The room had a glow—the red chintz curtains, the dark green walls, the brass. She would never change it—never, never. Not if things rotted and dropped to dust and ashes.

Press thought it was so funny that her maternity dresses were size nine. She was home from the office then, but she used to meet him for lunch. Those days rolled through her mind as vividly as though they were on a screen, as though every look, every laugh, every lovely mad moment, were recorded. She would never forget one thing he ever said, one look that ever passed over his face. Bringing the baby out to parties. The gang kidding him for his pride in the baby's straight head and strong back. "Look at that muscle. . . . Fat? You're crazy. Look at that left hook—did you see that? Watch now—that-a-boy!"

Could this pale, skinny Johnny be the same child?

She noticed now that there was mail on the table and from the bills and ads picked out a strange envelope. "Notice of Eviction," she read. How perfectly absurd! "An action to evict the tenant is hereby authorized solely for the purpose of occupancy by Joseph Morando." She read it angrily. Why do people make such silly mistakes—why scare her this way? It was her name—her address. But it had to be a mistake—it had to be. She jumped up from the chair. Kitty would know.

(Continued on Page 80)

"You didn't need to say so much," she stammered,
"and you didn't have to say it quite so hard."

ILLUSTRATED BY

The Right Word—

BY MILDRED NORTH SLATER

ALL the way into the city on the 8:10, the scene at the breakfast table haunted him. For once the financial page held no interest; the whole investment-counsel business could blow up, and all his clients with it. Staring moodily out the train window across the dark green salt marsh, he realized with a guilty start that for a long time now, without his being aware of it, there had been two worlds beneath his roof: he spun about in one of them, obsessed with the daily problems of office and business; and Mae and the children spun about in the other. The two worlds had touched of necessity, of course, but because Mae had somehow learned to step back and forth from hers to his; he had not, until now, felt the slightest consciousness of loss or isolation.

Little things, seen with this new awareness, began to magnify and take on importance. At one station after another, for example, there were children and mothers in cars waving gay good-by's to fathers. The repeated pattern filled him with a vague sense of lack, of something wanting. He lived too close to the station, certainly, for Mae to drive him; but when, he found himself wondering, had the children shown the slightest inclination to walk to the train with him, or to meet his train at night? Yet Mae couldn't move from the house without John or Eileen tagging after her. Queer that a little thing like that should all at once seem momentous. But it did.

The train flashed over the trestle that spanned the sparkling blue tidal river and he suddenly thought of Eileen's eyes, swimming with tears. His shoulders moved uneasily beneath his loose tweed jacket and his hand passed slowly across his chin.

"I'm eight," Eileen had been saying, picking up at breakfast the argument that she and John had left off at bedtime the night before. "I'm eight and I've been on bird walks and you haven't and I should know. A nuthatch is a bird."

"Well, if you're eight, I'm six," John blurted, "and a nuthatch is a thing you open nuts with; like a woodhatch is a thing you cut down trees with, and I don't care what you say."

"A bird." Like the unrelenting snip of scissors from Eileen.

"A nutcracker thing." Like a chant from John.

"Bird."

"Nutcracker."

"Bird."

Exasperated, Larry turned the pages of the morning paper to the market reports, but Mae spoke to the children with the long-suffering patience that he sometimes thought mothers must bring into the world along with their offspring.

"When you've finished your breakfast, get out the bird book and look it up," she told them. "But now, suppose you drink your orange juice and stop the bickering."

The orange-juice glasses rose obediently, and Larry sighed with relief. But almost immediately Eileen said, "And what's more, smarty-pants Johnny Wall, I've seen them walking upside down. Nuthatches, I mean."

There was utter and complete silence for a moment, then John's lower lip shot forward.

"Mom," he howled, "she's doing it again. She's lying at me. Make her stop."

Larry flung his paper to the floor. He glared indignantly at Mae. She was calmly spooning soft-boiled eggs into two yellow cups, salting and peppering the eggs, breaking in bits of buttered toast. How, he thought distractedly, she could sit there without even hearing was beyond him. And why she permitted this constant morning squabbling——

"Stop that bellowing!" he exploded. "Where do you think you are?"

John's mouth, opening to howl again, closed soundlessly.

Looking grimly from one child to the other, he said in Day-of-Judgment tones, "Both of you. Listen to me. A nuthatch is a bird. A bird, John, do you understand? They can run down trees headfirst, like squirrels. They nest in holes in trees. They push their food into cracks or crevices with their bills. They use their bills like hatchets. And that is how they got the name: nuthatch." He felt the tenseness of his jaw as he turned to apple-cheeked, blue-eyed John. "There is no such thing as a woodhatch. The word is 'hatchet.'" He turned from John to pink-cheeked, flaxen-haired Eileen, and further thought of chastisement failed him as he saw her lashes blink at him and her eyes fill up like two blue ponds of tears.

"You d-didn't need to say so much," she stammered. "Just 'a b-bird' was all you h-had to say."

He understood exactly what she meant and he wanted to cut his tongue out. Mae was gazing at him with a strangely introspective expression, and the way she bent her head when he stared back hurt him more than anything she might have said. He could almost feel her pity for the children in the soft warm flush of her face and throat, feel it in the way she drew her upper lip down, as though she, too, were close to tears.

BUT it was John who broke the tension in the air. Spinning his eggcup on his plate, he scrouged up his face and yelled with all his might, "Here, Pip-squeak. H-e-r-e, Pip!"

Pipsqueak, the wire-haired, came bounding into the dining room with joyous yelps.

"Look, Eileen," John pleaded. "Look. I'm going to give my egg to Pip. Look, why don't you?"

Mae rescued the eggcup with one hand, as Eileen flung herself against her.

"He didn't have to say it so hard, either," Eileen cried hysterically. "And I—I'm mad at him; I——" Burying her head in Mae's lap, she sobbed, "I hate my father."

"Hush," Mae whispered. "You mustn't even think such a horrible thing. Come, let's go up and wash your face in nice cold water, shall we?"

John sat for a moment, staring at his plate. Then almost fearfully, he slid from his chair and collared the dog and followed his mother and sister from the room.

LARRY bent and picked up the paper from the floor. He smoothed and folded it carefully. He would have to read it on the train. Children, he told himself, kicked up storms like this. It didn't mean anything. Kids said all sorts of crazy things. And John leaving him that way, without a word. That was natural too. Probably frightened by all the hubbub. By tonight they'd both be over it and the whole thing would be forgotten. But Eileen was right, of course; amazingly right for a child her age. He needn't have said so much so hard.

And all the way to the train, after calling good-by up the staircase, he thought of all the ways he might have said whatever he had to say:

Look here, Eileen, he might have said, go get the bird book and we'll find John a nuthatch. He might have laughed and said, I don't know why they don't call 'em woodhatches, son—perfectly good word, to my way of thinking—but they don't. They call 'em hatchets.

If he had handled it that way, as he should have, as any understanding parent would have, they'd be happy now and so would he. But he had so much on his mind these days, and that singsong nuthatch and woodhatch business. Woodhatch, he thought again, and his eyebrows drew together in a puzzled frown as a memory stirred in him. It had something to do with wood, and oddly enough with his father. Then all at once he remembered, and wished he hadn't, as a vivid picture from his childhood came to him with an unexpected and almost alarming sharpness:

He was sitting on the ground, his back against the woodshed. A red-covered book, The Harvester, was propped up on his knees. The sun was warm on his head and shoulders and the bare earth cool beneath his toes. He should have been cutting stove lengths for his mother's Saturday-morning baking; but he was lost in an exciting dream and the wood was still untouched. Lifting his eyes from the book, he gazed that day over fi[illegible] orchards, mentally exploring their breath-[illegible] possibilities. Why! What the Harvester had done might be done all over again, because things didn't ever stop growing. Even stuff the Indians had used was still used for boils and things. Ginseng, whatever that was, and medicinal herbs—probably right here on the farm, right under his very nose, just waiting to be harvested and sold, just like the book told about. He'd probably tramped barefoot right over a fortune without even knowing it. His heart began to pound as the dream expanded inside him. The mortgage on the farm was magically wiped out, the taxes and insurance paid, his father's overalls discarded for a fine blue suit with a stripe in it. His mother sat in the parlor in a grand new dress. And a hired man

(Continued on Page 109)

Sometimes fathers don't know about little girls. They have to reach out or there's nothing left but a turned back and two separate worlds.

There was such gaiety to loving, something she had not realized love could hold.

Just what She wanted

SHE WAS TWENTY-SIX: YOUNG ENOUGH TO DREAM, OLD ENOUGH NOT TO BE AFRAID OF WAKING. • BY SELMA HAUTZIK BRENNER

THEY were coming down the hill in the twilight, cold, with their jackets buttoned high and their skates slung over their shoulders. Men and women were rushing into and out of the shops before leaving Lausanne for the lake villages. The girls felt the cold, now that they were merely walking. They were irritable and hungry, and gave the impression that they felt the pensionnat they were returning to was not quite fashionable enough for the money they were paying. Ridiculous for it to be so far from the skating pond.

Miss Sand, the teacher who had taken them skating, was scolding the English girl.

"But I didn't flirt," said Rose Bryce. "He was only trying to teach me to skate backward."

"Besides," said Kate, her friend, "he wasn't a boy; he was at least thirty."

Miss Sand put her skates in her other hand and frowned, because she realized she was biting her lower lip, a detestable habit, to keep from answering sharply. She might at least sink gracefully to whatever regions they had assigned the old man of thirty. She was no longer a girl to them, she knew. She was slim and dark and twenty-four, and all she meant to them walking down the hill from the lake and the sun, straining her muscles as they strained theirs, watching the people as they watched them, was that she was thin and old and a teacher.

"It's nice to skate backward," she said, certain that they would feel no offense or gratitude.

It was evident that they felt nothing toward her. As a teacher it might be that they found her tolerant, lenient, perhaps likable; as a person, they did not know she existed. Even when they skated with her they were careful, slow, respectful. And now on the same hill that was more hers than theirs, that she had so often climbed for school and exciting walks, they were calm beside her, unaware of the lives she had lived at each crossing, of her imaginary interviews, indifferent to her company, drawing her into their conversation—silly enough, she admitted—only when it became serious.

She shrugged her shoulders and turned her attention to her beloved shopwindows. Yes, beloved, she smiled to herself; known and watched and gloated over for twenty years. The pastry shops were the most interesting, she decided, shutting herself off from the girls and giving herself over to an old and familiar pleasure; they changed so often. High cakes replaced flat toast; and creamy rolls, gingerbread. Thick éclairs made way for thicker layers, and colorful fruit tarts for coffee buns. The jewelry shops, she decided, were more constant; they didn't need changing so often. You could always notice something new about the same jewels. If you liked, the round watch was rounder and the long diamond longer than when you noticed them last week.

Here was a linen shop she liked, the same doilies and aprons arranged differently, but nothing new. Then the bookstore, always exciting in that swift passage; then the chocolate shop, sweet-smelling and coy; then another pastry shop, with cookies piled high in rows; then a corset store, dull and unchanging, and then Fayot's.

It was always here that she fancied her heart stopped for a moment. Whether she walked slowly or quickly, she had time to see something new, something (Continued on Page 149)

ILLUSTRATED BY JON WHITCOMB

How Lovable are You?

TIME FOR KIDS NEXT DOOR, SMILES FOR MORE THAN JUST BEAUS, MONEY FOR THE BROTHER THAT'S BROKE AND A DASH OF SYMPATHY WILL GIVE YOU A HIGH SCORE. ★ BY JAMES C. ADAMS

THERE'S no point in going out to the garden to eat worms just because people don't seem to care too much about your welfare. You can feel as sorry for yourself as you want, and eat as many worms as you want, too, for that matter; but it won't make your lot in life any happier. Of course, we may be presumptuous even to suggest that you ever were prompted to act in this fashion; but if you ever were, perhaps you're lacking in lovableness. Maybe that's the crux of your trouble. Maybe the reason you feel you're being slighted by life is that you just aren't lovable enough!

If you'd like to find out, answer the 20 questions which follow. Check Yes or No to each question. When you have finished, check your answers with the correct ones on page 159 and find your score. After that, act accordingly. Anyone who really wants to make himself lovable can. And it pays!

1 The Pollyanna theory that everyone is perfect often backfires. Nevertheless, there are some people who will always be convinced that most people are fundamentally pretty swell even if they're not completely perfect. Do you agree? . . . . . Yes ☐ No ☐

2 Friends can be a darn nuisance when you want to curl up with a good book and spend a nice quiet evening of undisturbed relaxation. At least, some people think so. Do you? . . . . . Yes ☐ No ☐

3 Dogs shed in the fall and get hair all over the place. Cats scratch things up unmercifully. Canaries make a fearful racket. But some people keep all three in their house at one time. Would you? . . Yes ☐ No ☐

4 Some people can't be happy unless their hearts are constantly turning flip-flops over someone of the opposite sex. Other people can go for months or even years without any flip-flops at all and get along fine. Can you? . . . . . Yes ☐ No ☐

5 Do you believe in the theory that once you've been introduced to people it's up to them to make the first move? If they want to be friendly, O.K.; if they don't, to heck with them! . . . . Yes ☐ No ☐

6 Being frank is supposedly an admirable trait. And if you are that way there is no need to change simply to spare someone's feelings. Or is there—do you think? . . . . . Yes ☐ No ☐

7 Maybe children should be seen but not heard, but if you're the type who likes to let her hair down and have a good romp with the kids occasionally, you probably think that theory is so much hooey. Are you that type? . . . . . Yes ☐ No ☐

8 It's a waste of time sometimes to trouble yourself over minor gifts for unimportant occasions that concern your family or friends—because they may not be appreciated. But some sentimentalists still get a terrific bang out of doing this sort of thing. Do you? . . . Yes ☐ No ☐

9 Living alone has a lot to recommend it. It's quiet. It's peaceful, and nobody is around to tell you what to do all the time. Do you think it would be pleasant? . . . . . Yes ☐ No ☐

10 Could your little boy or girl or a friend's child inveigle you into accompanying him to the Annual Old Folks Young Folks Frolic at his Sunday school although it meant canceling an engagement you'd been counting on for months? . . . . . Yes ☐ No ☐

11 Stick to your guns through thick and thin and you'll never lose an argument and probably make a lot of people think you know what you are talking about. Is that your practice, rather than giving in occasionally just to keep the peace?. . . . . Yes ☐ No ☐

12 Do you think it's necessary to keep yourself looking bright and shiny most of the time, despite the fact that anyone who is really fond of you would probably say he didn't care how you looked just so long as you were you? . . . . . Yes ☐ No ☐

13 Do you think it is worth bothering your head over someone who thinks you are rather a pain in the neck—and making an effort to have him find out that you're not so bad as he had believed? . . Yes ☐ No ☐

14 Some people sing out with enthusiasm for life and love, while others just meander about sort of accepting things as they come along. Are you the singing type rather than the meandering?. . . . Yes ☐ No ☐

15 Everybody is bored occasionally by others' conversation, but some people can get genuinely interested in almost anything. At least they make a good pretense of being. Can you? . . . . . Yes ☐ No ☐

16 You may be itching to take an outing in the country next Sunday, but if one of your good friends who is under the weather would like to have you around, would you be willing to change your plans without beefing about it for the next two weeks?. . . . . Yes ☐ No ☐

17 Keeping your troubles to yourself is a fine idea, but some people just can't seem to do it. When any of them come to you with theirs, can you shift into your good-listener gear and then send them off feeling like a million dollars?. . . . . Yes ☐ No ☐

18 "Sticks and stones break my bones, but words don't matter" is the philosophy that some people adhere to and consequently they aren't hurt very easily. Is this your philosophy too? . . . . . Yes ☐ No ☐

19 Everybody's meant to do his job well if he's going to do it at all. Is that any reason to give him a pat on the back? He's simply done what's expected of him!. . . . . Yes ☐ No ☐

20 "When you're in a jam here I am—with no strings attached and all the money I can lay my hands on." Are these your sentiments, too, as far as close friends and relatives are concerned, when they come to you to borrow money? . . . . . Yes ☐ No ☐

CHEZ MOUQUIN

Painted by William J. Glackens

HERSHEY COLLECTION, ART INSTITUTE OF CHICAGO

How rarely do American paintings suggest the pleasures of the senses! Our leading artists have preferred, instead, to represent precise fact; or, less often to do exactly the reverse: to create the mystery of an enchanted, spellbound world. But to search out the pleasanter aspects of life, to paint a delightful existence, ebullient with a gay, worldly sensuality—this spirit has been almost entirely lacking in American art.

Thus Chez Mouquin, by Glackens, stands a neglected signpost pointing in a direction few of our painters have thought to explore. Glackens himself was guided to that seductive region by the French impressionists. When he returned to America in 1896 after a year and a half in Paris, it must have occurred to him that a New York restaurant could be as joyous a subject for a painting as the bar of the Folies-Bergère, which Manet had made famous several decades earlier. Certainly the cellar, the bouillabaisse, the snails à la Parisienne at Chez Mouqin on 28th Street and 6th Avenue were as good as anything in France, and people seemed to enjoy themselves with the same zest, the same animal appetites they showed abroad. Realizing this, Glackens in 1905 painted a convivial double portrait of his friend, Jim Moore, and a professional model, with a pagan gaiety he had learned in Paris, but, also, with a sense for specific detail, which he had been taught as an illustrator for the leading papers of Philadelphia and New York.

JOHN WALKER, Chief Curator, National Gallery of Art

WHAT'S WRONG WITH HIGH SCHOOL?

By George H. Henry

PARENTS who now have a youngster in high school must surely have a vivid recollection of those events of the past fifteen years during which their child was reared: a drawn-out depression, a fierce and divisive conflict of ideas near its close, a devastating world war, and now the confusion of reconversion. These events rocked our churches to their very cornerstones, interfered with the functioning of the home, and caused many to veer from constitutional government itself; naturally, the schools, too, as part of that society, were profoundly altered.

With this past in mind, I should like to describe to the parent—especially to those parents who have a child now attending high school or will have one in high school in the next few years—what the present high school is like, and what it will be like for at least the next five or ten years.

I—THEY ARE OVERCROWDED

In 1930, around the time of the birth of your child now in high school, 47.09 pupils out of 100 eligible ones were in high school; by 1940, 77 out of 100 were attending high school. To put it another way, in 1930 there were 4,395,000 pupils in high school; in 1940 there were 6,601,440 pupils. We are granting one and a quarter million diplomas annually. In ten years over 12,000,000 pupils passed in and out of the high schools of our nation. Just as today the colleges hardly know how to accommodate the vast throngs of returning veterans who are taking advantage of the education clause written into the G. I. Bill of Rights, so the high schools have had to contend with the problem of numbers, year after year, for two decades; but with this difference: a frantic college president can say that his quota is filled; the high-school principal, in the name of democracy, has to find a desk, a locker, a book, a teacher, a place for everybody, without exception, short of being a proved moron or a confirmed delinquent. And many of these latter types were passed and graduated as one expedient in handling a hopeless situation. Let's fearlessly say what such a policy means: during the depression and the war there were absolutely no standards for admission to high school except mere attendance for eight or nine years in the elementary school. This policy is now established practice.

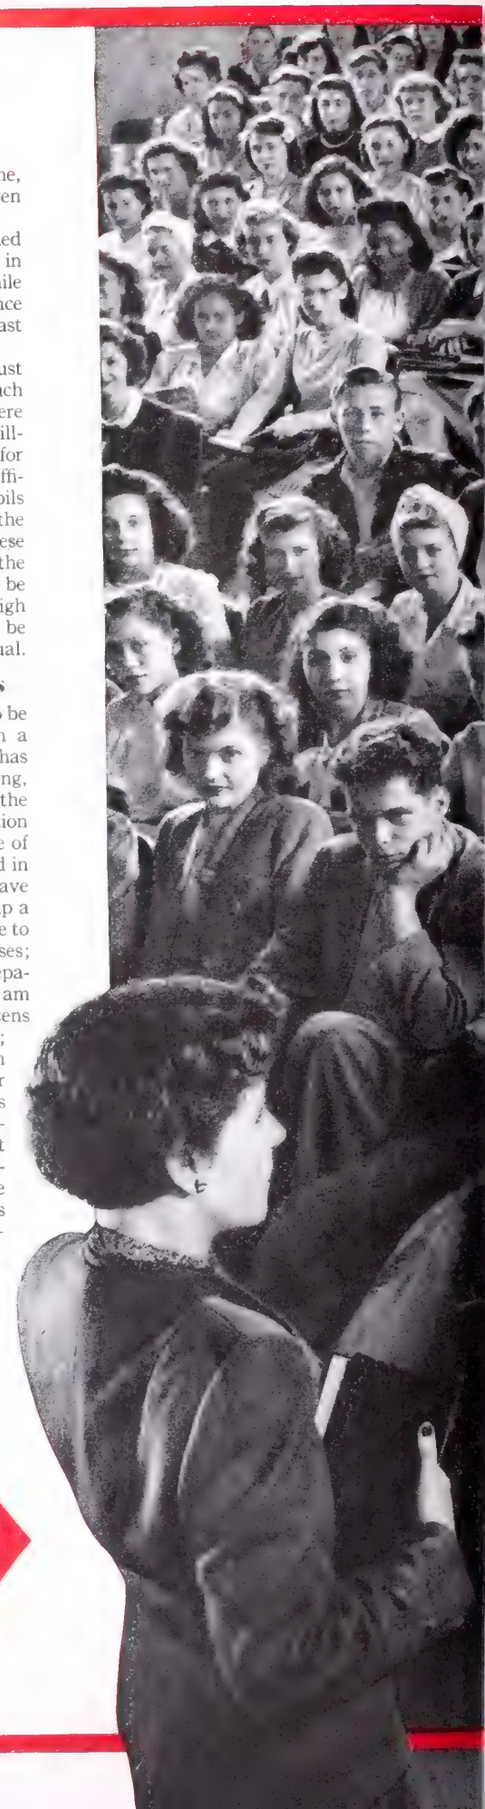
So the chances are that right now your child is in a crowded school and will continue to be in one until he graduates. With the millions of veterans returning, even though they may all find a place in an expanding economy, there is little likelihood that teen-age youths will ever in the next decade find much employment in that economy, for surely both veterans and adults will be served before youth. It thus looks as if youths can no longer profitably quit school even if they want to. Even in 1940 only 77 per cent of all eligible youths were in high school. Suppose within a few years this figure should rise to 90 per cent! Let us imagine, too, what would happen to high-school attendance if even slight adult unemployment should prevail.

Recently, an educator from New York State informed me that some members of the legislature, in order to be in readiness for such a contingency and to combat juvenile delinquency, are hoping to raise the compulsory-attendance law to age eighteen, just as Pennsylvania did during the last depression.

This is typical of our thinking about education: just pass a law but not provide for the consequences of such a law. Such a policy creates chaos in any high school where many are unwilling to be taught, and others, although willing, are allowed to languish in courses utterly unfit for them. Thus, high-school education in America is in the difficult position of being required to handle throngs of pupils for no other reason than to keep them from roaming the streets. It is important to note that the presence of these extra millions is not due to any abnormal increase in the population or to any sudden burning desire of youth to be educated. For the next few years the atmosphere of the high school where your child is attending will most likely be tentative, hurried, crowded and decidedly anti-intellectual.

II—THEY USE REGIMENTING METHODS

But, even if your child may be fortunate enough not to be in a crowded high school, he will undoubtedly be in a herded high school. For some reason or other, democracy has been unfortunately associated with herding, thronging, massing. Just because democracy means the voting of the masses, equal opportunity for the masses and the education of the masses, it does not follow that the mere presence of masses or droves of people doing everything at once and in the same way and in the same place is democracy. We have seen enough of that in Germany and Italy. Cooping up a thousand youngsters in a building and having them move to a master clock is not necessarily education of the masses; it may be just the opposite. In fact, it seems a good preparation of youth for the dictator principle. The war, I am afraid, has conditioned us all to accept massing: as citizens we line up for soap, for the movies, for medical care; pack ourselves into trains and into restaurants, and even jam the beaches; not to mention the millions of former soldiers who have learned to wait interminably in queues for everything, however private and personal. Our tolerance for this sort of thing may lead us to believe that education, too, can proceed like a bomber mission, or calisthenics, or the assembly line. Regimentation is the deadly foe of real education. Yet herding—educators euphemistically call it "administering the program"—seems to be the very essence of modern schooling.



[illegible] enrollment in our high schools, [illegible] by responsibility for more [illegible] the odds are stacked against [illegible] good high-school education.

This marshaling of youth to the routine of clock hour and to quantitative credits sometimes finely evaluated to an eighth of a unit, according to the length of a period, the number of periods a week, the number of meetings a year—has become the accepted order of all schools. Even the principal of an uncrowded small school, though some of his schoolrooms may stand idle, is proud of the "efficiency" of his schedule, which, in miniature, is exactly like a large-city system. But education must have some leisure, continued quiet and solitude. I do not imply that group living is not essential to an education; much education must be done in groups, and, at times, in large groups, to inculcate such attitudes as cooperation and such qualities as leadership. But under administrative herding even promotion degenerates into [illegible] to grade. Besides, many excellent ways of teaching, well known by teachers for fifty years, are seldom tried at all, because a quantitatively administered school plant comes before the soul of the pupil.

So efficient are the schools in respect to numbers that administrators themselves are alarmed at their own efficiency, and so they have devised a process called guidance: routine interviews conducted by amateur psychologists (called counselors), who in twenty minutes delve into a pupil's life to determine why he is failing or why he rebels against school authority. The heart-to-heart contagion, which is the essence and accompaniment of [illegible] consultation, and is, supposedly, the human oil dropped into the grinding gears of the diploma machine.

Despite this fad called guidance, the sincere teacher cannot become "close" to his pupils unless, through his [illegible] extraschool way; there is no place made for it in his daily task. The moving of numbers has been so well worked out after years of school administrative practice that teachers could not exert this personal tutorial influence even if they were allotted time for it. For the pupil's schedule is so much a part of the inflexible curriculum that the pupil and the teacher cannot find time to come together informally.

(Continued on Page 74)

"I heard you buying a book and I liked your voice." Regan said. "That's all. I just wanted to meet you." "Sit down," Sally said.

Tis the Kiss

SHE THOUGHT SHE KNEW ALL ABOUT HOW TEXAS HE-MEN SHOULD ACT—BUT HE LOOKED LIKE A MAN AND ACTED LIKE A MOUSE. ★ BY FRANK O'ROURKE

REGAN thought Santa Fe was the craziest town he had ever driven into knowingly, and then deliberately walked through and absorbed with his eyes and ears and nose; it was the past of America all tangled and interlocked with the present, and the future sticking up in certain odd representations of art and rainbow shops and Indians selling armloads of bracelets in the hotel lobby. He had spent two weeks in a comparatively civilized and quiet part of the Kerrville hill country in Texas, and then headed northwest in the general direction of anyplace, passing some nice towns and gradually working onto the first sloping plateaus of the mountains; and stopping in Clovis for ham and eggs at midnight, a truck driver told him how to find Santa Fe and he drove straight through that night, rabbits running wild before his headlights and the sky turning from pale blue to brilliant blue-green. And here he was, one day deep in the town and feeling quite soothed and rested. The hotel was wonderful and the food was terrible, but nobody bothered him and he could walk and look at people and do as he pleased; and then he saw the girl and didn't particularly want more rest.

He was buying a paper at the magazine stand when he heard the voice behind him ask about a book, and he had to turn and see how much beauty was attached to something as warm and beautiful as the voice; and she was six inches from his jaw, standing beside him, a tall, blond-haired girl with blue eyes and a full mouth that seemed to tremble invisibly with latent warmth. Regan said, "Excuse me," and she smiled and paid for the book and went across the lobby toward the bar. Regan looked at her and then at the man behind the counter.

"Who was that?" Regan asked.

"Sally Barton," the man said. "She lives in town. Why?"

"How old are you?" Regan asked sympathetically.

"Fifty," the man said. "Why?"

"No wonder you ask why," Regan said. "My kid brother is six and he knows why. You had a mental checkup lately?"

"Why, no," the man said. "Oh, you mean ——"

"Yes, brother," Regan said pontifically. "How do I meet her?"

The man grinned and made mental gymnastics with his eyes and forehead creases for half a minute. "Have you met B. B. Bunting yet?"

"Not yet," Regan said, still feeling the glow of her smile. "Is he the local flag salesman?"

"He is one of the nicest men in town," the man explained. "Been here years, knows a million people, writes about all of them for the paper. He'll fix it for you if he likes you. There he is now—right over there by the patio. Go over and introduce yourself."

Regan said, "Thanks," and started toward B. B. Bunting, turned and called, "Thanks a million," and crossed the lobby at a dogtrot. He saw B. B. Bunting swell in size and shape, a slender wisp of a man well into his seventies, with white hair and a sharp, bright-eyed face, and dressed, unbelievably, in a big cowboy hat, beautifully tailored corduroy jacket and trousers, a wide silver Indian belt and English walking boots. B. B. Bunting was unlike anything Regan had ever seen before, and he came up fast and stuck out one hand and said:

"Mr. Bunting, my name is Jack Regan. The man at the magazine stand says you can help me out."

B. B. Bunting gave Regan a shrewd, all-appraising stare and said, "Slow down, youngster. What's the trouble? Where you from? What are you doing here? Who is she?"

Regan knew he would like Santa Fe if everyone else turned into snakes and curio-shop owners and pallid-hued I Am'ers. He liked this old man intensely from his first word, and he did not usually like people on such short acquaintance. He said, "I'm from Texas, Mr. Bunting ——"

"Ugh," B. B. Bunting said. "Texas. Do you have oil or cattle?"

"I just saw a girl," Regan said, ignoring the question. "Her name is Sally Barton, and I want to meet her."

"You do, eh?" B. B. Bunting said gruffly. "Do you paint, or write, or do anything unethical for a living?"

"I'm sort of a loafer," Regan grinned. "Also an ichthyologist. I live in Houston. I don't paint. I can hardly read and we don't admire that word 'unethical' in Texas. Now what?"

"Now you can meet her," B. B. Bunting said. "She'll like you, I think, having been slobbered over for twenty-four years by writers and sculptors and painters, not to mention her own folks and a few hundred other characters like myself. You'll be a fresh breath of air." B. B. Bunting stopped suddenly and stared at Regan hard. "What did you say you were—that big long word again?"

Regan grinned. "Sort of an amateur ichthyologist, Mr. Bunting. I study fish."

"You are in the right place," B. B. Bunting said solemnly. "We have more species of fish, poor and untrapped, in this town than you will find in the oceans. Everybody here is crazy—or didn't you know?"

"I guessed," Regan said. "When do I meet her?"

"Right smack dab now," B. B. Bunting said. "I think I saw the lady wander into the bar. Come with me."

Regan followed B. B. Bunting across the lobby to the bar, and into the bar and down the aisle between tables of talking, laughing people and waitresses running wildly with trays of food and drink.

"Ha," B. B. Bunting said. "Ho," and plunged between two large tables to a larger table completely buried beneath assorted elbows and arms and heads. "Sally," B. B. Bunting said, "I want you to meet someone."

Regan stood quietly behind B. B. Bunting and saw her look up from the table and smile broadly (Continued on Page 121)

ILLUSTRATED BY CORY WHITMORE

Southern Accents on Beauty

1

2

3

PROTOTYPE PROFILE of a 1947 belle. She forsakes flash for femininity . . . adds style to prettiness by never overdoing curls and "frills." She acquires a clean-cut look through detailed grooming . . . avoids anything blatant in matters of make-up, voice or manner. Her posture is erect . . . her waist is small and neat. She knows how to be feminine without being helpless . . . and she has a refreshing look for a brand-new year!

Inspired by the real-life belles of bygone generations and the storybook heroines of the South, today's Southern belle emerges as a lovely version of an old-fashioned girl. She is demure, feminine. Her skin is cameo-clear, and her make-up is minimized to accentuate her fragility. Her hair-do is taken from the days when grandmother was a girl, brushed away from her face and arranged in soft curls. She doesn't hesitate to borrow beauty tricks of other eras if she can modernize them to suit her own face and figure. Her appeal today is as popular as it was a generation ago . . . and her sheer FEMININITY can bring out the chivalry in even the most modern of men! . . . Here are her converted beauty accessories . . . some designed for you to make yourself:

1. OLD-FASHIONED BANDS of gold lace are sewn together in a pattern of squares over sheer net for a modern headdress. To make. 2. FINGERNAIL GLITTER: Mix artists' gold powder with colorless nail polish for a very special golden manicure. 3. BONED BODICES have been minimizing the span of a waist since the middle 1800's. Here's one in stiff taffeta and gold lace to wear with full, full skirts. To make. 4. FANS HAVE BEEN FLIRTING their way through the centuries, adding femininity wherever they go. Carry one in satin with matching gloves in a color to bring out the color of your eyes. To buy. 5. IN OLDEN DAYS housekeepers wore chatelaines around their waists to carry utility articles. You can wear one in bright brocade, dangling your lipstick, perfume bottle and door key. To make. 6. WATERFALL CURLS were beau catchers of the 1800's. Try this 1947 adaptation by fastening "waterfall" ribbons in gay colors to the back of a simple hair-do. 7. ADD SPARKLE for a dressy date. Taffeta evening bag covered in an open pattern of gold lace or mesh. To make. 8. TWINKLING PINK is a color to complement any girl's complexion. Wide, wide ribbon studded with sequins to wear over your hair on starlight nights. To make. 9. A HEART-SHAPED COMPACT with perfume bottle and bag adds a final touch to your gayest occasions. Bag to make. 10. VELVET CHOKER WITH BRIGHT BEADS gives the right amount of color to your plain dark dress. To make. ★ BY DAWN CROWELL

Beauty Editor of the Journal

Send 15c to Reference Library, Ladies' Home Journal, Philadelphia 5, Penna., for all directions on ACCESSORIES TO MAKE, No. 2318.

THE TERRIBLE MISS DOVE

Every one of us has known a woman like this. One who lingers in our memory long after the more beautiful ones are forgotten. By Frances Gray Patton

MISS DOVE was waiting for the sixth grade to file in for its geography lesson. She stood behind her desk, straight as the long map pointer in her hand. And suddenly she had the feeling of not being really alone. Someone or something was moving about the room. Over there, near the sand table where the first grade's herd of rickety clay caribou grazed at the edge of the second grade's plateau, it paused and looked at her. But even when the presence glided, like the shadow of a drifting cloud, along the wall behind her; even when she heard—or almost heard—a new stick of chalk squeaking on the blackboard, Miss Dove did not turn around. She knew, of course, that nobody was there. Her imagination was playing tricks on her again. It was something, she had to admit, humiliatingly close to nerves. Miss Dove did not believe in nerves.

Through the open door she watched the sixth graders come out of the music room down the hall. They came out with a rush, as if for two minutes of freedom between classroom and classroom they were borne along upon some mass exhilaration. They always left the music room in that fashion, but this morning they managed to be noisier than usual. It was the season, she supposed. The spring day was warm, and the children were restless as the weather. There was a sharp sound among them, as of a plump posterior being spanked with a book; there was a voice saying, "Double dare, Randy!"; there was a breathless giggling.

But as they approached Miss Dove's room their disorder began to vanish. They pulled their excitement in, like a proud but well-broken pony. One by one they stepped sedately across her doorsill. "Good morning, Miss Dove," they said, one by one, with the same proper lack of voice inflection, and went demurely to their places. At a nod from her they took their seats. Hands folded, eyes to the front, posture correct—they were ready for direction.

Jincey Webb, Miss Dove noticed without enthusiasm, had a permanent wave. Yesterday her carrot-colored mane had been neatly braided and pulled back from her serious, freckled face. Now it hung to her shoulders, a bushy mop of undulations and frizzy ringlets. It hung on her mind, too; that was plain to see. For Jincey's expression was one of utter and enviable complacency. It seemed doubtful that a long lifetime of repeated triumphs could again offer her an achievement so sublime with self-satisfaction.

Randy Baker, a pink boy of exceptional daring, wiggled his ears at Jincey. Miss Dove looked at him. Randy's pinkness paled. A glaze of innocence came over his round eyes. His ears grew very still.

Miss Dove kept looking at him, but she had stopped seeing him. Instead, she was seeing his brother Thomas, who had sat there at Randy's desk seven years before, with the same glaze over the mischief in his eyes. And then she saw Thomas on a raft in the Pacific. She did not see him as they had described him in the papers—skin and bones and haggard young face overgrown with a rough, wild beard. The Thomas she saw looked like Randy. He had braces on his teeth and a dimple in his chin. And he was all alone in the dismal gray mountains of the sea.

A wave of giddiness swept over her, but she did not sit down. It was nothing. It had been happening to her off and on all year, and it always passed. Miss Dove had a poor opinion of teachers who could not practice self-control.

For thirty years Miss Dove had taught geography in Cedar Grove Elementary School. She had been there before the brooding cedars had been chopped down by a city council that believed in progress and level playgrounds. She had seen principals and fads and theories come and go. But the school still squatted there, red brick, ugly, impervious. Inside it still smelled of wet raincoats and pickle sandwiches. Galahad still petted his charger on the left wall of the vestibule, and Washington still crossed the Delaware on the right. Every fall nervous six-year-olds had to be sent home in tears to put on dry drawers. Every spring there occurred the scandal of cigarette butts in the boys' basement. The same deplorable, old-fashioned words sprang up overnight like mushrooms on the cement walk. And now and then some hitherto graceless child could still surprise you with an act of loyalty or understanding. The school had not changed much. Neither had human nature. Neither had Miss Dove.

EACH June some forty-odd little girls and boys—transformed by the magic of organdy ruffles and white duck pants into a group picture of touching purity—were graduated from Cedar Grove. They went on to the wider world of junior high and, beyond that, to further realms of pleasure and pain. In the course of time they forgot much. They forgot dates and decimals and how to write business letters.

But they never forgot Miss Dove.

Years afterward the mention of the Euphrates River or the Arctic Circle or the Argentinian pampas would put them right back in the geography room. They would see again the big map with its flat blue ocean and its many-colored countries. (India was pink, they would recall, and China was orange, and the Italian boot was purple.) They would see Miss Dove lifting her long stick to point out the location of strange mountains and valleys. And they would feel again the wonder of a world far-flung and various and, like themselves, entirely under control. They would also feel a little thirsty.

"Remember Miss Dove?" they would smile.

But this green remembrance and the accident of her name's rhyming with a tender word should not deceive anybody about Miss Dove. She was no valentine. Miss Dove was a terror.

She had been young when she first started teaching. Her pupils would have hooted at the notion; they would have felt it more reasonable to believe Miss Dove had been born middle-aged with her mousy hair screwed into a knot at the back of her head and a white handkerchief pinned to her dark, bony bosom. Nevertheless, it is true. She had once been quite young.

Her father had died, leaving her little besides a library of travel books, an anemic violet-scented mother, and two young sisters yet in school. It had been up to Miss Dove. Older people had pitied her. She seemed too thin and pale and untried, they thought, to carry the burden alone. But Miss Dove never pitied herself. She loved responsibility.

THE children of each grade came to her forty-five minutes a day, five days a week, six years of their lives. She saw them as a challenge. Their babyish shyness, their lisping pronunciation, their reckless forgetfulness—these evoked no compassion from Miss Dove. They were qualities to be nipped and pruned. Her classes were like a body of raw recruits that she was to toughen and charge with purpose. Miss Dove was the stuff that commanders are made of.

Other teachers had trouble keeping order, but not Miss Dove. Other teachers tried to make a game of their work—they played store and pasted gold stars on foreheads. They threatened and cajoled. Miss Dove never raised her voice. She rarely smiled. She laid before the children the roster of her unalterable laws. And the laws were obeyed. Work was to be done on time. There was to be no whispering, no hair chewing, no wriggling. Coughing, if at all, was to be covered with a clean handkerchief. When one of these laws was chipped, Miss Dove merely looked at the offender. That was all. If a child felt obliged to disturb the class routine by leaving the room for a drink of water (Miss Dove loftily ignored any other necessity), he did so to the accompaniment of dead silence. The whole class would sit, idle and motionless, until he had returned. It was easier—even if you had eaten salt fish for breakfast—to remain and suffer.

Miss Dove managed to introduce a moral quality into the very subject she taught. The first graders, who studied the animals of different lands, repeated after her, "The yak is a very helpful animal." And they knew she expected them all to be yaks. Later they learned a more complicated sentence. "The camel," they recited in perfect unison, "is not a pretty beast, either in looks or disposition, but (Continued on Page 118)

He leaned forward, his eyes tight shut, so that he needn't see the result of his terrifying duty.

ILLUSTRATED BY HADDON SUNDBLOM

Test I
Map P. t II

IRENE DUNNE says, "I'd try to accept advice intended for me. I'd marry young and I'd have several children. I'd aim high; mere security is too poor a bargain to strike with life."

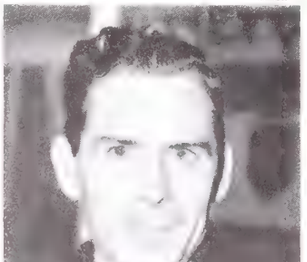
U. S. NAVY PRUSS

ADMIRAL NIMITZ claims, "Youth today is better off than ever before in my memory. If I were 21 or younger I'd take time out to figure what I wanted life to become. The choice is vast."

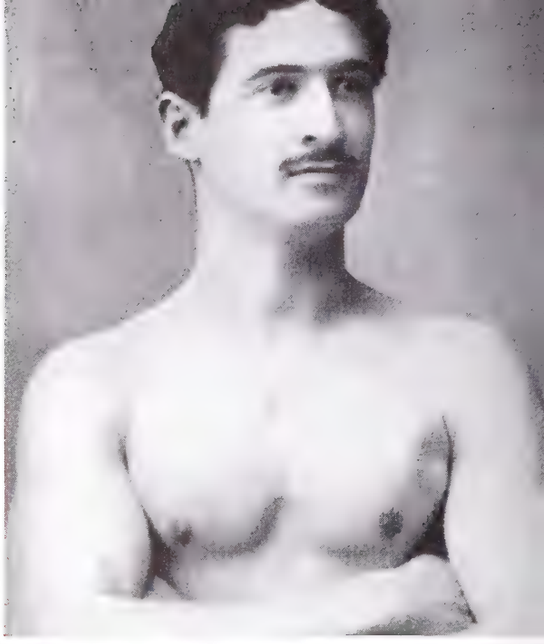
ACME

DOROTHY THOMPSON says, "The world stands in too desperate a need of fundamental rehauling for the young and able to find satisfaction in reporting the mistakes statesmen make."

ACME



MONSIGNOR SHEEN says youth must find peace and usefulness within, "for modern man makes himself secure from conflicts of the age only if he resolves conflicts within himself."



BERNARD BARUCH, the practice boxer in his twent said his athletic training made him conciliatory, tolerant patient—if all else failed he had the punch to back him

IF I WERE

"IF I were a young man today, or any day," Bernard Baruch said, "I'd hustle. I'd get a job—whatever job I could—and give everything I had to it."

We were sitting, the great planner and I, in Washington's Shoreham Hotel, in the suite which Mr. Baruch inherited from Manuel Quezon, of the Philippines. An upright and spruce old gentleman whose 76 years did not keep him from taking Andrei Gromyko, Russia's U.N. delegate, to a prize fight recently, Mr. Baruch was tussling with the fabulous question I was circulating among the eminent: "What would you do if you were 21 today?" I give you his answer first because he is much the oldest of the men and women whom I polled; because he has lived long enough and hard enough to indulge himself in the luxury of looking backward, but his youthful mind and spirit drive him ever forward -as witness the fact that he is currently engaged in the most pressing problem of our time: the control of atomic energy.

"I'd get any job," Mr. Baruch continued. "If it wasn't just the work I'd hoped for I wouldn't worry too much about that. Making a success of the job in hand, however uncongenial, is the best step toward obtaining the job you want to hold.

"I'd miss no bets at making my work a success. I'd make friends of those who worked with me. I'd be cheerful and obliging to everyone. I'd carry the brief case for the boss, or do him any useful little services, without worrying about whether these things were 'beneath me.' I've seen men rise to some of the biggest business positions in this country because, when a vacancy occurred, all the members of the board remembered them as being constantly obliging and eager to help.

"My formula would be very much the same as the one I'd recommend to a nation: 'Work and save.' Those are the words I gave to Arthur Krock, of The New York Times, in 1919, when he approached me after the Paris Peace Conference and asked my recommendations for America's economic future. They are the same today.

"I'd never let unpropitious events turn me from my course. Do you know the story of the two frogs that fell into the milk can? It's a g story for young men to know: The first frog c 'I'm drowning! I'm drowning! Help me qui And since no one came to help him, he drow The second frog went right on about his busi He said, 'Hustle! Hustle! Hustle!'—and he moving around so fast that he churned the into butter and was able to walk off the top.

"I'd say to any boy of 21, 'Young man, h like the second frog.'"

In sharp and almost stunning contrast is advice of Monsignor Fulton J. Sheen, of Catholic University. A priest of immense i ence among the people of his faith, he has converted to Catholicism many men and wo some of them outstanding figures in American

I saw Monsignor Sheen in the cool and pea house he has built in Washington. His bur eyes and ascetic face are those of the man sees in religion—a passionate and intensely sonal religion—the only help for humanit such an hour as this.

"If I were 21," Monsignor Sheen said should turn my back on all the values by w the modern world attempts to find peace and fillment. I should abandon a framework of th ing which has shown its inability to make happy or nations secure. I should scrap the p ises of the nineteenth century so-called libera along with all those ideas—dangerously freq in today's thought—which elevate the state a the individual and make totalitarianism seer some, the only way out of chaos.

"Society was atomized long before the became front-page news: when the individua told he might safely make his own laws and f his own impulses, with no check from a H Authority, social anarchy was the result. found, then, that living without laws was im tical; in their hunger for order they surrend to the state such powers as man-made go ments are never fit to hold.

"If I were 21, I should begin my adult life deep and searching examination of the prin according to which I wished my life to be Before I began to pursue any of the paths

76, he offers the advice he did at the 1919 Peace Conference—k and save. If 21, "I'd miss no bets. Making a success of job at hand is the best step toward the kind you want."

21

By Gretta Palmer

er teachers and employers and politicians ed on me, I should first see where these paths e apt to lead and decide whether their goals ld, if I reached them, be fully rewarding. If answer seemed to be, 'No'—if I decided that kind of 'success' enjoyed at the end of most of e routes had failed to bring peace to those ady there—then I should say, 'The world's ice is faulty. Even on practical grounds, I l reject the values of the modern world.' With decision, I should be prepared to search for as that offer some real hope of bringing me to llment and usefulness and peace.

For modern man makes himself secure from conflicts of the age only if he resolves the licts within himself."

oes this seem otherworldly? If you think so, will be surprised to hear what that very tical Hollywood star, Irene Dunne, would do e were 21 again:

Get inward order—that is the first step I'd . If you can work out your religious beliefs y, no other problem that comes up in your life utterly throw you. If you are inwardly con-d, no triumph can bring a lasting satisfaction."

talked to Irene Dunne in her Hollywood sing room, on the lot where she was playing her in the picture, Life With Father—her first nnicolor effort.

I were 21, I'd do a lot of things now differ-y than I did in my own twenties," Miss Dunne t on. "For years I wasted time, hesitating veen the careers of singing and the stage. That because I lacked internal order; as a result, I events in the outside world sway me toward purpose and that, without ever having made what I wanted to do. Because I wasn't sure as ever on the right course, I was overeager uick results. I needed an immediate triumph eassure me.

And so, when I should have been singing es, if I were to be a serious musician, I was llong in the score of Aïda. You see, I halfway ted to be a Metropolitan Opera star. But ing in the world of music seemed to break for me, and everything in the theater came my way, so I drifted into success on the stage. Because I was still divided, and uncertain that I wanted theatrical success, I was sullen and ungrateful in years which could have been very happy ones if I had planned, from the first, to take one career or the other and lay all my bets on that single effort."

But, Miss Dunne added, she wouldn't be so single-minded that she would rule out marriage.

"I'd marry young," she said, "and avoid, at any cost, the mistake I made: of permitting geography to separate me from my husband and break up our home. I'd have several children; and if they didn't come naturally, I'd adopt several. But never one alone.

"And I'd try—if I were 21 again—to accept whatever advice seemed intended for me in a much humbler spirit than Irene Dunne could ever take any advice at such an age. For I have always had a stubborn streak, and eagerness to tell other people how to run things instead of letting them tell me. If I had had this role in Life With Father when I was really 21, I'd have been telling the Technicolor crew how to set up their cameras. One of the lessons I learned later—and an important one—was how to listen, really listen, to those who know more than I. Very few young people listen at all: they use the time when someone else is talking to figure out what they will say next.

"If I were 21, I'd aim high; mere security is too poor a bargain to strike with life. But I'd aim accurately, and after a lot of self-examination, to be quite sure I was embarking on the thing I wanted most of all to do. That little preliminary step of cleaning out the mental drawers and setting your thoughts and hopes in order is the most important step in a person's whole career. For the world is confusing, if we let it confuse us. If we're sure of what we want to accomplish, we can avoid adding to its confusion; we can keep a little undisturbed pool of peace inside ourselves."

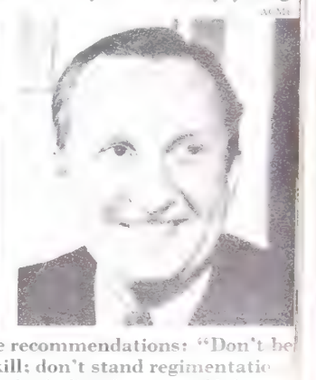
Miss Dunne belongs to the concentrate-early school, as you see. But what about a man who has had three careers (Continued on Page 155)

CLARE LUCE, at 21, didn't have a college degree, was married. Now she says, "I'd get a college education. And I would do this particularly if I intended marriage with no career."

BISHOP OXNAM, one-time tennis-team member at the University of Southern California, if he had life over again would "equip myself for community service, no matter what."

WIDE WORLD

JIMMY STEWART who went from architecture in Princeton to Hollywood, says, "I wish I'd stayed in college longer and studied a great deal more." Advice to youth—marry young.



WILLIAM BENTON has five recommendations: "Don't be dependent; acquire a salable skill; don't stand regimentatio don't be afraid of change; and don't live for yourself alon

REEN LEAVES

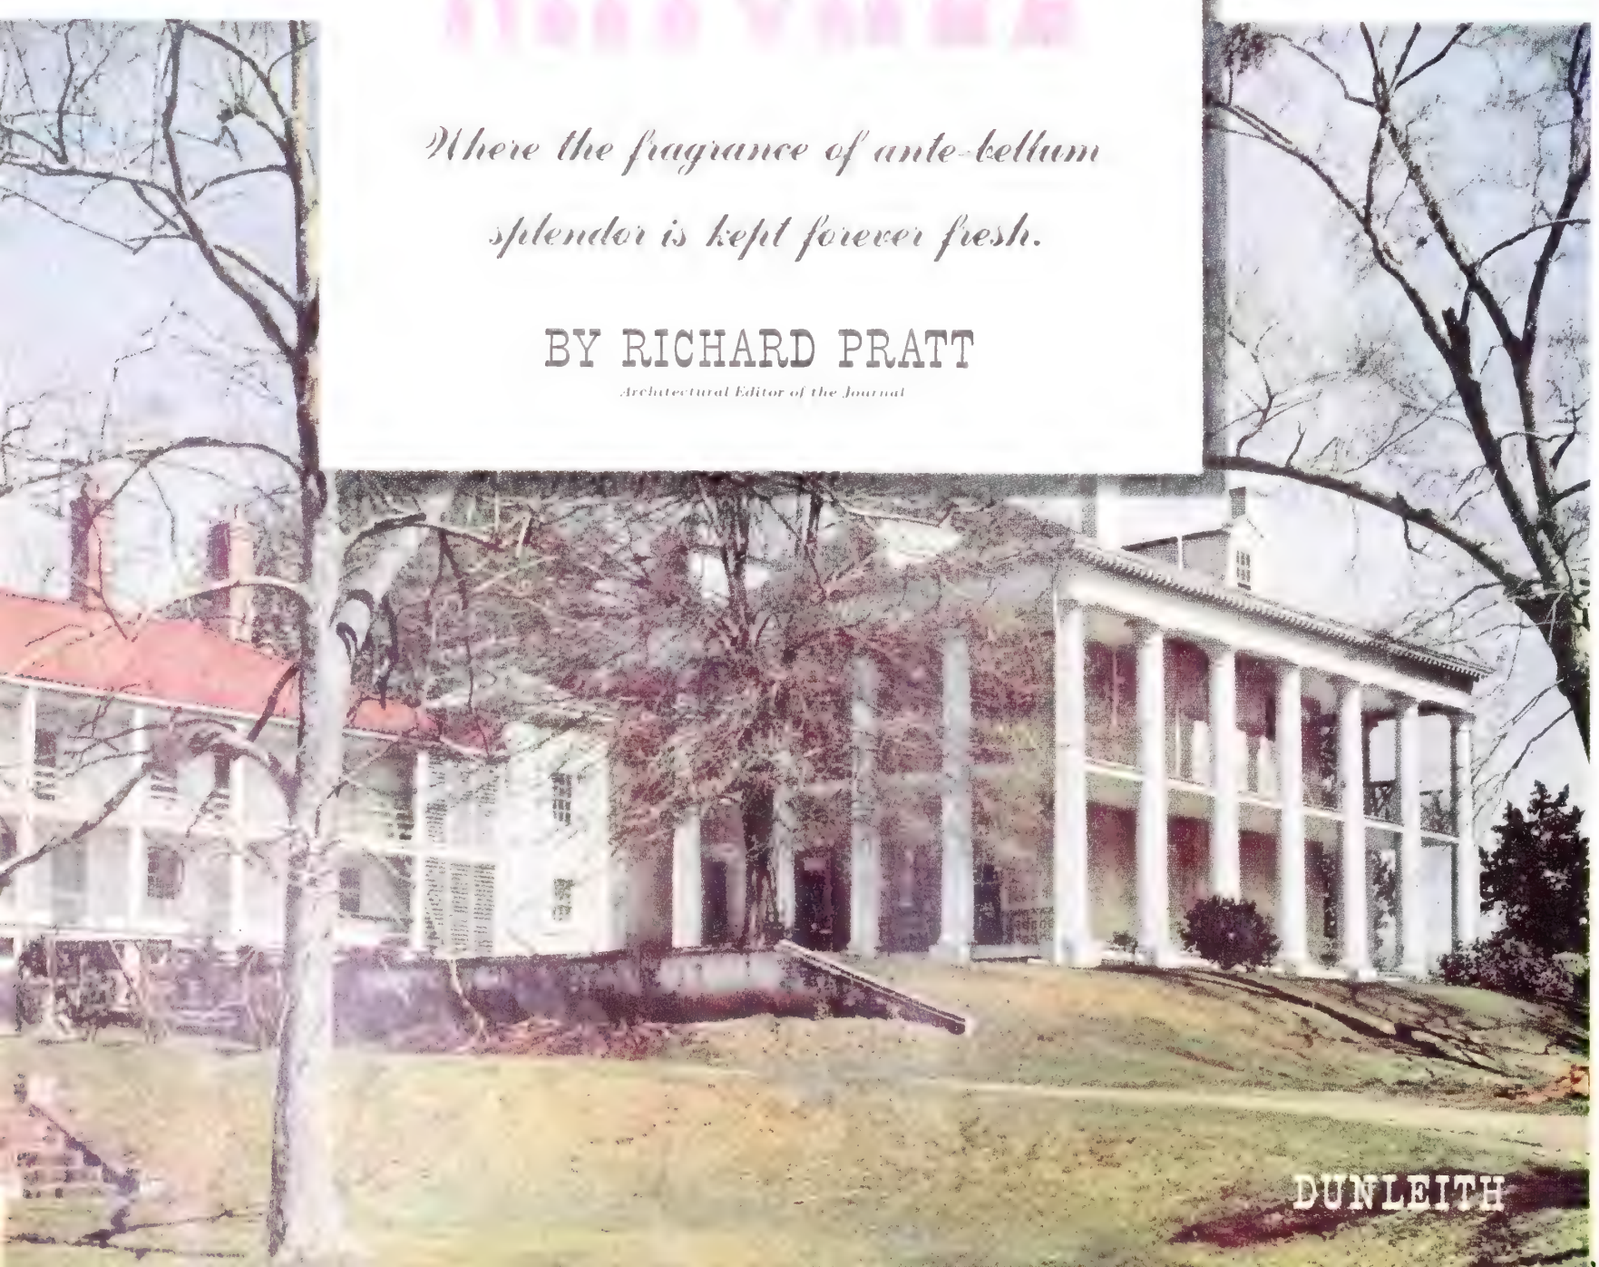
D'EVEREUX

NATCHEZ

Where the fragrance of ante-bellum splendor is kept forever fresh.

BY RICHARD PRATT

Architectural Editor of the Journal



DUNLEITH

The small library at Gloucester has an eighteenth-century mantel from France, Meissen garnitures from Germany, a secretary from England and paintings from Italy—typical of the importations of the time.

GLOUCESTER

The names of Natchez homes are part of their romantic flavor. Green Leaves, D'Evereux and Dunleith; Gloucester, Monteigne, Monmouth and Arlington; Longwood, Lansdowne, Linden, Rosalie, Hope Farm, Stanton Hall and Elgin; Richmond, Airlie, Mistletoe, and on and on: names and houses ornamenting the old town that stands high above the brown Mississippi and decorating the lush surrounding countryside. Gloucester is a good beginning, for it was the home of the first territorial governor, a rigid New Englander, named Winthrop Sargent, who came to this already colorful community about 1800, tried his Yankee best to resist its blandishments, and finally gave in to its luxurious delights. He now lies buried beneath a great magnolia on the lawn of his house whose Georgian manner he might have brought with him from Massachusetts—a style that the climate of Natchez embellished after its own exuberant fashion.

The upholstered pieces in the yellow drawing room at Gloucester show the effect of the Victorian fashion which found the Natchez homes such willing and wonderful settings for its romantic elegance.

The guest bedroom at Monteigne is dominated by its chinoiserie chintz: its great tester bed and rosewood combs to the best unspoiled Victorian taste of the times.

MONTEIGNE

Younger than most of the Natchez homes, Monteigne was scarcely ten years old when Union soldiers were stabling their horses in its drawing rooms. But it survived this Civil War vandalism, and its condition today, as you can see, is practically perfect, its classic portico rising as proudly as ever before its beautifully proportioned pink façade. Set against a background of enormous live oaks, Monteigne is surrounded by great gardens of roses, camellias and azaleas, the soft night air heavy with their sweet smells and the daytime brilliant with their blossoms. In point of time, Monteigne marks the close of the golden age of Natchez, much as Hope Farm and Gloucester marked its beginning. From the end of the eighteenth century to the start of the Civil War, the Natchez district was peopled with families of fabulous wealth who loved to live elegantly. The ships which carried their cotton to the Eastern seaboard, to England and the Continent, carried them, too, and brought them back with the finest of furnishings for their homes and with the most cosmopolitan ideas for an idyllic life in this faraway community.

Generations of hand polishing have produced a rich patina on the fine eighteenth-century furniture of the Monteigne dining room, where the light glitters on lavishly scaled repoussé silver and a delicate Venetian chandelier. Especially fine is the pair of Sevres vases on the mantel.

Monteigne's entrance hall, with its marble floor, its harplike balustrade and its hand-blocked French scenic wallpaper, is one of the most stunning eye-catchers in the whole stunning Natchez neighborhood.

In keeping with the scale of the house, the double drawing rooms of Stanton Hall open into a ballroom seventy-two feet long, whose full length you can see reflected in the immense gilt-framed mirror at the end, glittering with the light of the massive bronze French chandeliers.

STANTON HALL

It was typical of the flush times in Natchez in 1851 that the builder of Stanton Hall should have chartered a whole ship to bring from Europe materials and furnishings for his new home—not to mention further importations from abroad which were required during the five years before the house was finished. As handsome as are the solid-silver hinges, knobs and key plates that came from England for the doors, the lacy iron grillwork that came by the ton from Italy for the porches is handsomer still. And indoors no expense was spared on the carved white Carrara marble mantels or on the bronze French chandeliers that hang from ceilings more than twenty-two feet high. There is no record of Stanton Hall's original cost, but as a sign of fallen grandeur it was sold during the boll-weevil depression for $9700. Since then it has been bought by one of the Natchez garden clubs as headquarters for its annual tours of the famous old homes, and also serves as a rather fabulous guesthouse.

HOPE FARM

The oldest of the grand-manner homes of the Natchez district, Hope Farm dates from the days of the Spanish occupation. It is really two separate houses, joined by galleries, the older and larger built in 1775, and the smaller in 1789 by Don Carlos de Grandpré, a French adventurer who was a governor of the district during the Spanish regime. Its design is simpler, its ceilings lower, than those of the houses that went up when the United States took over the territory, but the care with which it has been restored makes it one of the most charming in the Natchez district.

The furnishings of Hope Farm show many influences, from the early Federal furniture of the dining room above, through the nineteenth-century bedsteads, chairs and dresser of the bedroom at the bottom of the page, to the elegant Victorian pieces of the cool inside parlor just below.

GREEN LEAVES The twin parlors of Green Leaves, of which the room above is one, are identical except for details in their priceless accessories. The Beltzhoover family makes everyday use of both rooms, amid the Meissen and Sevres, the Watteau fans, the ivory miniatures, rare prints and manuscripts, and autographed albums of Confederate generals and other memorabilia of the War Between the States. And in the game room at the left it is as though time had stood completely still for a hundred years or more.

No. 3
of the Journal Series called REGIONAL HOUSES

ARLINGTON More than a century ago the library at Arlington (left above) was filled with eight thousand rare volumes, purchased in London, meticulously cared for ever since on the shelves that surround the room, whose tremendous scale is given away by the armchair in the corner. In the room at right, the present owner of Arlington keeps her famous collection of glass, the shelves having been effectively set against the windows of the gallery to bring out the beauty of old Bristol, Bohemian, Waterford and English crystal.

THE ELMS The back parlor at The Elms still has its original Victorian furniture intact, still upholstered in the now-seldom-seen original Windsor patterns. Also seldom seen nowadays are such items as the lily sconces above the mantel and the graceful rosewood escritoire. The bell pull beside the window rings its specially toned bell in the pantry, where each room has its own bell.

LINDEN Most Natchez homes had punkahs, or breeze fans, in their dining rooms, swung gently back and forth with strings by colored boys during the midday dinner, which is still the principal meal in Natchez homes.

LANSDOWNE The drawing room at Lansdowne represents the nineteenth century at its most fabulous, with a double set of rosewood furniture from France still covered in its original brocade. Imported at the same time as the furniture were the hand-painted wallpaper, the carpet, cornices and brocatels, making in all one of the most remarkable rooms of its period in the country.

IF YOU ASK ME

By Eleanor Roosevelt

I am puzzled about what is going on in U. N. It seems to me that when the Americans or British make a proposal, the Russians ignore it or make a directly opposite one. I get the feeling that we will never be able to work with the Russians. Do you feel that way?

No, I do not feel that way. It seems to me quite possible to get on with the Russians, though I think it is going to take us a long while really to understand each other. There are fundamental differences that exist between us, in our backgrounds and in our points of view, which arise very largely from the fact that Russia is a very young nation—young and virile—but, nevertheless, insecure. We have more than 150 years behind us, and we have attained a good deal of the poise and security which come with maturity.

The desire for security motivates practically every country. They need a sense that they have friends and are safe in the family of nations; that their people and their own strength are adequate to meet the demands which living in the modern world requires.

It is much easier to have confidence in people if you have a sense of security. We have gained it, and I think for that very reason we should perhaps be better able today to be generous about some of the very obvious moves which are made by the Russians, largely because of their lack of security. Only with confidence and trust can peace be a reality.

There is no question, for instance, that ultimately we will all have more security if we have a greater sense of interdependence; put more strength into the United Nations, and count less on our own individual strengths. Even we find that hard to accept, because it is such a new concept of living with other nations, and for the Russians, who have lived on the continent of Europe, where every nation has looked askance at every other nation for years, it is even harder than it is for us.

We are apt to forget the changes that have come over the world, and to judge whatever moves Russia makes to assure her security from the point of view of the world ethics of today, rather than from the point of view which was prevalent years ago when we met our own problems. In many ways, Russia is today where we were a hundred years or more ago. We did not like it when people criticized us. And it was not just because of the criticism; it was because we were a little afraid that some of the things they said were probably true!

One takes criticism better as one grows older; and if we really understood, I think we would face more realistically some of the things which Russia has done, even though we might still oppose them, because we know both the world of today and the world of our youth.

For instance, we proclaimed the Monroe Doctrine for our own security; and many of the other moves which we are reminded of as we go back through the pages of our history were made to give us a sense of security. Many a time in our history we have done highhanded things, but we have done them always with a sense of virtue because they made us more secure! They increased our economic stability, or our defenses; so, as we felt that our motives were good, we justified our self-interests.

That is something we must not forget when we watch another nation, a virile, young nation, in a period when international and national ethics have changed considerably, trying to gain some things which we have already achieved. It is far harder today to live by modern standards and still achieve these things, since the buccaneer days are over. The Atomic Age has wiped out the past in which we grew up.

When all this is considered, however, I think it is essential that the Russians also understand that the nations living around them, who have greater maturity, have set up certain standards, and that to live successfully with them the effort to understand those standards must be made. They will have to stop some of the practices which are relics of the past, and recognize eventually the basic difference between our two beliefs: We think the state must serve the individual; and they think the individual is subservient to the state. Gradually as our conceptions become clearer to each other, and as life becomes more worth while to every individual in his part of the world, we will, I believe, find a happier medium for working together and living together in peace and amity.

I was married three months ago, but up to this time I haven't made any new friends, because I'm just too shy. What can I do to stop feeling so uncomfortable with strangers?

Remember, first of all, that your husband fell in love with you and married you and that he is proud of you. That should give you some assurance. Try to forget how you feel and think only of how your guests feel and your shyness will soon disappear.

Why don't you write an article on "the perfect guest"? I would like to read it.

I think I would rather write an article on the perfect host. A guest is really only good or bad because of the host or hostess who makes being a guest an easy or a difficult task.

My friend was killed in action overseas. This was two years ago, but he is still constantly on my mind. Nothing I can do nor anyone I meet seems to measure up to Bob. What is the best way to forget the past and look forward to the future?

I know of no way to forget the past. Perhaps you can learn to live with it more happily, remembering what gave you joy, realizing that no one whom you loved and who loved you would want you to go on and lead a lonely life because you kept comparing him with the new friends that came into your life. You do not want to forget Bob, but you do want to go on living happily, and perhaps you will love someone else just as much one of these days, but in an entirely different way.

My boys are married and live not far from us in the same city, yet there are weeks at a time when I do not see them or talk to them unless I call them up. I'm certain they love me and yet they are unconsciously negligent. I don't want to put it on a "duty" basis and I try every way to be the kind of mother a married man wants. What do you advise?

If I were you, when I wanted to talk to my boys or their wives, I would call them on the telephone and I would try to make some kind of regular weekly arrangement with them. Perhaps you could have lunch or supper together on Sundays, but do not make them feel that they can never break the engagement. Sometimes it is easier to do something that you can count on and know is going to happen, which will bring you together and keep the family spirit alive.

The young people are busy and have many interests of their own and it is harder for them to find the time to call you than it is for you to call them. I would not do it too often, but once or twice a week would show you are interested and want to keep in touch. However, it is a little difficult to advise people one does not know and where one does not set oneself up as Dorothy Dix!

What do you think of the Canadian plan for subsidizing families? Would you favor legislation in this country to provide monthly payments to families of low income or to families of all incomes to help bear the cost of raising families? Do you think income deductions for children should be increased?

If a country is particularly anxious to increase the birth rate, subsidizing large families would seem to be a wise plan. However, I think it would be much better to approach the question from a different angle; namely, to put a floor under earnings and try to see that no family earned less than was consistent with a fair standard of living. Of course I realize that some people will live better on a certain amount than others, but that is a question very largely of education. It might be possible to increase income-tax deductions for children, but that, I think, should be the same for rich and poor alike.

In the light of your son's recent book, were the relations between your husband and Prime Minister Churchill misrepresented as true friendship to the American people? If not, why has your son written at this time such tactless statements about the successful accomplishments of two great leaders?

I do not think you read my son's book very carefully. He explains that there existed between my husband and Prime Minister Churchill a warm personal friendship, and I have done this also in a column which I wrote on this particular subject. There can be a warm personal friendship between two individuals who, because of background and the circumstances under which they have lived, may have entirely different political beliefs, and very different approaches to the ultimate objectives which they wish to achieve through government. That, I think, was really the case where my husband and Mr. Churchill were concerned. As far as the war period went, each knew that the other was a good man, leading his people well and acting wisely to meet the needs of the war situation.

I think my husband understood and admired Mr. Churchill's patriotism and his devotion to his country. My husband had an equally patriotic devotion to the United States of America. He considered that the interests of the two countries were not always identical. There were political interests entering the war strategy here and there that were bound to cause some differences. Even more difficulties are certain to appear in times of peace.

I do not feel that my son made any tactless statements. He knew quite well where the areas of cooperation and warm affection existed and also where the difficulties lay and what caused them.

Letters should be addressed to Mrs. Roosevelt, c/o the LADIES' HOME JOURNAL. It should be understood that Mrs. Roosevelt's answers reflect only her own opinions, and are not necessarily the opinions of the Editors of the JOURNAL.

"Oh, dear, we're just on our way out. I'm terribly sorry. I don't know any eight people we'd rather have seen."

Paris fashion, never more lovely

by Wilhelm Cushman

D.46

Enchantment in one petal-like drape to the side; worn with short lace mitts by Balenciaga

Tea-corseted dress in black velvet, black tulle headdress, provocative silhouette by Jacques Fath

Young and beautiful dinner fashion: full rustling taffeta skirt, slim sleeved blouse top; by Jacques Fath

The ankle-length dress—very Paris, in black net over green taffeta, with a taffeta sash; by Lelong

DRAWINGS BY DELFAU

Rib bolero in [illegible] velvet, rummer [illegible] ankle-slim pleated [illegible] -waisted fashion by Schiaparelli

Bouffant dancing dress as Paris does it: pale mauve and green tulle, taffeta bodice and gloves; by Jacques Fath

COLOR AND CHANGE

MAKE A SUIT OR DRESS IN BEIGE OR GRAY . . . PERFORM YOUR WONDERS WITH COLOR . . . IN SHIRT, JACKET, HAT OR BAG. ★ BY RUTH MARY PACKARD

Extra jacket can be made in plaid tweed; bound with black or green; pattern 1980.

Long-sleeved shirt; 1999 (12 to 20, 25¢); belt, bright scarf; with suit skirt.

Collarless, single-breasted suit with big flap pockets; Hollywood Pattern 1980 (12 to 20, 25¢); dark-green or scarlet-red accents.

Striped jersey shirt: 1684 (10 to 18, 25¢), and a jersey beret make a change.

Give the dress the touch of spring with white piqué ascot, cuffs, jeweled buttons.

ther views of Hollywood Patterns rns at the store which sells them ostage prepaid, from Hollywood reenwich, Conn.; or in Canada from

Two-piece beige wool dress, inspiration for change: 1998 (12 to 20, 25¢); plaid-wool bag, ascot and umbrella case, newest accessories.

Finishes

BY ANN BATCHELDER

Menu

FOR BUFFET

Caviar Eggs "On the Hour"

Baked-Ham Glacé

Apricots Stuffed With Horse-Radish

Smoked Fish and Shrimps

Hot Biscuits or Patty Shells

Vegetable-Salad Bowl

Pineapple-Coconut Torte Coffee

For 12 People

[illegible] on the road to town there's [illegible]. He runs the village [illegible] occupy about every available space on the old painted walls, hanging one above the other in the lounge, in the writing room, most of all in the dining room.

There are so many clocks that eyes and ears are bewildered at the wealth of these ancient timepieces. No, they don't strike the passing hours, nor do they record the things they have seen, the confidences they have heard. Silent, unless some curious one insists on a demonstration of their quality, they hang mute yet someway sentient, somehow concealing secrets that have lain hidden in their quiet faces too many years, too long a time for such as I to wake their latent memories. They are the custodians of hours gone forever. And for some of them the centuries have confided what must remain hidden forever behind those faces that reveal nothing, silent within those voices that will not speak to us.

The old timepieces only mark the slumber and spell out the sleeping hours of those who love and live by them. We do not count the hours. That is their job. But when an old clock stops, refusing to abide by star or sun or moon, never to go again, something in life [illegible]. A circle is completed. We start [illegible] way. Time overtakes us—we cannot overtake time.

It is time for us. But, having written [illegible] words anent time and clocks, I will bring you to the hour of your New Year's party. That hour will mark a beginning, it will inaugurate a new cycle for us all. We can start all over again, and, while we're planning for that Happy New Year and resolution-fraught occasion, let's get busy and see what's what in the way of the food you will wish to serve your holiday guests. Shall it be tea?—that comes first—or supper—that comes later, and very nice it is too. Open house or the choice, the select, the intimate circle for a New Year buffet? One or the other is likely to engage your attention at this time. At least that is the way we've dreamed it up. Not only dreamed it, but made the dream come true. As you will soon find out.

(Continued on Page 114)

Menu

FOR TEA

Egg-and-Avocado Sandwiches

Pistachio-Cheese Sandwiches

Fruitcake Cookies

Teatime Jelly Rolls

Tea Cornets

Brazil Chips—Bonbons or Mints

Tea—Cream—Lemon—Sugar

PHOTOS BY STUART POWELL

LINE A DAY

BY ANN BATCHELDER

1 Collecting—the most fascinating hobby in the world. In my next incarnation, I shall collect bells. Or think I shall.

2 Maybe repeater: Bread sauce, I mean, l'affaire chicken and guinea breasts. Cook two cups of milk with a cup of soft bread crumbs, a chopped onion and twelve whole cloves, in the double boiler, to the soft spreading stage.

3 From there, take out the cloves and count them that not one escapes your eye. No one wants an old clove to chew on. Season the sauce well, with salt and pepper. Add a lump of butter. Keep hot. Spread on the platter to support the lightly sautéed breasts of chicken. Sprinkle all at last with browned crumbs.

4 The real pâté de foie gras is with us again. Something to gloat over. Cubes of it in aspic and mounds of it on toast or diced with chicken and mayonnaise, or just right out of the pot, it is the last word. I mean last.

5 Scalloped apples with peanut brittle may stop you—but for only a minute. Sliced tart apples in layers with the ground-up brittle, little pieces of butter and the juice of a lemon are all. Bake until apples are tender. Wonderful with pork.

6 Turkeys used to wear bells so their owners could keep track of them. But they had to hunt for them just the same—or so I am told.

7 Take a pound of sausage and mince it fine. Add two cups of cooked rice and an egg. Mix up well. Make into cakes and fry in hot fat (frying-pan style). Don't hurry them. They're delicious for breakfast—hot stuff for luncheon.

8 And now we're on rice, one more little piece of business. You know how butterscotch sauce is on ice cream. Well, try it on a creamy rice pudding.

9 From an old cookbook: "Cottage cheese is that milk preparation vulgarly called smear case. It is unnecessary to use these common expressions and no lady will permit her servants to do so. As the mistress is so will the servant be." As the twig is bent, eh?

10 News item: Now you may order your fresh oysters, in the shell or out, iced, sent the day they come out of the beds. Ninety-six beauties in a box. In case you haven't an oyster bed in your back yard, this is a bet.

11 Another piece of news: Almond oil coming in from Italy. Use it for salads and frying. Just a little different.

12 When I write my book on griddlecakes (pancakes to some) there's a curried-clam griddlecake coming up, fish griddlecakes, pea "griddlers" and dozens of others. Can you hold on?

13 For example: Take equal parts of finely flaked cold white fish and a rich, highly seasoned cream sauce. As the griddlecakes come from the griddle, spread each one with the fish mixture. So far so good. Better to come.

14 Roll up the spread griddlecakes as you make them and set aside on a hot greased sheet. When all are done, sprinkle with grated cheese and bake them in an oven at around 350° F., until the cheese browns and bubbles. Serve with a sauceboat of cream sauce. This is a speciality. Could be of your house.

15 Stylish no end are the sardines dipped in chutney and served on toast fingers spread with rarebit.

16 I am sure you have polished the chafing dish and have the spirit lamp filled. Creamed oysters on toast, and diced chicken with asparagus tips in a good cream sauce, are two cold-night dishes. And you know how I feel about a rarebit.

17 For de luxe appetizers or salad fripperies, may I say a word about caviar? It's here—the real thing. Don't ruin it. A little lemon juice, a touch of grated onion, all right. But only that—and hot toast or little puffs. It's enough.

18 Those whole peeled Bartlett pears in jars, drained, covered with waffle batter, baked and served with almond-flavored whipped cream, make a dessert not to be soon forgotten.

19 A receipt I will not give away
Is making a dandelion soufflé.
The reason is I don't know how
And wouldn't make it anyhow.

20 Broiled oysters: Drain and dry the oysters. Dust with salt and pepper. Dip in beaten egg and then in fine crumbs. Brush with hot melted butter. Broil, turning over. Serve on a bed of water cress and with halves of lemon.

21 For half-starved skaters make up a French-toast sandwich plate. Have the bread thin, spread with peanut butter, put together, dip in egg-and-milk mixture and fry. It's cold, you know, out-of-doors.

22 Muffins are versatile as a tightrope artist with four billiard balls in the air. There are bran and raisin and date, and chocolate and sour cream and bacon and apple and cheese muffins. Now you think up a few.

23 One of the best is the old-fashioned cranberry kind. To your regular white-flour muffin mixture add a cup of cranberries and a little extra sugar. It's well to cut the berries first.

24 Stuffed roast of pork or stuffed pork chops are deliciously different if chopped cooked prunes and apple are added to the bread stuffing. And raisins, too, but not with prunes.

25 To make a good winter dish, prepare mashed sweet potatoes, park sausages on top and bake. A sprinkling of brown or maple sugar on the potato is indicated.

26 Corn-meal mush molded, sliced and fried in the sausage fat, is a cheerful thought. Homely fare, but good to the last brown crumb.

27 Little country stores spring up here and there, and once you find one you're lost to time and road maps. There's one up in the hill town of Weston, Vermont, you might know. Has water-ground meal and calico; Other things too. And scenery.

28 Did you know that you can use a broken cinnamon stick as you would a vanilla bean to flavor custards delicately?

29 I shall speak of green sauce—for fillet of sole or any fine fillets of white fish. The sauce should be as thick as heavy cream. A superb cold sauce which you'll be proud to serve.

30 Mince fine some parsley. Add a stalk of chopped celery, a small onion, three or four anchovies, cut fine. Season. Add juice of half a lemon and a grated egg yolk—hard-cooked one. Now add salad oil.

31 The snow is drifting as I write this. Since it must drift, let it drift high and spread its blanket wide. Underneath I know that, sleeping serenely, my tulips are waiting. And I can wait too. In fact, I shall have to.

DRAWING BY R. C. ATHERTON

Last Words

He who loves not his native state
Never, oh, never, could be my mate.
He who adores not the valley and hill
Will not be remembered in my will.

HAPPY NEW YEAR

1947

YOU CAN SEE
YOU'RE GOING TO LIKE IT . . .

THE BROTH IS RICH WITH CHICKEN...

When you sit down to a steaming plate of chicken soup, what you want above all is—chicken. And that, in Campbell's Chicken Soup, is what you get above all. Plenty of chicken goes into its making—fine plump chickens simmered ever so slowly to make a broth that fairly gleams with chicken richness. Fine white rice, cooked to fluffy lightness, is then added to the broth. And, finally, pieces of chicken are measured in generously, chicken so deliciously tender it just about melts in your mouth.

THE RICE IS STEEPED IN CHICKEN...

ALL THROUGH IT...THERE'S CHICKEN...

That's Why—

JUST AS SURE AS YOU LIKE CHICKEN, YOU'LL LIKE Campbell's CHICKEN SOUP

Never neglect a cold!

That will help avoid pneumonia. But if pneumonia should strike,  don't let it frighten you. Medical science, aided by the sulfas and penicillin, has reduced pneumonia mortality by about one half in the past 10 years.

If more people who have bad colds, or colds that hang on, would call their doctors, the pneumonia death rate would drop still further.

Remember, pneumonia is communicable, it works fast; and the worst months are ahead. So fight pneumonia by guarding against colds.

Common colds need special care!

Try to keep in the best of health during the winter, for by keeping fit you lessen the risk of colds and pneumonia. However, if you get a bad cold, stay home and go to bed if possible, eat lightly, drink plenty of fruit juices and other liquids. Be especially careful not to get chilled.

Watch out for pneumonia's warning symptoms, which are usually a severe shaking chill followed by fever, coughing accompanied by sharp pains in the side or chest, and often rust-colored sputum. However, one type, virus pneumonia, starts slowly with a gradual rise in temperature, a feeling of chilliness rather than a shaking chill, and a slight sore throat with a hard cough, but little or no sputum.

Some types of pneumonia, like virus pneumonia, do not respond to sulfa or penicillin. Whatever the type, calling the doctor quickly permits the prompt diagnosis and medical care which afford the best chance for rapid recovery. For other important information about pneumonia, influenza, and the common cold, send for Metropolitan's free booklet, 17-J, "Respiratory Diseases."

Metropolitan Life Insurance Company

TO VETERANS—IF YOU HAVE NATIONAL SERVICE LIFE INSURANCE—KEEP IT!

MARY HALLAM

(Continued from Page 18)

so absolutely Letty! She came into the room now with that familiar motion which seemed to combine the walk of a self-conscious school miss wearing her first pair of high heels with the hip-swinging walk of a voluptuous native woman. Her mother and Mrs. Cotter had often enough scolded about that walk, saying that it was the "follow me" walk of a not nice girl, but they had never succeeded in modifying it. Maud had often told her that it was time she abandoned it in the interests of respectability and matronhood, but Letty said she hoped never to look like a matron and didn't care about seeming respectable. She was interested in being it, she said, only because in the long run it saved a lot of trouble. "If people misunderstand my walk that's their lookout. It's my walk." But from the waist upward she was the very pattern of dignity and carried herself well.

She kissed Maud on both cheeks and said in her pretty, consciously modulated, somewhat artificial voice, "How are you, Maud darling? I'm sorry I had to keep you waiting, but I was having a massage and Miss Ohlson was late."

Maud, who had never had a massage in her life, not even of the facial sort, asked what she was having it for. Had she been ill? Letty said she had not been ill; it was just that Nelson liked her to have it.

"Take off your coat," she said. "It's boiling hot in here. The central heating in this house is almost too good."

They sat on a deep sofa placed at right angles to the fireplace, where an electric fire glowed falsely among false coals and sent out an amber light and no heat. Maud took off her black coat, uncovering a severely plain black dress. For over fifteen years she had worn nothing but black, relieved, at times, by white. It saved, she said, endless trouble. With her black suits she usually wore lingerie blouses, trimmed with fine tucks or lace. These, her underwear and her hats came from Paris; her tailor-mades, furs and coats from London; and her dresses and shoes from Boston. Her hats were of the latest fashion and often frivolous and extreme, but she was quite unconcerned by the fact that they did not suit her mature and regular features. She wore them, she said, because they amused her.

"How you've changed! You used to have thick black hair and now you're bald. You used to have a ruddy complexion and now you're pale. You used to be stocky and now you're thin. I'm surprised, Mr. Gordon."
"But I'm not Mr. Gordon."
"You've even changed your name!" —FRANC, in Ireland's Saturday Night.

Letty, too, was in black, a clever French model ornamented only by a superb diamond brooch. Seeing Maud's eye on it, she said, "Lovely, isn't it? Nelson gave it to me for our wedding anniversary last year."

"It's magnificent," said Maud. "I gather Nelson is still pleased with his bargain. Dear Letty, it's good to see you. You look just as you always did."

It was true that Letty's features accommodated themselves without noticeable change to childhood, girlhood or womanhood, and Maud thought it would be difficult to guess her age. She might be twenty-five or thirty-five. Today Letty was wearing her fine, light brown hair combed upward to the top of her head, the ends neatly turned in. The effect was both elegant and naïve and gave her the look of a young girl on her way to the bath.

"I told Shaw to bring in tea," she said.

"His name's Shaw, is it? He's new to me," Maud remarked.

"His name's really O'Shaughnessy, but you can't call a butler O'Something."

"Can't you? Why not?"

"I don't know," Letty said. "You just can't. Maud, you'll stay to dinner, won't you? I meant to ask you when you rang up, but you took me by surprise."

"I can if you like," Maud said, "and if you haven't got a party."

"No, thank heaven, we're not having a party. There'll just be ourselves and Mary."

"How's Mary?"

"Oh, about the same." She put on a guarded look, Maud observed.

"Not married yet?"

"Good heavens, no! And not likely to be. I'm glad you can stay, Maud. It'll cheer Nelson up to see you. He's depressed about the war."

"He thinks it's inevitable, does he?"

"You know how people are. Some days he thinks it's bound to come, and some days he thinks it isn't. I tell him it depends on the state of his liver. Personally I prefer not to think about the war. I don't see what I can do about it. There always have been wars, and there always will be. So why worry?"

There was something positively endearing, Maud thought, about Letty's trueness to type. She looked at her with an amused smile and was about to speak when Letty forestalled her with:

"I intend to drive an ambulance, if there is a war. The children can go to the country, and we'll stay here. Nelson couldn't possibly leave London. They'd want him in the Ministry of Supply."

Maud wondered how much of London, should there be a war, would be left to live in. Finding the conversation unprofitable, she changed the subject. "Tell me about the children. How are they?"

"Ivor's doing very well at Eton. Lucille's growing up; she'll soon be sixteen. She's at school in Switzerland, you know. She's taken to writing poetry lately. I don't know why I should be afflicted with a daughter who writes poetry, do you?"

"No, I don't," said Maud with her robust laugh. "She must be a throwback."

"Well, it's very annoying," Letty complained. "She isn't even pretty; she takes after Nelson's side of the family. But I'm going to see that she's smart. It costs nearly as much to dress her as to dress me."

Maud made no comment on this, which she thought not unlike the utterance of a certain type of American mother. She merely said, "I'd be enchanted if a daughter of mine wrote poetry."

"You wouldn't be if you hoped to marry her well."

In those few words, Maud thought, Letty had packed the whole of her outlook on life, though they were spoken with her habitual air of pretty defiance. It was useless to take Letty seriously.

"You're quite incorrigible," Maud said, "and you always were. Now tell me about Mary."

There was a moment's silence during which Letty seemed to be considering how much she should tell. "I hoped we could keep off that subject," she said. "However, you're my oldest and best friend and I don't see why I shouldn't talk about her to you." She paused again and Maud said:

"Well, then, go ahead. Don't make such a mystery of it."

"Once I start on the subject of Mary, it's hard to stop me, so I don't often start. You know she's always been delicate."

"Yes. Isn't she any better?"

"Worse, if anything. Nelson sends her to one doctor after another, but they don't seem to accomplish much. She doesn't seem to have any vitality at all."

"What about her music? She hasn't given it up, has she?"

"Since the accident she has. I told you about that, didn't I?"

"You wrote that she and Lucille and Mlle. Drieux had been run into in a taxi, but I didn't know any of them were hurt."

"Mary was the only one, and it was her own fault, in a way. They were going to a concert at Queen's Hall. It was foggy, and

(Continued on Page 59)

HER RING:
a brilliant-cut diamond, set high and round. Of deepest diamonds-and-sable

She's Engaged!

She's Lovely!

She uses Pond's!

Miss Lillian Givens

The daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Winfield Givens, formerly of Penn Valley, now of Germantown—engaged to Mr. Lane Frederick Warren, Jr., of the old Pennsylvania Welsh Barons. Baby Cynthia: Miss Givens lived in Caracas five years—and last winter visited Havana. Another Pond's engaged girl, she has eyes of pure forget-me-not blue, an irresistible smile, a smooth pink-and-white complexion that tans with a warm, luscious glow.

"I think blush-cleansing with Pond's is just grand," Lillian says.

THE NEW BLUSH-CLEANSING with Pond's Cold Cream that Lillian Givens loves, will give your skin, too

—an instant clean-sweet look
—an instant softer, silkier feel
—and bring up a rose blush of color

W TO "BLUSH-CLEANSE," your face as she does:

You rouse your skin by pressing a face cloth drenched in warm water against your face and throat.

You "cream-cleanse" while your skin is receptively moist and warm. Spin your fingers full of snowy-white Pond's Cold Cream upward in circles, as if drawing engagement rings all over your face. Pond's demulcent action softens, loosens dirt and make-up as your fingers swirl. Tissue off.

You "cream-rinse" with a second thick Pond's creaming. Spin about 25 little Pond's Cold Cream engagement rings up over your face. Tissue off.

You tingle your clean, clean face with a good splash of cold water. Blot dry.

AT'S ALL! "I've never had anything feel nicer," Lillian says, "—and it leaves my skin really glowing clean."

Every night—give your face the complete Pond's blush-cleansing! Every morning—for a "bright-awake" look—a once-over blush-cleansing with Pond's! Invite the Pond's "engaged look." Dip your fingers deep in a big jar of Pond's Cold Cream, you'll find a 6-ounce jar is especially nice.

Diamonds and Pond's! Nine engagement-ring diamonds—valued at $20,000—destined for some of the loveliest engaged girls in America

AMONG THE BEAUTIFUL WOMEN OF SOCIETY WHO USE POND'S

The Lady Georgina Coleridge
Mrs. Nicholas R. du Pont — Mrs. Anthony J. Drexel, III
Mrs. Ernest L. Biddle — The Duchess de Richelieu
Mrs. Franklin D. Roosevelt, Jr.
Miss Cynthia McAdoo — Mrs. Allan A. Ryan
Lady Charles Cavendish — Mrs. George Jay Gould, Jr.
Viscountess Bridport, Duchess of Brontë

Short-cut to a square meal

That's the wonderful thing about Treet!

Treet and Toasted Corn Bread

It just takes a matter of minutes to cook up a big meal—a hot, hearty, nutritious meal—with Treet! Serve Treet every way you serve ham—fried, with toasted corn bread 'n' jelly, for instance. Cut a loaf of Treet into 8 slices and fry in a little fat 1 to 1½ minutes on each side. Spread split squares of corn bread with Cloverbloom Butter or Mayflower Margarine and toast them golden brown under the broiler. That's the easiest recipe for compliments in a stack of cook books!

Treet—not one but two favorite meats

There's more to Treet than you see or taste—tremendous food values are concentrated in this blend of tender pork shoulder and sugar-cured ham. Treet is rich in proteins and calories, minerals and vitamins—and none of this nutritious goodness is ever lost, for Treet is sealed in the tin before cooking. Remember, Treet is not one but two favorite meats—and you can serve Treet any way you serve ham!

Armour's 80th Anniversary · 1867–1947

The best and nothing but the best is labeled
ARMOUR ★

For additional Treet and Canned Meats recipes, write Marie Gifford, Dept. 31, P. O. Box 2053, Chicago 9, Illinois.

Serve Treet every way you serve ham!

(Continued from Page 56)

Mary lowered the window to look out. She had her hand on the sill of the window and they were run into by another taxi. Her fingers got pretty badly smashed. It was very bad luck indeed," Letty added, her voice musical with appropriate sympathy. "Very. But any other girl of her age would have pulled herself together and faced the thing. They did what they could for her—I can't tell you what Nelson paid out in doctors' bills—but they couldn't make her fingers as they were. She could still play if she wanted to, but because she can't play as well as she did before, she won't look at the piano. I can't tell you what we've been through with her in one way and another. First because we didn't take her music seriously enough, and because Nelson considered her too delicate to study abroad. I let her have the drawing room for three hours every morning, but no, she couldn't play here. The atmosphere wasn't right, or something. All I can say is, Maud, thank God I've no temperament. I've come to hate the very sight of a piano."

"But, Letty, this is a tragedy. The accident, I mean. I had no idea."

"It's been a tragedy all round, then," said Letty. "Don't imagine we haven't suffered. She's a hundred per cent liability, and I think it speaks pretty well for Nelson and myself that all this trouble with her hasn't affected our married happiness in any way. He knows I've done everything I possibly could for her."

"So your conscience is perfectly clear," said Maud.

Letty gave her a quick glance and said, "Absolutely."

"Poor Mary. I can't think of her apart from her music, somehow."

"Of course I don't happen to be musical," said Letty. "It was left completely out of my composition, and I'm thankful it was. If you knew what we've been through with that girl. Of course she ought to marry; all her doctors have admitted to me that she'd be far better married. But she's warped or something. She won't look at a man."

"Won't look at a man?" Maud repeated. "But she did look at one. You told me so, in one of your letters. I think you said he was a barrister."

"Oh, that. I forgot I'd mentioned it. It started very well, but she bungled things somehow. I'm afraid he just lost interest."

"I'd like to see her," Maud said. "Is she in the house now?"

"No, she went out this morning and hasn't been back." Letty paused, and then said, after a moment's silence, "What makes the thing still worse is that she hates us. Or anyway, she hates me. If she has any affection for her father she certainly doesn't show it. She's fond of Ivor and Lucille, but no one else."

"She didn't use to hate you," Maud said.

"Well, she does now. She tries to hide it, of course, but the whole atmosphere's full of it. Nelson doesn't realize it, but I'm afraid it's simply because he can't believe that anyone could hate me. And of course I've been very good to her."

"Why doesn't she live by herself?"

"That's what I think she ought to do," said Letty, "but Nelson simply won't hear of it. He [illegible] would be ridiculous for her to live in a flat of her own, quite apart from the fact that she's ill half the time. Besides, he doesn't trust her."

"Not [illegible]. What on earth do you mean by that?"

"Just what I say. He doesn't trust her not to turn against us completely. I know how he feels. It's like having a valuable dog and going to endless trouble and expense over his training and so on, and then seeing him attach himself to strangers and show his teeth when you go near him."

"What an unpleasant simile. I suppose she has her own friends, hasn't she?"

"Very few. She doesn't like the people she meets here, and she makes no effort to meet other people. Well, we've talked enough about Mary. The whole subject bores me. Bores me to tears. How do you like this room, Maud? Or isn't it weird enough for your taste?"

Maud laughed. "It's quite weird enough."

"All right," said Letty with good humor. "I knew you wouldn't like it. I suppose you think it's too conventional. I love those lamp shades. I've never seen any like them."

"Neither have I," said Maud.

"All right," Letty said again. "I don't care. I like them. You can't hurt my feelings. Don't you think it's a lovely house?"

"Yes, I do. Did it have to be so big?"

"Well, you know Nelson likes plenty of space, and we do have to do a lot of entertaining. You see, one of these days Nelson's going into politics. I think the Conservative Party needs men like him."

"I expect you're right about that. This staircase will be just the thing for your receptions. I can see you standing at the drawing-room door, graciously receiving the guests."

"That's one reason we bought it, because of the staircase, and the size of the drawing room."

"Well, you must have liked it," said Maud, "or you wouldn't have chosen it. It's all very handsome," she said more generously. "You mustn't mind me. You know we never did like the same things."

When Nelson came home, he greeted Maud warmly and, after a second's hesitation, kissed her cheek. She felt about Nelson much as she felt about Letty. She was fond of him in spite of a number of things. Maud thought he had thickened and coarsened in the past two years. His face was more highly colored, his neck seemed to have shortened. He was a big, rather barrel-shaped man, and she now detected a slight pomposity in his manner which struck her as new. She could see no gray in his thick dark hair, and for the first time wondered if he dyed it. His brown eyes, small but pleasant and frequently smiling, were a trifle close together; the fleshiness of nose and lips suggested a sensuality that his regular and ordered domestic life belied. (It was Letty's claim that she had found the perfect husband.) Yet to Maud there was something very likable about him.

He asked Maud how her mother was and wanted to know why she hadn't come over too. Maud explained that her mother's only sister had just been widowed and her mother had not liked to leave her so soon.

"So she came over with Lowell Pierce instead," said Letty mischievously. "I'm not sure she's nice to know."

"It would be more accurate to say he came with me," Maud remarked. "And may I remind you that it isn't for the first time?"

"Couldn't he have come to dinner?" Nelson inquired.

Maud said that he was spending the day in bed. They'd had a rough crossing and he hadn't slept well. "He takes very good care of himself nowadays," she said.

"How's his heart?" Letty wanted to know.

"Much the same. He's going to see a new heart specialist when we get to Paris."

"How long are you going to stay in Paris?"

"About two months. I've been asked to buy some paintings for the art gallery."

"Oh," said Letty, and made a little grimace. "I can imagine the sort of things you'll buy."

Maud smiled and said nothing, and Nelson remarked, "One of your great virtues, Maud, is that you don't try to convert the unconvertible."

"I hope I'm not such a fool," she retorted.

A moment later he turned to Letty and, with a troubled look, asked, "Where's Mary? Why isn't she here?"

"She went out somewhere," Letty answered carelessly. "I don't know where. She didn't tell me."

"Didn't she say when she'd be back?"

"She certainly didn't confide in me, darling. Perhaps Shaw knows."

Nelson at once went to the bell and rang for him. Shaw came, with a patient look, and said, his eyes on the carpet, that Miss Hallam had not mentioned to him what time she would be back. She had only remarked that she would not be in for lunch. He withdrew, and Nelson's face darkened.

"I don't like her to go out without saying where she's going or when she'll be back. She knows it perfectly well."

"So do I, darling, but you'll have to speak to her," said Letty with a little laugh. "She's your daughter. And she's nearly twenty-four. There's nothing I can do about it."

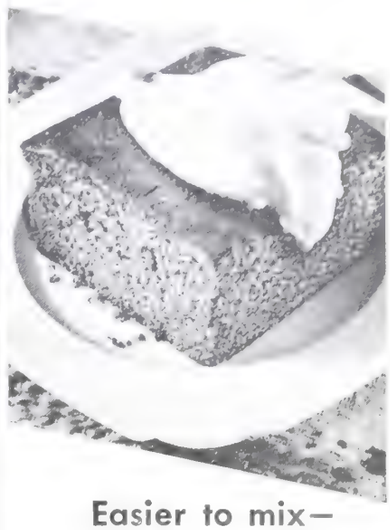
He turned to Maud. "We would not worry about her like this, except that she's so delicate. No doubt we've made mistakes. She's a difficult girl to deal with. But if only her general health would improve, I'd be less worried."

(Continued on Page 61)

"Well, make up your mind—if you're going to be the father, see that I be boss, too."

Save Sugar

NEW, QUICK, EASY
Gingerbread
made in a Saucepan



Easier to mix—and less dishwashing!

√ All mixing done in one saucepan!
√ A handle to grasp as you beat!
√ Best gingerbread you ever tasted!

SUGARLESS GINGERBREAD

½ cup shortening · 2½ cups sifted flour
1½ tsps. baking soda · 1 tsp. cinnamon
1½ tsps. ginger · ½ tsp. salt
1¼ cups Brer Rabbit Molasses
1 egg, unbeaten · ¾ cup hot water

No creaming of shortening. Just melt shortening in 3-quart or 4-quart saucepan over very low fire. Remove from fire; let cool. Mix and sift dry ingredients.

No beating of eggs. Just add molasses and unbeaten egg to cooled shortening and mix until well blended. Add sifted dry ingredients alternately with hot water, mixing well after each addition. Pour into well-greased 9x9x2 pan and bake in moderate oven (350° F.) 40 to 45 minutes or until done. 16 portions of delicious gingerbread!

"Folks, my molasses is over 60% natural sugar—and Rich in IRON!"

Brer Rabbit

That sugar in Brer Rabbit Molasses comes straight from the sugar cane. Real sugar—in natural form.

Iron is essential for good red blood! Brer Rabbit New Orleans Molasses is one of the richest known sources of food iron.

Two Types: GOLD LABEL, highest quality fancy light molasses—mild and sweet. GREEN LABEL, rich-flavored dark molasses.

FREE! NEW, QUICK, EASY SUGARLESS RECIPES

Send me leaflet giving new, quick, easy recipes for sugarless desserts—made in a saucepan. Also 52-page book of 116 fine molasses recipes. BOTH FREE.

Name _____
Print Name and Address

Address _____

Paste on penny postcard and mail to:
BRER RABBIT, c/o Penick & Ford Ltd., Inc.
New Orleans, La., Dept. J 1-7

Finest way to keep 'em singing Home Sweet Home

Finest RECIPE FOR CRANBERRY-GLAZED HAM

Half ham, tendered
1 can Stokely's Finest Cranberry Sauce

Bake ham, fat side up, uncovered, in slow oven (300° F.) 30 to 35 min. per lb. Beat cranberry sauce with rotary beater. Spread over fat surface of skinned, scored ham. Bake 15 min. in moderately hot oven (400° F.). Watch your family's delight as they agree that sweet-tart glaze gives new zest to an old favorite. But for real, deep-flavored lusciousness, be careful to select the most delectable cranberry sauce. Only bright, red jewels of cranberries are selected by skilled inspectors for Stokely's Finest Cranberry Sauce. They're washed sparkling pure, in constant sprays of clear water, so that you can be sure of nothing but the finest when you ask for Stokely's Finest. P.S. You'll find more wonderful recipes on the back of every Stokely's Finest label.

Finest RECIPE FOR GREEN BEANS VINAIGRETTE

1 can Stokely's Finest Green Beans
3 tablesp. Stokely's Finest Sweet Pickle Relish
1 tablesp. minced onion
¾ teasp. sugar
¾ teasp. salt few grains pepper
3 tablesp. vinegar
⅓ cup salad oil

Drain green beans. Add remaining ingredients. Heat. Serves 4 to 5. If you're looking for a quick, new way to add vegetable variety to meals, here's your most delicious bet! That enticing, pickly sauce does wonders for the fresh-tasting goodness of tender beans. And you'll find a sealed-in freshness in Stokely's Finest Green Beans. Each firm, ripe bean is whisked from the vines . . . and the same day, often within the hour, it's packed! That's why they always ask for "seconds" of nothing but the finest, when you serve Stokely's Finest.

Stokely's

Finest

ALWAYS DELICIOUS

Products of Stokely-Van Camp, Inc., Indianapolis

(Continued from Page 59)

"I want Nelson to try to persuade her to o to a psychoanalyst," said Letty.

"Modern magic," he said. "Hocus-pocus. don't want her to have anything to do with his Freudian business."

"Well, we've tried everything else," said etty. "Personally, I'd love to be psychonalyzed. You talk about yourself for an our a day every day for weeks. What could e pleasanter? It's better than going to a rtuneteller."

The doorbell rang and Nelson said, "There ne is at last."

There was a brief silence as Shaw went to ne front door. Then the door of Nelson's udy was opened a little wider, and Mary ame in. She looked about her like a diffient stranger. Her face was thin, her features harpened by ill health; her eyes were large nd dark, but they were lifeless, like a laid ut unlit fire.

Without a change of expression she went o Maud and said, "Aunt Maud, how lovely o see you! O'Shaughnessy told me you were ere."

Maud kissed her cold cheek and took a thin nd awkward gloved hand. "My dear," she aid, "do you know it's three years since we net? You were away somewhere when I was ver last."

"I know. When did you get here?"

"You would have heard all about it if I'd een you this morning," said Letty, her voice arefully free from reproof.

Mary did not reply to this, but said, "I'm orry I'm late. I ought to have telephoned. I topped at a friend's on ny way home and my ead was aching so adly that she made ne take an aspirin and e down."

"Another headche?" said her father.

"Yes," said Mary. I'm sorry. I shan't want any dinner, Letty. think I'll go straight p to bed if you'll all xcuse me."

"Eva can take you p some soup," said etty melodiously.

"Thank you," said Mary. "Shall I see ou again, Aunt Maud? I hope so."

"I certainly hope so too," said Maud eartily. "Why don't you come and have unch with Lowell and me on Friday? We're taying at the Downshire."

"Thank you, I'd love to," the girl answered, nd she made an effort to put some warmth nto her voice.

"Well, that's fine," said Maud. "And take are of yourself in the meantime."

Mary bade them a formal good night and urned and left the room. No good-night kiss vas offered and none, it appeared, was exected. Her going left a little, troubled ilence.

Then Nelson said explosively, "Really, hese doctors are fools. Why can't they find ut what's wrong with her? The money I've pent, and absolutely no results."

"I don't think, myself, that Letty's idea s such a bad one," said Maud. "Why not ry a psychoanalyst?"

"Would you go to one yourself?" he demanded.

MAUD laughed and said, "My dear Nelson, t's no good asking me that. I'm so normal 'm ashamed of it. A lot of my friends appear o think that because I'm a spinster I ought o be full of kinks and complexes, but all can say is that if I've got any I'm just not ware of them."

"Well," said Letty, who was sitting very erect in her chair, "what Mary needs is a psychoanalyst or a lover. If she's too spiritless to get herself a lover, we ought to see that she goes to a psychoanalyst."

"Letty's prescription for almost everything," said Nelson, "is a love affair," and, though he smiled, his heavy but by no means unattractive face seemed to darken.

"They change one's whole outlook, and they're so good for one's appearance," Letty went on with the pretty perversity of a charming and indulged child. Shaw appeared in the doorway at that moment to announce dinner and she added, as she got up, "Remember I don't approve of either remedy at the moment. But then I suppose, to be discussing [illegible]." She kissed Nelson and took his arm as Maud preceded them into the dining room.

During dinner the situation in Europe and Mr. Chamberlain's efforts to maintain peace were discussed, and the words and phrases used by both Nelson and Letty seemed to Maud to be those in current use. Both said, without much conviction, what many of their friends were probably saying.

NELSON, it seemed, still had hopes of Hitler. "He's crazy on one subject," he said. "The Jews. If it weren't for that, I'd say let him go ahead and run Europe. No one else can."

"Well," Maud said, "the whole idea of it simply appalls me. What a world we live in!"

"I suppose in another hundred years or so," Nelson said, "we'll have abolished war, or it'll have abolished us. About even chances, I think."

When they returned to Nelson's study the subject of Mary came up again.

"I'm glad you asked her to lunch, Maud," Nelson said. "I wish you'd talk to her."

"What about?" Maud wanted to know.

Nelson looked quickly at her; his small shrewd eyes had a slight reproach in them. "Now, Maud, I'm not going to suggest that you turn yourself into a kind of household spy. It's just that I wish you'd try to get at her; you know, find out what makes her tick—or find out why she doesn't tick. We can't. God knows we've tried to help her."

"Why don't you let her come to Paris with us?" Maud suddenly heard herself saying.

Nelson looked at her in astonishment. "You can't mean it, Maud. Why should you burden yourself with a delicate, neurotic girl you hardly know?"

"Oh, I don't believe she's as bad as all that."

Nelson cleared his throat and replied, "Well, it's not my habit, as you know, to exaggerate. Still, I wouldn't stand in her way, if you really mean it. I'm bound to say, Maud, that I think it's very generous of you. You realize, I suppose, that she may get ill."

"What's wrong with French doctors, darling?" Letty asked him.

"That's all very well, but Maud would have the care of her."

"Well, why look for trouble?" Maud asked. "The change would probably be good for her." Having made the offer, she was now determined to see the thing through.

"Anyway," said Letty, "I want to get her room repainted. There was a leak in one of the pipes last month. It would give me a chance to have the workmen in."

"All right," said Maud. "The next question is, will she come?"

"Of course she will," Letty hastened to say. "It's only when suggestions come from us that she turns them down."

Nelson said slowly, "It might be as well not to let her know that we've been discussing the idea. Could you make it appear that you've just thought of it, Maud, when you propose it to her? If she suspects col-

"Oh, you leave that to me," Maud said. "I can dissemble as well as the next person."

Half an hour later, glancing at the clock, she said, "I ought to get back to my invalid," and Nelson rang for Shaw. When the taxi came, Maud turned to Letty and said, "Well, tell Mary I expect her at one, on Friday, and she's not to let me down."

"What about a little dinner party for Maud and Lowell before they go?" Letty suggested, her arm through Nelson's. "Just eight or ten, as there's so little time. We haven't any high-brow friends, Maud, so > Discouragements and obstacles can be used to strengthen character as dams make it possible for rivers to generate electricity: they impede the flow but they increase the power. Defeats are inescapable; failures are as certain as the sparks fly upward. By the side of every mountain is a valley, and by the side of every oasis is a desert.

>
> —REV. MARION DE VELDER, broadcast on a Church of the Air program. Quoted in TALKS: Columbia Broadcasting System, Inc.

AS SIMPLE AS THIS —

Brew your favorite brand of coffee through a Lox-in glass filter*. . . and lady . . you're serving coffee at its best. • Lox-in is an exclusive innovation . . patented by Silex . . it is the only glass filter with replacement guaranteed for life against breakage . . it locks in . . it can't bobble or fall out . . and it not only fits Silex perfectly but most other glass coffee makers as well. • Buy and use it today . . preferably in a Silex . . for Silex makes better coffee . . . . . Price 75¢.

★Available NOW at your local dealer

FREE . . . our brochure "Head Chef Recipes" brings you newest hors-d'oeuvre and sandwich secrets of famous restaurants . . . also tested recipe for making the world's freshest, most delicious coffee . . . just write Dept. 15 F. The Silex Co., Hartford 2, Conn. In Canada: St. Johns, P. Q.

SILEX LOX-IN Glass Filter

First Encore!

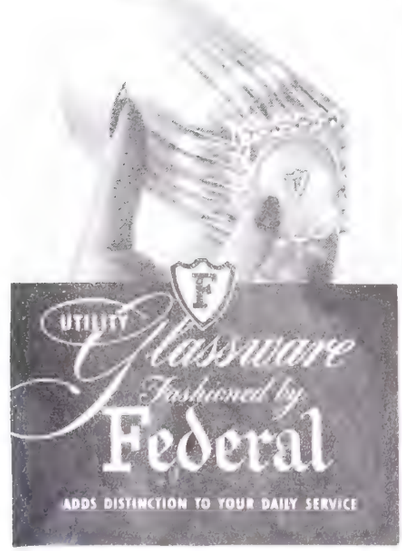
Ⓕ According to all indications this young lady's very first encore of a Park Avenue tumbler will be far from her last. The fact is she's a very discriminating woman.

Ⓕ You see, more women have encored with their purchases, the fresh sparkling beauty of the Park Avenue than any other tumbler ever made.

Ⓕ Furthermore, since the turn of the century, Federal-fashioned tumblers, tableware, beverage sets, occasional and ornamental pieces have graced millions and millions of American homes.

Ⓕ Look for the Shield Ⓕ of Federal when you buy glassware. It's your assurance of lovely crystal, unmatched in color, clarity and brilliance, at a very low cost.

THE FEDERAL GLASS COMPANY
Columbus 7, Ohio



don't expect a lot of people who can talk about art."

"I know plenty of people who can talk about art," said Maud genially. "I'm with them all day long. But won't it be rather a rush, Letty? And we've got only Wednesday and Thursday free."

"Then we'll say Thursday," Letty said, "and I'll ring up Lowell in the morning. But you tell him he's got to come."

Maud had hoped to avoid a dinner party at the Hallams', but she saw there was no escape. "He'll come all right," she said. "And thanks, Letty. It'll be lovely."

Nelson went to the door of the taxi with her. "I wish you were here oftener, Maud. You're very good for Letty. Good for both of us, in fact."

Her heart warmed to him. While putting on her coat in the hall she had been thinking, One comes away full from some houses, empty from others. Now I'm coming away empty. The unmistakable sincerity of Nelson's words touched her. Had he, too, been aware of some lack? The role of plain businessman which he so sedulously assumed sometimes wore a little thin. Definitely there was more in Nelson than met the eye, but it was only apparent when one was alone with him, when he was off his guard.

When she reached the hotel she took the lift up to the fourth floor, where Lowell's room was. Her own was on the floor below. They usually engaged their rooms separately; not that anyone ever questioned their right to arrive and depart together or to have their meals together. It was a small convention to which they generally adhered. They were old friends and had reached a time of life that surely placed them beyond any suspicion of impropriety, thanks partly to her own matronly appearance and to Lowell's delicate health and invalidish air. She knocked at his door.

Lowell was in bed, with a dark-red silk dressing gown about his shoulders. He had a book propped against his drawn-up knees, and the reading lamp picked out highlights on his round, nearly bald head. His colorless mustache was thin and closely cut; his nose was fine, straight and fastidious. His brown eyes, unusually large for a man, were mild and seemed incapable of anger. His somewhat receding chin merged in his neck as he looked over his glasses at Maud and said:

"Back, Maudie? What was your evening like?"

She was reminded, with a vividness that made her smile, of her mother. Lowell could be, when she wished him to fill the part, either friend or brother. Now, at this moment, he was her mother and she felt a warm and amused affection for him as he looked over his glasses at her, as companionable as any woman, but so much more useful as an escort, for she disliked dining with women in restaurants, or seeing other women dining together.

She sat on the foot of his bed and began to tell him about the evening in Hyde Park Square. He had met the Hallams perhaps half a dozen times and brought to bear on them his own humorous and sometimes caustic scrutiny. He thought Letty a kind of Becky Sharp with a dash of Madame Bovary. When Maud had described the house he said:

"What fun they get out of their money I don't know. Letty's opposite number at home would have been adventurous enough to buy Matisses and Picassos whether she liked them or not, just to be in the swim."

"Nelson wants to establish himself firmly, and then go into politics. Letty's contributing her share in her own way. Probably she's the right wife for him, though just now and again I have my doubts."

"I gather from what you say," Lowell remarked, "that they suit each other well enough. As perhaps you know, I divide people roughly into two classes: those who live with an eye on their immortal souls and those who don't. The Hallams belong conspicuously, to the latter class."

"Well," said Maud, with a laugh, "you can suit yourself. But, Lowell," she continued, "you remember, don't you, that Nelson has a daughter by his first wife, who died?"

"I seem to remember. I don't think I ever met her, did I?"

"Yes, you did. When we were dining one night at the house in Kensington she came in and played the piano. She played Chopin and was very nervous, but she played uncommonly well."

"Yes, now I remember," he said. "A thin, dark young girl, not bad-looking."

"She's delicate, poor child," said Maud, "and I guess she's pretty unhappy there with Letty all over the place. They mix like oil and water. I'm going to ask her to come over to Paris with us, unless you've got some good reason why we shouldn't ask her."

"What, me?" The invalidish man looked round at her with an air of humorous surprise. "Since when have you begun looking for objections or even opinions from me? Well, she'll be your responsibility, not mine."

"Oh," she laughed, "I'd hardly expect you to make yourself responsible for her. Seriously, Lowell, tell me if you hate the whole idea."

"I don't particularly hate it. You know I don't like young girls. They make some men of my age feel young, but they make me feel a hundred."

"Well, she's not exactly a young girl. She's twenty three or four. And she's had her troubles." She told him about the accident in the taxi.

He asked, "Why hasn't she married?"

"Her health's been wretched. She's always being ill."

He said, polishing his glasses, "One of those vicious circles, I suppose. She's ill because she hasn't married and she hasn't married because she's ill."

"You talk like Aunt Chloe in some girls' magazine," she told him. "You can go into that question with her when we're in Paris."

"I'll do nothing of the sort." He put on his glasses and picked up his book again. "It's time you went to bed. Open my window before you go, will you?"

She pulled his window down from the top, thinking how often she had performed this little act for her mother, and then turned to the door. "Well, good night. I'm lunching at the Savoy tomorrow with Accrington, the art critic. Join us, if you like. It's my party."

"All right," he said, "if I haven't anything better to do."

She closed his door softly and went down to her own room. She went to the closet to hang up her coat. It was pleasant to be here again, and with Lowell. They disagreed only about minor matters, about which it was amusing to argue. Dear old Lowell. She was very, very fond of him.

Her friends and family took it for granted that but for Lowell's disastrous illness at nineteen, the attack of inflammatory rheumatism from which he had so nearly died and which had so impaired his heart, they would have married. Well, she thought, as she had thought many times before, let them think it. What did it matter now?

A freshman at Harvard at the time of his illness, he was advised by his doctors not to return there, and so continued his studies with tutors in his own home. There had been few exchanges of sentiment between Maud and himself, either before or after the event that changed his life. He had continued to be her escort to dances, though he did not, of course, dance, and she left them early on his account. He became more and more dependent on her, and she, inexhaustibly kind and tolerant, let him believe that she was equally dependent on him. Little by little he entered once more into the social life of Boston, and, more important to him at that time, its intellectual life. At forty, however, he announced that he was weary of the latter and that only the former now interested him. His mind, she knew, easily grew tired, and he fell back upon the merely amusing. He had many friends, though she was always friend in chief. He became like an urbane monk, entertained and stimulated by contact with his fellows and as fond of gossip as a fishwife. Maud often told him that he could have written good, gossipy novels, and he might have done so had he been touched, even lightly, by the spur of poverty, but his parents died leaving him well off and he was content to watch the world go by, to collect early American furniture for a house he had bought—though he could not make up his mind to live in it—near Stockport, and to interest himself mildly in scientific research.

Maud knew him better than she knew herself. She knew every corner of his life; almost, she thought, of his mind. It was his belief that he knew hers, and the fact that he did not was responsible for the one flaw in her relations with him, and for the guilty feeling that had troubled her for years in regard to him. She had kept from him—as indeed she had from everyone, with a single exception—the most important event in her life. It was highly improbable that he would ever find it out unless she herself were to tell him; nevertheless, the uncertainty as to how he might be affected by it, if he were to know, teased her and was much in her mind.

By all the rules, this piece of private history should have been discovered long ago. That it was not, in such a closely knit society as that of Boston and within their own comparatively small circle, was extraordinary. At twenty-four she had fallen in love with a well-to-do Bostonian known to all of them who was married and the father of four children. He told her that though he no longer loved his wife, he would never seek a divorce. Maud accepted this barrier to her total happiness, and though she suffered greatly with intervals of fearful and inordinate joy, they were lovers for over ten years.

In response to a certain affectionate misconception as to her musical talent on the part of Mrs. Cotter, Maud took singing lessons from a Spanish ex-opera singer named Mme. Montez. The singer, because her neighbors objected to the sounds inseparable from the giving of lessons, rented an apartment for that purpose not far from her house. When the lessons were over for the day, usually at four o'clock, the apartment was empty. Maud made Mme. Montez her only confidante, and the singer gave her her sympathy and presented her with a duplicate key to the apartment. Here Maud's emotional life, all that ever came her way, was lived with an intensity and a depth of feeling that made it a life within a life.

In the end, Martin Brewster died at the age of forty-four after a lengthy illness, during which he was dutifully cared for by his wife and inaccessible to Maud. It seemed to Maud that the agony she then suffered was the punishment she had to bear for her illicit happiness. Grief, and a grief which had to be hidden, aged her and added years to her already mature appearance. She never fell in love again, nor wished to. Martin Brewster had completely absorbed and dominated her and during the ten years that their love affair had lasted she took her views and preferences from him.

(Continued on Page 64)

Hint

By Goldie Jane Feldman

Oh, woo me with a compliment
And I may think you lie,
For many is the honeyed word
That leaves a lass to cry.

Or woo me with a fine bouquet
And I will grow afraid,
For gifts and blandishments alike
Have broken and betrayed.

But would you seek to win my heart,
Continue as you're doing
(You're letter-perfect in the part)—
Let me keep on pursuing!

They come first!

Your children's normal growth and development come first in all your planning. And because good nutrition is so important to them and their spread for bread is an important part of good nutrition, you'll find we're playing on your team.

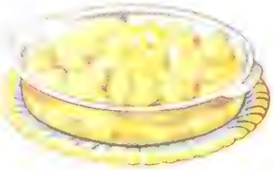
For Nucoa is made to standards set in consultation with an advisory group of leading American nutritionists. Its uniform quality is maintained by strict laboratory control. 175 tests daily insure Nucoa's sweet, fresh flavor...smooth-churned texture...high food value in every delicious pound. No other churned spread can be counted on the year round as a finer source of Vitamin A.

"That is why on bread and toast and hot vegetables—in all your cooking, you'll find Nucoa so good "it melts in your mouth." We make sure that Nucoa is good enough for your children. Could any spread be better to set before a welcome guest?

So Smooth! Easy to Cream . . . to Spread

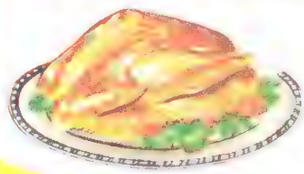
Bread-and-spread is important energy and starting health—a blessing we must share with those who are starving in war-torn lands. Prepare it with [illegible] carefully waste a crumb.

FOR FLAVORFUL COOKING, TOO!



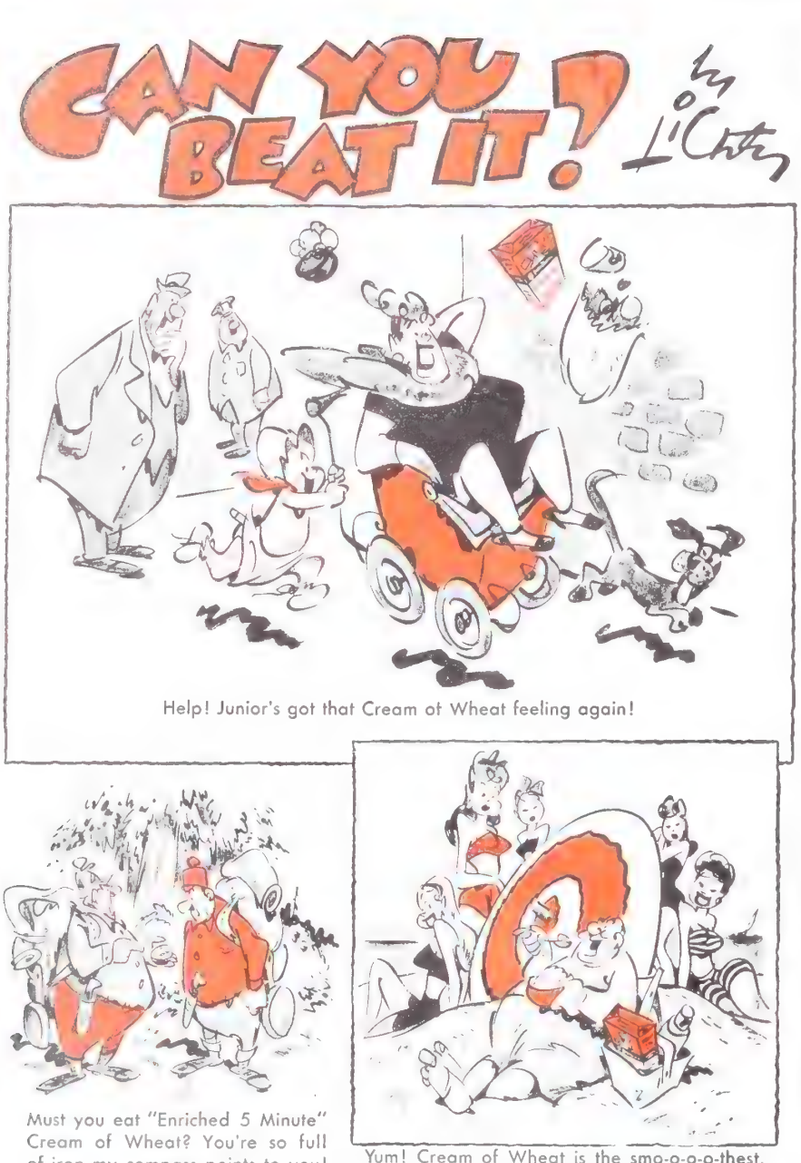
GLAZED APPLE DESSERT

(1) Melt 3 tbsp. Nucoa. Blend in 1½ tbsp. enriched flour; add 1 cup water slowly. (2) Add 6 tbsp. [illegible] and ½ tsp. cinnamon, and cook, stirring occasionally, until thickened. (3) Place 6 apples, pared, cored and quartered in a Nucoaed baking dish; pour sauce over them and bake in a moderately hot oven (400° F.) for one hour. (4) Stir occasionally, so apples will be uniformly cooked and glazed. (5) Serve warm or chilled with milk. Yield: 6 servings.



FLUFFY BREADLESS STUFFING

(1) Sauté ½ cup chopped onion in ½ cup Nucoa until yellow. (2) Stir in 2 cups H-O Quick Oats, 2½ tsp. salt, 1½ tsp. poultry seasoning, ¼ tsp. pepper and 3 cups unseasoned mashed potato. (3) Pack lightly in roasting chicken and roast as usual. Yield: Stuffing for 3½-4 pound chicken.



CAN YOU BEAT IT!
Li'Cotter
Help! Junior's got that Cream of Wheat feeling again!
Must you eat "Enriched 5 Minute" Cream of Wheat? You're so full of iron my compass points to you!
Yum! Cream of Wheat is the smo-o-o-o-thest, tastiest dish on the beach!
FINISH
Uglugg win big North Pole dog sled handicap again! Instead of "mush", he yell "Cream of Wheat!"
YOU CAN'T BEAT IT... GET THAT CREAM OF WHEAT
FEELING!
TOPS FOR "GET-UP-AND-GO" FOOD-ENERGY!
ALL THE BLOOD-BUILDING IRON YOU NEED DAILY!
COOKS TO FULL DIGESTIBILITY IN ONLY 5 MINUTES OF BOILING!
COSTS LESS THAN 1¢ A BOWL!

(Continued from Page 62)

Her interest in pictures had been first aroused by him. He had bought in Paris as a young man—a young man with money and a flair—a magnificent Manet, two portraits by Ingres, an early Corot, a Van Gogh and a Sisley, and with these as a foundation he built up a small but admirable collection of nineteenth-century French paintings. As his wife took no interest in them whatever, he left them in his will to a Boston art gallery, where they were contained in a specially built wing and known as the Martin Brewster Bequest. With this bequest went the proviso, privately agreed upon, that Maud was to be made curator and buyer for the collection, a fund being allocated for this purpose.

Maud's interest in and knowledge of French painting was well known to her friends, who were not at all surprised that the choice of the trustees should have fallen upon her. Also, she had for some years been writing articles for the Amateur Collector. She had now built up a reputation as a shrewd buyer, a skillful bargainer and a good judge.

She knew that Janet Brewster had preceded her to England with one of her daughters and that she might easily run across her. In Boston their acquaintance had never ripened, but remained infertile, static. But a meeting here, Maud feared, might have different results. Conceivably Janet might welcome an encounter with two fellow Bostonians and discussion of mutual friends at home, and this Maud was determined to avoid. Even had circumstances been other than what they were, she and Janet Brewster would have had little in common.

She folded up her clothes neatly and got into bed. The Times lay on her bedside table and she opened it and studied the list of art exhibitions before switching off the light. She then turned comfortably on her side and, crossing her arms on her breast, uttered a silent, humble yet urgent prayer for those she loved, living and dead, and fell asleep.

Our lives are like waves that come up out of the ocean of eternity, break upon the beach of earth, and lapse back to the ocean of eternity. Some are sunlit, some run in storm and rain; one is a quiet ripple, another is a thunderous breaker; and once in many centuries comes a great tidal wave that sweeps over a continent; but all go back to the sea and lie equally there.

—AUSTIN O'MALLEY: Quoted in Treasury of Wit and Wisdom, by Norman Lockridge (Biltmore Publishing Company).

Letty placed such emphasis upon the importance of looking one's best that it gave Mary a perverse pleasure to take little trouble about her appearance. Her usual costume was a loose tweed coat worn over a simple, serviceable dress, and a beret. She had four berets, one of them red; this she wore when she went to lunch with Maud.

The day was the mildest of the season so far, and the sun had unexpected warmth. As Mary had time in hand, she decided to walk to the Downshire, and she was almost dazzled by the sun. It caressed her face, her eyelids were bombarded by it, she felt it lie warmly against her mouth, she felt it penetrate to her very heart. But she was not deceived. The sunlight was a check which would not be honored; it was a promissory note given her by a bankrupt.

THE night before she had had one of her recurrent dreams, a dream which never failed to cast a deep shadow on the day that followed. It was the dream of lost spring. She had been looking forward to the spring with a longing that, she knew, was more than a mere longing for the darling season; it was a longing to which a hundred other longings attached themselves. It was a longing to possess the spring by matching it with her private happiness, and so meet fullness with fullness, and loveliness with love. And each year her fears that she would once again be found wanting brought about the dream: the dream that spring had somehow overtaken her and passed on, and before her yearning eyes had turned to dried leaf and sere, burned grass and dust. In her dream she recognized the same disaster that had overwhelmed her before, and her whole being cried out in anguish and in protest, "You've let it go by again! It's gone, and you've had none of it, not a bud, not a flower of it." And her heart had broken with disappointment and chagrin.

And now she was going to try to make herself acceptable to two nice people who meant nothing to her: "Aunt" Maud, Letty's friend, whom she could have liked warmly but that she was Letty's friend; and Letty's friend's friend, the baldish man she remembered on that nightmare evening when she had been sent for to play to them, and had played Chopin as if her fingers had been turned into little hammers.

SHE looked about her for a clock, saw one, and slackened her pace. There was plenty of time. She walked slowly, caressed by the sun, and took stock of her situation. Seen from outside, she knew she would be judged fortunate. But inside, the scene was like the opening of Macbeth—a blasted heath and three witches. She could name them: Hate, Frustration, Despondency. Three charming girls.

Her Mentor, her other, commenting and watching self, had sometimes said to her, Get rid of the first and the other two will vanish. A palpable lie and, anyway, unfeasible. Get rid of hate? It was in her very blood stream. She had disliked Letty from the first moment that her childish eyes had rested upon her.

Then music, the very stuff of life to the developing girl, a boring noise to Letty, washed like a sea between them. Her father was indifferent to it, and only when she talked of making it a career did he grow impatient. Her health was so unreliable as to make nonsense of such aspirations; and, anyway, she was going to be an attractive young woman with money behind her. The career for her was marriage.

The fight was long and bitter. As if to prove her father right, her health declined still more, until she was sent to Switzerland with the threat of a tubercular lung forcing her submission. Two years were spent there, two—from the point of view of music—utterly wasted years. Back again to the piano and to her lessons she came, with dogged determination.

She was nearly at the hotel and it was still too early, so she paused to look into a florist's window, but saw only pictures from her own past. She searched for happy ones, as the unhappy will; scenes with which to comfort herself when there was comfort from no other quarter. But there was only the accident, arresting all hope, all motion; zero overnight and the moving waters of her life stilled. She had asked the brisk young surgeon when her hand was taken out of plaster:

"Is it really all over? Shall I never play again?"

His answer had been, with a surgical, cruel-to-be-kind look at her, "There are compositions for the left hand, I believe."

Her father had urged a cruise, Letty a three-months visit to Maud Cotter in Boston. She declined them both. The shy girl who had been too absorbed in her music to contemplate any other life now saw but one possible route for herself out of this bitter, freezing wasteland: a husband, a home, a child. These might fill a vacuum that seemed to her otherwise without limit. She chose this way back to life as a frightened prisoner, plotting freedom in spite of his fears, chooses his best way of escape. What would Maud Cotter, Letty's friend, think, Mary wondered, if she knew about Ferdinand Walsh? But no one knew, no one would ever know.

Encouraged by Mary's changed attitude toward men, Nelson one night had brought home to dinner a young barrister who had lately won a case for him. Ferdinand Walsh was a tall man in the early thirties, with the

(Continued on Page 67)

Animal, vegetable, or mineral?

this charming little fellow is what he eats ery day, he's all three—animal, vegetable, d mineral.

The nutrition story on this youngster is important war record.

He came in a year when this country was ting an all-time high in number of babies
rn. Hospitals were crowded, food rationed, erything pretty much topsyturvy. But got what he needed to build that sturdy tle body. The babies in most of the rest the world were (and still are) badly dernourished.

A healthy, husky boy is a good symbol of the U. S., and we're glad we had a hand in helping supply him with plenty of the right foods. National Dairy is in the food business, with emphasis on milk and milk products.

Youngsters like this one are a symbol of something more to us—they're a sign that America is growing fast. The population's multiplying—there are more mouths than ever to be fed.

That's a big job. But National Dairy is organized to bring to it the specialized talents of many people—people who know food and recognize its importance in building a better and healthier America.

Dedicated to the wider use and better understanding of dairy products as human food . . . as a base for the development of new products and materials . . . as a source of health and enduring progress on the farms and in the towns and cities of America.

Kraft Sealtest Breyers

NATIONAL DAIRY
PRODUCTS CORPORATION
AND AFFILIATED COMPANIES

First thing in the morning . . .

when everybody's rushed . . .

and tastes are fussy . . .

Try Borden's-the new instant coffee made especially for breakfast!

LOOKIT! NO FUSS, NO WAIT, NO GROUNDS, NO WASTE-QUICK AS A WINK! AND PERFECT COFFEE EVERY MORNING!
IT'S NOT JUST FOR OCCASIONAL USE. IT'S A REAL BREAKFAST COFFEE. FINE COFFEE. ALL COFFEE. WAIT TILL YOU TASTE IT!
100% PURE COFFEE
Borden's INSTANT
COFFEE

We don't have to tell you folks how nice it would be to have instant coffee for breakfast—for that early morning rush, when time's so short.

"Sure," you say, "but how good is the coffee? Show us an instant coffee as swell as our best ground coffee—and we'll buy and bless you."

"Fair enough," says Borden. "We'll waste no words. Either Borden's has it, or you don't pay! It'll taste as good as your favorite ground coffee every day—or your money back!"*

You see, Borden's was made for breakfast—not just for occasional use. It's all coffee—not a half-and-half café-type mixture! And what coffee! Serve it by the cup or by the pot. Serve it to the whole family. Serve it for every meal. If we aren't right, the treat's on us!

Tastes as good as your favorite ground coffee—or money back!

IMPORTANT: Don't use too much Borden's. Just remember Borden's is 100% pure coffee. Use ½ to ⅔ of a level teaspoonful.

© THE BORDEN CO.

*If you don't find a jar of Borden's Instant Coffee as good as your favorite ground coffee, send us the jar with the unused contents, and we'll cheerfully refund your money. The Borden Co., 350 Madison Ave., New York 17, N. Y.

Guaranteed by Good Housekeeping

(Continued from Page 64)

striking, heavily marked eyebrows so common among comedians and members of the bar. He had an easy, elegant way of lounging in a chair or on a sofa, and handled his long legs and arms with grace and confidence; and yet in spite of the easy grace there was a look of ruggedness too. Mary thought there was something of the actor in him, but this did not displease her, this helped to conquer her; and she could not have said whether his mind or his personality attracted her more. He enlivened what might well have been a dull evening, for good talk was not often heard at the Hallams'. Letty, charming and girlish in a lovely dress of gray-blue silk, sparkled. Nelson, pleased by the success of his guest, relaxed and lost some of his stiffness and his habit of critical watchfulness. Mary, like most shy people who are determined to overcome their shyness, sometimes startled by her outspokenness. So absorbed was she in her own feelings, in her own shy, desperate plans, that she did not know that in the first hour of that evening the relations between Letty and herself had altered. They were attracted to the same man. They had become rivals.

After dinner, when they went into the drawing room, he strode to the piano, looked at the maker's name and said, "A Bechstein! Who plays it? Do you play, Mrs. Hallam?"

Letty looked up at him and laughed. "I?" she cried. "Good heavens, no! I'm not musical in the least. I've no temperament. It's my stepdaughter who's the musical one." And the fool, she seemed to say; the silly, muddled fool, who doesn't know what women are for. No, no, thank you very much, I'm not in the least like that!

He turned to Mary, perfectly aware of undertones, and said urgently, "Oh, please play, do! If you will, perhaps I shall be encouraged to play too. I'm an amateur, but I love it. We'll have a musical evening."

Mary looked at him unflinchingly and slowly extended her hand, palm upward, like a beggar, showing the scarred fingers that would not straighten. "I can't play now. I injured my hand. I was going to be a professional pianist, but that's all over."

With an exclamation he took her hand and examined it. "What a shame! What a tragedy! How did it happen?"

"It was a taxi accident."

He let go her hand, and in his face she saw a sympathy that for once caused her no pain. On his actor's face it was vivid. "I can't tell you how sorry I am. Ought I to have seen? You use your hand so very cleverly, no one would notice. How brave you are!"

She shook her head. "I'm not brave at all. I took it very badly." She got up and went to the music cabinet. "What will you play?"

"No notes," he said. "I play mostly from ear. I am the veriest amateur." He sat down on the piano bench. "I'll play something I'm sure you don't play, so as not to offend your ear. I'll start with the waltz from the Rosenkavalier, just to loosen up my fingers. I haven't touched a piano for days."

He ran his big hands easily and lightly over the keys. The room became gay with his music.

Letty's large, brilliant gray eyes were on Walsh's back. I'm not taken in, she was thinking. This is only a parlor trick. I know the sort of man he is. As experienced as the devil, and as clever. He amuses me. I like him. Mary had better look eslewhere for a husband. He's probably involved with a married woman. Any normal man over thirty who hasn't married is involved with a married woman.

SHE reviewed her life, for now she was seeing it from a fresh angle. A mild and safe flirtation with this amusing man would be good for her, good for her appearance. It was time she looked about her a little. Nothing serious, just the gayest and most innocent of affairs, something to give a little zest to life. After all, she'd seen almost no one but Nelson's business friends for years and years. Before she knew where she was, he'd be finding her dull.

Poor Mary, her thoughts ran on; a jeune fille, still, at nearly twenty-four. She had had Lucille at nineteen and Ivor at twenty-one. No one looked on a jeune fille for more than a year or two. After that it became a subject for ribald jokes. Poor Mary.

It was Letty's ambition to be always cool, polished, charming, sure of herself, nobody's fool. She hated sloppiness; she hated inefficiency or muddle. Mary, she was quite certain, was going to make a tiresome mess of her life. Now she washed her hands of her. Let her look after herself. Let her go her own way. Let her even fall in love with this young barrister and make a perfect fool of herself over him if she wants to. It's no concern of mine.

And Mary, painfully trying to reverse the whole current of her thoughts, painfully seeking her way out to life once more, found in Ferdinand Walsh all the incentive and encouragement she needed. Yes, this was the sort of man who could make her forget what she had lost; so clever was he, so talented; so knowledgeable. She missed what Letty saw; saw what Letty missed. Both magnified what they saw.

Letty now set herself out to please, under Nelson's approving eye, this chance dinner guest, this amusing man, as she mentally called him, so obviously clever and on the way up. And saw, with amused pity, with inward laughter, how softly Mary spoke, how attentively she listened to his playing, how she emerged from the background where she habitually kept herself and let loose a little the creature she was and might be, let it out on a little chain, with growing confidence, seeing that it was met with kindness.

WHEN ANIMALS SEEK HUMAN AID

The great blue heron rose heavily from the stream edge. A metal chain dangled below the bird, trailing in the air. The heron had stepped on a steel trap which had clamped on one of its legs. A few hundred yards away the bird alighted. It rose into the air again, headed back and landed not more than twenty feet from the man with the field glasses. Although the great blue heron is usually wary of man, it made no effort to escape as he approached. It put up only token resistance as he grasped its dangerous lance bill in one hand and opened the trap with the other. Facing a greater danger, it had braved the danger of man.

—Edwin Way Teale.

Walsh went home shortly before midnight. "I've had a lovely evening," he said, dark eyes and brows turning from Mary to Letty, and back. "Please ask me again."

"Well," said Nelson when he had gone, "he seemed to enjoy himself. What do you think of my young barrister?"

"Darling," said Letty, "he's the perfect answer to the hostess' prayer. He'll be invaluable for dinner parties. Why haven't you asked him before?"

"I haven't known him very long. What did you think of his playing, Mary?"

"If he'd taken it seriously," Mary said, "I think he might have been a very good pianist. He's thoroughly musical and his ear is surprisingly accurate."

"Well, I thought him an amusing man," said Letty with a yawn. "And I shall ask him to a party soon. Now I'm going to bed."

And Mary, lest there should be any misunderstanding, not knowing how plainly she had let it be seen, said, "I liked him very much, father. Very much."

He patted her shoulder a little awkwardly. They scarcely knew each other, their lives were altogether separate. "I'm glad," he said. "You're looking better, my dear. See if you can't put on a little more fat."

She smiled at him and said good night.

In Letty's bedroom—it was not his bedroom, because he snored and had been dismissed to the dressing room—he said, undoing his tie, "Well, I'm very much encouraged. I must say. Do you think he's a bit to Mary? They certainly have something in common."

"Darling," said Letty, sitting at her dressing table, "don't indulge in any romantic flights about that man and Mary. He's too clever to be caught by an inexperienced young girl. He'll marry when it suits him, and he'll marry well, a rich woman, or a woman of title, or possibly both. He's about as likely to fall in love with a shy, delicate, rather neurotic girl as I am to fall in love with Shaw. So put that out of your mind."

HE looked at her reflection in the mirror rather gloomily. "I don't know why you're so positive about it. He put himself out to be agreeable to her."

"Oh, of course. He has good manners, and he's sorry for her. But fall in love with her he certainly will not. Or with anybody, if you want my opinion."

"You may be right," he said. Then he added, "But what sort of man do you think would fall in love with her?"

Letty began brushing her soft, light brown hair. "Ask me an easier one, darling. You ought to know. She's your daughter."

"I really don't think I know anything about her. I suppose I ought to have taken more trouble to know her when she was a child. I blame myself a good deal."

"Yes, darling, I know," said Letty. "You've said so before, but that's because you're a very nice man, always ready to blame yourself for what you couldn't help. If you insist on blaming yourself you'll have to go farther back; you oughtn't to have given her the mother you did."

"Well, I don't know. I was pretty young, I suppose, and inexperienced."

Encouraged by her kindness, he came close to her and, bending down, turned her face up and kissed her. She paused, brush in hand, then put her free arm about his neck and returned his kiss.

"I hope," she said lightly, "that nobody ever says the same thing about Ivor and Lucille."

"Don't," he said sharply, shocked. "Don't ever say that, even in fun."

"Darling, you're a very nice man."

The evening, the meeting with Ferdinand Walsh had pleased and stimulated her. She thought once again what a good wife she was, how she had never deceived Nelson and never denied him anything; no, nor ever would. Not many wives could say as much. He owed her a little relaxation, a little freedom.

She looked up at his reflection in the mirror and leaned her head for an instant against his waistcoat, smiling. "I'm really ridiculously fond of you, you know," she said.

Mary, turning now from the florist's window, remembered how she had gone up to her room that night, pulled aside the curtains and stood looking out at the lighted windows, shining dimly into the thin fog that half veiled them and hid the outlines of buildings. She felt the imminence of love; then, through that door, of marriage, of maternity, and had suddenly longed for them with a hunger she had never known before. Oh, if life would give her these, she would put what she had lost forever out of mind. She opened her hand, with its awkward fingers, and asked herself, Was it for this? Was there a purpose in it after all?

Only three days went by before a little note came for Mary from Walsh, to ask her to a concert the following week, dining first in a restaurant off St. James's Street. She had pledged herself to stay away from concerts, but to go with Ferdinand Walsh was another matter, and she readily absolved herself from her vow. It was the happiest of evenings, unforgotten and unforgettable. Rain, she remembered, had made the streets shine like canals, but it stopped as they left the restaurant. Later he had had to park his car far down Portland Place, and he was distressed that she was obliged to walk a hundred yards or so in her thin slippers on the wet pavements. She thought nothing of it, was utterly content. She was not shy

(Continued on Page 69)

A DELICIOUS SWEET WITH LITTLE SUGAR*

PEANUT BUTTER COOKIES

¾ cup peanut butter
½ cup brown sugar*
1 egg, lightly beaten
¾ cup flour
¼ teaspoon salt
½ teaspoon cinnamon
½ teaspoon Arm & Hammer or Cow Brand Baking Soda
2 tablespoons water

Cream peanut butter and sugar. Mix and sift dry ingredients. Add egg, dry ingredients and water to peanut butter mixture. Blend well. Chill thoroughly. Roll out into a thin sheet and cut with a small cookie cutter, or make into a small roll, slice and flatten each cookie with a floured fork. Bake in a hot oven (400° F.) 8 minutes. Yield: About 50 small cookies.

* Honey or maple syrup may be substituted for the sugar. If so, reduce the amount of water to 1 tablespoon.

NOTE: Rolled cookies may be cut with fancy cutters, such as crescents and stars. Store in tightly-closed container in order to retain their crispness.

BAKE WITH BAKING SODA

In combination with sour milk, buttermilk, or sweet milk soured with fruit juices or vinegar, it's Nature's own leavening—still the way to tender textures, delicate flavors, and soft, moist crumb, in cakes, cookies and hot breads.

ARM & HAMMER OR COW BRAND BAKING SODA

CHURCH & DWIGHT CO., Inc.
10 Cedar Street, New York 5, N.Y.

Please send me FREE BOOK describing uses of Baking Soda; also a set of Colored Bird Cards.

E-91

Please print
Name _____
Street Address _____
City or Town _____ State _____

Glamour cakes again! "Mix-Easy" recipes for 2 Swans Down favorites!

What cake-lover could ever forget Swans Down's wonderful Creole Fudge Cake? Double-rich layers put together with gleaming seven-minute frosting and glossed over with melted chocolate!

Or Swans Down's Marble Cake—luscious chocolate mingled with swirls of dreamy-soft white cake!

And now—the Swans Down Kitchens have turned those gorgeous cakes into "Mix-Easys"! No creaming! Beating cut in half!

Try one of these glorious old favorites—modernized by this remarkable new quick-mixing method! Other exciting recipes come with your Swans Down box.

SWANS DOWN "MIX-EASY" CREOLE FUDGE CAKE

Preparations: Have shortening at room temperature. Line bottoms of two 9-inch layer pans with paper; grease. Start oven for moderate heat (350° F.). Sift flour once before measuring. (All measurements are level.)

Measure into sifter:

2 cups sifted Swans Down Cake Flour (And be sure it's Swans Down!)
1 teaspoon soda ½ teaspoon salt
1½ cups granulated sugar or firmly packed brown sugar

Measure into mixing bowl:

½ cup shortening

Measure into cup:

*Milk (see note at right for amount)
1 teaspoon vanilla

Have ready:

2 eggs, unbeaten
3 squares Baker's Unsweetened Chocolate, melted

*With butter, margarine, or lard, use ⅞ cup milk. With vegetable or any other shortening, use 1 cup milk.

Now—Swans Down's "Mix-Easy" Part!

Beating cut in half! (Mix by hand or with electric mixer at a low speed.) Stir shortening just to soften. Sift in dry ingredients, add ½ cup of milk, and mix until all flour is dampened. Then beat 2 minutes. Add eggs, melted chocolate, and remaining milk and beat 1 minute longer. (Count only actual beating time. Or count beating strokes. Allow about 150 full strokes per minute. Scrape bowl and spoon often.)

Baking: Turn into pans. Bake in moderate oven (350° F.) about 30 minutes. Spread seven-minute frosting between the layers and on top and sides of cake, and coat with 2 squares of Baker's Unsweetened Chocolate melted with 2 teaspoons of butter.

SWANS DOWN "MIX-EASY" CHOCOLATE MARBLE CAKE

Preparations: Have shortening at room temperature. Line bottom of 10x10x2-inch pan with paper; grease. Start oven for moderate heat (375° F.). Sift flour once before measuring. (All measurements are level.)

Measure into sifter:

2 cups sifted Swans Down Cake Flour (And be sure it's Swans Down!)
2½ teaspoons Calumet Baking Powder ½ teaspoon salt 1 cup sugar

Measure into mixing bowl:

½ cup shortening

Measure into cup:

¼ cup milk 1 teaspoon vanilla

Have ready:

3 egg whites, beaten to meringue* with ¼ cup sugar
Chocolate mixture: 1 square Baker's Unsweetened Chocolate, melted; 2 tablespoons water; 1 tablespoon sugar; and ¼ teaspoon soda

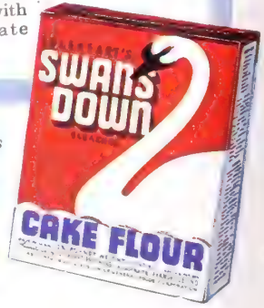
*For meringue, beat egg whites with rotary egg beater (or at high speed of electric mixer) until foamy. Add ¼ cup sugar gradually, beating only until meringue will hold up in soft peaks.

Now—Swans Down's "Mix-Easy" Part!

Beating cut in half! (Mix by hand or with electric mixer at a low speed.) Stir shortening just to soften. Sift in dry ingredients, add milk, and mix until all flour is dampened. Then beat 2 minutes. Add meringue mixture and beat 1 minute longer. (Count only actual beating time. Or count beating strokes. Allow about 150 full strokes per minute. Scrape bowl and spoon often.)

Add chocolate mixture to ½ the batter, mixing only enough to blend.

Baking: Put batters by spoonfuls into pan, alternating plain and chocolate. Then with knife, cut carefully through batter once in a wide zigzag course. Bake in moderate oven (375° F.) about 30 minutes. Frost with favorite chocolate frosting.



Product of General Foods

Swans Down is back! Fine cakes are back!

(Continued from Page 67)

him; she let out the chain a little e, a little more. One day, she thought, e would be no chain at all.

Then he left her at her front door he said, ing her hand in both of his, that they t meet again very soon, and when a fort-t passed she told herself that a fortnight ne life of such a busy man must seem the fest of intervals. When they heard from again it was to ask the three of them to with him at the Savoy. Letty went to trouble of getting herself a new dress for occasion, a black lace dress that a nish dancer might have worn. Mary had thought of buying a new dress; she wore one she had worn the first evening he e to the house, and Letty made a face n she saw it.

Haven't you something better? You've n that for a year or more, and it never particularly becoming."

Mary said, "Won't it do? It's too late to nge now."

he's going out to dine with the man she's in with, Letty thought, *and she says, on't it do?" Well, she's not my daughter.
done what I can.*

hey were six at dinner, the two others
g a fellow member of the bar, somewhat nger than Walsh, and a talkative, by no ns good-looking, but interesting Austrian, widow of an English diplomat. She ned to be on very friendly terms with r host, and Mary wondered about her a e unhappily, but Letty had no doubts ut her at all, and ght, He wouldn't ask o meet us if it was some-who really mattered to Why should he?

was Letty's evening.
had intended that it ld be. Walsh danced e with her than with er Mary or the Aus-n, and Nelson looked ner with divided thoughts. Would she r grow any older? How pretty she was!
a line, not a gray hair; as fresh and plias a girl. His heart ached as he thought is increasing weight, which he never ned to have time to do anything about, his whitening hair which she had perded him to have dyed.

wasn't long after this that Mary went alone with Walsh again, this time to the ter and to supper after. Another magical ning, to be remembered first with delight then with anguish, to be blotted out tears and shame. She sat close to him ne car as he drove her home, closer than would have sat if she had not loved him.
was utterly certain now that she did him and that he would wonderfully, aculously return her love. She sat so that coat sleeve touched his, so that she d even feel the arm beneath the sleeve.
wanted no more at that moment; it was nuch happiness as she could bear. She ted their love to ripen slowly.

the doorstep he said, "Give me your
" and she took it out of her bag and gave him, her hand trembling. He did not nce put it in the door, but stood close to in the pillared windy darkness of the t steps, and, putting his arms about her, drew her to him slowly and, lifting her with his hand, kissed her on the lips.
whole life, her whole being was in her zed, marveling whisper, "Oh, I love you
He whispered back, "You're a darling. are, you know. One day soon I'll tell more. But not here." He opened the , gave her back the key, smiled fondly er in the light from the hall, and went n the steps and got into his car. She ed till she heard the car drive away and went slowly up to her room, drunk and d with happiness. She could not sleep.
lay in bed hugging herself in a half-elieving ecstasy. Here was all that she longed for and more, more.

etty had said to Nelson that evening, w don't let this raise your hopes. He's y for her. He's simply being kind."
How do you know it's only kindness?"
I simply know."

Shortly after this, Letty invited Walsh to [illegible] party [illegible] people.
He was not put next to Mary and they scarcely spoke to each other. He played bridge after dinner, and she had never learned to play. It was a miserable evening for her, and she was thankful when it was over, though she cried a little in her room.
Within the week he rang up to ask her out to lunch, but she had gone to Surrey to spend a few days with her aged Grandmother Hal-lam and Letty answered the telephone.

NELSON was irritated at the way things hung fire. Was Letty right or wrong? Did Mary and Walsh like each other or didn't they? And if they did, why didn't they get on with it? To help matters along he asked Ferdinand to join them at a play and to have supper at a restaurant and dance afterward.
A night was agreed upon and Mary looked forward to it with so much dread and so much eagerness that when the day came she woke with a feeling of deep depression and helplessness, which was not made better by the nearness of one of her violent headaches.
At noon Nelson rang up Letty to say that he was obliged to go to Manchester on business and wouldn't be back until the following day. He wanted Shaw to pack a suitcase and bring it to the office.

"Don't let it spoil your evening," he said.
"I don't want to disappoint Mary. Try and get someone in my place. I expect Hopkinson would jump at it if you asked him."

"All right, darling," said Letty, "but it's quite ruined my evening."

She didn't want to ask Greer Hopkinson if she could get anyone else.
She'd been bored by him all too often. But after trying one or two other possibilities with no success, she rang him up. As she had expected, he said he'd like nothing better than to come.

When it was time to dress, Mary's headache was in full possession. She knew that she looked her worst, her eyes sunken, her skin sallow. Even her hair, her thick, dark, flattering hair, seemed to have lost both life and luster. She used her simple arts: brilliantine, a little dry rouge, a brighter lipstick. The wan face defeated them. I'll see it through, she thought. She had had a present from Ferdinand that morning, a book that he had promised to send her. He had written in it, "For Mary, from F.L.W." Coming on a day when she needed comfort and assurance, it had brought her infinite balm. It was Henry James' The Tragic Muse, which he had had bound for her very prettily. She remembered afterward how she had touched its smooth, polished binding with her lips before putting it into her desk.

Greer Hopkinson called for them in his far too handsome car. He was a successful stockbroker, fifty-six, bald and facetious.
He made puns, he had a foolish laugh, he pretended that he and Mary had an understanding, were sweethearts. He liked to talk as though they were to be married someday.
"When we're married, sweetheart," he would say, "we'll go to Capree on our honeymoon."
He sent both Mary and Letty expensive boxes of flowers on their birthdays and at Christmas, and great boxes of chocolates. He was Nelson's friend and broker.

When they reached the theater Letty saw to it that Mary sat between the two men, while she herself sat on Ferdinand's right.
Greer, therefore, had only Mary to talk to before the curtain went up, and he never stopped talking.

Once, during the play, Letty leaned across Ferdinand and whispered to Mary, "How [illegible]"

"All right," said Mary shortly, and added,
"thank you." She hated the way Letty leaned across Ferdinand to speak to her.

"It's not much of a play," whispered
Letty. "If you wanted to go home you

> It is the best part of the man, I sometimes think, that revolts most against his being a minister.
>
> From The Heart of Emerson's Journals
> Edited by Bliss Perry > (Houghton Mifflin Company).

SOMETHING NEW FOR DINNER

...and ready to serve at the drop of his hat!

RAVIOLI
à la Chef Boy-Ar-Dee
Spread Chef Boy-Ar-Dee Ravioli in skillet (some prefer to melt a little butter in skillet), cover and heat on low flame. Or heat Ravioli in sauce-pan. So easy—simply delicious!

Chef BOY-AR-DEE RAVIOLI

Lady, here's eating! Plump, tender ravioli made with choice beef, blended-in vegetables and just a touch of tangy cheese, cooked to perfection in the Chef's own flavorsome ravioli sauce. You'll thrill the whole family with this joyfully different, ready prepared, melt-in-your-mouth main dish!

LIKE TINY MEAT PIES IN SAUCE! Chef Boy-Ar-Dee Ravioli is thrifty, too—only a few pennies a portion. Hearty, nourishing. Get a big full-pound jar today.

RAVIOLI MEAL IDEA

Chef Boy-Ar-Dee Ravioli
*Mixed Green Salad
A Crusty Bread or Crisp Crackers Beverage

Try watercress, endive and lettuce with French Dressing. Crumbled Roquefort or Stilton cheese is a nice addition.*

By the makers of Chef Boy-Ar-Dee Spaghetti Dinner and Sauces

Look What's Inside

Here's a Chef Boy-Ar-Dee Ravioli just as your fork cuts through it. See the luscious stuffing of choice MEAT (Beef) and blended-in vegetables.

Guaranteed by Good Housekeeping

Copr. 1947 Chef Boy-Ar-Dee Quality Foods Inc.

The Chef
tells you "when it's done"!

THE CHEF is a new and needed idea for your kitchen. It is a stylish, accurate, electric clock with an easily operated timer that says "when."

The Chef times any household task to a second—or up to an hour. When asparagus has to come out of the pressure cooker at a certain split second—set the Chef's timer and forget it. You'll be reminded. Clothes in the washer should be "activated" only a certain length of time. Set the Chef. Its timer will buzz you!

Unique . . . Versatile

The Chef is unique in that it may be placed where you want it. Mount the Chef on the wall. Set it on any flat working surface. You can see the Chef. You can reach it.

This immensely versatile electric clock-and-timer comes in four attractive colors: apple green, Chinese red, ivory, white. A-C only.

For your kitchen wall — THE GARCON

This smartly styled kitchen clock can be read from all over the kitchen, and it's no trouble at all, at all!

The GARCON is self-starting—you can say good-by to winding worries. In the same four colors, the new General Electric Garcon is today's standard value in kitchen clocks! General Electric Company, Bridgeport 2, Conn.

General Electric Clocks

The Clocks Most People Want Most

GENERAL ELECTRIC

Ferdinand whispered to her, bending his head down close to her ear, "You don't want to go, do you?"

"No," she answered.

The play was light, foolish, empty, and Ferdinand tore it to pieces without mercy as they made their way out. "I never can see," he said, "why, because someone asks you to a play, you're debarred by politeness from criticizing it. It's like placing a nice dish of bones in front of a muzzled dog. What did you think of it, Mrs. Hallam?"

"What people usually think of a bad play," she answered. "That they could have written a better one."

"I thought it was first-rate," protested Greer Hopkinson. "I don't know what's wrong with you people. Carp, carp, carp. That little actress—what was her name?—the red haired one, was the goods. And that funny chap made me laugh like a fool. Jolly good, I thought, the whole thing. Well, come along, boys and girls. There's the chauffeur. In you get."

And now the evening assumed, for Mary, a really nightmare quality. As they sat at the supper table, there seemed to be no remembrance in Ferdinand Walsh's eyes of those moments by the front door. She might, she thought, have dreamed them. Again and again she searched his eyes, his cool and friendly and unmeaning eyes, and the whispered words became a monstrous, shameful indiscretion. Oh, what had she done, answering his kiss with all of herself when nothing had been intended by him but an instant's pleasure, as he might have sniffed a violet or stroked a dog's softear? In that whisper she had made a complete confession of love, however she might try to twist or turn the words into something else, or give them some other meaning. Her miseries, mental and physical, overwhelmed her. When she got up to dance with him her feet were leaden and the room and the lights and the other dancers swam about her.

People are pleased when praised, not for their obvious qualities with which they are as familiar as you, but for those which they believe they lack. A general will not thank you for talking to him of his victories, but his gratitude will be unbounded if you mention his flashing eyes. The famous novelist cares little for praise of his books, but if you speak enthusiastically of some obscure essay which few appreciated or of the vibrant quality of his voice, he will immediately become interested.

—ANDRE MAUROIS: The Art of Living. (Harper & Brothers.)

As they danced, Ferdinand said to her, "You're not looking at all well. We're all worried about you. Don't you think you ought to go home?"

So "we" were worried. She had not known that two letters could inflict such pain. "Perhaps I'd better go," she said.

"Poor child. We'll stop dancing. Shall we have an evening out together soon? Would you like it? I'll ring you up."

She nodded, unable to speak.

As they returned to the table he said to Letty, "This child's all in. Don't you think she ought to go home and go to bed?"

"Well, I don't think there's any doubt of it," Letty said. "Don't you think so yourself, Mary? We hate to lose you, it's a shame, but there it is. You look almost ill. Greer, run her home in your car, like a dear, will you? And then come back."

Mary looked wildly at Ferdinand. Could it be possible that he would let this happen?

Greer was already on his feet. "Come along, sweetheart, daddy'll take you home."

Ferdinand flashed a sympathetic look at her and held out his hand. "Take care of yourself. You mustn't be ill."

As she still lingered, uncertain, Letty said, "I told Eva to sit up, so ring for her when you get in. And tell her she needn't wait up for me. Not that I shall be late, but I don't like keeping her up after twelve."

Ill though she felt, Mary wanted to stay, longed to stay, but Greer stood waiting, and she knew that if she said she would stay they would continue to urge her to go. She turned without another word and left the room.

In the car, Greer took her hand and tucked it under his arm. "Poor little girl, why don't Letty take you to Egypt or the Riviera or somewhere? You ought to be in the sun."

She tried to laugh, but burst into tears instead and sat sobbing amidst the wreckage of the evening, the wreckage of her hopes. If he'd cared for her, he would have taken her home, instead of letting her go home with Greer.

"Now, now," said Greer, putting an arm about her and patting her shoulder. "Pretty girls shouldn't cry and spoil their looks. Marry me, and we'll go to the South Sea Islands. Don't you listen to Letty. I'd make the best husband in the world. Now don't cry, ducks. Here, take a real hankie."

She tried to control herself, and managed to say, "Be careful, Greer. I might take you at your word one of these days."

He laughed. "Things as bad as all that. Poor old Greer! Nobody loves him. Now that's better. I'll tell you something, sweetheart. I'm not going back to the others. I'm going straight home to bed when I leave you. I've got a busy day tomorrow. Letty won't mind. It's been a grand evening and all that, but sleep's sleep and slumber's slumber."

She wiped her eyes. This was unexpected and unwelcome. "But they'll wait for you," she protested. "Letty expects you to go back."

"Catch Letty waiting for anybody," he said. "Not she. It'll be O.K. And I'll get a good night's sleep. With boys on the stock exchange need all our wits about us these days, believe me. Here we are, sweetheart. Give daddy a nice kiss and see that you're fit and well tomorrow. The absurd, good-natured man whom she had known ever since she could remember took her key and let her in. "There you are. Sweet dreams. Bye-bye, darling."

Mary could picture herself wearily climbing the stairs to her room. She did not ring for Eva, but Eva heard her and came down from her room on the topmost floor. "Aren't you well, miss?"

"No, Eva, I feel awful. But I don't want anything. I'm going straight to bed. And Mrs. Hallam asked me to say that she didn't want you to wait up for her."

She wondered if she dare take any more aspirins. How many were dangerous? She didn't know. She didn't much care. She lay awake, listening for Letty to come in. She had left her door open a bare inch so as to be sure to hear her. It was now twelve-thirty and she supposed they might stay and dance for another hour. Tears flooded her eyes again and fell on her pillow. Then she remembered the book that had come that morning, and got up and took it out of the desk. She lay reading it, comforting herself with the feel of it between her hands, something that he had touched, liked, given her. "For Mary." Written in his own hand for anyone to see. And he called Letty "Mrs. Hallam." At one moment it gave her hope, at another it seemed to put her in her place as a young girl he liked and was sorry for. Was that how he thought of her?

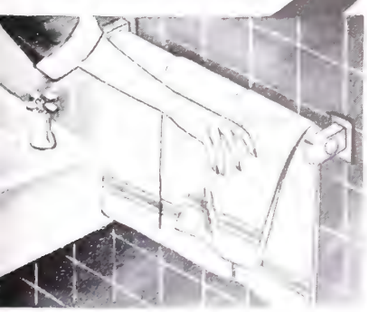
By half past one Letty had not come home, and by the throbbing of her temples, the restlessness in her arms and legs and a thirst that water did not quench, Mary knew her temperature had risen. If only, if only Letty would come home. What were they doing? Had they gone on to a night club? Were they talking about her? What would Letty say? She believed she knew only too well what Letty would say.

She thought she heard a sound and, after listening with held breath, got out of bed and ran down to Letty's room in her dressing gown and slippers, only to find it empty, abominably, guiltily empty, the bed turned down and a silk-and-lace nightdress laid across it. How it all spoke of Letty! The rose hangings, the gilt, the white fur rug

(Continued on Page 72)

Irish Linen again . . .

DRESS DESIGNED BY VERA STEWART



NEN HUCK TOWELS

So pleasing to look at . . . so pleasant to use. In pure white or decorative pastel colors and in both guest and regular hand towel sizes.

NEN SHEETS AND PILLOW CASES

For luxury sleep, for lasting quality, for the perfect ensemble to your beautiful blankets, sheets and pillow cases must be . . .

NICER THINGS FOR YOUR HOME ...NICER THINGS FOR YOU

How good to feel the crisp clean touch of Irish linen again . . . to enjoy all the little satisfactions that mean so much to a woman. The satisfaction of seating your guests at a table made beautiful with Irish linen damask...the daily satisfaction of ample supplies of household linens . . . the personal satisfaction of wearing linen suits and dresses and, once again, of using only pure linen handkerchiefs. More and more Irish linens will be coming into stores from now on. Look for the symbol, "Irish linen, it's lovely, it lasts."

Irish Linen

● Write for this free 40-page book on Irish Linen.

THE IRISH LINEN GUILD

527 FIFTH AVENUE, NEW YORK 17, NEW YORK

LINEN HANDKERCHIEFS

Your handkerchiefs, like your perfume, must be of the finest quality — of sheer Irish linen in either dashing prints or all-white.

LINEN DISH TOWELS

Absorbent, quick-drying, lint-free . . . and brightly styled to dress up your kitchen . . . that's the story of the new linen dish towels.

Say Shefford for fine cheese

Pot Luck or Full Dress

Pot Luck—Shefford Blushing Bunny

Grate ¼ cup Shefford Chevel* Brand Cheese Food (so easy to melt or spread or slice). Put remainder of 8-ounce package of Chevel in saucepan; add 1 can (10½ ounces) condensed tomato soup. Cook over low heat, stirring constantly until Chevel melts. Serve on 4 slices toast; top with thin slices of onion sprinkled with the grated Chevel. Makes 4 servings.

*Chevel is a trade-mark owned by Standard Brands Incorporated ace 1 package (8 ounces) Shefford Chevel rand Cheese Food in saucepan; add 1 n (10½ ounces) condensed tomato soup. ook over low heat, stirring constantly til Chevel melts. Add 1 can (12 ounces) oster and ½ teaspoon curry powder ssolved in ½ tablespoon hot water. (Mild nevel blends so well with other foods.) eat thoroughly. Serve on toasted ackers. Garnish with finely chopped rsley. Makes 4 servings.

Full Dress—Shefford Lobster Rarebit

Simple or fancy, home folks or company, the start for any good cheese dish is good cheese. Shefford Cheese has the honest, genuine flavor, the naturalness of the good milk from which it is made. Old-time experts in the finest dairy country produce Shefford, in many styles and types, for people who respect quality in cheese.

STANDARD BRANDS INCORPORATED
New York 22, N. Y.

(Continued from Page 70)

the pink roses on the dressing table, the wood fire, mostly embers now, with the underclothes she would put on in the morning laid neatly on a chair beside it. How she hated, how she hated Letty! Yet, deeply as she hated her, she had never hated her presence as much as she now hated her absence. Oh, Letty, I could almost love you if you were here! she thought.

Back to bed, shivering now, her head hot, her headache knocking wildly about inside her skull, like a trunk adrift and awash in a ship's cabin. Another endless hour passed, dragging itself lamely by. They must have gone on to a night club. But Letty never went to night clubs. No, because Nelson hated them. Now she was free to do as she pleased. Free to do anything.

A clock downstairs struck three, and Mary gave a little moan, an audible moan, as though there had been someone there to hear. She sat up and beat her fists upon her knees. Come home, Letty! Letty, come home! You know what you're doing to me, you do. you do! She did not think of her father, no thought of him crossed her tormented mind. Now there was no sound in the house; even the rumble of London had ceased, as if it had been put away for the night. She lay, fevered in body and mind, while yet another hour passed. She heard four strike, then five. Oh, where were they, what were they doing? Could a man take a woman like Letty into his bachelor flat? What was to prevent it? Of course he could. Would Letty go? Yes, if she felt safe, if she felt sure. Then that was where they were. She knew it now, knew it with absolute certainty. Then everything was ended. Worse than ended. Poisoned and made loathsome forever. She began crying helplessly, O God, let me die! I want to die!

At half past five she heard a taxi draw up, not in front of the house, but a little way down the square. Once more she held her breath, straining to hear. After a little interval she heard steps on the stair, soft, infinitely cautious steps, and once or twice the treads creaked a little. Then Letty's bedroom door opened, giving a faint swish as it was pushed over the thick-pile carpet and repeating the sound as it closed, with a final click. Now she was in her room; now she was home again; now it was over. The girl stood shivering at the inch-wide opening of the door, and in her mind's eye followed Letty across her room to the dressing table between the steep fall of the rose curtains on either side; saw her sit looking at herself in the glass, her face still stamped with triumph, pleasure and fatigue. She could see that look on Letty's face as plainly as if she were in the room with her. Though she had never seen it on any woman's face, she knew it would be there.

She closed her own door noiselessly and let her breath out in a great sigh, as if it were all the breath she had and all she would ever have; as though it were all she would ever need. Letty! Very slowly she went to her bed and crept in. She felt as though she had walked through some searing flame and was now reduced to the size of a walnut. She drew up her knees, drew her whole body into a small, trembling knot. She was beyond tears. Those she had shed earlier were the tears of a child. If she had known the trick of dying, she would have died then.

(To be Continued)

FOR A LONG WINTER EVENING

WHEN the temperature drops and your own cozy fireplace is the most inviting spot, it's time to knit. Make a sweater, a bag—or a hooked rug. You'll want to order more than one of the JOURNAL patterns listed below.

JOURNAL REFERENCE LIBRARY

FOR YOURSELF

2289. CARDIGAN. Ballop trim, colorful variation. No front closing. 5c.
2290. STRIPED VEST AND CAP. Ensemble knit for No. 2289. 5c.
2291. LOW-NECKED EVENING SWEATER. A new note in stripes. Three-quarter-length sleeves, stockinet stitch. 5c.
2292. TWO-PIECE RIBBON-KNIT DRESS. Short sleeves, over-skirt blouse. 5c.
2293. RIBBON-CROCHETED HAT. Companion to No. 2292. 5c.
2294. LONG SLEEVED AFTERNOON SWEATER. Low neck, gold star paillettes. 5c.
2295. KNITTED JACKET. Crocheted chenille collar, peplum style. 5c.
2296. CROCHETED MUFF. To carry when wearing No. 2295. Use black chenille. 5c.
2297. KNITTED JUMPER. Jerkin type. 5c.
2298. STRIPED SWEATER. Just the thing to wear under No. 2297. Long sleeves, round neck. Stripes run horizontally. 5c.
2299. CARDIGAN JACKET. Rib stitch, roll collar, patch pockets. 5c.
2200. CROCHETED DRAWSTRING BAG. This new big bag in popcorn stitch adds the final touch in accessories. 5c.
2197. AFTERNOON SWEATER. Sequin trim on the belt, sleeve edge and neckline. Bracelet-length sleeves, round neck. 5c.
3009. DUTCH CAP AND MITTENS. Make them in white with colored yarn embroidery. 5c.
2196. SHORT-SLEEVED PULL-OVER SWEATER. Novelty beaded belt. Sizes 12, 14, 16 and 18. 5c.
1877. BEEHIVE HAT. Small roll brim, grosgrain bow trim on front. 5c.
1987. CLASSIC TWO-PIECE DRESS. Sleeve length as you wish, shirtwaist front. 5c.

FOR YOUR HOME

2013. ONE- AND-PLOW SAMPLER HOOKED RUG. 24 by 40 inches. Two houses, farmers, oxen and a plow make up this pastoral scene. 10c.
2014. SQUARE-MOTIF HOOKED RUG. 24 by 54 inches. Design formed by concentric squares in contrasting colors. 10c.
2015. HOLLY HOOKED RUG. 27 by 40 inches. Bright berries and leaves on natural background. 10c.
2016. SCROLL HOOKED RUG. 27 by 49 inches. Graceful scrolls. Floral center design. 10c.
2017. FLORAL HOOKED RUG. 22 by 44 inches. Elaborate, many-color designs. 10c.
2018. BOUQUET HOOKED RUG. 24 by 30 inches. A soft background sets off this bold bouquet. Scalloped border. 10c.
1050. CHERRY-RIPE QUILT PATTERN. To be appliquéd in blocks. 10c.
1051. STAR-DIAMOND QUILT PATTERN. Appliquéd. 10c.
1600. IVA'S PINCUSHION. An easy quilt design worked in appliqué and trapunto. 10c.
1601. REBA'S RING. Designed for patchwork or appliqué and trapunto. 10c.
1602. RACHEL'S WREATH. Appliqué, trapunto and quilting design in four large squares. 10c.

BOOKLET AND PATTERN LISTS

List containing additional patterns will be sent free upon request. Titles, prices and numbers of all booklets and patterns are given.

1660. LIST OF JOURNAL HAT AND BAG PATTERNS. Accessories you can make.
1571. CHECK LIST OF PATTERNS FOR JOURNAL KNITTED AND CROCHETED ARTICLES.
1752. MAKE-IT-YOURSELF PATTERNS. Handicraft for your home, your children, yourself.
2076. THINGS TO WEAR.
2008. LIST OF DEPARTMENTAL BOOKLETS. About the home, garden, child care and training, beauty and entertaining.
1695. SUB-DEB BOOKLET LIBRARY.

We will gladly send any of these patterns if you'll order by name and number. They will be mailed anywhere in the United States and Canada upon receipt of stamps, cash, check or money order. Do not send stamped, addressed envelopes or Savings Stamps. Readers in all foreign countries should send International Reply Coupons, purchased at their post office. Please address all requests to the Reference Library, Ladies' Home Journal, Philadelphia 5, Penna.

The kitchen that saves ...a hundred different ways!

"Four Seasons" Kitchen that's warm in winter, cool in summer and fresh-as-clover all year round. For — this latest "New Freedom Gas Kitchen" design features a special ventilating system to whisk away greasy vapors, un-needed heat and unwanted cooking odors right at their source. And that's just one of the new freedoms it dramatizes for you. For instance, look at that smart new automatic Gas range built to "CP" standards. It gives you the last word in clock-controlled cookery plus old fashioned flavor. Even dishwashing's easier . . . thanks to the plentiful supply of really hot water from an economical automatic Gas water-heater. As for the best in food storage, just read what this new Gas refrigerator can do for you. Order one for the first step toward your own "New Freedom Gas Kitchen" . . . today!

"treasure" at your pleasure!

ew — completely portable — Gas rator has a frozen food locker — u can store a bushel (60 standard ts) of meats, vegetables and more ice, too. Fast freezing ds in trigger-release ice trays.

Food for a week — without hide and seek!

Plastic-coated sliding shelves make ... quick and ... arrangement ... More food ...

GAS

AMERICAN GAS ASSOCIATION

THE WONDER FLAME THAT COOLS AS WELL AS HEATS

Special food savers mean fresher flavors!

The Gas refrigerator assures healthful constant cold! As for finer tastes . . . there's a big tender-care Meat Keeper and two dew-action humidifiers for crisping-up limp vegetables and keeping fruits fresh and juicy.

And here's the best...its motor-less

Silent efficiency! There's not a single moving part in the freezing system to wear out . . . cause noise . . . or need costly repairs. No wonder this beautiful new Gas refrigerator is such a money-saver throughout its long useful life!

Copyright 1948, American Gas Association

THE WICKEDEST WOMAN WHO EVER LOVED!
The author of "LAURA" now brings to the screen
"Bedelia"
J. ARTHUR RANK
MARGARET LOCKWOOD · IAN HUNTER
ANNE CRAWFORD · BARRY K. BARNES
VERA CASPARY'S
"BEDELIA"
Directed by Lance Comfort · Produced by Isadore Goldsmith · Screenplay by Vera Caspary, Herbert Victor and Isadore Goldsmith
A JOHN CORFIELD PRODUCTION
An EAGLE-LION FILMS Release

WHAT'S WRONG WITH HIGH SCHOOL?

(Continued from Page 29)

The average teacher in high school would be thankful if he had only 150 pupils per day, which is, in most states, supposed to be the official maximum. In 1934 the average number of pupils to a classroom in America was 28.3 and the average number of classes was five. Today, because of the war, the figures are much higher. Imagine yourself an English teacher marking carefully and thoroughly 140 compositions once or twice a week, besides innumerable drill exercises; and then finding time to hold even a ten-or fifteen-minute conference with each pupil, to go over the work. It is certainly obvious that your child is in the hands of a teacher who is ever conscious that he does not have the time, in respect to each of his pupil's needs, to be the kind of teacher he aspires to be. This, then, is what I mean when I say that your child is in a herded school.

III—They are Aimlessly Overprogrammed

Since for the first time in our history, nearly all youth, unselected, attend high school, we are now allowed to see the entire vast problem of public-high-school education. We can say, thus, with assurance, that World War II has brought the pioneering stage of education to an end (1830–1946). Yet at the moment when we are ready to consolidate our gains, we cannot do so. For your child is in a high school that is not clear about what its main business is. It doesn't even know what its gains are!

This aimlessness is not exactly the fault of the schools. As one by one the functions of other agencies and institutions in our society break down, the school has been compelled to appropriate these services. A few recent news items may serve to illustrate this trend. A few weeks ago at a board-of-health meeting in a certain large city it was brought out that venereal disease was alarmingly increasing, and, as usual, the chief remedy suggested was, "Every school should teach sex education." A week later parents, alarmed over juvenile delinquency, besieged the newspapers with letters that said, in effect, "The schools should give a course in crime prevention and detection." Analyzing the large number (500,000) of maladjusted young men who evaded the draft or were rejected, a world-famous psychiatrist writes: "It would not be amiss if education in the United States added to the humanities real teaching concerning the functions of motherhood."

In many small towns that steadfastly refuse to care for the recreational needs of their youth, the school has made itself responsible for a complete social program for the young, including, often, a teen-age canteen. In 1944 the Education Policies Commission, probably the chief national spokesman for American education, actually proposed: "This rural school, moreover, is the center of literary and artistic interests for the entire community—adults as well as youth and children. In Farmville there are no art galleries, no concert halls, no museums, no theaters, no libraries apart from the school, no parks other than those developed by the school." It is no wonder that President Conant, of Harvard, in the Sachs lectures delivered at Columbia University, said that educationists themselves "have quite consciously fostered the idea that education could work miracles." Today at nearly every forum and panel, the concluding phrase is—it is the only note of faith in these cruel days—"That's a matter of education"; the implication being, of course, "let the schools do it"— schools organized, as we have seen, like an assembly line, and manned by mob-harried teachers.

That the school now feeds the undernourished, visits the homes of truants, conducts an employment agency, acts as police, finds cases for the welfare agencies, mothers pupils, schematizes their play, shows them how to rouge their lips, advises them what to do when up a back road in a car, teaches them to dance, how to hold a fork, how to think and read well—that the school now assumes all these obligations, and many more—is an evidence of how totalitarian they have become. On the strength of a philosophy that "education is life," most educators glory in this so-called growth of education. But certainly not all activities are equally important, and by stuffing within school walls three times as many things for pupils "to do" we do not necessarily enrich the life of the pupil three times. The paradox is that as the school increases its range, education often becomes less.

For in an aimless school your child is likely to be a hopelessly busy child—busy for the sake of busyness. To him the filled life becomes the best life. Your child is tugged and pulled to participate in more things than he can do adequately. In truth, right inside the school these activities compete for the pupil's time. The school whirl will allow little chance for reflection. This bringing of "life" into the school has been, fundamentally, an attempt to make school real and natural, and to reach all manner of pupils; but so multifarious have schools become that they are now complex societies in themselves, unable to bring much meaning into pupils' lives. Ironically, they are busier than "life" itself! Yet meaning is the very essence of education! One is compelled to question what kind of intelligence is emerging from this whirl. The unfortunate outcome of this circus type of school is that pupils think of "study" as inconsequential to the educational process.

Pupils all over the country complain about homework. The reason is obvious. School for any pupil is a full-time job; yet out-of-school groups harass the pupil in order to enrich him or to "save" him, until the pupil cannot "get around" to his lessons. The present crisis in homework is really an indication that your child is a victim of the conflict inside the school, between reflection and ceaseless doing. Meanwhile, "right" and "wrong" are alien words to the ever-active youth.

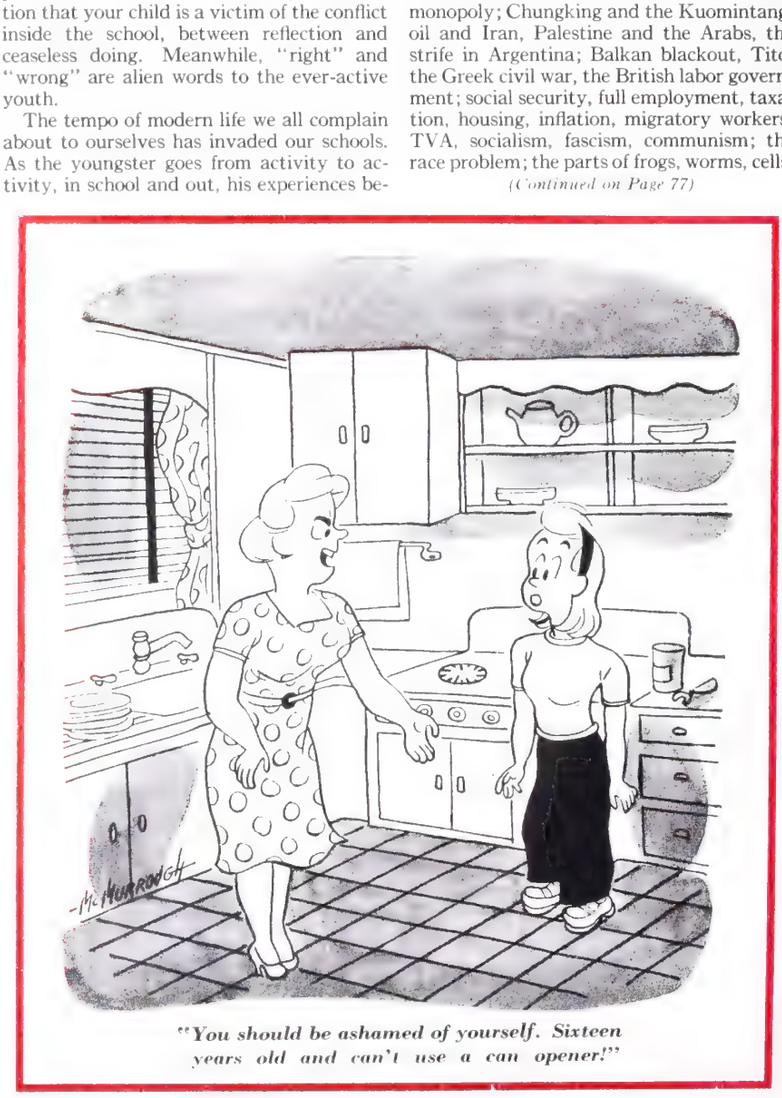
The tempo of modern life we all complain about to ourselves has invaded our schools. As the youngster goes from activity to activity, in school and out, his experiences become kaleidoscopic. He stays at no one thing long enough to suck at its marrow. One experience, properly assimilated, may become flesh and blood; a host of experiences, closely spaced, are but vaguely remembered. As Dr. Arthur G. Bills, psychologist from the University of Cincinnati, puts it, "Time is telescoped to such an extent and we have so many stimuli that the patterns of memory are broken up." "Life" has entered the schools with a vengeance, bringing its vices along with it.

IV—They Cram the Curriculum

Besides being deluged by activities, your child will be in a kind of school that expects him to acquire all sorts of knowledge that is to him bewilderingly unrelated. This knowledge will be sectioned out to him in a miscellaneous way, in sixteen to twenty different courses. To list the following items haphazardly is the only way I know of to convey to the parents what a peculiar feeling of inadequacy their child must have as he goes hour by hour from class to class, day in and day out, for four years:

Scores of literary names, both American and British, and a hundred works, many of which are studied in close detail; grammar, from the parts of speech to dangling gerunds; how to organize a paper of fifteen hundred words; the detection of propaganda; a study of the theater, the short story, the novel; the whole ancient world, especially Greece and Rome; the feudal system and knighthood; the rise of each major modern nation; the story of India and China and our good-neighbor policy in Latin America; the whole of American history, including the Constitution, the amendments, the local, state and Federal courts and the jury system; imperialism and nationalism, with the U.N.; labor versus management, free enterprise and monopoly; Chungking and the Kuomintang, oil and Iran, Palestine and the Arabs, the strife in Argentina; Balkan blackout, Tito, the Greek civil war, the British labor government; social security, full employment, taxation, housing, inflation, migratory workers; TVA, socialism, fascism, communism; the race problem; the parts of frogs, worms, cells,

(Continued on Page 77)



"You should be ashamed of yourself. Sixteen years old and can't use a can opener!"

Someone's getting a NEW BEAUTYREST soon

(WE HOPE IT'S YOU!)

IF YOU'LL TAKE one little step today, chances are you can get a new Beautyrest soon. The step? Just go to your Beautyrest dealer and ask for one of these luxurious inner-spring mattresses.

If you don't get your Beautyrest right away, you can count on getting one soon.

But hurry! Demand's so great for Beautyrest it's still "first come, first served."

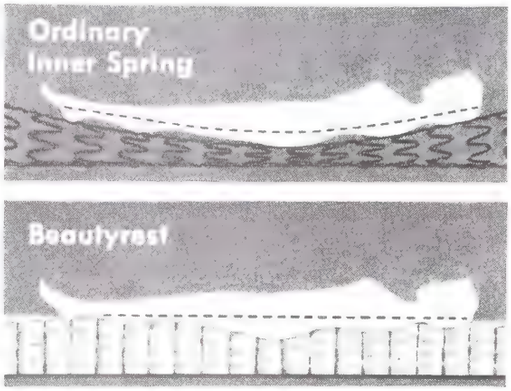
The facts below will tell you why so many other people want a Beautyrest, too.

Luxury comfort of Beautyrest, as portrayed by ANNE BAXTER, now starring in Darryl F. Zanuck's production of "THE RAZOR'S EDGE" by W. Somerset Maugham.

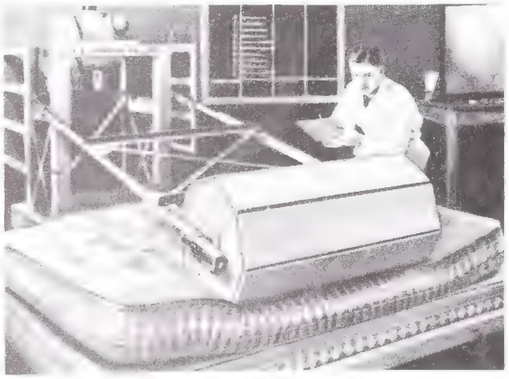
Ordinary comfort! In ordinary inner-spring mattresses, like the one above, all the coil springs are ned together. When one is pressed down, others joined it go down, too, make the mattress sag.



2. Compare these pictures! Above, see how the ordinary inner-spring mattress sags under your weight. But notice Beautyrest below. It cushions every part of your body, gives you firm, natural, buoyant support.

3. Beautyrest comfort secret! Beautyrest has 837 independent coil springs, not joined together. Each spring separately cushions a different part of your body, lets every inch of you relax luxuriously!

Sag-proof edges! Other mattresses may have firm edges for a while. But Beautyrest's patented edges y neat and firm for the lifetime of the mattress! autyrest needs turning only 4 or 5 times a year!



5. Lasts three times longer! In special "torture tests" conducted by the United States Testing Company, Inc., Beautyrest lasted three times longer than all other inner-spring mattresses tested. That's quality for you!

6. 1¢ a night! Based on its 10-year guarantee, all a Beautyrest costs is little more than 1¢ a night. Think of it! And you get prewar Beautyrest comfort, prewar Beautyrest quality! What a buy today!

Beautyrest* by SIMMONS

MAKERS OF THE WORLD'S ONLY ELECTRONIC BLANKET AND OTHER FINE-QUALITY BEDDING

REG. U. S. PATENT OFFICE
1947, SIMMONS CO. MDSE. MART, CHICAGO

Eyes welcome more colorful meals and eating's better when the fresh flavor and tenderness of Niblets Brand whole kernel corn come on the table

Tender squab on their bright platter have a tender counterpart in the mound of Niblets Brand whole kernel corn. The amusing blackamoor with his armload of greenery and the colorful Edam cheese add to the bright picture.

Note to very new housewives: We think Niblets Brand whole kernel corn has happy young qualities that go with happy young homes. Its flavor is fresh and natural. Its tender golden beauty is as festive as your pretty new china and silver. We grow the delicate kernels from special seed (our exclusive breed D-138). We pack them in vacuum "at the fleeting moment of perfect flavor" to make your first meals memorable. We hope the Green Giant on the label will be your good friend—for life.

Minnesota Valley Canning Co., headquarters, Le Sueur, Minn.; Fine Foods of Canada, Ltd., Tecumseh, Ontario.

Niblets BRAND WHOLE KERNEL Corn

©MVCCO. "NIBLETS" BRAND REG. U. S. PAT. OFF.

(Continued from Page 74)

ves, flowers; application of biological ideas farming, cold storage and new products; lear physics, carburetion, resultant forces, stics; rock formation, stars, seasons; formulas, quadratics, theorems, cosines, arcs; foreign tongue; salesmanship, canning ches, mechanical drawing, working in y; the story of lumber from tree to floor ards; the things men die for, the good

All these—shall I say hodgepodge?—are one tenth of what your youngster is expected to hold in his head in four years (actually 720 days, six hours a day). J. Donald ams, in the Book Review section of the w York Times, writes of "the strange, inliable appetite for unrelated information at seems to hold Americans particularly in grip." It is clear that our schools are etting this very appetite.

How did this absurdity come about? Even the days when only the elite and the gifted uld get into college, the fourteen to seven- en year old youth was required only to master the tools of learning—Latin and, by imication, his native tongue. Therefore, the nowledge just itemized above was not ndertaken until the pupil first had some pability in reading and writing; the task of nderstanding other matters was college education. But today, by necessity, the high hool is no longer solely a preparation for llege, but a terminal education for 75 per nt of all graduates, hence a preparation for e. Realizing this truth, well-meaning edutors have crammed practically a college ducation into the high-school curriculum at e most difficult time in a person's life, when is particularly unstable, given to spurts of nergy and to depression, overawed about x, and flighty in aspiration. It is a time fore most pupils have come to the great wakening, a time before they truly feel a eed for learning. How futile that we hope teach everything, once and for all, in thirty- x months—the pupil, thereafter, to live off is bill of fare for life! For the average youth e whole thing comes too soon in his life. We e constantly aiming over his head.

V—They are Long on Books—and Short on Readers

But, worse yet, by the policy of nonfailure the elementary grades, it all comes before lf the high-school student body has sufficient proficiency in reading. Yet nearly all e knowledge I just itemized is taught by eans of books.

Few parents are even remotely aware of w low the reading level is in our schools. o a parent who pines for the good old days the sacred three R's, I could recite figures at would make his hair stand on end. Few rents can accept the following statement ithout flinching: After every method known schoolmen is used assiduously throughout e elementary school, with clinical advice d remedial classes thrown in to boot, the rd cold fact remains that about a third of e high-school population is not at home ith print, and is unable to get the meaning om reasonably difficult books.

Letters to me from all over the country have ot challenged the statement; in truth, many achers admitted to me that they believe the gure is even higher. For instance, on the ementary-school level, we note that 50 per nt of first-graders in the St. Louis schools e retarded in reading, which is about the rm for the rest of the country; on the other nd, at the higher end of education we learn at in numerous college-freshman classes ere are as many as 30 per cent who do not ad beyond the elementary-school level.

In the main, it is likely that your youngster on't be a good reader, and even if he reads ell the chances are that he doesn't care to ad. Now, there is no use for the parent to come emotional over the situation, and amor for a change in methods and for a reurn to the good old days of drill and grammar. The dilemma is that all the methods ave been tried! All known methods of teaching reading, ancient and modern, are full of aws. The schools are in an awkward position: nearly all the influences of American e—radio, movies, automobiles, the increased tempo, comics, pictorial magazines, monosyllabic pulps, large-scale sports, recreation—tend to draw the youngster away from good reading. Therefore, parents must no longer expect some magic school method to reverse the very trend of events, the very pattern of our society. Before lashing out at the schools, parents must appreciate the competition that these nonverbal influences set up against reading, influences whose effectiveness lies precisely in the fact that one doesn't have to pore over and dig into print.

VI—They Need Your Help

Frankly, the classroom of the old three R's, in the light of these out-of-school channels of mass education, is becoming archaic. And schoolmen are frantic over what to do about the condition. Don't charge them with dereliction of duty. They need your help.

For you, too, stand in relation to your children as the schools stand in relation to their pupils: both school and home are growing ineffective before 200,000,000 comic books a year, 80,000,00 weekly customers of the movies, 30,000,000 automobiles, countless millions listening over the radio, 100,000,000 attending basketball. These forces need not

★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★

Two Clocks

BY DORIS CONE

Little in the mind
Of the child running
Is the stopped hour
Of age, sunning

Itself on the void
Lawn of rest.
The child running
Out of the east

Cannot pause for more
Than a hasty grin,
Given shyly;
Then hurries on

Expectantly to trees
And weeds, where
Time moves by the number
Of bugs in the air.

★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★

be wrong, but there they are—working every minute of the day. Despite our efforts, youth feeds on the violence of the comics; idolizes speed—rocket, jet or automobile; memorizes swing verses almost by osmosis, yet cannot quote a line of decent poetry; and imitates the materialism of the movies. Surely, parenthood is having a hard time of it. We both have a common foe. The school needs the home—badly; the home needs the school. We must not fall out over emotionally charged words like old-fashioned three R's, progressive education, grammar and drill, or phonics. In the light of past world-wide events that make us all shudder, these terms are too trivial to battle over.

Unmercifully "drilling" youngsters in grammar and in phonics or not drilling them will not alter their reading ability, will not alter the world: to be drilled or not to be drilled makes no appreciable difference in the attitude toward life of the average high-school pupil. There are many authentic studies to prove this fact.

What is more important to the education of your child, I think, is that the home and the high school have unfortunately gone separate ways. At the very moment of the discovery of phenomenal means of communication and at the very time of the presence of thousands of Parent-Teacher Associations, the high school and the home are farther apart than ever. Never was I so conscious of this truth than during rationing: literally, for the first time since the world began, millions of parents sat down at a table with tens of thousands of teachers—but not to talk education! As these parents timidly peered up into the rafters and into the glass doors, I thought of what a P.T.A. could be.

But educators have invented such a pedagogical jargon that even they have trouble communicating with one another, let alone with parents. In 1943, in Common Sense, I wrote, "The objectives of public education need the homely, substantial ring that terms like planting cabbage and making the bed have."

Also, a pernicious myth about education, that originated in the twenties, has widened the gulf between home and school: "Don't dabble into your child's homework, because you might undo these complex, involved modern methods. Let the schools alone." Anyone in school can spot the youngster whose parents have "heard his lessons," supervised his study habits, read books with him. He generally stands out. It is harmful to the schools that they allowed the untruth to circulate that schoolteaching is an esoteric, highly specialized process quite beyond the lay mind.

To me, nothing in education is more pathetic than to recall how in 1939, in order to save American democracy, faculties all over the country were swept by a fad of philosophy making, and then scarcely a school ever thought to present its objectives to the community for approval or disapproval.

Then, too, with the rise of statism, most parents resign themselves to their ignorance of what is happening inside these palatial buildings they pay for. Parents have been so absorbed in the dire events of the past decade that in desperation they were glad to surrender to the school nearly all their personal obligations toward the education of their children. It was that much less to worry about. As a result, parents are unaware that schoolteachers in private discuss the debasement of school standards; that principals are at their wits' ends over the breakdown of book education.

Again and again I receive letters from "the people," who seem to take a delight in lambasting the schools, and in the small towns across America the favorite pastime is to deride their local schools. In trying to diagnose this attitude, I believe it to be due to the snobbery that our high schools all unconsciously inculcate, not a snobbery of an elite but a snobbery of the white collar. Probably the greatest motivation for the diploma is this: "Get educated if you don't want a dirty job."

Wage earners who have children in schools resent a kind of education that frowns on honest work, however lowly and grimy. This is another reason for the alienation of many parents from the schools where their children are compelled to go.

But probably the chief cause of the estrangement between the people and their schools is the timidity of school supervisors to acquaint the parents about the actual conditions of their schools. As hired experts, they think that to confess their bafflement is to condemn themselves. But educators are to blame when the public-relations bureaus that most city school systems maintain are no more than propaganda devices that justify school procedures or divert parents from a realistic appraisal of their schools.

Again and again school principals and the public need to sit down and discuss the issues I have raised here: How the regulation of education by credits, courses and units is only one way to run a school, only a convenient way, not necessarily the right way. Why consolidation, now the trend, may be but herding in more virulent form. Why schools take on still more services when they fail in so many that they now assume. How the presence of millions of poor readers has created a crisis in our book-centered schools. These are the trade secrets among educators that all parents ought to know.

If parents uncritically let the schools go unchecked, their schools, in time, will be bureaucratic-propelled institutions, grimly efficient, without any vital, popular use to our republic.

MOM!!! WHAT'LL I DO?
JACK JUST PHONED THAT HE'S BRINGING TWO MEN HOME FOR DINNER... AND IT'S TOO LATE TO SHOP!
DON'T GET PANICKY, SUE!
GIVE THE BRUTES TUNA CUTLETS... THEY'LL LOVE 'EM!

"They're an old standby of mine when your father stampedes in with his men friends unexpectedly. Tuna cutlets are a good hearty, he-man dish. Jack's friends will think you're a wonderful cook. And I know you have tuna...I saw it on the shelf when I was there yesterday." Yes, tuna cutlets are always a favorite with men, if you use these brands of quality tuna. Keep a supply for emergencies!

VAN CAMP SEA FOOD CO., INC
Terminal Island, California

THE BRANDS

THAT MADE

TUNA famous!

Buy EITHER Brand... the quality is the same

PHOTOS BY STUART

These kitchens come ready-made and ready to use. Individuality is added to the modern mass-produced utility unit, which includes kitchen, laundry and bath, through skillful placing in the house plan and personal preferences in color for floor, walls, counters.

KITCHEN IN A PACKAGE

BY GLADYS TABER

T O MI

I saw a dream come true. There, on the rolling Michigan hills over which I was sloshing knee-deep in mud, were twelve small charming houses designed by eight different architects and in each of them plopped, abracadabra fashion, everything a house needs in one utility core!

I saw, in my imagination, the gay small houses as they would be with children running across the newly seeded grass, puppies ripping out the just-planted bulbs, brides hanging out those silly embroidered dish towels that

And I thought the famous architects, who designed those model small houses to demonstrate the adaptability of the steel-core unit, had spent their time in a happy carouse.

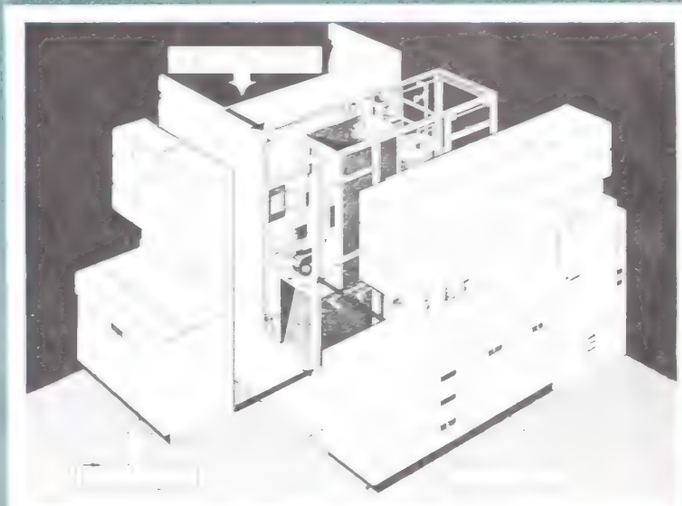
It really did seem like a dream come modern. For the single unit consists of a compact steel core containing the heating unit, water heater, plumbing, wiring and other domestic utility fixtures, and around this core are complete kitchen, laundry and bath appliances and fixtures. The core and its cabinet attachments and paneling form an L-shaped wall which completely closes off the kitchen-laundry area from the bathroom. And with practically a wave of the wand, the assembled parts can be trucked directly to the site of the house, quickly installed and placed in operation. As long as one end of the core is left open for service, the L wall with its attached kitchen and bath can be adapted to houses of as many different types and sizes as those in Kalamazoo. Add four walls and a roof, whisk your belongings in, and you can start housekeeping!

The unit permits cubage reduction, which lowers the housing cost. The estimated cost of the complete unit installed is around $1500. This single-purchase way for everything is simple and less expensive. It would seem that one could remodel a house without pulling out all the plumbing and main wires.

I was glad that the JOURNAL had chosen the lowest-cost house in the group as the location for their kitchen this month.

Continued on Page 80

Easy to work in this kitchen. Roomy [illegible] counter space. Double [illegible] washing. Wide plumbing [illegible] with drawers and shelves. Added storage above for supplies. Dining area right at hand, with sufficient privacy for entertaining.

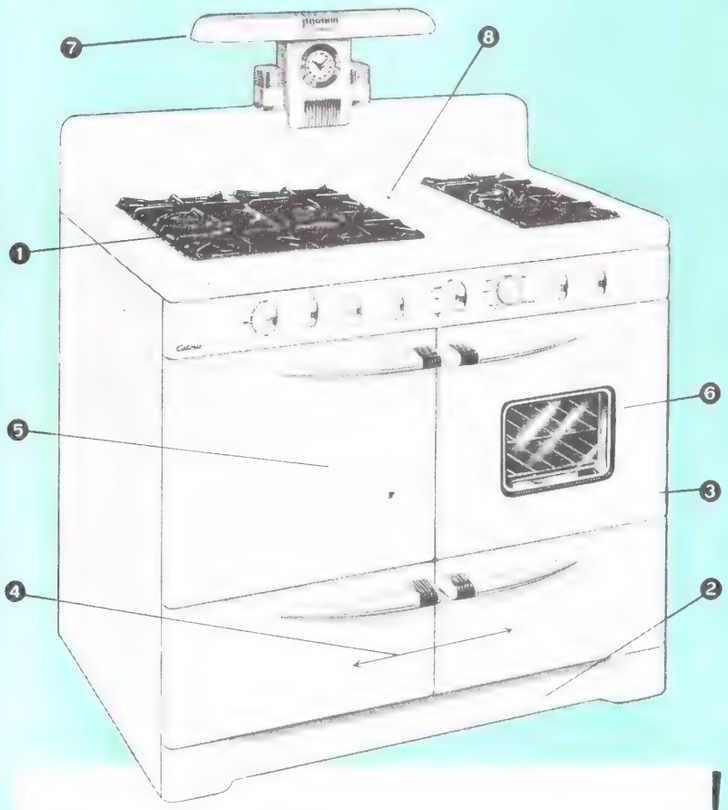


Neat as a pin closet—busy as a bee on Monday morning.

Laundry is done around the corner in the washing machine. Folding cover converts the space thriftily to a work counter. Ample tub for soaking or hand-washing is also concealed under the counter. No running down cellar on washday. Broom and supply closet with shelves [illegible] and space above. [illegible]

The One Range With

New Features Every Woman Wants



Check Any New Range for All These Features

1. Flavor-Saver Dual Burners, guaranteed for life . . . save flavor, vitamins, minerals and fuel.
2. Patented, Soft-Action, Oven Door Spring.
3. Hold-Heat Oven Seal plus Fiberglas insulation for even oven temperature.
4. One-piece Porcelain Front Frame construction for cleanliness and strength.
5. Veri-Clean Broiler—Waist high, easier to use. Completely removable, easier to clean.
6. Observador Window Oven—watch your baking without opening the door.
7. Fluorescent light—Automatic cooking aids—Electric outlet.
8. Porcelain Monotop—sanitary, easy to keep clean.

Cooking on an Ultramatic CALORIC is so much faster, cleaner, cooler—and so much more convenient it's virtually automatic. And the smart, modern beauty of the Ultramatic CALORIC makes it America's easiest range to keep clean.

See the new CALORICS at any of our 4000 dealers.
Caloric Stove Corporation, Widener Bldg., Philadelphia 7, Pa.

Specially Engineered Models for L. P. Gas Users in the country out beyond the city gas line.

Caloric

REG. U. S. PAT. OFF.

SERVING HOMEMAKERS SINCE 1890

Mr. L. Morgan Yost, the architect, designed the little red house so that the uses of interior space flow from one area to another, with a minimum number of bearing partitions.

The dining area can be expanded into the living area when there is a party; the table is near enough to the kitchen work surfaces so the housewife may sit at it comfortably while she looks up a recipe. The laundry area doubles as a hall to the bedrooms, so there is not an inch of waste space.

The kitchen itself is efficient. In size it is 9½ feet long by 8 feet wide and accommodates everything. Steel cabinets are ample, well designed and well planned. The wall opposite the sink gives additional counter, cupboard and drawer space.

The laundry unit, when covered, makes a whole additional work surface, and the cover of the small but compact range, which may be either gas or electric, slides out to add more work space. The slide is cantilevered and will support any reasonable amount of weight. Beneath the upper cabinets is a strip in which outlets for grill, coffee grinder and toaster are located. At the right of the refrigerator are two narrow cabinets, the upper one a towel rack, the lower one for trays.

Two drop panels above the counters provide easy access to motor controls for servicing and adjustment. Troublesome replacement of fuses is eliminated by a circuit-breaker panel conveniently located on the laundry wall.

> There is no exercise better for the heart than reaching down and lifting people up.
>
> —JOHN ANDREW HOLMES: Wisdom in Small Doses (University Publishing Co.).

The one danger in any mass-produced thing, I think, is that it may lack individuality. The kitchen may be the factory of the home, but nobody wants it to seem like a factory. It should have the atmosphere and charm of a specially made item for a special family. There is a kind of cold impersonality about most things that are made in large numbers all alike.

While I feel that this core idea may be the forerunner of a fine new era in American homes, I would hate to see American families regimented into so many million peas in a giant pod. I love my own prerevolutionary farmhouse, with its uneven floors and lopsided doors and windows that are thicker on one edge than on the other. I like a handmade look about even apple pies, not fluting that is run on with a machine.

However, I needed only to see the finished kitchen in this particular house to assure myself that individuality may be added to a modern, mass-produced unit. First of all, color. A dramatic pattern in clear singing red and strong confident green used for curtains and place settings gives a quality to the whole kitchen and to the dining area. A bride, struggling with how many times she should fold over the batter for the angel cake, would look up and see the sun through the beautiful fabric and begin to sing as she worked.

Color in accessories too. Hanging pots of scarlet-and-green geraniums suspended like old-fashioned lamps from the ceiling under the clerestory which lights the passageway add a note of gaiety. If the canisters are scarlet, instead of hospital-white, and the herbs stay in red jars, and the pot holders are red, you have more lilt to the room. The high stool and the dining chairs, glowing with red upholstery, give a singing tone to the kitchen. For a third color, touches of yellow are just right.

Modern is the little house, modern the kitchen, so modern should be the dining table and chairs. Simple design gives a feeling of spaciousness, too, and allows for clear clean color on the chairs. It would be easy to have company in this dining area, for the hostess can serve easily from the range, slide used dishes back to the work counter, and not seem to be rushing about too much.

It is a hopeful sign of progress, I think, for engineers and architects and designers to turn their energy toward making better homes for less. A completely planned kitchen unit would be a boon to many women, and many families might afford a home of their own under the low-cost planning when they might rent uncomfortably all their lives otherwise.

When I left the little red house in Kalamazoo, the rain had diminished and laid a fine silver gauze over the gentle hills. The twelve houses were shining with silvery drops, as if indeed a silver wand had been waved over them. The sky had that cool look which Michigan skies have in the autumn, and it was nearly time for supper. Freshly picked sweet corn, I thought, and pot roast simmered with carrots and onions, and fluffy dumplings with chopped young parsley in them. And apple Betty, crusty with sugar and cinnamon and a bowl of yellow cream to ladle over it. Milk in the green glasses for the young, and black coffee for the not-so-young-any-more.

AFRAID OF HAPPINESS

(Continued from Page 21)

She hurried downstairs. Kitty wasn't home. On the second floor no Whittakers responded to her knock. She went slowly back up. Of course they can't put me out—it's my home. The phone was ringing and she ran the last few steps. It was Sidney inquiring about Johnny.

"Oh, Sidney"—she couldn't get her breath from the climb—"I'm—I'm being evicted. I just got a paper. They can't do it, can they? I couldn't leave here!"

"I'll be right over, Mathilda. Don't you worry now."

Why must this happen to her? Surely there were other apartments that were just rooms, that didn't mean to anyone what this meant to her. She stood in the middle of the room, looking about as though she would barricade the doors, pile up the tables and the couch.

The door swung open. "Fellow évacuée, I presume." Kitty must have seen Mathilda's wild look. "Oh, Til," she said quickly, "we'll do something. This Joe Morando can go climb a tree."

Kitty stood squarely on her two feet. You felt her strength, her invulnerability at first glance. She had deep-set unwavering eyes, straight-drawn brows, strong face bones. She wore, as always, a tailored suit with a boy's round-neck lisle shirt. She was funny about these shirts—they had to be immaculate. With her short straight hair she should have looked masculine, and yet she really didn't. From the front her hair might have been caught back like a peasant's—or a madonna's. She had a large mouth with square corners, a tender mouth. And for all their level look, Mathilda thought her eyes were the kindest she had ever seen.

When the news came, Kitty, who was just that strange-looking girl who had moved into the floor below, came right up. There were Mathilda's friends and Press' friends and their wives, but Kitty was the only one who made sense. She stayed right there for two days and nights. She was wonderful with Johnny.

The last time she came for dinner Johnny had a tantrum. "Why don't we eat in here?" Kitty asked. "The bed's our banquet table and Johnny's the centerpiece. Get Cloon to bring two trays."

"How do I be a centerpiece?" Johnny asked, instantly calmed.

"Just act like a bunch of roses—sit still and give off delicious odors. Here"—and she doused him with Mathilda's most expensive perfume. "These flowers cost a lot," she explained. "They cost twenty dollars a dozen."

"I did? I cost twenty dollars a dozen?" Johnny asked, awed, and of course sat so

Don't be a Rubbit!

Don't rub a greasy, crusty roaster with a limp dishrag. Let a square metal-fiber Brillo pad whisk it bright!

Be BRILLO wise!

Clean that messy roaster fast—with Brillo! Brillo licks off grease and crust. Neat! Easy! Use Brillo every day! The special shine ingredient in Brillo soap keeps pans sparkling!

RED box—soap pads

GREEN box—soap & pads

Shines aluminum fast!

RESET LOOSE SCREWS with Plastic Wood

EASY! No skill required. Handles like putty . . . and hardens into wood.

IN CANS OR TUBES

WON'T CHIP OR CRACK

PLASTIC WOOD

A CELLULOSE FIBRE FILLER

Electric ROTO-ROOTER Razor-Kleens SEWERS AND DRAINS

At the First Sign of Trouble Call YOUR LOCAL ROTO-ROOTER MAN

BETTER, FASTER, SERVICE FOR LESS

FREE Sewer and Drain Inspection

ROTO-ROOTER CORP. Dept. 617 Des Moines 14, Iowa

CLEANS WINDOWS WITHOUT WATER

NEW CHEMICAL MITT

Sensational! DRY Window Cleaner! Uses no water. Liquids. Chemicals. Transforms windows, leaves glass sparkling clean, no heavy buckets to carry. Saves time or money. Send card or letter for FREE SAMPLES FOR TRIAL

Send name at once. A penny postal will do. Print your name.

KRISTEE CO., 1353 Bar Street, AKRON, OHIO

still—or maybe he was dazed with the perfume—anyway, he went right off to sleep.

Now Kitty came in and sat on the small chair by the fire, her feet straight out on the hearth. "It has to go to a magistrate. He'll give us three months, maybe six. This Morando has bought the house, you see, and wants to make it into a private house. Sounds phony. He may be a veteran; if so, it isn't so good."

Mathilda felt weak in the pit of her stomach. "Suppose we do get three months or six, if in the end we have to go? It isn't just that it's hard to find another apartment; I can't give this place up—ever. It's all I have left of Press. I mean it's not just an apartment—it's ——"

She couldn't explain. That mark on the floor was where Press put down a kettle. He built that shelf the radio sat on. She could look at these things and know that it had all not been a dream. She could sit here and pretend he was in shaving, any minute would burst into song. She could listen for his step on the stair. In another place, in rooms he had never been in—she would die.

SIDNEY knocked and came in breathing hard from the stairs, his voice hushed as always when he came here. "How do you do, Miss Towne, so nice to see you again," his hand ready for the handshake he was so good at.

Such conventions were wasted on Kitty. She jerked her head at him, friendly, but still it was a jerk. "H'lo, Sidney. The guardian angel at the first rub."

He took the cue for lightness. "If I remember my Aladdin, it was a genie who answered the rub. Not the genie with the light brown hair." That was pretty clever for Sidney. "Now what's this about evictions?"

"The crib won't be put on the sidewalk tonight."

Mathilda tried to smile and join them in their kidding, but she couldn't. Solid ground was slipping from under her. She was scared through and through.

"As I understand it, any magistrate can give six months if it can be shown the tenant has nowhere else to live," he said. "Under the circumstances, Mathilda might get more time. These magistrates are subject to pressure. I have a friend, a publicity man, who'd help. A widow, with a small child ——"

Mathilda sat up. "No, thank you. Black veil, lead Johnny by the hand—pinch him to make him cry. Let them take the apartment. I might have known it would go too." She was sickened at the torrent, but was powerless to stop it. "It's better to have nothing—expect nothing." She buried her head on the back of the couch, making horrible noises. Those awful words had done it—she a widow—a widow ——

"My dear—now, my dear—come, come." Sidney was beside himself with sympathy. "You're tired—don't, don't. We'll do something. We'll fix it. There, now."

"I don't want you to do anything. Let them put me out. I don't want a home—not without Press."

"Johnny might like a home." Kitty's words were a quick sharp slap.

Mathilda sat up. "I'm sorry. I don't know why I went to pieces."

She went into the bedroom. Johnny was a skinny little figure under the covers of his bed in the corner. Suddenly she realized he was wide awake, his eyes on her. It gave her a guilty jab, as though he had said that accusing "Johnny might like a home." She felt his head. The fever had gone completely.

"Would you like a drink, darling?"

"No, thank you."

She had an instant's foolish resentment that he wouldn't let her get the drink—she'd feel less guilty. As she brushed up her hair she could hear the two outside talking. Sidney poured words over all situations. Kitty never spoke unless she had something to say, and even then had the most diabolical way of making you say what she was thinking.

She tucked Johnny in, kissed him and went back into the other room. She sat on the edge of the couch.

(Continued on Page 83)

"Look what I got for believing a perfume ad!"

"I KNEW marriage wouldn't be all moonlight and roses. But nothing prepared me for that bluest of blue Mondays when life seemed to stretch ahead like a never-ending clothesline. Then suddenly in walked my husband and two strange men carrying a new Easy Spindrier washer.

"What a difference. My Easy is two washers in one! Its two tubs work as a team to do my week's wash in less than an hour! One tub washes a full load while the other spins a full load damp-dry. Whirls out up to 25% more water than a wringer!

"Clothes dry faster and are lighter to handle . . . I save ironing time . . . no deep-creased wrinkles to iron out. I save mending . . . the Spindrier can't bust buttons. I save cleaning bills . . . because it safely does washable drapes and slipcovers.

"Shirts are so much whiter. Undies last longer. Blankets come out like new. And it's so wonderful not to have to feed diapers through a wringer!

"There's more time for moonlight and roses when you have an Easy!"

MORAL: See Easy in action! Easy Washing Machine Corp., Syracuse 1, New York.

A CAVALCADE IN GLORIOUS TECHNICOLOR

COLUMBIA PICTURES
PRESENTS

the Music... the Magic...
the Times... of America's Greatest Entertainer

The JOLSON STORY

with
LARRY PARKS · EVELYN KEYES
WILLIAM DEMAREST · BILL GOODWIN

THRILL TO THESE BELOVED MELODIES!

CALIFORNIA, HERE
I COME ♪ SWANEE ♪
YOU MADE ME LOVE
YOU ♪ MAMMY ♪
WAITING FOR THE
ROBERT E. LEE ♪
APRIL SHOWERS ♪
I WANT A GIRL ♪ RAINBOW 'ROUND
MY SHOULDER ♪
ABOUT A QUARTER
TO NINE ♪ I'M SITTING ON TOP OF THE WORLD ♪
TOOT, TOOT, TOOTSIE ♪
LIZA ♪ ROCKABYE YOUR BABY ♪
BY THE LIGHT OF THE SILV'RY MOON ♪

SCREENPLAY BY STEPHEN LONGSTREET · Produced by SIDNEY SKOLSKY · Directed by ALFRED E. GREEN

(Continued from Page 34)

"I love Johnny," she told Kitty, defense in her voice. "I know I get irritated with him—he's a difficult child at times. I come home nights so tired I could scream—but I want to do the right thing for him." She looked up.

Kitty's eyes were kind, but her mouth was firm. "Johnny has to have more than that."

"More than love?"

"More than you wanting to do the right thing. Johnny's in a very bad way."

Mathilda gestured hopelessly. How could she explain? "It just isn't there. All the feeling—the warmth, the ability to care about things, to enjoy them, to give—all that died with Press. I'm just a—shell." Kitty didn't answer. Sidney squirmed uneasily. "But I want to do the right thing for Johnny. You tell me what to do—I'll do it."

"No," said Kitty. "I'm not going to tell you what to do. You have to tell yourself."

"You don't think I should give up my job? Oh, Kitty, I couldn't. I'd go crazy with no job. It keeps me from thinking. And what would I live on? I couldn't live on my insurance. How would I pay the rent?"

"You have been invited not to."

Mathilda stared at the floor. The land was breaking under her feet. Life was rushing on, tearing away everything she loved.

Kitty was quiet for a minute, seeming to consider whether to speak or not. Finally she looked up. "I suppose everyone who has lost someone they loved feels that they have died too. It is a fantasy that keeps you from facing what must be faced. The fact remains that you haven't died. You are a living, breathing human being and you have a job to do. You have to stop taking these sedatives. Johnny needs a living, breathing mother, not a doped one."

"Oh, now, Kitty," Sidney protested.

Mathilda nodded. "I know you're right. And if I give up my job, then what?" Her voice was colorless.

Kitty looked at her. "You need roots. Living things have to have roots. It's the way you get sustenance."

"You mean—religion?"

"I mean family. Johnny ought to tie you to life, but he doesn't seem to. You have to connect—see that you have a place to fill between what was and what is to be."

"I haven't any family. Press' mother lives out on the Coast—she's an invalid. There's Aunt Ada," she added. "Nothing could be worse than going to her."

She tried to explain Aunt Ada. When she lived with her mother in Brookline they used to visit her mother's aunts: Aunt Harrie, a dashing, handsome, dominating woman; Aunt Ada, a mouse. Aunt Ada seemed to feel that she had been born to wait on Aunt Harrie. Aunt Harrie thought so, too, and she scolded Aunt Ada for being slow and stupid and clumsy. And yet Mathilda adored Aunt Harrie and had little if any love for Aunt Ada. Aunt Ada seemed to enjoy being scolded. And she stuck right at home, said she didn't want to go gadding, she'd rather hear Aunt Harrie tell about things. Silly!

WHEN Mathilda was away at school her mother died, and immediately afterward Aunt Harrie. Mathilda went to New York then and didn't see Aunt Ada again. She wrote her now and then and received greeting cards addressed in a fine scrawling hand. Once in a while Mathilda wondered about her. She never went up to see. There was nothing she could do, Mathilda told herself. Aunt Ada had her home and a small income.

"Where does she live?" Kitty asked.

"Stonehead. A little town on the coast. I don't like small towns and I can't bear New England." Certainly nothing could be more depressing than to go live with an old woman—she must be eighty.

Kitty seemed to be considering that objection, but when she spoke she didn't answer it. "Children need roots," she added to her former statement.

Sidney got up. "You don't have to decide anything tonight. Sleep on it, Mathilda. I'll call my lawyer in the morning, and a real-estate chap I know. Anyway"—he held her hands and looked down at her—"you're not to worry, little lady. We'll think of something. And if this eviction should go through, you could stay in my apartment. I'd go to my club," he added hastily, color flooding his already pink cheeks.

SHE smiled up at him. "You're a darling, Sidney. I couldn't turn you out of your apartment. I'll be all right. You two are awfully patient with me. I know I'm behaving badly but I can't seem to follow the rules on mourning." She bit her lip. "If my arm were cut off you could tell me all night that I ought to use it this way or that. It isn't there." Tears welled up in her eyes.

Sidney was still holding her hands and he patted them, his face, his so-kind face, puckered almost as though he were about to cry like a boy. "Now get a good sleep, and don't think about anything. How about a good hot drink? Kitty, you'll—you'll do something?" he asked as he left.

"He would have tucked you in if he had stayed five minutes more," Kitty said. "Personally, I think you have a lot of thinking to do, but maybe not tonight. Want me to stay?"

Mathilda shook her head. "I'll sleep. I promise."

She did think in the next few days, constantly. She had no answer to Kitty's arguments. Johnny was in a bad fix. He was shrill and tense. He had an upset stomach every few days and cried horribly every time he threw up. Mrs. Cloon reported tantrums almost every day. Of course she was no good, but try to get anyone else! If the apartment had to be given up eventually, it would be better to give it up now. It was March. Summer wouldn't be so bad in Stonehead—lying on a beach sounded pretty wonderful, as a matter of fact. So finally she wrote Aunt Ada. Having cast the die, she was scared to think Aunt Ada might say no.

She took Aunt Ada's answer downstairs so Kitty could see for herself what a grim thing she was getting Mathilda into. The letter would be funny if it weren't all so important to them. It was entirely concerned with train schedules, with how to get from the station to the house and the right day to travel. Aunt Ada showed no surprise that the niece who had been so little concerned with her in all these years was suddenly asking to come to stay. And she showed no pleasure in it either, Mathilda noted.

"There are no trains on Sunday," Aunt Ada wrote. "The laundry goes on Monday and Tuesday is dump day."

"Do you suppose that means we shouldn't come then? That's the day to leave, I'd say. Out we'll go some fine dump day."

Mathilda read on. "'It has been cold and rainy, but I presume it is just as bad everywhere. I waited and waited for a southwest wind. It came and blew down my grapevine. I'm told the best train is the two-thirty-five, but that doesn't run on Saturday.'"

Who Would Be Free

By Leonard Snyder

Who would be free will love the wind—
The fickle wind, and wild—
And never bolt his oaken door
Or hold his own strong child;

And, free, will walk the tropic dawns
Thickened with scent, and pink,
And sit him by no narrow hearth
With long, long thoughts to think.

Who would be free is lonely, too,
And kin to wind-tossed wave;
And cool a stranger's tear will fall
Across his narrow grave.

SINCE 1886
SERVICE THROUGH FRIENDLY CALLS

FOR OVER SIXTY YEARS, Avon has brought beauty directly to American homes through friendly Avon Representatives. This personalized method of distributing Avon toiletries typifies the pioneer spirit, the visionary enterprise of our American way of life. It offers thousands of women interesting and remunerative occupations... while rendering a delightful, specialized beauty service to their communities.

Beauty is the Avon Representative's business. And she feels privileged to help you with your individual beauty problems... to advise you on the latest fashion in lipsticks and face powders ...show you informative charts on make-up and skin care... and fill your orders promptly with Avon Cosmetics that are fresh and of the finest salon quality. Welcome the Avon Representative when she makes a friendly call... be a hostess to loveliness.

Avon
cosmetics
IN RADIO CITY, NEW YORK

—Why Not Buy an EXTRA Package?

"Yes, an EXTRA package on the side, keeps a family well-supplied." Let that slogan be your New Year's guide to comfort. Then, when muscular aches and pains, headaches, upset stomach and the discomforts of a cold cause you distress, Alka-Seltzer always will be on hand for quick, comforting relief. Why not "Buy 2 packages instead of one," the next time you visit your drug store? Keep one at home and take the other with you wherever you go.

Alka-Seltzer

Ease simple Headaches, like we sometimes get

Settle your Stomach when it gets upset

Discomforts of COLDS now are in sight

Ask for an EXTRA start the year right

"It's a very excellent bit of prose," Kitty said. "New Englanders must be descended from Jeremiah. 'I waited and waited for a southwest wind. It came—and blew down my grapevine.' Stunning. Either she doesn't want you and hasn't the courage to say so or she wants you so much she doesn't trust herself to touch on the subject. That's the answer, I'd say."

"New England—'new' short for 'neurotic,'" Mathilda said.

The office became unbearable as the time to go drew nearer. She had said she loved her job. Of course she didn't. She never had. The artists were sweet, but she was thankful she was through being a wet nurse to grown men. Everyone gushed over her. It was wonderful. "Surely you'll come back in the fall." She didn't say.

Winnie Logan gave her the biggest surprise. She came into Mathilda's office one morning slightly embarrassed. "I was wondering—could I have a talk with you?"

"Why not? Sit down."

"Oh, not here. This is the nosiest office. I wondered would you have lunch with me?"

She never had lunched with Winnie—they just had nothing in common—but she could. They met at the Ritz—Winnie's choice. And Winnie was dressed up to it. Mathilda wore the same tweed suit she wore most of the time.

"I guess you think this is pretty fresh of me. And you'll think me fresher still when you hear what I brought you out for." She dropped her eyes to the menu—nice clear eyes she had, but made up too much for daylight. "Of course you know how much Mr. Gree-eer thinks of you. It's going to be an awful blow to him having you go this way."

Mathilda was startled. What right had Winnie to discuss his personal affairs? She froze.

"You're awfully good for him. I mean you sort of take things lightly." Good heavens, thought Mathilda, so I take things lightly! "I mean he's sort of serious and old about things. I think his mother has something to do with that. She was forty years old when he was born. Did you know that?"

"No, I didn't."

"And he's the only child and no father. If people understood that—I mean really he's a wonderful, wonderful person. If people knew what I know—the things he does ——"

"Look, Winnie, I don't know what this is leading to, but if you're asking me not to go ——"

"No." Winnie buttered her roll with rapt care. As though she were buttering it for her boss, Mathilda thought. "No, I think it's just as well you're going, because Mr. Gree-eer ought to get married. The only women he knows outside of you are his mother's friends. What I was wondering—don't you know someone like yourself you could introduce him to before you go? Someone young and—bright. It would be the making of him—he's so fine himself underneath."

She was too astonished to answer properly. She said she would think it over. "But of course introducing him to a girl and having him fall in love with her are two different things."

"I know. But there's lots I can do. You'd be surprised what a secretary can do."

I am, Mathilda thought. I'm surprised out of my boots this minute.

Sidney came over almost every evening. Always with an excuse which he carefully explained: "Thought I'd better bring you the address of that storage company I told you about." Then he settled down for the evening. "I met some people who know Stonehead," he said one night. "They say it's pretty gay up there. Yacht club, all that. You'll meet people."

She shook her head. "Aunt Ada isn't in the yacht-club set. I don't want to meet people," she protested seriously.

"These friends of mine have a little cabin cruiser, a Diesel job. Pretty nice. I thought I might go along sometime. You wouldn't mind if I dropped in on you, would you?"

"Probably fall on your neck. I'll miss you very much."

He reddened. "It means a lot to me—to think you may miss me. There's been so little I could do, Mathilda. But you know ——" He stopped. "Johnny's been better lately, hasn't he?"

She held up the small pants she was mending. "He's so excited he can't stay in his clothes. But he hasn't up-chucked for days."

It was funny the trouble Johnny had understanding what it would be like in Stonehead. He could not imagine living anywhere but on the top floor of a high apartment.

"If I don't take my sandbox, what will I play with on the roof?"

"You don't play on the roof. You play down in the yard. You sleep upstairs and you eat downstairs. And then you go out to the yard to play.

"Do you sleep upstairs too?"

"Yes. You'll have your own room and I'll have mine. I think."

"Will Aunt Ada sleep in the kitchen?"

"In the kitchen? Of course not, darling. She'll sleep in her room."

"And Mrs. Cloon won't be in the kitchen?"

"No. She isn't coming."

"But you are. You'll be there every single day."

"Every single day."

No matter how many times she told him this, he came back to it for reassurance. He'd call her in after he was in bed. "You won't go anywhere at all, not even an office, not any day? Monday or any day?"

"Not any day in the week."

Her things were going to storage, a few she was selling. Precious possessions turned into so many cubic feet of things! It was like digging growing things up from a garden—cutting off their roots. Prescott's books—how could she pack them away? He wouldn't like that. Suppose he came back and found them treated thus.

She made lists endlessly. She went back again and again to the Thrift Shop. Toys and more toys. Johnny's first rattles. The stuffed dog bursting his seams. Things she never could decide to part with she had to decide about now. Tearing up a home is tearing out a piece of your heart, ripping, watching yourself do it, being sensible about things that have nothing to do with sense. Only with everything that matters in this world. If Prescott had known it would end like this—their heaven!

The movers came at nine. By eleven the apartment was a horrible place. A body picked by vultures. Would she remember it like this? Get away quick before she broke down!

"Come on, Johnny, the taxi is waiting." Oh, quick—quick, Johnny, I'm going to cry.

"I just remembered that pigeon with the lame leg. I want to take him—he'll miss me."

"No, Johnny. That pigeon wants to stay here. He has friends here—his mother lives here. Come on, Johnny."

"I have to get him." Johnny was halfway up the stairs to the roof.

"We'll find a lame sea gull in Stonehead. . . . Johnny! Come this minute!" So she lost her temper and they left with Johnny in tears and her ashamed. Good-by to all that. Good-by and good riddance.

Kitty was on the sidewalk with the bags, her hair blowing in the cold March wind.

Mathilda threw her arms around her. "We'd have gone under if it hadn't been for you."

"Send me chronicles, Til. Good-by, Johnny. Have fun."

Sidney, solemn, solid, made his way to them in the station. He managed porters and gatemen with his usual suavity. You can't laugh off having a man to run things. "You'll write me, Mathilda? Let me know how it works out?"

Winnie's work. "You'd be bored to death. There won't be a thing to write about."

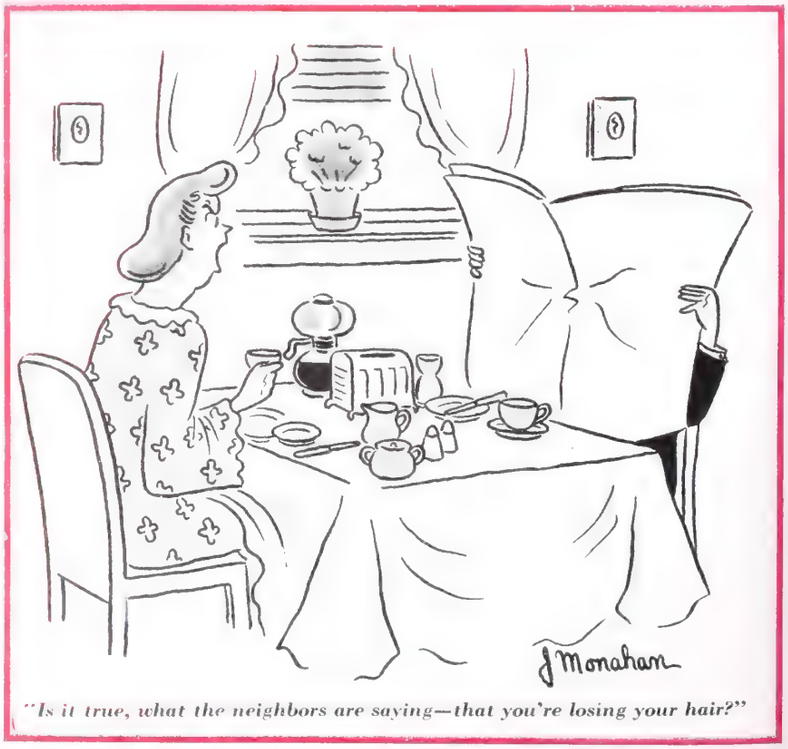
"I can't imagine being bored with anything you'd write. You have a way of putting things—in spite of—I mean even though you may not be exactly cheerful—a wonderful spirit. You've really been wonderful. Everyone thinks so. You don't like to have me call you brave but ——" He switched to Johnny to avoid having to make a complete sentence. "Good-by, old man. Take good care of your mother."

Johnny turned from the window and considered it. "I don't believe boys as small as me can take care of grownups. Anyway, she doesn't need anyone to take care of her."

"I wonder," Sidney said and blushed. "If there is anything, Mathilda, anything at all—ever ——" In his earnestness his brow was moist.

Dear old Sidney! As the train pulled out of the station she leaned her head against the seat back and closed her eyes. Why not—why not just let Sidney take over? No man ever had a kinder heart. He would move heaven and earth to give her what she wanted. She knew she was tired to think of such a thing, but he would be a wonderful father for Johnny. Johnny wasn't exactly enthusiastic about him, but he would learn to be. Sidney wouldn't expect that she would love him, after Press. Nothing like that at all. Just an arrangement—and not,

(Continued on Page 86)



"Is it true, what the neighbors are saying—that you're losing your hair?"

"...not a creature was stirring..."

(None, save the doctor going out on a call.)

You remember how it starts – that beloved old Christmas poem:

'Twas the night before Christmas,
when all through the house
Not a creature was stirring,—not even a mouse.

Well, that isn't always true for the doctor. Sometimes there's just no rest at all for him – even on Christmas Eve.

Blizzard or heat wave . . . December or July . . . night or day . . . near or far . . . early or late . . . no matter when you call, he comes!

According to a recent nationwide survey:

MORE DOCTORS SMOKE CAMELS THAN ANY OTHER CIGARETTE

YOUR "T-ZONE" WILL TELL YOU...

T for Taste...
T for Throat...

that's your proving ground for any cigarette. See if Camels don't suit your "T-Zone" to a "T."

● Not a single branch of medicine was overlooked in this nationwide survey made by three leading independent research organizations. To 113,597 doctors from Canada to Mexico, from the Atlantic to the Pacific went the query — What cigarette do you smoke, Doctor?

The brand named most was Camel.

Like anyone else, a doctor smokes for pleasure. He appreciates rich, full flavor and cool mildness just as any other smoker. If you don't happen to be a Camel smoker now, try Camels. Let your "T-Zone" give you the answer.

Camels Costlier Tobaccos

R. J. Reynolds Tobacco Co.
Winston-Salem, N. C.

Just like getting an extra pair of stockings!

LUXED stockings last twice as long, strain tests show!

Wouldn't you like to get double wear from your stockings? Well, some amazing tests show you how.

Dozens of sheer stockings were washed repeatedly the Lux way—the same number with a strong soap. Then all the stockings were given strain tests to see how soon they'd run. The Luxed stockings lasted and lasted—more than twice as long as the others! That's just like getting an extra pair of stockings every time you buy one.

Nylon, rayon, silk, cotton stockings all showed similar results. Be wise—use Lux.

Lux contains scarce materials. Don't waste it!

(Continued from Page 84)

of course, for a long time yet. She would have been asleep in a minute, but just then they pulled out of the tunnel.

"Look. Mother—look. It isn't going to be dark all the time. We came out." He pointed to the rows of tenements with the bedding hanging from the windows. "Look—isn't everything beautiful?"

As they drew near Stonehead she found herself more and more excited. It was just plain physical reaction, of course. The emotional strain of leaving, three days of packing—then suddenly nothing to do but let the engineer pull levers and blow whistles and take them somewhere. That's the silly thing about traveling: just because the train chugs on you think you are getting somewhere. You may be just goin g in circles, or going backward. But her cynicism didn't stop her from looking out one side of the train and then the other, recognizing places.

"Look, Johnny. See the children at the crossing waiting for the train to pass. I guess they're coming home from school."

He studied them gravely, blinking with sleepiness. "Yes, I guess they are."

"Look at the dog. He's barking at the train. As if a dog could stop a train."

"I don't believe he could."

She pulled him to her, into the curve of her arm, and he leaned his head back and smiled up. They two off on an adventure. They two against anything that was ahead. They stopped at stations surrounded by little white houses; long tree-lined streets led off into a plum-blue distance. Lacy fans of elm boughs, smoke from someone's supper fire. New England has something, she admitted.

But their arrival wasn't to be so smooth as it had seemed. Clouds that had been racing across the sky collided and spilled their burden. Rain was coming down in such torrents they could hardly get across the tracks to the overhanging roof of the little station.

The only waiting car turned out to be a taxi. "Get right in, sonny. Climb aboard. Guess you didn't figure on a welcome like this. Strangers, aren't yer?"

"Not exactly. We're going to visit my aunt, Miss Peet." She gave him the address.

"Ada Peet. You must be her niece. Doris' daughter, aren't yer? Got a look of Doris around the eyes."

What a funny thing to become suddenly. Doris' daughter. Johnny looked up at her as though Doris' daughter were a stranger.

"I remember Doris. Pretty girl. She useter come to visit when your grandmother was alive. Seems to me I remember you, too, when you was no bigger'n this young man." He shot up a hill and down again. "Your aunt is getting on." He shook his head sadly.

THEY turned another corner, went up another hill and stopped. Mathilda looked out. "Here we are, Johnny."

She spoke gaily, but she felt utterly sick. The glimpse she got was too awful. The house had gone completely to pieces. The white paint was gray, blue-green shades were pulled down at the windows, two shutters were tied together with a string.

"Run, Johnny, up onto the porch. Never mind the bags."

There was no sign of Aunt Ada. She started to ring and then saw the door was ajar. She pushed it open and they went in. The hall was dark, but a dim light shone from the kitchen.

"Aunt Ada," she called.

Aunt Ada came out into the hall, a little figure no larger than a nine-year-old girl. She held her two hands, obviously dirty, away from her and peered out to the front door as though it were in the far distance. "Doris, is that you?"

"IT's Mathilda, Aunt Ada. Here at last."

"Well, there—didn't I know we'd have a downpour. And didn't my stove lining have to go and fall out just now. I had to put the fire clean out. That stove is the worst thing I have to contend with. Put your things in the cluset. Is the little boy soaked to the skin?"

"This is Johnny, Aunt Ada. Pretty tired from the train, but not too wet. This is your Great-Aunt Ada, Johnny." Great-great actually, but that would only confuse him. Poor child, what was he to think of this weird little old gnome? Her sleeves, rolled up, showed arms like brittle twigs. Her gray hair, drawn down, made her skull stand out, made her nose seem enormous.

Johnny stared up at his aunt. "What made the stove lining fall out?"

"She's deaf," Mathilda whispered, but Aunt Ada seemed to hear his high treble.

"Don't I wish I knew. I've got a good fire in the furnace though. I suppose you'd like to wash up."

They took their bags and climbed the stairs. Poor Johnny; this was horrible for him, after all she had said about Stonehead. "Come on, Johnny, remember I said we slept upstairs." She must pretend everything was all right.

"Just these little stairs?"

"That is all, just one flight."

"I thought we could put Johnny in the pink room. And I fixed up Aunt Harrie's room for you." Aunt Ada pulled a string and a dim light revealed the pink room. Gray, cracked ceiling, old wooden bed, colorless walls, worn painted gray floor. What was pink about it? A pile of window screens in the corner covered with newspapers. Limp curtains. The windows obviously hadn't been opened in weeks.

Aunt Harrie's room was still worse. A hodgepodge of furniture, more screens covered with a sheet. Mathilda thought she had never seen such depressing rooms in her life. She sat on Johnny's bed and put her arm around him.

"Look, darling, we're tired and it's raining, but tomorrow the sun will come out. We'll walk down to the harbor. I'll get you some toys—a boat maybe."

He hugged her. "I like my room. Do you want to see me put on my light myself? And look how big my bed is. What's that closet? Is that a little boy's closet?" He pulled open the door of the cupboard under the eaves. "I can keep toys in here." He hugged her again, wide awake now. "I like Aunt Ada too. She isn't much bigger than me. Can I go down and watch her fix the stove lining?"

So—Johnny perfectly happy! She felt he had let her down. Couldn't he see what a terrible place it was? All he cared about was that his light had a string on it. She looked about the room and she listened to the rain

(Continued on Page 88)

NEXT MONTH

His head bowed, his face burning with shame, Brian stood with his arms up and the offending hands turned out to the class. He raised his head and saw that every eye was on him. But it was not just the children who were watching him, Brian felt; he was aware of a vague knotting at the back of his head, as though an unseen watcher were looking on.

This is the story of things which grew: a town which needed a greater ideal; a family who thrived on the depth of its spirit; and a boy who harbored a grown man's soul—a small boy who asked big questions, like ——

WHO HAS SEEN THE WIND?

By W. O. Mitchell

Complete in the February JOURNAL

Add Rit Yellow to a navy and white stripe. Result—a navy and yellow print.
Add Rit Turquoise to a black and white print. Result—a black and turquoise print.
Add Rit Rose Pink to a light blue and white print. The light blue becomes lilac, the white becomes rose pink.

a fashion future for your dated print with ALL PURPOSE RIT

Heavenly days! You can dye a print and keep the pattern with All Purpose Rit. Even if the fabric is Celanese*, spun rayon, nylon (originally "undyeable" at home), you can now dye it to your heart's content, because All Purpose Rit results are guaranteed. All Purpose Rit is making millions of wardrobes sparkle because it's a wonderful new kind of dye. Forget everything you ever knew or heard about dyeing—All Purpose Rit will make an expert of you with the first package. So hurry, hurry, hurry!—beauty is waiting in your closet!

Don't trust precious clothes to anything but Rit. Only Rit "will work." Get guaranteed All Purpose Rit.

ALL PURPOSE RIT—the finest dye that money can buy 25c

THIS IS WHAT HAPPENS WHEN YOU DYE PRINTS

If you dye a dark pattern on a light ground, only the light shade will take the new color. If you dye a print combining two light colors, the pattern will remain, but the result will be two exciting new colors.

FREE BOOKLET Y 8

RIT PRODUCTS CORPORATION
1401 W. Jackson Blvd., Chicago 7, Illinois

Please send me your new All Purpose Rit fashion booklet, "Prints Can Change Their Colors, Too."

Name_____

Address_____

City_____ Zone____ State_____

Give yourself a beautiful TONI Home Permanent for your date tonight!

Easy as putting your hair up in curlers—but the wave stays in!

You'll want to know all about this new easy way to look lovelier . . . win compliments. These questions and answers tell you everything!

Does TONI really work?
Answer: Yes! Toni will wave any kind of hair that can be permanent-waved, even grey, dyed or bleached hair.

Can you do it yourself?
Answer: Yes! If you can roll up your hair on curlers, you can give yourself a Toni. Directions are easy to follow.

How long will it take you?
Answer: The actual waving time is only 2 to 3 hours—even less for hair that's dyed, tinted or bleached, or for baby-fine hair. And all of that time you are free to do what you please.

Is TONI really a permanent?
Answer: Yes. The Toni creme wave is a genuine permanent, and the wave will last until the hair grows out.

Why is TONI a Creme?
Answer: Because Toni Creme Waving Lotion gives a curl that looks natural . . . is "frizz"-free from the start.

Will TONI work on children?
Answer: Yes! Mothers find Toni's gentle creme waving lotion is ideal for children's silky-fine hair. (And the child is free to run about and play while the permanent is "taking"!)

Is TONI guaranteed?
Answer: Yes! Your Toni wave must flatter you or you get back every cent you paid. Toni can make this guarantee because the Toni Wave is laboratory controlled for uniformity and high quality.

Good idea! Give your daughter a Toni Home Permanent today—you'll both be thrilled with results! Toni is ideal for children's hair.

Every hour of the day another 1,000 women use Toni

Toni HOME PERMANENT
THE CREME COLD WAVE

At all leading drug, cosmetic and notion counters

$1.25 plus tax

(Continued from Page 86)

on the window. How could she possibly spend a night here? She took a few things from her bag and opened the closet door. In the back of the closet hung dresses—Aunt Harrie's dresses, saved all these years. She shut the door again. How utterly creepy! How could Aunt Ada have let the house go like this? Had she no pride? It had been a cute little house, bright and clean and quite gay. Just because Aunt Harrie died did she have to act as though she were dead too?

She heard Johnny downstairs. "You know how to make a fine fire, don't you? What are you cooking?"

"I figured a chowder might taste good."

"What's a chowder?"

She must have turned to him in amazement. "My stars—you don't know what a chowder is? Well—I wouldn't know what to say. It's just a chowder."

"I think I'll like it all right. In New York I had shredded wheat and sometimes an egg and milk—and bread and butter and shredded wheat. Our fire didn't get built, it just went on. I don't believe Mrs. Cloon would know how to build a fire."

Johnny was often shy with new people, or sullen. Here he was talking to Aunt Ada as though he had known her all his life.

Aunt Ada brought the chowder in in the old purple tureen. There was a fringed damask cloth on the table. The spoons were coin silver. There were some beautiful things in the house if you could sort them out from the junk. Aunt Harrie used to keep luster pitchers on those cupboard shelves. Now they were crowded with jelly glasses, pillboxes, a flashlight and a few clothespins.

I'll clean that off tomorrow, Mathilda thought. Then, No I won't. I won't get caught in this dusty old spider web, she told herself. I won't stay that long.

> All affection and display proceed from the supposition of possessing something better than the rest of the world possesses. Nobody is vain of possessing two legs and two arms, because that is the precise quantity of either sort of limb which everybody possesses. —SYDNEY SMITH.

"It's been an awful winter," Aunt Ada said, serving the chowder. "I don't know when I've known the cold to hold on so long."

"Was it cold enough for snow?" Johnny asked.

"Snow? It seems as though I no sooner got my path shoveled than down it came again, thick as feathers. I don't know where all the snow came from."

"I think it comes from the clouds," Johnny told her.

"Well, wherever it came from, there was too much of it. My pipes nearly froze a dozen times, and the ice broke that limb off the tree in the front yard. Harrie liked that tree. I don't know what she'd say."

Johnny listened, fascinated. "I think spring is coming now," he piped cheerfully.

"That's what the calendar says. I guess the weather man hasn't looked at the calendar."

JOHNNY considered that, then he laughed. "I think you're joking, Aunt Ada."

And where do I fit into this? Mathilda asked herself. They are having a swell time. She was ashamed. Johnny able to take it and she not? Johnny able to talk to Aunt Ada. When she tried to make conversation, Aunt Ada asked "What? What did you say?" On the third and fourth repetition any comment she thought up sounded silly.

When Johnny went up to bed he threw his arms around Aunt Ada and hugged her. Was there nothing repulsive about old age to him? Apparently not.

"I'm glad you and Aunt Ada get on so well," she remarked as he lay so tiny in the huge bed. She was frankly fishing, and her voice must have showed it.

"Why wouldn't I love her?" he asked defensively. "She's my very own aunt."

Was that what Kitty had meant when she said Johnny needed roots? He would like this house, dark and dingy as it was, because she had stayed there as a little girl, because it was to a certain extent his house as the apartment never could be, even though it was the only home he had ever known. Perhaps children do need roots, she admitted. She didn't.

She had never had a strong family feeling. Her mother had been the tie with the aunts. Aunt Harrie had interested her as an individual, but not as an aunt necessarily. It gave her the creeps to be called Doris when Aunt Ada got mixed up. She was herself, not Doris' daughter. Her father died when she was twelve, but she felt no similarity between her mother's loss and her own. Her father had been a quiet, hard-working accountant, gentle and affectionate, but not very important in their lives. Or so it seemed looking back now. When he died they lived on in the same apartment. There was no great change. It was nothing, nothing in the slightest degree like the horrible loss that had come to her.

BUT there was no getting away from family in this house. In the parlor—a stiff little room with horsehair furniture, dark brown walls, tan flowered carpet, bay window—hung two portraits. One was of her great-grandfather, John Peet, painted when he was still young. On the opposite wall was little Johnny, painted when he was three. She had seen these paintings for so many years she did not think of them as portraits of real people. They were just two pictures.

After supper the first night Johnny saw the child's portrait and stood considering it. "Who's that, mother?" he asked.

"That's another Johnny." She had not thought of the names as being the same until then. "He was Aunt Ada's brother."

"Brother! Did he like to dress like that?"

The child wore a blu dress with a low neck well off the shoulders, short sleeves with a frill, a tight waist and full skirt. Below his skirt hung pantalets with deeply embroidered ruffles. It was a beautiful old painting, nearly life-size, too late to be a primitive but with some of the naïve quality of a primitive. The little boy faced slightly sidewise, holding an open book but with his face turned to the painter, his chin up, his round doll-like cheeks pink, his eyes wide. He had a spit curl on his forehead and another over his ear. You could practically count the hairs in the curls and the stitches in the embroidery.

Johnny sat on the floor before it, his cheeks pushed out of shape by his fists. "Did he live here in this house?"

"Yes, I guess he did."

"Maybe he slept in my room." Louder: "Did he sleep in my room, Aunt Ada?"

"I don't know. He died before I was born."

"He did?" they both chorused.

"Oh, yes. He died before that was painted. It was made from a daguerreotype."

After Johnny was in bed Mathilda tried to read, but she could not get away from the painting. It dominated the room. Grandfather Peet's painting was all grays and browns and olive greens and blacks, but Johnny's was red and blue and gold with a wide elaborate gold frame.

After his death his father and mother sat here evening after evening with their child looking down on them. With death so fresh a wound in her own heart, she could not bear it. Those pink cheeks, those round little arms. She would move her chair, but she could not get away from little Johnny.

Johnny must have died more than eighty years ago. Don't be so silly, she told herself, but she could not escape the feeling that Johnny's death was still fresh tragedy there in that room.

She looked for something else to read. The books were drab and uninviting—and dusty. The Water Cure Manual, published in 1852. It set forth the idea that all ills could be cured by water. She put it back. They

(Continued on Page 90)

Introducing Mrs. Les Pretend

She's a lovely little fibber
She's a story teller born

Birthday secrets she refuses to share even with her mirror. A gay deceiver, she loves it when people guess her to be years younger. They do because her skin tells little white lies about her actual age. She's over thirty, but shh! . . . that's her secret. In the scant few minutes it takes her to apply Bonne Bell's Plus 30 Cream, with its natural skin-enriching hormones, she keeps her years unapparent.

Overnight your skin can absorb the active hormones in Plus 30 Cream. The result? A fresher, younger look—in only a few wonderful "story book" days.

You'll love it. Imagine! Your age a guessing game and you the winner by 10 years! You'll find Plus 30 a real luxury cream for your skin at night—not greasy or sticky but richly emollient, fragrantly fresh and softly creamy.

You can look younger in one month

Every night take 3 minutes to apply this youth-awakening Bonne Bell Plus 30 Cream on face and neck—using gentle upward stroke.

While you sleep, the active hormones in Plus 30 can be absorbed to replenish and bolster nature's own failing supply—help the skin resist the passing years after 30.

In one month, or even less, you'll awaken to a thrilling sight. Your skin has a softer, smoother, younger look—no longer tells the real truth about your age.

Bonne Bell CLEVELAND, OHIO

10-day supply $5.00, 30-day size $3.00

"In Mexico I found my Love"

At Hotel Reforma, we'd been dining, dancing. "Marry me," you whispered. "I can't let go of these soft hands." Thank goodness I used Jergens Lotion, darling! . . . Favorite hand care of the very loveliest women.*

In Taxco, you bought me a bracelet. "Not one is good enough for this dear hand," you said. I want you to love my hands always, my dearest. So I'll always use Jergens Lotion.

For delicious, smooth, soft hands, Jergens Lotion is more effective now than ever—thanks to wartime research. Protects even longer, too, against roughness that discourages love. The two fine ingredients many doctors use for skin-smoothing are part of this even-finer Jergens Lotion. Still 10¢ to $1.00 (plus tax). No—no oiliness; no stickiness.

*Hollywood Stars use Jergens Lotion, 7 to 1.

For the Softest, Adorable Hands, use

JERGENS LOTION

FREE

YOUR CHANCE to see that Jergens Lotion is now finer than ever. Mail [illegible] (or just a penny postcard if you wish.) Box 27, Cincinnati 14, Ohio. Please send my gift bottle.

Name _____ Address _____

City _____ State _____

(Please [illegible]) (Canada: [illegible] Ave., Dept. 34)

(Continued from Page 88)

probably could, she thought. With enough water. If you jumped into it. She then tried Salem Witchcraft in Outline. That could hardly be called jolly reading. She finally resorted to the family Bible. The first item in it was made in 1723 and was, curiously enough, not a birth, death or marriage, but the fact that on May the second there was a heavy snowstorm and the pear trees all in bloom, "the ice so thick in the hogshead I could stand on it." This was apparently entered by Samuel Sawtell. In the same wavy handwriting, the same purple ink, he entered the fact that his wife Rebecca passed away at three o'clock in the morning, four years later. It was strange, Aunt Ada complaining about the long cold winter and her great-great goodness knows how many greats -grandfather getting out the family Bible to record the spring snowfall.

She turned the pages, reading the old names. "Thomas Clifton, lost at sea, aged 23. . . . Mary Sawtell married Thomas Braden. . . . Lucy Sawtell married Jonas Gray." Was Lucy in love with Jonas? Was she perhaps in love with Thomas Clifton who was lost at sea? Was Jonas perhaps like Sidney, a kind friend? Apparently not, for Lucy had eight children. One named Mathilda. Mathilda married Stephan Armstrong. They had she read it amazed two Stephans . . . two Williams . . . and Grace . . . four daughters named Grace. The first Stephan, the first William and the first three Graces all had died in babyhood.

She saw it was the custom to name a baby for a baby that had died. The infant mortality in those early days was appalling, but no mother had equaled this Mathilda Armstrong for perseverance. "So, God, you have the power of death," the poor mother had cried "but I have the power of life. Take my little Grace and I'll bear me another and another." The father had probably begged her this time to name the baby Mary or Ellen or anything but Grace. "No—I won't accept death. This is Grace." And the fourth Grace had lived to grow up, for twenty-three years later she married Silas Bowden.

Muttered While Manipulating a Granny Knot

By Georgie Starbuck Galbraith

Full oft, sweet sir, do I agree
To masculine supremacy
In such fine arts as parking cars
And wrenching stubborn lids off jars;
In curing water taps that drool
And shooting grizzly bears and pool.
Most humbly I concede the male's
My better, whether driving nails
Or tennis balls. But if I strive
With all ten thumbs, I may contrive
To wind and knot a piece of cord
About this package, dear my lord,
Without suggestions from a guy
Whose wife must tie his dinner tie!

Aunt Ada looked at the clock. "Eight-thirty—my bedtime." Mathilda decided she would go up too. She looked out the window at the rainy street. Few lights showed from the little houses down the hill. Aunt Ada locked the front door, then she latched it and fastened a chain across.

You're too late, Aunt Ada. Little Johnny died. Aunt Harrie has been dead ten years. Three little Graces died.

Aunt Ada's movements were automatic. Every night she went through the routine of shutting out evil, of locking herself in with her fears. Slipping the bolt on the cellar door. Locking the windows.

I shall be raring tearing mad in two weeks, Mathilda told herself, getting ready for bed. Only I shan't stay two weeks. I'll write Sidney; he'll come and get us. Of course she wouldn't. She wasn't ready for that yet. In the fall maybe. She'd just have to take it until then. After all, she had said she only wanted to be alone so she could think about Press. She didn't need people. Johnny could play outdoors and make friends among the neighbors' children. She'd take him for a walk every day. It was absurd to think it could hurt a child that his mother loved his father so much she couldn't forget him.

As she got into bed, suddenly through the rain came the sound of the bell in the town hall. She remembered it from her childhood, ringing the curfew. When the wind was east it sounded next door, when it was west it seemed to be far out at sea.

"Mother"—Johnny's voice through the open doors—"what's that?"

"That's the bell in Abbey Hall. You should be asleep, darling."

"It sounds happy, doesn't it? I think it's glad we came."

She could see the spire rising above the climbing roofs of the town. She thought of all the people listening to it, setting their watches, saying it was time for bed. She could feel alone in the house, but there were people all about; in small towns they press around you—you can't be alone. The bell clanged on. Need it be so gay? She took a last look at Press' picture by the bed; that way she was almost sure to dream about him.

The morning was vivid with the sharp spring sunshine. Johnny was wild to get out. He rushed from window to window. Mathilda succumbed and washed the luster pitchers and cleared off the shelves.

"Now doesn't that look corking? I've been meaning to do that for a long time," Aunt Ada said.

For ten years, to be exact. And in six weeks the clothespins and the pillboxes would be back. She put Aunt Harrie's dresses away and unpacked.

"Come on, mother."

Mathilda stood on the front steps and looked about. The house sat on a corner at the top of a twisting hill. One street went by the parlor windows up the hill, the other dropped down sharply, leaving the little front yard sitting up high like a stage. It was a tiny square yard that should have been prim. The pickets in the fence had fancy scalloped tops. She used to think it was like embroidery around a green handkerchief. Now the fence was gray and shabby.

Behind this upper yard was the back yard, a full story below. Behind that the land dropped over still another wall to "the lower garden." This was a long plot stretching back to the giant apple tree which reached from one fence to the other, its branches drooping to the grass. Mathilda looked at it sadly. The paths were gone, the pear trees half dead, the grape arbor broken down. There had been a row of rhubarb against the fence, and peach trees along the wall, and a little hanging swing. How could Aunt Ada let it go like this?

Johnny hurried her out the gate and they went down over the hill to the town. The streets were so narrow you had to push back against the fence when a car went by. You climbed up and up and then you went down. On one side the houses sat high above you, on the other you could look down the chimneys. The March wind blew Mathilda's hair and whipped her skirt. Johnny's red muffler waved like a banner. He ran ahead and he ran back. He held on to fence pickets and stared through at ducks and cats and children. There were the stately Federal mansions where the ship captains lived, and the rows of houses so close to the sidewalk you could knock on the windows.

They ended up at the post office. In the hushed building Johnny's voice echoed.

Coverall apron

in Gay Colorful Patterns

● When scrubbing an I-drubbing
. . . cleaning and tubbing,
You'll need a gay Coverall!
For mocking at grime, for laughing at drips,
It's the best big apron of all!
Made to take both wear and tear,
It offers you ample protection.
Side twin pockets . . . floral print pattern,
Cast off your domestic dejections!

Starcross, inc.
1450 BROADWAY, NEW YORK CITY 18, ---- GREENVILLE S. C.

CROCHET
14 GLORIOUS NEW PINEAPPLE
DESIGNS IN 10-CENT BOOK

● New, different doilies, bedspreads, tablecloths! Charming vanity and table sets—wonderful gift ideas—all in book full of PINEAPPLE designs. Get at your favorite store, or mail coupon. Limited supply; first come, first served!

CROCHET, KNIT, TATTING books — Limited quantities 10 cents each SIZES NUMBERS

The Spool Cotton Company, Dept. LHJ-1
54 Clark Street, Newark 2, N. J.
Please send me the [illegible]
Enclosed is [illegible] cents.
- No. 220—Pineapple Designs
- No. 222—Tablecloths
- ☐ No. 223—Chair Sets (Crochet)
- No. 217—Doilies
- No. 218—Vanity Sets
- No. 219—Bedspreads
- ☐ No. 210—Blouses and Dickeys
- ☐ No. 224—Woolies for Babies

Name (please print)

Address

People turned and looked at them—[illegible] in town. [illegible] everyone would know who she was and recall her history for two generations back.

At the desk Mathilda put down the broken pen and looked in her purse for her fountain pen. A man opposite offered her the pen he had been using. It was a slight encounter, too trivial to record. She didn't hear him and he offered the pen a second time; she looked up, misunderstood, understood, saw that she had made him repeat, thanked him, started to take the pen but didn't take it as she then found her own. Her hair was blown, her nose probably red, she was sniffing, Johnny was talking, pushing against her skirts, she blotted the address insignificant every bit of it, but her eyes had met his in one of those strange concentric meetings of glances in which you seem to drop through the other's eyes, seem to lose your eyes in his and with an effort disentangle.

When she came outside, she wondered about it. He couldn't have been a local inhabitant, but it was too early for the summer people. He had a cosmopolitan look very foreign to the town. His clothes, the careless yet sophisticated flannel shirt, the chamois jacket. He looked like Someone. Most striking, of course, were the eyes, the amused, friendly, philosophical, frank, gentle —— She stopped herself. Why in heaven's name was she thinking so concernedly about a man in a post office? Merely, she explained to herself, because she had thought of the town as made up of natives. Perfectly nice people, but natives. He wasn't like that—obviously.

"Mother—why don't you answer? See if you can beat me to the gate."

"Of course I can—pooh-pooh for you. I'm a runner from way back. Get set, go."

They came running up the front steps, hilarious, boisterous, to be met by Aunt Ada, her eyes popping out of her head.

"What's the matter—what happened?"

"Happened?" Mathilda repeated. "Nothing. We're just running for fun." She might have used a language never heard on this earth before. Had Aunt Ada ever done anything for fun, much less run up a steep hill for such a silly reason?

The old lady turned away and then remembered that something had happened. "Look, Mathilda—look what came." Excitement and, always with excitement, fear. "I didn't know what to think. The man said it was for you. I took it, but—I don't know what it can be. I hope I did right."

Flowers—from Sidney, in a box large as a small bathtub. Tulips, daffodils, iris, a bunch of saucer-sized pansies, another of primroses. All crisp and fresh and sweet. It was his belief that every woman should receive flowers every day; they deserved it, bless them, just for being women. He practically supported two florists, but he had done himself proud this time. She lifted them out, burying her face in the mass.

Aunt Ada stared. Probably flowers had never entered this house before except for a funeral. "Oh, my fury," she said. "My fury. What are we going to do with them?"

"Put them in vases. Enjoy them."

"They're probably covered with ants."

"Ants? Why, Aunt Ada, of course they aren't."

"We'd better put them all in that old basin down cellar. If there's one thing I can't contend with, it's ants."

Mathilda laughed. She'd write Sidney a long funny letter about how his gift was received.

"Did you see anyone downtown?" Aunt Ada asked. She rarely went out herself.

Mathilda didn't know just the answer to that. If she said, Oh, yes, crowds, Aunt Ada would feel bad that she couldn't go. If she said, Not a soul, Aunt Ada would think the town was dying off and she left alone.

She wrote Kitty:

I said it would be grim, and I was right! Aunt Ada is afraid of everything—rain, lightning, wind, fire, men. Especially men. "There's a man at the front door!" From her voice you'd [illegible]

Have you a Bulging Abdomen?
You'll really get rid of your bulges in a SPENCER!

At left See how her abdomen is lifted in the support she wears.

If your abdomen bulges—if you have spreading hips or an unlovely backline, it's just common sense to get a Spencer. For a Spencer does much more than conceal your figure faults . . . it corrects the cause of your bulges and they actually vanish.

Your abdomen will be youthfully flat, your hips smartly slim, and your backline gracefully erect. And your Spencer is guaranteed never to lose its shape.

Your Spencer will effectively correct any figure fault because we create a fashion support especially for you in which every line is individually designed to solve your figure problem—and yours alone. And you'll be amazed to find how little your Spencer will cost!

Have a Figure Analysis

Any dealer in Spencers will gladly give you a complete figure analysis. You'll find it fascinating! Spencers are sold by women dealers who are expert corsetieres qualified to consult with you on your special needs.

See Your Future Beauty Lines In Interesting Free Booklet

To receive booklet send coupon below—or look in telephone directory for "Spencer corsetiere" or "Spencer Support Shop."

In her Spencer Fashion support and breast support she is slim and lovely

We're Back to Normal Deliveries

Do You Want to Make Money in a professional type of business? Experience not needed—we train you. Profitable—interesting. Check here ☐ for information.

Also made in Canada at Rock Island, Quebec.

TO: LYLE SPENCER SEND TODAY
Spencer, Incorporated
141 Derby Avenue, New Haven 7, Conn.
Please send your free booklet. I have marked my posture problem at left.
Name (Please print)
Street
City & State

SPENCER INDIVIDUALLY DESIGNED SUPPORTS
Reg. U. S. Pat. Off.

Nelly Don — Just try one on.

Woven Madras (Sanforized Cotton); Shore Blue, Seagull Gray, Sand Beige. Sizes 10-16, about $11.00. For name of store nearest you, write Donnelly Garment Sales Co., Kansas City 8, Missouri.

and peers at him. Yesterday she was looking out the window with opera glasses. "I was just wondering what day of the week it is," she explained. I thought she was really nuts then. She was looking to see if it was dump day; that would make it Tuesday. She looks each day until she catches Tuesday, apparently. Imagine having your only contact with the world through ash cans. I'll be that way myself soon.

When she mailed the letter that man, that tweedy, youngish, professorish man, was in the post office again. He smiled a wide friendly smile and she returned the merest modicum, just the slightest stirring of the corners of the mouth, acknowledging that she recognized him as the man who offered her a pen. At least that was what she hoped the smile indicated.

As they left the post office she said idly to Johnny, "I wonder what time it is."

Johnny said, "I don't know," as of course he hardly would, but then off he darted. "I'll find out." The only person in sight was Mr. Tweeds.

"Johnny, no. Don't bother. It doesn't matter. Johnny!"

On he went. When she caught up the two were talking. She realized then that Mr. Tweeds not only wasn't a native of the town, he was probably not a native of the country. He had a slight, slight accent.

"If I lift you up thus, you can see the clock in Abbey Hall."

Johnny explained that that was no good because he couldn't tell time.

"It isn't important, really," she said. Both ignored her.

"Then you are very fortunate"—he said tu-nate, not chinett, speaking English better than an American, as so many foreigners do—"for you can learn to tell time by the clock in Abbey Hall, and I am told whoever learns to tell time by that clock will always live within the sound of its bell."

"He will?"

"That's what they tell me."

"Did you learn to tell time by Abbey Hall?" Johnny asked.

"No. My bad luck."

"Where did you learn to tell time?"

"Johnny." She reached for his hand, but he ignored her. "Come on, Johnny."

"I learned to tell time in a town called Frederikshavn, a town in Denmark."

So he was a Dane. He looked up at her and smiled as though he had caught her thinking what he was, and she quickly showed that she didn't care two bits if he were Danish or Ethiopian.

But Johnny spoiled it all. "Good-by. I hope we see you again. And I'll certainly learn to tell time. By that clock, I mean," as though he were an old friend, and because she was Johnny's mother she could be presumed to be seconding the thought.

"I'm so sorry," she said coldly. "Thank you very much." Which didn't mean a single thing, as she realized all the way home.

"Did you see anyone downtown?" Aunt Ada's poll parrot remark at supper.

"Not a soul."

"Why, yes we did too," Johnny contradicted her shrilly. "You know, my friend, that nice man. I'm going to learn to tell time by Abbey Hall so I can always live here. He said so."

"Who was this man?" Aunt Ada asked.

"No one. No one at all. Just a man Johnny asked what time it was."

But Aunt Ada wouldn't let it drop. "Did you ever see this man before? What did he look like?"

"Really, Aunt Ada, I can't remember," Mathilda said.

"I can. He had blue eyes—blue as that gravy bowl. And he smiles like this." He made up such a grotesque face, such an obviously poor imitation of Mr. Tweeds' really nice smile, that Mathilda laughed aloud.

Johnny, encouraged, went on. "I'm going to see him again. I think he'll teach me to tell time."

"You're going to see him again?" Aunt Ada asked Mathilda.

"No. Of course not. I don't even know his name." He would have a Danish name. She could probably find it in the town telephone book, if she wanted to, which of course she didn't.

Later, when she was looking up the grocer, she came across Olaf Gutekunst. Was that Danish? Then she saw it was followed by Plumber. That seemed particularly funny and she laughed right out. So he was Olaf the Plumber, was he? Then she went upstairs and wrote Sidney a long affectionate letter.

Spring was coming to Stonehead in a rush. The old apple tree in the lower garden threw a flowery fascinator over its head, little whips of peach trees turned into bouquets pink as coral. In the pastures back of town they found violets and anemones and bluets.

Lavender smoke went up from the gutters where neighbors burned the leaves that had blanketed their gardens all winter. The air was filled with the smell of freshly turned soil, acrid and clean as the smell of the sea. Mathilda learned new faces as women hung pillows and rugs and blankets on their clotheslines.

"Couldn't I get a rake, mother, and rake up the yard?" Johnny asked.

"Oh, Johnny, what's the use? It would be so hopeless—the garden is such a mess. Why not just play with your trains?"

But the life under the sod would not be suppressed. Green spears stabbing through last year's leaves—under the Judas tree lily-of-the-valley shoots, under the elm the first prickings of the common day lilies. Between the house and the street, in the midst of the dried plantain and burdock of last year, the dark red curls of peony. Silly spring!

Aunt Ada didn't care whether the garden bloomed or not. She never looked at the flowers, and certainly she wouldn't pick them. They'd be covered with ants. But the peonies and the lilies pushed on up and shoots opened into leaves and buds became flowers. Spring was as indomitable as the mother of the four little Graces.

Mathilda could see that Stonehead had been wonderful for Johnny. The April winds blowing off the sea had brought color to his cheeks and a bright gleam to his eye. Only occasionally did she remember how sullen and difficult he had been in New York.

Their walks were fun. Who would ever believe a boy six years old could be such fun?

(Continued on Page 94)

"Sure I'll make up with you . . . if you'll just be reasonable and admit it was all your fault."

Something clicked!

At first I just sort of circled around you—saying "Yes, how lovely" to the fenders, and being impressed with your silvery grille-front. They are lovely fenders. It is an impressive front. But—

It wasn't till John started talking Engine that this feeling happened! I'd sneaked away, slid behind the wheel into this soft seat, and suddenly—everything seemed so right, so natural, I reached for the key.

That impulse sealed the pact between us, there and then, Plymouth! I knew you were mine—and you knew it, too. Even the lights on your jewel-case instrument panel flashed a friendly wink to prove it!

Now it's official—because you're installed at my own front doorstep where all the world can see. Beautiful, obedient car—ready to carry me on any errand, in cozy luxury. Off we go at the turn of a key. Plymouth—you're for me!

Plymouth most like the high-priced cars

Are you in the know?

How can you leave at your dating deadline?

- ☐ Tell the crowd Dad insists
- ☐ Say you need your beauty sleep
- ☐ Mention an early A. M. appointment

Party-ing is such sweet sorrow when you're the gal who must break it up. You're also the gal who must face the family . . . so don't hesitate. Mention an early morning appointment. It's the smooth way to exit at your curfew time. At "difficult" times, curfew for outline fears calls for Kotex. That's because Kotex has flat, pressed ends that don't show . . . that prevent revealing outlines. And the exclusive safety center of Kotex means extra protection against accidents.

How should you cope with hickeys?

- ☐ Squeeze with fingertips
- ☐ Cover with heavy makeup
- ☐ Let them alone

You're all set for next Saturday night, and horrors!—a hickey rears its ugly head. Never squeeze pimples. Just dab with antiseptic and let them alone. Unless they're chronic, needing medical care, they'll soon disappear on their own power. Well-scrubbed skin gathers few blemishes. And bathing's especially important if you'd be clover-sweet on certain days. Kotex helps keep you dainty, because in every Kotex napkin there's a deodorant . . . locked inside so it can't shake out.

After making an introduction, then what?

- ☐ Follow through
- ☐ Let them take it from there
- ☐ Start talking for talk's sake

Spare your friends the pause that distresses —after they've said "How do you do?". Follow through! Drop a word about Jim's pet hobby or Jane's mad passion for the Samba. It gives them the pitch for conversation; puts them at ease. To be at ease on "trying" days, let Kotex introduce you to real comfort, dreamy softness that is strictly this side of heaven! For Kotex is made to stay soft while wearing. You get lasting comfort . . . more poise per hour!

More women choose KOTEX* than all other sanitary napkins

*T. M. Reg. U. S. Pat. Off.

A DEODORANT IN EVERY KOTEX HARMFUL AT NO EXTRA COST

(Continued from Page 92)

They egged each other on to climb steep rocks, to slide down slippery ones, and then guiltily examined the seats of each other's dungarees.

And Johnny wasn't so stupid either. He asked questions that made sense. She figured out the connection with what she had said to his next question, astonished at the ground he covered in that little head.

But evening came, Johnny was in bed, Aunt Ada rocked in her chair slowly falling asleep, and Mathilda sat facing little Johnny on the wall. He hung there, the symbol of the cruelty, the finality of death. Her burden of grief pressed down on her again. She had found in the family Bible a fact that made Johnny's death seem even worse than before. After Johnny died, John and Eliza Peet had seven daughters: Jane, Eliza, Susan, Mathilda—her grandmother—Harriet, Abigail, Ada. Never another boy. Father and mother and their seven daughters sat in the little parlor and looked up at their treasure, their jewel.

She turned to Grandfather Peet and asked him how he stood it. The portrait was painted before Johnny died, so his smile gave her no clue. Did you ever get used to his death? she asked him. Did you learn to remember he wasn't going to run out to meet you when you came home from work? Did you forget to listen for his voice? Did a day ever come when you woke and knew it was true as you woke, spared the sudden stab of remembrance as sharp as the first stab on the day he died? Could you ever say "Thy will be done," Grandfather Peet?

Grandfather Peet was dead. That was only a painted canvas. She would never know.

In April a telegram came from Kitty:

PERSUADE AUNT ADA TO LEAVE THE WINDOW SHADE UP TOMORROW NIGHT ABOUT NINE AND SEE WHO STEPS OUT OF THE TAXI

"Johnny—Johnny. Kitty's coming." She shared it with him instantly, not realizing how unlikely she would have been to do that before.

After the first excitement she began to feel guilty. What would Kitty think of their life here? Those roots she talked of, have I gotten anything from them? She couldn't see that she had.

Johnny was awake at nine, so she let him come downstairs and look out the window. Passers-by would see him in his pajamas, Aunt Ada objected, in the very words they had anticipated to each other aloud. They laughed. Just after the curfew rang, the taxi pulled up and there was Kitty, bareheaded, blue ulster—she might have walked from New York, or at the most come on a bicycle. They ran out and the three embraced on the porch. It was like a good cool drink after having a parched puckery mouth for weeks.

"Hello, my friends. Johnny, stop giggling and let me see you. My soul and body, it isn't Johnny—it's the boy next door. It's some tough guy you're trying to fool me with. . . . Hello, Miss Peet. I'm Kitty."

"Then I guess, if you're Kitty, I'm Aunt Ada."

Everyone laughed. Every so often Aunt Ada brought out a saucy humor.

They led her into the parlor and Kitty saw Johnny on the wall and Aunt Ada had to tell his story: "My father thought the world of him. That's my father there—a fine-looking man he was. Aunt Harrie always used to say so—she favored him, you see, and she'd say how fine-looking he was and then say how much she resembled him. Fooling, you know. She was a holy terror."

Mathilda looked at her, amazed. This was more than she had ever said before. Kitty studied Grandfather Peet.

"I suppose you know you are the very spit of Grandfather Peet yourself," Kitty said to Mathilda. "He has nice hands," she shouted to Aunt Ada.

"Now I'm glad you noticed that. What he couldn't do with those hands! He was just a wizard! He made all our toys when we

REALSILK MEANS QUALITY

IN PRODUCT . . . IN OPPORTUNITY

FOR MEN
Socks
Neckwear
Shirts
Underwear
Pajamas
Robes
Sportswear
Accessories

FOR WOMEN
Coats Suits
Dresses
Rainwear
Sportswear
Lingerie
Hosiery
Accessories

FINE MERCHANDISE—sold direct by reliable local men and women—with direct-to-consumer shipment, from one central point, assuring quality control of Fashion . . . Fabric . . . and Fit.

FINE OPPORTUNITIES—for men and women in both sales and management positions open in many communities.

WRITE DEPT. J-1

REAL SILK HOSIERY MILLS, INC.
Indianapolis 6, Indiana

THE PIN WITH THE LASTING GRIP
•
SMOOTH FINISH INSIDE AND OUT

Scoldy Lox BOB and HAIR PINS NEVER LET YOUR HAIR DOWN

Amazing New Plan!
DRESS for YOU for Ordering 3!

THRILLING NEW PLAN! Your choice of Gorgeous New Dress or Suit —in your favorite style, size and color, given to you for sending orders for only Three Dresses for your friends, neighbors or members of your family. That's all. Not one cent to pay. Everything supplied without cost.

Experience Unnecessary
Spare Time Will Do!

Famous Harford Frocks will send you their big, new Style Line showing scores of latest fashions, with actual fabrics, in dresses, lingerie, children's wear, etc., at sensational low money-saving prices. Also sportswear, slacks, suits and coats. Show styles and fabrics to friends, neighbors, and family—send in only 3 orders—and your own dress is included without paying one cent.

Be First in Your Town

WRITE TODAY for big Style Presentation showing scores of latest fashions with actual sample fabrics. No money needed. Don't miss this opportunity to get complete wardrobe—with chance to earn up to $22 cash in a week besides. Write now.

HARFORD FROCKS
DEPT. P-9012
CINCINNATI 25, OHIO

Your Choice OF MORE THAN 100 STYLES

(Continued from Page 95)

d, or this place wouldn't get on my nerves
"

"I hand out advice," Kitty said dully. Five hunks for five cents, assorted flavors ick on a stick. I don't like your thinking can help you. I can't. No one can. But I know this: Nature doesn't like freaks. does something about it. You have to be usting, receptive, and somehow—well, life kes care of it."

"I stop being a freak. You mean you ink I may fall in love with someone else." e sat forward and spoke angrily. "Well, u're wrong. I never will. Never."

Kitty looked at her, surprised at her hemence. "Lock the doors," she said. Nail blinds over the windows. Old women n do that, you can't. You can't stuff life o a box and sit on the cover."

Johnny had wandered up and was squat- g beside Kitty. "What would happen if u sat on the cover?" he asked her.

"The box would bust open—blow you up o a tree."

Johnny considered that, looking up at the gh elm by the street. Both girls were silent. ien when Johnny had gone back to the ver garden Mathilda said slowly:

"There's one answer. is may sound like a ny idea—I hope you n't misunderstand. there was someone o was just a good end, someone you ed well enough, you ght make a sort —arrangement."

Kitty rolled her eyes Mathilda, startled. "I mean you would arry him, but it uldn't be a real rriage, of course. He uld know that you dn't love him and ver possibly could. t it would mean a me and a father for ur child—it would a kind of life."

Kitty pulled at asses by her feet, t looking up.

"Are you shocked?" athilda asked her.

"Yes, I think I am. I haven't been ocked many times in my life, but I think m shocked now."

"I don't see why. Of course you know o I mean. Really he's a terribly nice rson."

"That is why it shocks me," said Kitty ickly. "He is a terribly nice person. That one reason why you couldn't do it. The ier reason is—two people sitting on a box e just two people sitting on a box. One tra person gets blown into the tree."

That afternoon they wandered about the wn—keeping away from the post office. ey stood high on Glover's rocks and looked wn at the empty harbor. Later it would filled with smart yachts, with the white ls of hundreds of racing boats, and jammed cursion boats. Kitty fell in love with little black shanty on a rock. They nt up crooked lanes and stopped in ops that were just the front rooms of old uses. A fat man in a shanty fried clams for em. "And we want a pickle, don't we—a t one." The potato chips had just come om the factory down the street, he said. Kitty shook her head. "And you want to me back to New York!"

HE fire alarm blew, a block away, raising e hair on their heads. They counted the wling blasts, exchanged information with e people who rushed out and ran to watch e trucks go by.

"I could hear the whole town counting," itty said. "The town united against fire. 's a good little world here."

In the evening Kitty had a glimpse of the her side of the story. Aunt Ada went about e house pulling the window shades up, ecking the locks and pulling them down again. At the same window, in the same voice as every night, she said, "It's an awfully dark night." She asked three times if the downstairs door was locked and the gate latched. "Do you think we're going to have a storm?" She asked that every night too.

But of course it all seemed slightly amusing with Kitty there. To have Aunt Ada perform exactly as Mathilda had described it. Funny and pathetic, of course, too. And it wouldn't seem so bad after Kitty left, Mathilda told herself. Kitty had helped a lot.

But alas, a week of rain followed. Cold, drizzly, inexhaustible rain. Mathilda stayed in bed late and went to bed early. She got books from the loan library—novels. One a day. At the end of three days all the good Kitty had done was gone, the place was worse than it had ever been.

JOHNNY, shut in the house, was bored, difficult, complaining. He wandered through the house looking for amusement, in the cellar, in the cellar kitchen and the cellar-kitchen closet, then finally up the ladder to the attic.

"Johnny, don't go up there. You'll get all dirty. That ladder isn't safe."

"Why isn't it safe?"

"It just isn't. And the attic's all cobwebs. There's nothing up there."

"How do you know?"

She couldn't bother to explain she had looked up there as a child. "I just know. Come down."

He waited, and when she said no more went on slowly up. And she couldn't be bothered to scold more. The rain came in sheets against her window. It dripped, dripped, dripped from the gutter onto the bay-window roof. She lay on her bed and tried to read a silly book. In her room Aunt Ada snored.

"Mother—come here." Johnny's voice indicated something important. He sounded not frightened, but awed. "Come quick."

She put down her book and went to the ladder. "What is it?"

"Come up."

She climbed far enough to put her head through the opening.

"Wrapped up here in a sheet is something very wonderful. It's a house, a beautiful little house."

She went all the way, crossed the rafters and squatted beside him. It wasn't so little. The sheet seemed to be covering something as large as a small chest. She opened one corner and tore the paper inside.

"Why, how extraordinary. I never saw it before."

"Can we take it down and look at it?"

"I don't know why not. I'll ask Aunt Ada."

But Aunt Ada cut her short. "Yes, I know all about it. It's the little house."

"But what is it? Where did it come from?"

"My father made it." Tight mouth.

"He did! Why, it looks simply wonderful. Can't we take it down and look at it?"

"Oh, no—no. Don't you touch it. You'd better come right down out of the attic." It made no sense.

Johnny, on the ladder, was listening, his mouth drooping in disappointment. "Why, can't we touch it? We won't hurt it." Aunt Ada had let Johnny play with anything in the house. Why suddenly act this way?

"Father made that for Johnny. It wasn't finished when he died and father put it up in the attic. He said no one was ever to touch it, not even to look at it. He wouldn't let us even talk about it." She looked as frightened as though she thought her father might be listening now. "You'd better come right away from it."

(Continued on Page 99)

WITH THE CHILDREN

Our son had his heart set on a fancy box of lollipops in the village sweet shop. I explained they were not worth the price and tried to establish a sense of value in the five-year-old, which was no light chore. I finally persuaded him not to spend his money for them by saying anyone who paid that price for lollipops was plain stupid. A short time later guests brought our son the desired box of 'pops. Beaming, he said, "They are nice stupid people and I am glad everyone isn't smart."

Going out to help with some gardening, I was getting into an old pair of dungarees, when my young four-year-old feminist pleaded, "Mommy, please don't wear those awful pants. How would you like it if father put on one of your dresses when he helped you do the dishes?"

—KATHRYN COFFEY GLENNON.

The Flavor's All Yours... when you smoke
PHILIP MORRIS!

CLEAN, FRESH, PURE
America's FINEST Cigarette

From your first PHILIP MORRIS in the morning to the last one at night—the flavor's ALL yours! And here's why . . .

There's an important difference in PHILIP MORRIS manufacture that lets the full flavor of the world's finest tobaccos come through for your complete enjoyment—clean, fresh, pure!

That's why PHILIP MORRIS taste better—smoke better—all day long!

No Other Cigarette Can Make This Statement!

Of all the leading cigarettes, PHILIP MORRIS is the cigarette recognized by eminent medical authorities as being to the advantage of those who smoke!

CALL FOR PHILIP MORRIS

ALWAYS BETTER . . . BETTER ALL WAYS

White Shower

PICTURED FOR PEPPERELL BY THE BRILLIANT YOUNG AMERICAN ARTIST, RIC HOWARD—WHOSE SHARP EYES SHOW US "THE WAY WE LIVE"...

"Something beautiful, something dutiful"—Pepperell Sheets, of course!

When a girl announces her engagement, life is suddenly an exciting round of plans, parties, presents . . . And how there's more appreciated by the future bride than fine linens? That's why you'll find exquisite Pepperell Sheets in this happy picture of "The Way We Live."

Everyone can see the quality in shimmering sateen-finish cotton versus the close weave that makes lovely Pepperell Sheets wear and wear and wear. Normally thoughtful but too ready to use in every home-making task, you'll pay less with high tensile strength and long-lasting coolness. Pepperells are beautiful, but with the wear woven in.

Such luxury sheets, so practically priced!

PEPPERELL Sheets and Blankets

Look for the Buy-Guide Box!

We're making more Pepperell sheets as fast as possible, so keep looking for this new Pepperell carton—with complete information about thread count, weight, tensile strength, finishing details. Ask for it in your favorite store. Remember, only Pepperell Sheets come in the Buy-Guide Box! Pepperell Manufacturing Company, Boston, Massachusetts.

Pepperells... the beautiful sheets with the wear woven in

LADY PEPPERELL • DUCHESS • COUNTESS • ABBOTSFORD

(Continued from Page 97)

Mathilda and Johnny looked at each
er. "We can't bring it down?" he asked.
She shook her head and went downstairs.
e sat on the horsehair sofa and looked at brown wallpaper, the muddy water ors Aunt Harrie did, the pressed autumn ves with the velvet frame. On the center le was an Atlantic Monthly for August,
3. Jean Ingelow's poems. The sofa cushion ind her was made of little biscuits of silk, bably fifty years ago. A house of the dead.
nt Ada's dead, I'm dead, Johnny's dead.
ndfather Peet—she had looked to him help. And what help could he give her?
en his son died he had to kill something,
t little house he made. He had to scare children, even reach ahead and try to re her Johnny. I can't stand it—I won't here. You can't keep me here, she told ndfather Peet. She'd go pack, she and nny would leave right away, go back to w York, go anywhere.

She ran up the stairs, pulled her suitcase vn from the closet shelf. It had the tags it from the hotel where she and Press nt their honeymoon. She choked down a
, then dropped the suitcase and sat on the . Where was she going? Back to that el—back to try to find Press? There sn't anywhere to run to. They were oped right here.

ohnny came to the door. "Mother, at can I do now? I'm tired of playing h my pencils."

"There isn't anything to do. Not for ner of us." She hardly recognized her own ce. Johnny's eyes widened and fear ead over his face.

HNNY's eyes blinked and his face puck-
d. It changed slowly to a baby's face—t baby she used to hold, the baby she used nurse, wrapping the blanket tight about pressing it close to her. That baby that ked up at her so solemnly. "Look, Press—k at him. What do you suppose he's nking?" He was the baby and he was this nny and he was the Johnny that was ad somewhere—that tall, strong Johnny o was going to be the man his father was.
Such a flood of love for him came over her t she could scarcely breathe. I never w—I never realized. He's all there is— he's rything. He's life. She was trembling so held one hand with the other to steady self. She mustn't look at him. She mustn't hten him.

"Johnny"—calm, calm—"Johnny, dar-g, there is something we can do. I was ong. There's lots we can do. Right now ll go up to the attic and get the little use." She laughed, half sobbing. "Come shall we? Get it down and y with it. And then, after the n stops, we'll make a garden, ll we? And we'll fix up Aunt a's house. Paint it—pink and low and white."

ohnny looked at her solnly and said, "I'd like to ke a garden, but we mustn't the house down. Aunt Ada
d no."

"We aren't going to tell Aunt a."

He hesitated.

"Look, Johnny, Grandfather et said no one was to touch it, t he was wrong. Aunt Ada's ong. It's our house. We're ve and we're the ones that nt. His little boy died, but didn't—you didn't, I didn't.
me on. We're going to get it."

She climbed up the attic lad-r; she could have climbed on a mile.

"Come on, Johnny—you take t side. I'll go down a step d you hand it to me."

They took the great sheetapped thing into Johnny's om and shut the door.

"Now"—she smiled at him—ou lift one side."

"You lift the other." And ere was the little house.

Johnny's eyes shone with excitement. "Oh, mother—isn't it beautiful!"

It was a Victorian house about three feet square, three stories high, with a cupola on the top. About the roof was a railing of the most delicate carving. The windows were all of real glass, and inside every window were tiny shutters, some folded back, some closed. Window shades rolled up with little red wool tassels hanging. She shook her head at the wonder of it.

"Look at the front door," she said in a hushed voice. Slender pillars, cornices, brackets. Over every window was an intricately carved shelf with tiny scrolls.

"Oh, mother, how could anyone make it?"

"I don't know—I don't know, Johnny."

They moved around and saw that the back wasn't finished. There was no door, no steps, the windows were out. Before that could be done little Johnny died. Inside the house were pieces of railing, bits of lattice, pieces of lead cut out like wrought iron.

Every evening he sat working on it. Johnny was sick; if he had this to play with he might feel better. Then Johnny was too sick to see it, finished or unfinished. Did Grandfather Peet stop work and sit outside the child's door, or by his bed? Or did he work on, forcing his fingers to be steady enough to handle the tiny pieces, until one night they came and told him—the doctor, or maybe his wife? And then he stopped. He never touched another piece. Dry-eyed—he would be dry-eyed—he wrapped up the house and took it to the attic. "No one is ever to touch it."

The little girls came one after another and there would be rainy days like this one. Little Abigail or little Harrie or Ada had nothing to do. But the little house stayed wrapped in a sheet in the attic. He was never reconciled. He never said, "Thy will be done."

I had to do it, she told the picture later. I'm right. You know I am. My Johnny is alive—he mustn't be hurt.

They put the house in Johnny's closet and he played with it afternoons when Aunt Ada was taking her nap. He had never been rough with toys, but Mathilda watched him with the house, amazed. He had collected all the little pieces and put them in boxes. Up in the attic he found others that had fallen out. He would sit looking at it, talking to himself as children do.

"Now I am going up to my room—this is my room here. I look out this window and I see mother coming, so I go downstairs again and then I come out the front door."

It was all too amazing, like some plan working out after all these years. Another little Johnny playing with the house—like the second and third and fourth little Grace. Like the lilies under the Judas tree pushing up through the soil.

"How did Grandfather Peet happen to make the little house?" she dared ask her aunt.

"Well, it was just built and everyone was talking about it, the finest house in town it was considered."

"Oh, you mean it's a copy of a real house?"

"Yes, the Punchard house."

On the first clear day after the long rain they started out to see it. "Do you know what I'd like to do? I'd like to buy that house and live in it," Johnny said. "Then I'd have the big house and the little one just like it."

"Oh, Johnny—it's so big."

"I like big houses, full of people."

Poor Johnny!

They followed Aunt Ada's directions down through the town, around by the shipyards—so far they had been before. Then beyond that to a little colony of houses, a cove with a few boats, a pebbly beach with Swampscott dories pulled up. Then the road turned and went over salt marshes. The road was edged with large granite boulders—once the sea had come in here—and with old twisted willow trees. Johnny ran ahead, standing now and then to sniff the smells from the cove.

"There it is," Johnny called excitedly. "Look." He had seen the cupola over the trees.

Together they ran as though the house, having nestled there comfortably for eighty years, might suddenly flap its wings and fly south.

The marsh ended and there were a wide lawn, enormous beech trees, a driveway and the house! They stood and stared as though it were their long-lost home and they had wandered through jungle and desert to find it.

"Remember that front door? It's exactly the same. Just exactly." He climbed up onto the stone wall to see better. "And remember that window? That's the one with the glass unglued. And the shutters fell out of that window on the end, remember?"

She nodded. Grandfather Peet must have stood here as they were, studying it, making notes, or perhaps making sketches—there were no cameras then. He must have come again and again.

"That window there isn't right," Johnny said. "That ought to be a door. Someone changed it."

"I don't believe so."

"Yes, it's wrong. I'm sure it's wrong."

"What's wrong with my window?"

They both jumped and turned. They had such feelings of guilt about the little house they felt it here too. It might be Aunt Ada saying, "You took that house down. There will be a curse on you." But it wasn't Aunt Ada. It was Olaf the Plumber. Mathilda felt foolish even thinking that, he was so completely unplumberish.

"Hello, Johnny," the voice went on—the nice European voice. "Have you learned to tell time by Abbey Hall clock yet?"

And then Mathilda remembered, not with her brain but with her pulses, that she didn't like this man. She had hoped they would never meet him again. Why did he have to be the one to live here—as he apparently did?

Johnny was greeting him warmly. "I can almost tell time. I know where twelve is and I can count around, but the other hand is hard. Do you live here?"

"I do. What is wrong with my window?"

"I should explain." Mathilda took over. "You see, we merely ——"

"Do you have to explain?" he asked. "Let me think you are

(Continued on Page 101)

"My advice is snap it up while it's in stock and then look for a husband."

For those who love to play with fire Hearts may burst into flame at the sight of this lovely Lady Catherine Terrycord Robe. But the fabric? Never! For light and fluffy as it is—this gorgeous creation is treated with a new substance resistant to flame. No need to worry about flying sparks when you curl up in front of the fireplace. Washing or cleaning will destroy flameproofing. We will clean and re-flameproof for $1.50.

Lady Catherine
FLAMEPROOF
TERRYCORD ROBES
A SANDERS PRODUCT OF DISTINCTION
At your favorite store (about $10), or write to DELTA SALES COMPANY, INC.
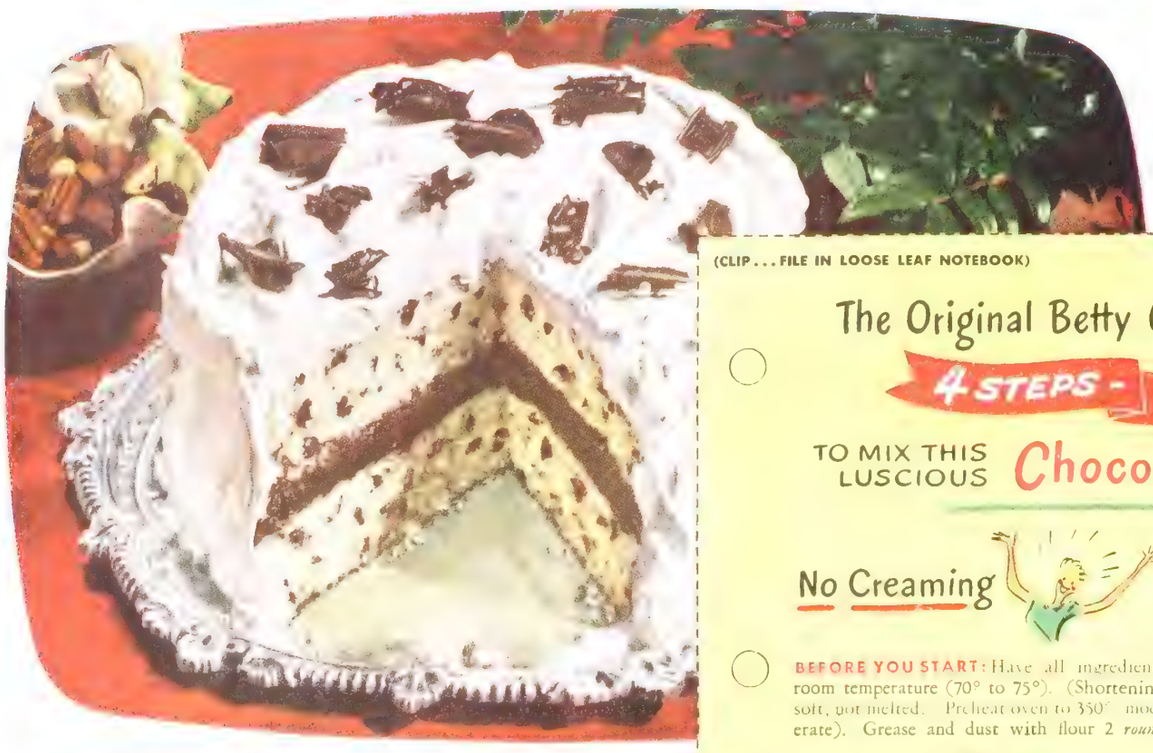
Jackson, Mississippi

IN CELEBRATION OF HER SILVER ANNIVERSARY...

Betty Crocker reveals ABC's of her

Double-Quick CAKE METHOD



Our new "double-quick" method gives you lovelier, lighter, better cakes in ½ the mixing time with Gold Medal "Kitchen-tested" Flour. Try my special Silver Anniversary Chocolate Chip Cake below. It's delicious!

(CLIP...FILE IN LOOSE LEAF NOTEBOOK)

The Original Betty Crocker New Method

4 STEPS - 4 MINUTES

TO MIX THIS LUSCIOUS Chocolate Chip Cake

No Creaming

No Egg-Beating

BEFORE YOU START: Have all ingredients room temperature (70° to 75°). (Shortening soft, not melted. Preheat oven to 350° moderate). Grease and dust with flour 2 round layer pans, 8-in. diameter, 1½-in. deep. Sift GOLD MEDAL FLOUR before measuring. Measure all ingredients accurately (level) before starting to mix.

1. Sift.....TOGETHER INTO BOWL..

- 2⅛ cups (2 cups plus 2 tbsp.) sifted GOLD MEDAL "Kitchen-tested" Enriched Flour
- 1½ cups sugar
- *4 tsp. double-action baking powder
- *1 tsp. salt

2. Add.....

- ½ cup high grade vegetable shortening
- 1 cup milk
- 1 tsp. vanilla

3. Beat.....vigorously with spoon for 2 minutes by clock (about 150 strokes per minute). You may rest a moment when beating by hand; just count actual beating time or strokes. Or mix with electric mixer on slow to medium speed for 2 minutes. Scrape sides and bottom of bowl frequently.

Add.....

- ½ to ⅔ cup unbeaten egg whites (4 large)

4. Beat.....2 more minutes, scraping bowl frequently.

Fold in CAREFULLY

- ½ cup sweet or semi-sweet chocolate cut into very small pieces (about ⅛-in.) (about ⅔ of a 4-oz. bar)

Pour into prepared pans.

Bake 30 to 35 minutes in moderate oven (350°). When cool, spread cooked white icing between layers, over top and sides. If desired, make Fudgy Chocolate Filling (recipe below.)

TO SAVE ON SUGAR: Use ¾ cup sugar and ¾ cup white corn syrup. Reduce milk to ¾ cup plus 1 tbsp. Add syrup with milk to dry ingredients.

FUDGY CHOCOLATE FILLING

Mix thoroughly, in saucepan 1 egg yolk, 3 tbsp. cream, ½ cup sugar, add 1 sq. unsweetened chocolate (1 oz.), 1 tbsp. butter. Cook over moderate heat only until bubbles appear around edge, stirring constantly. Remove from heat; beat until thick.

To make chocolate curls to decorate cake—have a bar of chocolate (either sweet or unsweetened) slightly warm . . . but not melting. With sharp knife cut off long shavings from smooth sides of bar . . . they will curl up.

NOTE: If you use GOLD MEDAL Self-Rising Flour, omit baking powder and salt.

If you live over 3000 ft. altitude, write to Betty Crocker, General Mills, Inc., Minneapolis 1, Minn., for adjustments for Chocolate Chip Cake recipe.

Perfect results assured only with Gold Medal "Kitchen-tested" Enriched Flour

Gold Medal's Back ...

and your grocer's got it!

Good News! On the Betty Crocker Silver Anniversary, America's favorite flour is again available . . . to bring you carefree baking days once more.

Superb, snow-white Gold Medal "Kitchen-tested" Flour! A flour for every baking need! Tested from wheatfield to kitchen to insure your baking success. With an exciting new set of recipes in the sack, perfected by General Mills' Betty Crocker staff.

Streamlined recipes for easier, quicker baking—insurance-tested recipes for surer, better baking! Betty Crocker New Method "Double-Quick" cake recipes . . . sure-fire "Never-Fail" pastry recipes . . . speedy one-bowl cooky recipes . . . lightning yeast recipes—the recipes you'll use again and again for delicious, easy Gold Medal baking.

Get your Gold Medal now—and join the celebration!

General Mills

FREE! WHILE THEY LAST!

Midwinter Carnival Recipes At Your Grocer's

Exciting new Betty Crocker recipes for Carnival Marble Cake, Coeur, Peach Cobbler, Bohemian Raisin Bread, Orange-Fig Bread, and Lemon Heaven Pie. Hurry, costs but the asking!

If your grocer doesn't have them, write Betty Crocker, Dept. 60, General Mills, Minneapolis 1. Ask for Mid-winter Carnival Recipes.

- Triple-Tested!
- Perfection-Blended!
- Recipe-Sure!

"Betty Crocker," "Kitchen-tested" are reg. trade marks of General Mills, Minneapolis, Minn. Copr. 1946, General Mills, iring my house. Let me think Johnny budding architect."

(Continued from Page 99)

A what?" Johnny asked, his head on one his face screwed up. "A what?"

An architect. A man who plans and ds houses."

He doesn't build arks?"

Sometimes arks," the man said, laughing. t he doesn't think so."

think I'd like to build houses," Johnny "but I'd never like any other house the I like this one."

athilda could not let Johnny get her in deeper. "You see, the reason we are ested in this house—we have a model of home."

e turned to her, as startled as though she said she had a trained lion. "A model of house! You have a model of my house?"

Yes. My grandfather made it."

But I am amazed. Why didn't I know existed a model of my house? The rical society did not know it. We spent s looking for old photographs, records, hing at all. It was in bad shape—I ed to restore it to its original condition. ound only a few very faded prints. And you calmly tell me you have a model."

No one knew about it. It was hidden in attic. I don't believe anyone ever saw

How large is it?"

e indicated with her hands. "We could ly get it down the ladder," Johnny said. Really—that large? An inch to a foot might be. When may I see it?"

'm afraid you can't see it," she told him. one is allowed to see it. Not even us."

But you said"—he gestured with both ds—"you said you had been studying athilda colored. And then laughed. "We it and we hid it in Johnny's closet. You —" Sobering, she told him the story. e showed great sympathy, exclaiming in slightly foreign way he had, "Ah—how his only son—poor man. And so the e was put away. But another Johnny rrected it."

hat a nice word. They resurrected it. now we shouldn't have done it—I mean people would think so."

Not at all. I think you did quite right. ple's mistakes must not be perpetuated their death. It is one of the great evils of world that the dead are allowed to con- the living. It is not right."

That's just what I think! It's horrible to ne dead hold living people back. Johnny es that little house." He looked at her she realized that she had been speaking ily, that her cheeks were flushed, and it dawned on her that she was talking m as though he were an old friend. "Any- , that's why we can't show you the se. Aunt Ada would never allow it."

M-m-m. We must think of some way. ould introduce myself," he suddenly re- mbered. "I am Anders Zorn—an ar- ect, incidentally."

A budding architect?" Johnny asked.

ELL, I thought once I had blossomed." smiled. "I build modern houses mostly. friends find it very amusing that I should e bought this for myself. One says so tively, 'I like this, I abhor that, I must e thus and so,' and then—one falls in ."

It's beautiful," she agreed. "We did not m it would have such a beautiful setting."

You must come in, Mrs. ——"

Avery—I'm sorry."

You must come in. See the inside of r house."

Oh, no—no, really. We must go. Aunt 's alone."

le walked down the road with them. "I think up some way to see the model, do fear."

We could set the house on fire and you ld pretend you were a fireman and save Johnny said. They both laughed.

hat evening Mathilda finally got up her rage. "Aunt Ada," she said, "I want to up this house."

Fix it up?" Aunt Ada asked. "How?"

"Every way. Paint it inside and out. New wallpaper. New curtains. I can paint—I'll do some of it."

"My fury," Aunt Ada said—"so that's what's gotten into your mother."

"Did you think he could be a painter and come to paint my room?" he asked in a whisper.

"Harrie had it all painted just a little while ago, but I suppose it could be done again. It means having strange men and they make such a mess. But it might give the neighbors something to talk about."

Before the work was started on the house a letter came from Kitty:

Met a gal today who tells me Inky Taylor is living in Stonehead. She married a Dane named Zorn and lives there in a beautiful old house. I'm writing Inky now to look you up. She's a swell kid—about your age.

Mathilda dropped the letter in her lap. Well, I'll be darned, she thought. How utterly funny life is. So he was married—to a girl about her age. He was probably thirty-four or thirty-five. An attractive age.

★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★

Lesson

By Elizabeth-Ellen Long

An old woman told me,
An old woman said,
"Love's an ill soon over with."
I wept and shook my head.

An old woman told me,
An old woman sighed,
"A broken heart mends quickly."
"Oh, no! Not mine!" I cried.

But now I know, who didn't
When my pain was new,
She was right and I was wrong,
And weep because it's true.

But now I know, who didn't
When I was very young,
That time's a cure for anything,
Though bitter to the tongue!

★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★

A man is settled then, you know what he is heading for, he has ideas. If he had a wife, a young wife, it didn't seem right to feel antagonism toward him. She didn't understand just why she had felt like that anyway.

Inky phoned the very next day. "Kitty says I'll like you."

"Kitty says I'll like you."

They arranged that Inky was to come to call the next day at four. Mathilda broke the news to Aunt Ada.

"Oh, my fury—what shall I wear? That Mrs. Zorn coming here."

"You sound as though you knew her."

"I do—everyone does. She was president of the Red Cross. She wrote me lovely letters—I kept them all. I never met her."

Mathilda helped Aunt Ada get ready, since she was making it so important. She found a silk dress old-fashioned enough to have real style. She looked very distinguished.

"I wish the painting was done. We'll have to give the parlor a good cleaning. Shall we get out the good tea set? What are you going to wear, Mathilda?"

Mathilda shrugged. "Oh, a dress."

"Well, at least you won't wear those pants."

Inky pulled up in a red roadster just after four. With her was her husband. They were talking and sat in the car a minute after it stopped to continue. Both laughing. The most absurd stab went through Mathilda's ribs. Other couples were so happy!

Inky was not raven-haired, but blond as a broom. She was a tall girl with fine wide shoulders; her blond hair she wore in a long bob only slightly curled. She had poise and self-sufficiency and a lovely large mouth filled with beautiful teeth. No wonder he fell in love with her!

"I told Anders where I was coming and he jumped aboard," Inky explained. "It seems he knows you. Something going on behind my back?" she laughed. "And where is Johnny—who knows the small hand on the clock already?"

"Johnny is napping still. He will be down."

Then Aunt Ada came in, with quite an air, really. He was charming with Aunt Ada—natural, easy. Aunt Ada, who did not like men in the house, was arch as a kitten with him.

THEY talked about Kitty, they talked about the town. Mathilda showed her lack of enthusiasm and they pointed out its charms as Kitty had. "I shall make it my personal responsibility to see that you appreciate your town, Mrs. Avery. I come from Denmark and show you about. You would not resent that? I do not know that I would like it if an American tried to show me Denmark."

"That's very good of you, Mr. Zorn. I think I have seen Stonehead. It's just that I like cities. I like New York."

"Oh, no. Or rather, like New York but stay here. I have a car. I will drive you about. I have a boat also. Perhaps you should see it from the water."

How extraordinary for him to talk thus! His wife looked amused. Foreign husbands certainly have strange notions of the way one talks to other women. Not "we" will drive you about, "we" have a boat.

"I'm afraid I am going to have to live in New York when Gunnar comes back," Inky said. "I'm dreading it."

"Gunnar?"

"My husband. Anders' brother. He is in Paris now. He is a member of a frightfully imposing commission," and she explained its purposes.

Mathilda did not hear. She was feeling too much the fool. And struggling that she should not show what she had thought; or if she did, that she should immediately and emphatically show, by a simultaneous expression, that it was not of the slightest interest to her whether Anders was Inky's husband or not. She caught his eye, and his amused expression told her that her efforts had been wasted.

Of course, like everyone, they raved over the portraits. "And this is the unhappy man," Anders said.

"Yes, and his Johnny. I'll see what I can do about the house," she said. "The first step. Be prepared to get nowhere." Louder: "Aunt Ada, the Zorns live in the old Punchard house."

"They do? I didn't know that."

"Yes."

Silence.

"I told them about the wonderful model your father made. Mr. Zorn is an architect, and so he was very interested."

"Yes, I don't doubt it."

Silence again. Mathilda exchanged an amused glance with him. Johnny was right. His eyes were bluer than the gravy bowl.

Then Aunt Ada spoke. "I expect he'd be still more interested to see it."

Anders took over. "Oh, I would indeed. I cannot tell you how much I would like to see it."

"Well—I'm willing you should," Aunt Ada said. "Might as well be hanged for a sheep as a goat."

"Now what does she mean by that?" Mathilda muttered to them. "You mean, Aunt Ada," she asked, unbelieving, "we can take it down from the attic?"

"Attic? I wasn't born yesterday. I think you'll find it in Johnny's closet. You needn't look so scared. I'm glad you had the gumption to get it. I couldn't sleep, I felt so badly about keeping it from Johnny."

Mathilda jumped up, enormously relieved. "We'll get it right down. Johnny must be awake. He'll be so excited." She started for the stairs.

(Continued on Page 103)

Treat Yourself

TO THE TASTE-THRILL OF A FRESH RIPE PEAR!

It's a "gourmet's adventure" to bite into a luscious ripe Winter Pear! Rich-flavored, tender, juicy Anjou, Comice and Nelis pears are in season now . . . "ripe" for your enjoyment!

★ Serve fresh Winter Pears with crackers and cheese for an easy, refreshing dessert!

★ Enjoy sliced pears and cream, with cereal or "on their own," for a special-tasting breakfast.

★ Pack a fresh ripe Winter Pear in that lunch-box. It's easy-to-pack, easy-to-eat—and nutritious! Fresh pears supply important vitamins, minerals and energy-giving levulose sugar.

★ Keep fresh ripe Winter Pears handy for the youngsters' after-school "snack." Low in calories, fresh pears won't spoil appetites for the next meal—yet levulose sugar makes them taste extra-sweet, satisfies between-meal hunger pangs.

Feature

FRESH PEAR SALADS, PIES, TOO

You can perk up midwinter menus wonderfully with fresh ripe Winter Pear salads, baked pears and cream, fresh pear pie and other pear desserts. Use Winter Pears in cooking, as you would apples.

LEARN TO Select YOUR PEARS

Your dealer should have pears ready-to-eat. They should yield to gentle pressure for fresh-eating and salads. Choose slightly firmer pears for pies and baking. If pears are quite hard, keep them at room temperature. They won't ripen in the refrigerator.

SEND FOR STAINLESS STEEL PEAR SLICER Only 25¢

Send 25 cents in coin for handy STEEL PEAR SLICER—which slices and cores in one operation. Copy of "Tasty Treats" recipe folder will be sent FREE with slicer, or on separate request. Be sure to give your name and address. Write today to Department D,

Oregon-Washington-California PEAR BUREAU

519 N.W. Park Avenue, Portland 9, Oregon

It's the stuffing that "makes" this thrifty meat roll!

And it's the flavor of Del Mont
Corn that "makes" the stuffing

1–We put extra care here

Extra care where? Right in the natural "wrapper" that protects Del Monte Corn in the fields. It took thousands of experiments to develop a husk that would close tightly over the tip of the ear, protect the kernels, and allow them to grow uniformly sweet and tender.

A small matter? Not for Del Monte! Hundreds of details like that are responsible for the extra flavor of Del Monte Corn.

And flavor is our responsibility—to you and to our brand. Every bit of extra care we take means greater enjoyment for you.

2–You get extra flavor here

Give round steak a break with the rich goodness of Del Monte Brand Corn in

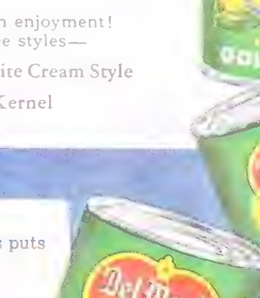
ROUND STEAK ROLL—CORNPATCH STUFFING

- 2½ lbs. round steak, cut ½ inch thick
- French Dressing
- 2 tbsps. butter
- ½ cup dry bread crumbs
- 1 12-oz. can Del Monte Golden Whole Kernel Corn
- 1 tbsp. chopped onion
- 3 tbsps. thinly sliced celery
- 1 tbsp. chopped pimiento
- 1 tbsp. chopped green pepper
- ¼ tsp. thyme
- ½ tsp. salt
- ⅛ tsp. pepper

Trim steak; pound both sides well. Pat into 11x15 inch rectangle. Brush both sides with French Dressing and let stand. Brown bread crumbs in butter; toss lightly with remaining ingredients. Spread stuffing on steak; roll up, securing with toothpicks. Brown in skillet, in fat trimmed from meat, turning frequently. Add ½ cup hot water and cover skillet tightly. Simmer gently for about 2 hrs. or until tender, adding hot water as necessary. Remove roll from pan; make gravy from drippings. Slice roll. If desired, serve with another can of Del Monte Golden Whole Kernel Corn, heated and seasoned, and sautéed green apple wedges (as shown). Serves 6.

And don't limit your corn enjoyment!
Del Monte packs three styles—

Golden Cream Style White Cream Style
Golden Whole Kernel



Extra flavor? Sure—Del Monte always puts flavor first

Del Monte CORN

(Continued from Page 101)

Let me help." Anders followed her. And ny waked up to find them bringing the e out from the closet. "Oh, really,
—oh, I had no idea." Anders could not ain his enthusiasm. "I never dreamed s anything like this. Look at that cor-
Look at the delicacy of that carving.
at the architraves over the windows.
did he do it? With what tools?"
nt Ada could not understand him, but could not miss his astonishment and ration. Mathilda asked his questions im. "I've always heard he used mostly a penknife. What tools he had he made lf."
ook at this curve. Inky, look—look at curve. Look at this infinitesimal finial.
t hands he must have had! Miss
"—he turned to Aunt Ada, then oked up at the portrait—"your father n artist." Aunt Ada beamed, not know-what to say. "I hope Johnny has ined some of his talent."
Mathilda used to be cute with her hands she was little. I have a valentine she me. Pictures cut out and pasted up. I ys thought it was wonderful work for a never was a tot," Mathilda protested.

ders was considering her seriously.
y do you not finish the house?" he h, I couldn't." But right away she she could and knew that it would e greatest joy that she could imagine.
think you could. I noticed your hands.
I think"—he looked Grandfather Peet—hink he would be ed." When they left ked her, "Have you
om you could work
I have a drafting
—a large one."
h, no, I couldn't take it there." Then ought. The cellar kitchen doorstairs a workroom that would make!
e was to dine with Anders and Inky llowing Tuesday. Anders had offered rvices if she needed advice as of course ould.
ome see our ducks, Johnny," Inky said.
y look just like ferryboats, covered feathers."
hey do? We had ferryboats in New
. Can your ducks toot too?"
y laughed. "No, they only quack.
ps you can teach them to toot too."
hey left with everyone laughing.
this Stonehead? Mathilda asked. Can e I?
e house was completely transfigured the month. The bedrooms were painted clean colors, the heterogeneous furniwas all painted white, except for the old gany, which was oiled and waxed.
e were simple small-figured chintzes,
d organdy curtains. "My fury," said Ada over and over again. "What l Harrie say?" The cellar kitchen Maa and Johnny did themselves. They ed it out, they painted the floor red, opened up the big fireplace.

R the back fence Mathilda asked Mr.
next door, if he knew a boy who would in the garden. "He'll have to be a g boy. There's a lot to be done."
she talked the slat of the fence came her hands. She got a hammer and nails ailed it back. Then she went around the n mending other slats. Who would beit would be such fun to mend a fence?
put the hammock under the apple-tree the swing will hang from that big bough thur came. A fourteen-year-old with curls like a cherub. Johnny's idol. She o interfere once or twice and explain Arthur wasn't hired merely to direct ny how to dig a garden, and eventually t the idea. At Arthur's suggestion they a patch and planted vegetables. And ny on his hands and knees watched the in the ground widen and the great s push their heads up through. The bleeding heart. Toddled and bloomed. Johnny picked a spray and brought it in.

"The poor thing look at the drops of blood, mother." His voice dripping with pity.

"Drops of blood, my eye. That's just a silly name, Johnny. It's only a flower. How could it be blood? There are [illegible] of something."

"I'd rather think it's a bleeding heart," he said haughtily.

"O.K., feller. If you enjoy weeping over something that isn't so, go ahead. But it's a bad habit." She heard herself. I sound like Kitty, she said. I must not be Kitty to me.

THAT was June. A month so different from the June she expected that she could not believe that she was she. Suddenly it had become a different stage, she wore a different costume and had different lines. She could not think back and see how it happened. Inky this friend who had, it seemed, always been her friend knew such interesting people. The Cecils and the Thomastons. Aggie Fitzgibbon, blunt, violent, good-hearted, and her charming delicate sculptor husband, Cedric. Maggie Tyler and her brother. They had boats. There were picnics, races, tennis at the yacht club.

Then it was July and everything slightly more so. Then it was August. She sat one morning in her workroom. She had been neglecting the little house too much. Now - and from now on, she told herself firmly - she would stick at it. The boys were down in the garden. She could hear their voices. Arthur was boasting about the money he had made.

"What are you going to do with it?" Johnny asked.

"Oh, I don't know. Get a boat maybe, or put it in the bank, or" a trifle smugly—"buy my mother a new dress."

"My mother used to make money and buy herself dresses. Now she doesn't work, she stays home with me except when she's with Anders. She'd rather stay home with me than have new dresses."

So Johnny still remembered New York, remembered and still worried a little. She picked up the chimney she was about to copy. It was a little masterpiece. It even had a lightning rod running up the side. She almost wept when she saw that. "Johnny will like this," Grandfather Peet had said.

She heard the bicycle tires in the road outside above the innumerable noises that might have drowned such a minor sound. Anders leaned his bicycle against the gate and came into the back yard. He stopped for a minute to speak to the boys below and then came in the door. She bent over the chimney, waiting, and then looked up in surprise as he entered. He sat beside her work table, asked if she minded his pipe, and then watched her work.

"I'm trying to figure out how he made the chimney wider at the bottom. What do you call it?"

"A corbel."

"It is just a bit of veneer glued on, I think."

He took the chimney and studied it. "Yes. It seems to be. And look, Tilda, on the edge here, unless I am mistaken, he sprinkled a bit of sand into the paint to represent the mortar. You almost have to take a magnifying glass to see it." Their heads bent together over it. "He did it to please himself. That is the difference between an artist and a workman."

"The row of pointed bricks stumps me."

"We call that tessellated." She wrote it down as she had written "corbel." His eyes were amused at her interest. "Do you realize that if your grandfather had finished the house, you wouldn't be doing it now?"

"No, I wouldn't, that's true."

"You wouldn't have known about this wonderful ability you have."

"You really think I have?" She looked up, but looked down quickly. "Sometimes as I work I can almost swear Grandfather Peet is standing over me, suggesting things.

> Few men ever have all the suffering they can bear; many think they have.
>
> From The Countryman's Year, by DAVID GRAYSON (copyright 1936 by Doubleday, Doran & Company, Inc.).

TWO WORLD-FAMOUS Faces

...AND THIS
THE FACE OF
THE DR. PEPPER
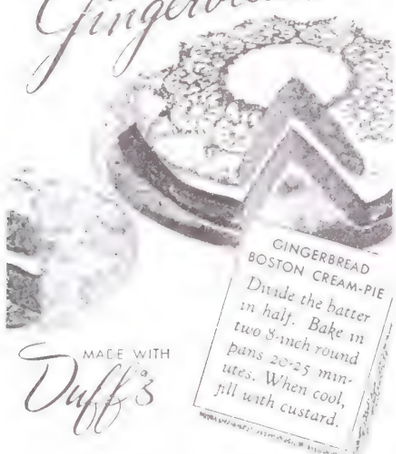
Clock

The symbol of the luscious, satisfying liquid bite to eat . . . the brisk, swift-lift for the fatigue hours of 10, 2 and 4 o'clock daily. Get the good-for-you habit; feel fresher, more alert and efficient. It helps any time you're hungry, thirsty or tired. Original, exclusive; a flavor creation, not a copy; it never tires the taste. In frosty bottles, or at the fountain custom mixed.

DRINK A BIT TO EAT at 10 2 4 o'clock

DRINK Dr. Pepper GOOD FOR LIFE!

PARTY MOOD
Gingerbread



GINGERBREAD BOSTON CREAM-PIE
Divide the batter in half. Bake in two 8-inch round pans 20-25 minutes. When cool, fill with custard.

MADE WITH Duff's

From its sugar-frosted top down to the last spicy morsel, this Gingerbread Cream-Pie is a party treat de luxe. And, at the same time, it's amazingly simple to prepare. The gingerbread is made quickly and easily with Duff's, and the festive topping is powdered sugar sifted through a paper doily. A filling of creamy custard completes the "easy does it" story.

Guaranteed by Good Housekeeping
All Duff's Mixes are fully-prepared
JUST ADD Water - THAT'S ALL!

GINGERBREAD
WAFFLE
HOT MUFFIN

PRODUCTS OF AMERICAN HOME FOODS, INC.

PRIZE PACKAGE!

Try leather for that, Mathilda, it's more pliant than wood. Or, I'd make that a little more curved. And sometimes I think I am my grandfather, making the house for the other Johnny. If I finish it he won't have died. It seems so funny to me now that I could ever have thought that it was wrong for us to look at the house, or that I should have hesitated to finish it. I'm doing it for him because I know, as firmly as I ever knew anything, that he would have wanted it."

He said nothing, but she knew he understood. They had talked about it so much. Finishing that little house, making every detail just as perfect as Grandfather Peet would have made it, seemed to her the most important thing she had ever done.

"The historical society is counting on exhibiting it in September. It will be done then, won't it?"

"Oh, yes. I have only the trellis and the back porch to finish."

There was silence for a few minutes—a bee buzzed on the pane, a lawn mower whirred outside.

"I was wondering, Tilda, if you had ever thought of doing this as a profession." She looked up, thinking he couldn't be serious. "Models for architects. There is a great demand for them and there will be more. People like to see right before them the house they plan to build—most people can't make sense out of blueprints."

"Do you think I could do it?"

"After this? You certainly could. You might have to study a bit, learn to work from blueprints, study the materials that are being used, but you would work closely with an architect. He would help you."

"People would pay me for this—play?"

"Pay you very well."

She looked out into the yard. What a wonderful thing that would be, too wonderful to imagine. She could do it—not in a glass cage, but right here; not directing capricious artists, but being the artist herself. She could put in more shelves, get better equipment—a fire in the fireplace in the winter. He was watching her look about the room, reading her mind as he so often did.

"There are some models on exhibition in Boston now. Modern houses; not like this, of course—you'll never be asked to make anything as difficult as this—I wonder if you wouldn't like to see them."

"Oh, I'd love to."

"We could drive up tomorrow. Have dinner on a roof maybe—or perhaps a show."

It was almost as though a wind had blown through the room, slamming the door, blowing out a light. They would drive home afterward. Last night she had leaned on her window sill and looked up at the moon, hearing that faint, faint music that comes from a full moon looking down on a sleeping town, and on a quivering sea, music as faint as a pulse beat. She had been close o tears at such beauty spread so richly before her—until she came to her senses. A sophomore in high school, she had called herself. A fifteen-year-old breathing heavily over nature. That thing there in the sky like a brass tray, just a big vulgar light, just an astronomical fact. She had jerked down the shade as though she were Aunt Ada and the neighbors were lined up outside. Tomorrow night there would be a moon—and no shade to pull. And she wouldn't be alone to hide her face in a pillow.

"I'm sorry, Anders. I'm afraid I can't go."

He smoked and watched her. Her fingers were shaking and she knew he saw it. "It's working into a rhythm," he said. "I think I begin to see the pattern."

She looked up. "A pattern?"

"Accept one invitation, refuse two."

"That's absurd. It just happens I can't go tomorrow."

"And if I had asked you to go the next day?"

"I'm sorry. Aunt Ada doesn't like to be alone—Johnny doesn't either." It was weak, but it had to do. She wouldn't go.

Lately it had got so that they were continually being left alone. Inky would swim off out to the float and there they were, she and Anders. Johnny would run off to see the ducks and there they were again. It would start as a big gay party. It ended with her alone with Anders.

He isn't in love with me, she told herself. I'm not foolish enough to think that. And of course I could never be in love with him, but it's just better to stop now.

He was silent so long she looked up. It's funny about men. They don't do things to make themselves attractive, like trying their hair different ways, or reshaping their eyebrows, or working on how they'll hold their pipe so when they smile their teeth show white against the tan, and their lips curl so—so cutely, and yet they can be so attractive. They just sit there not knowing it, not thinking about themselves at all. A girl cut out of stone couldn't help but be affected.

In the middle of August Gunnar came home. Inky phoned and asked Mathilda over for supper Sunday night. Mathilda thought hard as they chatted.

"After a year—you must be simply beside yourself, Inky."

"Beside myself all in a row. I'm bien cuckoo. I can't even think. I make no sense. You'll come, Til?"

Inky and Gunnar so much in love, reunited, the very air throbbing with their happiness. Inky and Gunnar, and she and Anders, watching, listening. But how could she refuse? It would have to be a good excuse.

"I'd love to come, Inky, but—I'm so sorry. I'm going to New York."

"Why, how come? How sudden! Anders didn't tell me."

"Anders had no way of knowing."

When she hung up she was ashamed that she had been so abrupt, but it was a good idea. An inspiration. She would call Sidney. He would get some tickets for shows—give her a whirl.

And when she came back? There would still be Gunnar and Inky and Anders and Mathilda. She couldn't go to New York every time they invited her to dinner. Sooner or later, there she would be caught. It made her knees weak to think of it. She just plain wouldn't accept. She would get sick, she would —— She sat and thought. If she let Sidney know that his dream wasn't impossible, she would be safe. Anders was very honorable. I'm engaged to Mr. Greer—Sidney Greer.

She put in a call for Sidney quickly. He didn't answer. Not then or an hour later. She called Kitty and told her she was comin down.

"What's wrong, Mathilda?" Kitty asked

"Wrong? Nothing at all. Why shoul there be anything wrong? I just thought trip to New York would be fun." She wa talking very fast. "I haven't seen Sidney i ages. I was so disappointed he never cam up. And it's not too early to start lookin around for an apartment for the fall. Wh shouldn't I? Is there an epidemic or some thing down there?"

Kitty's silence was heavy. Darn he what did she know? Nothing. "Til—wouldn't call Sidney. If you have the urg to come to New York, come on. You ca stay here. But let's leave Sidney out of it.

That made Mathilda mad. Kitty wa altogether too full of smug, well-meanin advice. This act—protecting Sidney fro Mathilda—was a joke. He would be furiou if he knew. "Sorry, Kitty. It's Sidney I a coming to see. I have thought it all over. know how you feel—it just happens yo don't understand the situation at all. Sidney and I are happy I don't know wh you should care."

"Til," Kitty said, "I thought he ha written. He said he would. I'm sorry t come out with it this way. Sidney is bein married next week."

Mathilda sat down on the step behind he Winnie had done it. "Mr. Gree-eer ought to b married . . . there's a lot a secretary can do. Winnie knew her strength all right.

"Is it Laura Something-or-other, suppose to be a friend of mine? He wrote me abou her."

"No—he's marrying his secretary, Winn Logan."

She gasped. "Winnie—Winnie! So sh pulled that off. Oh, Kitty, that's terribl Can't someone do something?"

"I don't think it's terrible at all," Kitt answered coolly. "I think it's the finest thin I've heard in months. I've met her. I thin she's swell. And so terribly in love with hin It's Sidney on the receiving end at last. don't know what you mean, 'pulled it off She never thought of such a thing. He di it."

She didn't know what to answer. She st couldn't believe it.

"When are you coming down, Til?"

"I guess maybe I won't come."

"Til—oh, I wish I were there. Loo love, get off that cover. Let it out."

"I don't know what you are talking abou Everything's fine here."

She hung up and went into the parlor. Sh felt as though the floor had vanished and le her balanced on rafters. Sidney. Sidney's lo for her—that had been like two and tw make four. To have him marry someone els And Winnie! What do I do now? she aske

She looked out the window ar there was Anders coming up th hill pushing his bicycle.

"Inky says you are going New York. The most remarkab coincidence. I have to go dow tonight—to see a client."

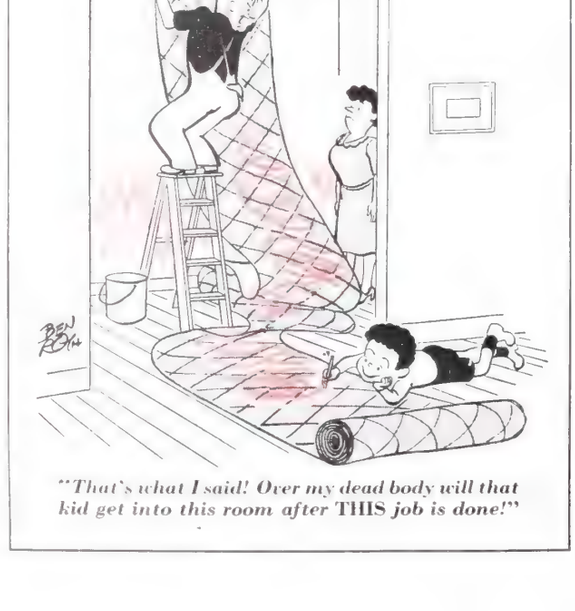
"But I'm not going. The frien I was going to see—is away."

His face was a mixture amusement and anger. "As matter of fact," he said, "m client would prefer to see me ne week. And of course if yo aren't going, you can come supper Sunday."

Sunday was one of tho summer days that seem to h just out of the tub. Cloud squeezed out of soapsuds an hung up to dry. Sky painted wit fresh blue paint. The haze August had gone out to sea, b all the richness of August w left behind. Gardens were burs ing with phlox, with late delphi iums and early asters. The holl hocks had long since gone.

Every summer hollyhocks i vade Stonehead, an army ha again as tall as the town's talle

(Continued on Page 106)



"That's what I said! Over my dead body will that kid get into this room after THIS job is done!"

It has taken centuries to produce this Special Milk

Hundreds of years ago the monks on the Isle of Guernsey were breeding cows to produce a superior milk. The breed was called Guernsey, and the milk was extra rich in cream and food values, yellow in color and delicious in flavor.

Guernsey cows were brought to this country direct from the Island of Guernsey, and today their milk is available to you under the name, GOLDEN GUERNSEY. The bottle you buy contains nothing but milk from selected Guernsey cows.

In order to bring you the distinctive flavor, the extra cream and other food solids of genuine Guernsey milk, a non-profit agricultural organization was set up and called GOLDEN GUERNSEY, Inc. This organization supervises the production of the milk from thousands of selected Guernsey herds and requires that it shall always be kept separate from other milk. Then leading dairies all over the country are authorized to bottle this milk and see that it reaches your home under the label, GOLDEN GUERNSEY.

You get more food value per penny spent when you insist on GOLDEN GUERNSEY—that special milk. So take advantage of the unusual flavor. Look for the ample supply of rich, yellow cream that tops every bottle. Guard your family's health with its extra nutrition.

Dairies in over 2000 towns and cities in the United States are supplying GOLDEN GUERNSEY to hundreds of thousands of families. Ask your own milkman to start leaving this superior milk at your home. If he doesn't have GOLDEN GUERNSEY, we'll be glad to give you the name of the nearest distributor who does. Write to GOLDEN GUERNSEY, Inc., Peterborough, New Hampshire.

GOLDEN GUERNSEY
EXTRAS

1. Comes only from selected Guernsey cows
2. Meets the requirements of local and state health authorities
3. Is supervised in production by GOLDEN GUERNSEY, Inc., a non-profit agricultural organization.

GOLDEN GUERNSEY
That Special Milk

Fieldcrest SHEETS

PURE WHITE...and PERFECT

Pleasant prospect . . . to relax between snowy Fieldcrest sheets . . . soothed by their lightness . . . lulled by their smooth softness . . . refreshed by the deep-sleeping comfort of sheets at their best. There's perfect awakening for you, too, when you know that Fieldcrest sheets and pillow cases—woven the luxury way—are priced the economy way. Ask for them at leading stores.

DURHAM—the fine, carded percale.
GOLDEN GATE—the sturdy, long-lasting muslin.
WEARWELL—the famous, service muslin.

FIELDCREST TOWELS

FIELDCREST BLANKETS

MARSHALL FIELD & COMPANY, INC. • 8 WORTH ST., NEW YORK 13, N. Y.

(Continued from Page 104)

man. They surround the houses, they march down the sidewalks, the gutters. Why they so love that town, of all the towns on the seacoast, no one knows. Their stalks were standing now, golden brown, shedding their seeds for next year's attack.

Anders drove slowly through the twisting streets. It was a beautiful day, he told her twice, and she agreed. A beautiful, beautiful day. She was going to be all right. She had had a good stiff session with herself. Everything would be perfectly all right.

The willow road was dappled with sun. Unseen hands were throwing golden coins drunkenly and the air was filled. When he started into the drive Mathilda stopped him.

"Just a minute, I want to look at it." He stopped, pleased. "You know, I think I like my chimney better than the original—it's a trifle slenderer."

He nodded. "Yes, I think it is better-proportioned."

"I never would believe I could have such an affection for an inanimate object—as I have for the little house," she added.

"You could safely have an affection for my house," he said quietly.

"You have done quite a bit since I first saw it. Do you call that a summer-house?"

"You could call it a gazebo or a belvedere. Your grandfather would have enjoyed copying that with all that lattice-work and the domed roof. I did these things," he went on, "not for myself, but because I had a hope ——"

"Of course, Gunnar was coming. Shall we go in and meet him?"

"Gunnar was coming," he agreed. "But Gunnar and Inky are leaving soon and I shall be alone in my big house." He wasn't being pitiful. Just a statement of fact.

Gunnar was taller than Anders, with a wiry build. Some might have thought him handsomer. He hadn't the kindly squint to the eyes, or the healthy brown skin, or the sensitive mouth with its swift smile. He talked rapidly in a very amusing fashion more foreign than his brother. They were a gorgeous couple, Inky in black organdy with a narrow blue ribbon about her waist.

GUNNAR was still catching up on the news. "And what happened to the kitten, my girl?" An odd endearment for one's wife, but he had a curious pronunciation for "girl" that made it a very loving word. "And did you get the bathing suit? Your sketch"—he turned to Mathilda—"Een-kee makes the most delightful drawings. To have a wife who writes such vunderful letters is a great joy—but not entirely. She seems so near as you read, it is hardly to be endured."

"And now poor Gunnar, home and no letters," Inky said, laughing.

He took her hand and kissed it. "Letters are but the distillation. I have the flower itself."

Mathilda looked away and met Anders' eyes full on her. It was as though he said, Thus two may love.

They had supper with the paving-block garden court with a saucy catbird curious about the whole affair.

"Reporter for the local paper," Inky sai

"Lobster," Gunnar told the bird, pointin to the small casserole on his plate. "Wi alligator pear and sherry. My wife can gi you the recipe. The hostess in black organd Mrs. Avery—you know Mrs. Avery." H was completely serious. The bird cocked h head and studied Mathilda. "In crea Liberty silk smocked."

The bird flew away, frightened by th laughter. It was gay—it was heaven. Th ducks swimming silently in their pond, th birds in the shrubbery, the breeze from th cove—that Stonehead breeze compounde of salt sea and summer flowers.

AFTER supper, inevitably they broke in two and two, although Inky went throug the gestures of being hostess. Mathilda d not know whether or not to think up an e cuse for going—she didn't, frankly, want go back to Aunt Ad but she didn't wa to stay and wat Gunnar and Inky ar she didn't want to b alone with Ander She didn't know wha she wanted. Withou figuring out how happened, she foun herself walking wit Anders across th road to the little cov

Now say you mu go home, she told he self. Now say it late. He walked b side her and now an then their arm touched. She must g O God, Who mak moons rise, sh prayed, stop this on Keep it down und the sea. Blot out th stars. Send tida waves to wash th star shine from th cove. If only she we blind! Do blind pe ple fall in love or a they spared that agony

Anders stopped t light his pipe and sh saw his face tens she saw his hand u steady. "You did n really think to g back to New York? he asked her.

"Yes. Of course.

"But—we talke of your makin' models. Here. Yo seemed ——"

"Oh, that was just midsummer madnes One of those silly things you think up i vacations. You go to Vermont and you d cide to stay there and raise maple sugar c paint barns and you go to Maine and yo get all excited about taking up deep-se fishing and writing a novel. You figure it a out as seriously as though you really mean it, and then fall comes and back you go t the old job. When I was in high school thought I wanted to be a drum majorette. He said nothing and the words came bac to her as the silliest sort of chatter. "It ha been a lovely summer, but now it's ove Summers always do end." A touch of bitte ness. That was her life. Love had been jus a season, a single summer and then winte bleak, unending.

"Tilda, I can't bear to see you strugglin this way."

"Struggling?"

"Torn."

"Why, I'm not torn at all. I don't kno what you mean."

"Why are you afraid to love again? Yo know how deeply I love you. That first da that very first day in the post office, it wa like a curtain pulled. It was a sudden revela tion of what life might be with the on woman." His voice broke. "There you wer with no warning. I knew you at once for m love."

★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★

Sonnet

BY E. V. GRIFFITH

And I shall love you when my other loves
Have passed and gone the way of passing seasons.
When autumn maples flame in all the coves,
And their dark leaves, found guilty of high treason,
Are gruffly sentenced and condemned to death
By hissing winds which rave and rant and blame—
I shall love you, my love, until my breath
Is stopped with earth from which my body came.
I shall love you though I am corn which clashes
And grasses which the warm winds bend and quiver.
I shall love you till time's key locks your lashes
Though I am years of leaves to drift down-river.
I shall give fallow earth my strength and passion,
And, doing, love you in another fashion.

★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★

Anders—don't, don't. Please."
Why not? Why shouldn't I tell you I e you? I think you love me, but your s are clouded with fear. Is it fear of me?
o not think so. It is fear of yourself.
r of life. Why won't you let yourself
e me?"
he had to speak now, quickly. She must o this. "I don't love you, Anders. And re is no chance that I ever will. None atever. I'm sorry—I don't know where ever got such an idea. I loved Prescott
I still love him. I always will." She had ted calmly, intending a dignified, kind, definite, speech. But her words were ing faster and faster. "How could I love one else? How could you think such a g of me? You don't understand. Press
I were in love. Terribly in love."
My darling." His tenderness stopped her t into anger. It was a barrier, taking her ngth. "Do not hold so firmly to that
."
The idea that I loved Press?"
No. That it is a sin to love again. Of se you loved him, but he cannot return.
t is over. You must face it. Be true to rself—not to this martyr you have ted."
You think I am not sincere? That this pose?"
Of course you were sincere. I think you e suffered greatly and have been very ve, but now you hold to that suffering.
hold it before your eyes to blind you to
I think you are afraid to look at happi-
."
I don't want happiness," she said quickly.
hat right have I to be happy when he e up his chance at happiness?" she asked gnantly. "He gave up everything for
It is the least we can do to be faithful to
."
e said no more, and they sat on the over-ed boat silent, looking not at the water the lights of the distant shore, but at black sand at their feet. The stars stared, ressing nothing. The wind went and left otiness—a vast and empty cavern.
I must go." She got up and he followed.
the way home he said nothing.
When shall you leave for New York?"
sked when they reached her porch.

DON'T know." He had no right to quesher. She was shaking with anger, weak h her anger. At him for saying things he no right to say, at herself for listening words she had sworn she would never n to. She wanted only to rush into the se, throw herself on her bed and think ut Press.
Good-by," he said.
Good-by. I'm sorry ——"
No, please. Just good-by."
Good-by, Anders." She went in.
unt Ada had not gone to bed. She sat in window of the back room with only the t from the street lamp. Her thin hands e relaxed in her lap, her head back inst the slats of the rocker. The little se, finished at last, had been brought up n the cellar kitchen that day. She was king at it now.
he started when she saw Mathilda. "Is t you, Harrie? Did you have a good e at the party? I was just sitting here king at this." She smiled at her child-ess. "It just seems as if I couldn't look t enough."
Mathilda sat and looked at the little se too. In that pale light it was like king at Anders' house from a distance.
tood out against the shadow on the wall.
opened front door dark, the porches dim.
e of the windows shone as though there e a light inside. Was Anders in there une to sleep?
I never can be thankful enough you had courage to bring that down from the c," Aunt Ada said.
But Anders said she had no courage. She courage the day she brought the house
vn. She had felt she was going mad, ocating, but it was Johnny's suffocating
t made her rebel. She had to save him.
would have fought anything for him er that day their whole life here was set in stone, like nothing could ever be wrote saying you were coming. You don't know how near I came to saying no. It write you to come. And there I was so lonelonesomeness, scared to let it go."

A BRANCH of a tree blew across the street lamp and the leafy shadows scurried over the house. For a minute it looked as though people were coming out the door, running across the lawn. Johnny had said he wanted "a big house, full of people."

"I'm glad you didn't stop us from coming, Aunt Ada. We needed you. Coming up here mad me see lots of things I didn't understand before."

"Well there, I didn't think you needed any help from anyone. You're like Harrie. She wasn't afraid of life she just went right to it. Well, I guess it's past my bedtime." She got up. "I'll probably be dreaming I'm a young one playing with the house and father not caring if I do."

Have I courage or haven't I? Mathilda asked, going up the stairs. Have I strength to go only so far and then give up? Why have I courage for others and not for myself?

She looked at Press' picture. "I don't know what to do," she said aloud. "You know I haven't forgotten you."

Aunt Ada used to talk aloud to Aunt Harrie, shut in her room. I'm just like her, trying to hold onto the past, pulling down shades, shutting out life. It was so easy to see weaknesses in others. If I'm not going to be afraid of life, she said, then I mustn't be afraid of love. If I do love Anders. It was so strange to put it into words. If I do love Anders. Oh, how she loved him! What right had she to kill anything so beautiful as love?

She jumped up to phone him, but went back to bed. For one night she would hold this wonderful secret in her own heart. The morning would be time enough to tell him.

It was nine-thirty when she woke. The dog across the street was barking at the postman. Mrs. Blaney was going down the hill to do her marketing. The same world—but oh, how different! She hurried down the stairs to telephone Anders. He would want to come right over. In an hour—in half an hour maybe ——

Inky answered the phone. "Oh, hello. Gunnar and I were rude as get out last night."

"That was all right. Is Anders there?"

"No. The darnedest thing. I found a scribble this morning saying he was off to New York. He's been planning to go for some time. Something seemed to hold him something to do with the tides, no doubt."

There was laughter in Inky's voice, but Mathilda couldn't laugh back. It wasn't supposed to go this way. "How long will he be gone?"

"I haven't the faintest notion."

"But he'll be back in a day or two, won't he?"

"Maybe maybe not. He's an independent cuss. If we hear anything I'll let you know."

After breakfast Mathilda went down into the lower garden. Johnny, in a pair of trunks, was busy with hammer and nails. She stretched out on a beach chair beside him. She would be nothing. She would live in a vacuum until he returned. It was a mistake, time out, he would come back and then life would go on.

She turned her head. "What are you building, Johnny?"

"Well, it's a kind of cage. And it's either

PHOTOGRAPHED AT LORD &

Tumble-Twist
RUGS
Make dream rooms come true!

To look at Tumble-Twist rugs, you'd never guess anything so lovely could be so wonderfully practical. Yet it's a delightful fact —Tumble-Twists are pre-shrunk, color-fast. They look even lovelier with laundering! In room sizes and scatter sizes at America's smartest stores.

CREATED BY LIBERTYVILLE TEXTILES
Libertyville, Illinois

RELIEF!

It's important to get fast relief when you have a headache. So always keep a bottle of Bromo-Seltzer in the house. Bromo-Seltzer fights ordinary headache these three ways:

1. Helps relieve headache pain
2. Helps relieve upset stomach
3. Helps quiet jumpy nerves

which may team up to cause trouble.

Easy to take: Simply put teaspoonful in a glass and add water. Bromo-Seltzer effervesces with split-second action. Caution: Use only as directed.

Get Bromo-Seltzer at your drugstore counter or fountain today. Compounded in four convenient home sizes by registered pharmacists.

For FAST headache relief

BROMO-SELTZER

A PRODUCT OF EMERSON DRUG COMPANY SINCE 1887

It was a place where the impossible happened over and over again. Johnny had insisted that the peas they planted were just little brown pebbles. And then they so obviously weren't. He was completely astonished that flowers on trees could turn into pears. How could they? It was impossible. But they did. Into large golden pears that dropped down in front of him when he was hungry. The place was enchanted, obviously. She looked at his sturdy brown shoulders. A thin unhappy boy had turned into a husky happy boy here. From now on there would be nothing but happiness for him. He would grow up in this town—learning to tell time by Abbey Hall clock had been a true augury. He would lead a normal family life. She lay soaked in sunshine and happiness, not allowing herself even to think what those words meant. They would find someone to live with Aunt Ada—they would come to see her often.

As though on cue, Aunt Ada came down the path holding a letter. She looked startled—mail always scared her a little. It could tell of a death.

It was from Sidney. Mathilda laughed. How many years ago was it that she had thought of going to New York to maneuver Sidney into proposing to her? Did anyone ever cook up a crazier idea?

The letter was Sidney at his Sidneyest:

> I have approached this marriage with the consecration of a young priest entering the Church. . . . I intend to make her as happy as my father made my beloved mother.

Dear Sidney! Who else could write such things? From him it was rather sweet. He said he and Winnie planned to go on a cruise and might stop over in Stonehead Harbor. She lay back thinking of Winnie and Sidney. He was her prince—how she must have felt when he asked her to marry him, and she hunting the right girl for him all the time! Sidney would think she was the cleverest person that ever lived. She remembered how Winnie copied her tweed suit, after they lunched together. She dropped the high heels. She was taking some courses at night school. Mrs. Sidney Greer would get along all right.

I have seen a hedgehog trying to collect crab apples, which he was unable to do with his feet or mouth, extend his spines and roll on the apples, thereby collecting three of them, which he carried away; presumably to his family.

—L. R. THODAY
N'importe. (Heath, Cranton, Ltd.)

The phlox was honey-sweet—a jangle of reds and magentas and corals and clear strong pink. The pears hung on the pear tree like presents wrapped in gold paper, arching the limbs, more like a fountain than ever. There was a wasp on one, complaining. An apple fell and lay red and inviting. She was too lazy to pick it up. Three back yards down, neighbors were talking. Aunt Ada's neighbors. Her neighbors now. Her town.

She saw it as though she were miles off, in time and in space. Little girls going to school late—running, their curls bobbing. Down the hill, by the gate, around the corner. As their mothers had run just a few minutes ago, down the same hill, around the same corner. Men dropping their tools to answer the fire alarm as their fathers and grandfathers dropped theirs to run to protect the town. The boy and the father and the grandfather were one and the same—Doris and Mathilda were the same—and Johnny in the painting on the wall sat there beside her alive, building a cage.

She started up. She must have slept. That must have been a dream that Anders had gone for good. But he had gone. How did she know it wasn't forever? She didn't know that he intended to come back. He could wire Inky to sell the house. She had been so positive last night: "I can never love you."

She hurried up to the house and called Inky again. "If you had to reach Anders"—her voice sounded so scared she swallowed and started again—"if you had to reach Anders, Inky, what would you do? Where does he stay in New York? Isn't there someone there he would be likely to get in touch with?"

Inky was all seriousness this time. She called to Gunnar, and Mathilda could hear them discussing it. "Gunnar says New York is so jammed he is probably staying wherever he can get in. Might be any hotel. We don't know his client's name. He has a friend who has an office on Fortieth Street." They wanted to help her, but they really couldn't.

Mathilda was getting more and more frightened. He was gone. This was the end. She had had happiness offered to her last night and she turned it away. You don't get second chances. He would never come back. He would never know that she loved him.

She knew it was futile to telephone New York hotels blindly, but she did just that. She just might find him. The clerk in the first one knew nothing of Anders and hung up before she could leave a message in case he came in. How many hotels are there in New York? Hundreds. Long distance was patient—with an effort. She was tying up circuits needed for more important things. Was there anything on this earth more important than reaching Anders?

She left the dinner table three times to talk to the operator. She spent most of the afternoon by the phone. Aunt Ada asked no questions.

Johnny offered suggestions. Anders might be feeding ducks in Central Park. "He likes ducks. Or maybe he's calling on Kitty."

"He doesn't know Kitty. But—oh, Johnny, you're wonderful. I could call Kitty and ask her to try to find him. Oh, darling, you're so smart." She gave Johnny a playful punch and ducked his answering uppercut and hurried to the phone. It was five o'clock. Kitty might not come until six.

But it was eight before long distance called back, "On your call to New York——" and Kitty's voice.

"Oh, Kitty, I've been trying to get you so long. I want you to help me. I need you terribly."

"Need me up there?" No surprise, no objections. She would take the next train if Mathilda said yes. Mathilda could imagine her sitting on a low stool or on the arm of the chair—at ease, assured, able to do anything.

"No, I need you to do something for me in New York. I want you to find someone for me. Anders Zorn. He's Inky's brother—brother-in-law. I never wrote you about him because—well, I thought you would misunderstand. I knew you wouldn't approve——"

"Of him?"

"Oh, no. You'd like him." She felt Kitty was smiling. "But you'd think I was acting foolish. And I was. Oh, Kitty—I was such a fool." She stopped. No time for that. "He went to New York last night and I have to reach him. I've been calling hotels all day. Johnny thought of phoning you. If you could call hotels I haven't called. And I have a number in Rye."

"If I find him, what do I say?" Kitty made it sound so simple.

Mathilda hadn't thought what she would say, finding him had been such a hopeless thing. "Tell him—oh, just tell him to call me. Just say I want to get in touch with him right away. Oh, Kitty, I was such a complete fool."

"Just a minute. Hold on."

Silence. Then, "Tilda?" Her knees collapsed. Every nerve in her body responded, but her voice would not come. "Tilda, Kitty says you have been trying to reach me." There was tenderness in his tone, but caution.

She forced an answer. "I just wanted to talk to you, Anders—I wanted you to come back. I made a mistake—I——"

"Shall I come back tonight?" A schoolboy's voice now, as though he would take a flying leap through the phone. "I'll take the next plane."

"Oh, Anders, I think trains are safer."

He laughed. "My darling!" Three hundred miles away it was as if he kissed her.

They GRIP HOLD STAY AT WORK OR PLAY

FOR EVERY HAIRSTYLE

CLEAN HAIR in 10 minutes WITHOUT WATER

★ No soap • No rinsing • No drying
★ Removes oil, dirt, hair odors
★ Retains wave; restores sheen
★ Grand between water shampoos
★ Ideal during colds and illness

30 SHAMPOOS WITH MITT 1.00 Plus tax.
At all good drug and department stores.

MINIPOO DRY SHAMPOO

COSMETIC DISTRIBUTORS, INC., NEW YORK 17, N.Y.

Is yours an Allergic Skin?

In cosmetics, too, physicians know best. Ask your doctor about AR-EX Cosmetics. At leading drug stores. Write for FREE BOOKLET: "New Facts on Skin Care"

AR-EX Cosmetics
FOR SENSITIVE SKINS

AR-EX COSMETICS, INC., 1036-AA W. Van Buren St., Chicago 7, Ill.

STITCH-UP DRESSES

Latest styles . . . Remarkable savings . . . ALREADY CUT OUT and marked for easy stitching up . . . Complete with all trimmings . . . All sizes, styles, fabrics.

SAVE UP TO $5.00 PER DRESS

FREE NEW STYLE BOOK. Write today EMPIRE COMPANY, Dept. 16-RM, 212 Wilson Ave., Jefferson, Iowa.

Before they finished breakfast Anders was t the door. He had followed the milkman p the path and had the two bottles in his and—a fact that would confuse Aunt Ada or the rest of her life.

Johnny ran out and leaped on him. "Did ou bring that duck?"

"I don't think we need any cream," Aunt ada said.

"If you can't spare a duck it would be all ight, because I might find a wounded bird omeday."

"Why, it's Mr. Zorn. You haven't been delivering our milk before, have you?"

"And of course wounded birds can't swim, o I won't need a pond."

He stood in the dining-room door, nonensical talk all about, breakfast-table dishes, alf-empty coffee cups. Johnny's eggy dish, melting butter, crumbs. No stars, no waves, o velvet night. She looked up, their eyes held—what could a romantic setting add to what they said?

"Won't you have some coffee, Mr. Zorn? Set another place, Mathilda."

She couldn't—she couldn't move. She didn't dare speak. Happiness makes you drunk—you do foolish things.

Anders pulled up a chair and sat at the table with great self-possession. Johnny would have his duck that very day, he said. He took neither coffee nor cream in his sugar, e told Aunt Ada. Laughed and corrected. So he was drunk too.

"Kitty is coming tonight, Tilda," he said. "She thought there might be something happening here she would not want to miss."

With her brain whirling, she forced a remark that would sound normal. "You liked Kitty, didn't you?"

He nodded. "I went to her in blackest despair. I [illegible] and you phoned. How could I not like her?" He smiled. "She said to tell you, if she had known what was in the package ——"

"In the package?"

"Or box, perhaps. If she had known what was in the box, she would have kicked you off the cover long ago. Does that make sense?"

Mathilda laughed. "A little."

"She also said she would be flower girl, but that unfortunately she could not carry Johnny's favorite flower because it is now out of season. Johnny, what is your favorite flower?"

"Oh, she means roses," Mathilda said quickly. "Johnny loves roses."

"No, I don't," Johnny said. "I think she means bleeding heart."

"Oh, my dear," Anders said softly.

"Are you going to be bringing the milk every morning?" Aunt Ada asked.

"Can we go get the duck now?"

"No, Johnny, not now. The duck will come later. Your mother and I are going for a ride. I have something to tell her, she has something to tell me, and we have much to plan. Kitty can be here only a few days," he explained to Mathilda.

Mathilda looked up at him. "But, Anders—you don't mean—in a few days ——"

"I do mean just that. Inky and Gunnar are leaving. And I am a stubborn cruel man. Aren't you afraid?" he asked her.

She took the hand he held out and followed him out the door. "Not a bit," she said. "Not the least bit in the world. Not of anything, ever again."

(THE END)

THE RIGHT WORD

(Continued from Page 23)

and a hired girl did every speck of work while his father and mother did exactly as they pleased. The book slid unheeded from his knees. Why, all he had to do to make his parents rich was to find out about these herbs and things and go see Mr. Parvin, who ran the drugstore, and maybe make a deal with him. Probably no time at all after that before big-city druggists would be hearing of him, Laurence John Wall, and sending in big orders.

His father's shadow fell across his warm bare legs. "Nice lot of wood you got chopped there," his father said in a voice of ominous quiet. "Ought to be pretty proud of yourself, big boy like you, lolling in the sun like a lazy tramp while your mother waits for wood and works to feed you."

He could feel his blood rush into his face as he got to his feet; feel a hideous choking lump come into his throat. A lazy tramp. He picked up the ax and a log of wood and began to chop into it blindly. He had been going to make them rich and his father had called him a lazy tramp. But he couldn't tell his father that because he didn't even seem like his father any more. He went on chopping, winking back his tears, as his father walked away with the book beneath his arm, placing a distance between them.

That was long years ago, but he could still remember and he probably always would. That day his father had said too much, too hard. And no matter how they tried, neither he nor his father had ever managed to shorten that unspoken distance between them. But if his father had come back that day, if he had said just one right word —— Kids, he thought. Queer little packages. Never really knew what they had inside them.

The train pulled into the terminal and Larry walked slowly through the crowds to the telephone booths in the waiting room. He stood for a moment staring at the telephones. I hate my father. Kid stuff, of course, but all the same —— It would have been a different matter altogether if John had been the one to say a thing like that. John howled his hurts right out of his system and forgot them. But not Eileen. More times than not she fought back tears. He could see himself, worse luck, in Eileen; and while he knew he loved both kids and could never have chosen between them, he also knew that Eileen made pulp of his heart as John never did.

His hand went into his trouser pocket and he drew out a handful of change. The thing to do was to call her up; talk to her. He jingled the coins in the palm of his hand. Easy enough to say "talk to her," but what would he say? What could you say to an eight-year-old that would make her understand? Maybe he could just say he was sorry and let it go at that. But merely saying he was sorry wouldn't be enough. Empty, just saying you were sorry. Something special was what he needed. But what? You couldn't let yourself spill over to a kid, and after all he was her father. His eyes strayed nervously to the station clock. If he called at all, he'd better snap into it. Maybe he could wait till tonight, take her something. [illegible] Maybe if he talked to Mae, let her fix it for him; but no, that wouldn't do either. It was Eileen he had to talk to and he knew it. Whoever heard of such a thing? he thought desperately. Here he was in an absolute sweat over calling up his own child! He studied the handful of change and his face suddenly brightened. He had it! The very thing. He knew what he could tell her; knew exactly: All he had to say was that he'd seen a nuthatch from the train window. She'd know by that that he'd been thinking of her, that he hadn't forgotten. Relieved and relaxed, he dialed his number. Mae answered.

"Look," he said, "get Eileen to the phone, will you?"

"Eileen?" Mae repeated blankly. Then after a moment her voice warmed and lowered and she drew him over into their world, the children's and hers. "Darling," she said, "I'm glad you called. Just wait a moment, will you? She's still upstairs."

I saw a nuthatch from the train window. I saw a —— Yes, that would do it.

"Hello," Eileen said.

But when he heard her voice, small and reluctant, unsteady still with tears, he forgot about the nuthatch and the right words came.

"Eileen," he said, "it's your daddy calling."

Can hands that wash dishes be "exquisite...fragile"?—They can!

No matter how hard your hands must work . . . Pacquins Hand Cream can help give them a lady-of-leisure look! Use Pacquins several times a day . . . this snowy fragrant cream will quickly ease away roughness, redness, and dryness. Your hands will soon look softer, smoother, and whiter. Yes, they'll have a "made for luxury and love" look!

Pacquins was originally made for doctors and nurses...

If you think your hands take a beating . . . consider doctors and nurses who scrub their hands in hot soapy water 30 to 40 times a day. Pacquins Hand Cream, super-rich in skin-softening ingredients, was first made for their professional use. If Pacquins can do so much for them . . . just imagine how it can help your hard-working hands.

Pacquins
HAND CREAM
Creamy-smooth . . . not sticky, not greasy. More hands use Pacquins than any other hand cream in the world.
Pacquins
HAND CREAM

AT ANY DRUG, DEPARTMENT, OR TEN-CENT STORE

Prize luncheons make for prize-winning bridge. And even the hostess (that's Mrs. Teague serving) can enjoy these party recipes for the really well-planned luncheon.

Conversation Piece

BY RUTH MILLS TEAGUE

Apricot-Sponge Camilla with golden egg-yolk filling and a wreath of grapes. Could there be a better incentive for the very best bridge?

PHOTOS BY STUART

BRIDGE is a social but not a very sociable game—that is, if you take it seriously, as most bridge players do; and yet a bridge party should be a gay and convivial affair. The coziest plan is to precede the game with lunch; enough good food to be just right but not too much, all the good chatter you want and you're ready to sharpen your wits, deal out the cards and go to it.

I think most of us will agree to the excellence of this formula, but many of us are stopped by the "it's just too much trouble, what with no help and so on" attitude. So let's plan a bridge luncheon—two tables is my choice—that will leave the hostess as bright and merry as her seven guests.

"Do everything the day before" is, of course, a must in this case. One o'clock comes pretty early in the day, and house, tables, food and yourself must be ready when the doorbell rings. But that's no problem with this menu—and here it is.

Avocado-salad ring, to be served either as a first course or with the hot dish. It's a mold of avocado that really tastes like avocado because there's little else in it. The center is filled with grated carrots and French dressing and the salad is served with a piquant sour-cream-and-shrimp dressing. Very special, if I do say so.

Poulet en Casserole will be the main dish, a creamy blend of chicken, mushrooms and sauce. A border of grilled toast points will provide the what-to-eat-it-on. For a soupçon of bread to go with it we'll have thin-as-paper Melba-toast curls, and very good they are.

(Continued on Page 112)

For a designing woman: mushrooms artfully arranged on a chicken casserole; curled Melbas and an avocado super salad.

"Hello Darling!"

I've just seen something marvelous

"Hello, John!
I've been looking at silverplate patterns
...and guess what, honey?
You were right as usual... modern,
they showed me all kinds.
And did you know John,
there is a kind of silverplate that just wears,
and wears, and wears?
... ...no John, it's not the reinforced or extraplated kind.
It's the silverplate that's Sterling Inlaid
...and darling!
wait till you see my pattern.
It's Youth. You'll adore it!
... ...why John, you darling...
here's one for you, too
...bye, bye!"

Something Marvelous: [illegible] backs of the bowls and the handles. Like this!

HOLMES & EDWARDS
STERLING INLAID° SILVERPLATE

HERE AND HERE
It's Sterling Inlaid

IMPORTANT: [illegible] few [illegible] that has not raised its price since the war! Fifty-two piece service, eight place settings... only $68.50 with chest. Tax Free). Three favorite patterns now on display at most [illegible] counters.

DANISH PRINCESS YOUTH LOVELY LADY

Copyright 1947, The International Silver Company, Holmes & Edwards Div., Meriden, Conn. Sold in Canada by: The T. Eaton Co., Ltd., °Reg. U. S. Pat. Off.

BUTTERED TOAST!
3 TREATS ... BETTER WITH BUTTER
Now! try these easy ways to Glorify Toast
Golden Butter goodness—for morning, noon or night!
GOLDEN BUBBLE FRENCH TOAST—To your favorite fritter batter, add 2 tablespoons melted Butter. Moisten (don't soak) bread in batter. Fry in Butter. Serve piping hot, generously Buttered. Bubbly, golden-crusty edges glorify appearance—just as Butter glorifies taste! Try it!
BUTTERED TOAST—Serve it "Buttered all over." For variety, spread with creamed Butter and honey. Good! Um-m-m-m. Good!
MILK TOAST—Serve hot ... in hot dishes ... with Butter in the Milk, and on the toast. It takes Butter to give toast that
IT'S BETTER WITH BUTTER
ADA is an association for nation-wide promotion, advertising and research activities supported by America's dairy farmers.
"Voice of the Dairy Farmer"
AMERICAN DAIRY ASSOCIATION
20 N. WACKER DRIVE

(Continued from Page 110)

The dessert, Apricot-Sponge Camilla, not too rich, and good as it is beautiful—two assets not to be ignored when planning a bridge-luncheon dessert. It's a combination of apricots, golden sauce and pale green grapes.

There's a lot to be said on the service end of this party, so we'd better move on to recipes—and a full-orchestra cooking day, as you'll see.

AVOCADO RING

This should be prepared the day before. For a fairly large ring mold you will need 4 cups of mashed avocado. Select ripe, dark-green fruit: the number needed will depend on their size. Cut in half and remove pulp with a spoon, scraping the bottom of the shell thoroughly. This is a better method than peeling, because it insures getting every bit of the bright green pulp next to the skin. Sprinkle at once with 4 tablespoons lemon juice. Press first through a ricer and then through a fine sieve.

Soak 3 tablespoons gelatin in ½ cup cold water. Add 1¼ cups boiling water, stir until gelatin is dissolved and chill until it begins to congeal. Blend gelatin mixture with avocado and add 2 teaspoons salt, 1 teaspoon sugar, ⅛ teaspoon cayenne pepper and 3 tablespoons onion juice. Set in refrigerator until partly congealed, beat for three minutes with rotary beater and add ¾ cup mayonnaise. Now taste for seasoning and add more if needed. The mixture shouldn't be flat, but it should taste like avocado, and that's a pretty delicate taste. And, too, remember it's to be served with a highly seasoned sour-cream dressing. If the mixture isn't a soft lovely green add a drop or two of green vegetable coloring. Pour in greased ring mold, or individual molds, and set in refrigerator.

> What a man does not understand he does not possess.
>
> —From Maxims and Reflections of Goethe, Translated by Bailey Saunders. (Published by the Macmillan Company)

CARROTS

The day before, grate enough bright orange carrots to fill the center of the mold, wrap loosely in a towel with several ice cubes and store in refrigerator. Just before you arrange salad, dry carrots and toss with French dressing.

SOUR CREAM-AND-SHRIMP DRESSING

Rub a small mixing bowl well with garlic and pour into it 1 pint heavy sour cream. Add ½ cup catchup, 2 tablespoons Worcestershire sauce, 1½ tablespoons grated onion, 1 teaspoon salt, 2 tablespoons horse-radish—cream variety if possible—1 teaspoon paprika, 1 tablespoon lemon juice and ¼ teaspoon dry mustard. Stir until blended, but don't beat, and add ½ pound—or more—frozen shrimp cut into pieces. Fresh cooked or canned shrimp may be used. Set in refrigerator ready for use the next day.

To serve the salad, turn out the mold on a chilled platter, fill center with grated carrots and garnish outside with plenty of crisp salad greens. Serve the dressing in a bowl, or spoon it into a border on the outside of the avocado ring. The salad can be arranged an hour or more ahead of time if it spends that hour or more in the refrigerator. The salad plates should be there, too, or outdoors where they'll get good and cold—but you know that.

POULET EN CASSEROLE

Cut 2 large chickens, roasters preferably, into pieces. Cover with 7 cups boiling water, bring to a boil and add 1 carrot, 2 stalks celery with leaves, 1 clove garlic, 1½ teaspoons salt, 2 envelopes chicken bouillon powder and 1 teaspoon gourmet powder. If you can't get gourmet powder, substitute an extra envelope of bouillon powder. When the mixture again comes to a brisk boil, lower the heat and let the chicken cook gently until very tender—about three hours. Add a little water from time to time to keep the water level about as it was when cooking started. Remove chicken, strain broth and set in cold place to let fat rise to the top.

Separate chicken from bones, fat and gristle and break or cut into fairly large pieces, not cubes. Slice 1½ pounds mushrooms, but save 8 of the best-looking caps for the top of your casserole. Melt a little butter or margarine in an iron skillet and put in the 8 fancy caps upside down. When they are golden brown remove, add the sliced mushrooms and sauté for ten minutes. Drain them into the bowl of chicken pieces. (We're saving dishes.)

Into the same skillet put 4 tablespoons butter or margarine and cook until slightly brown—a light yellow-brown—and blend in 5 tablespoons flour. Add 4 cups chicken broth, all fat removed, 1 tablespoon fresh sweet basil leaves, finely chopped, or 1 teaspoon dried sweet basil, a pinch of cayenne pepper, ½ teaspoon freshly ground black pepper and ½ cup heavy cream or undiluted evaporated milk. When mixture has thickened, remove from fire and add 4 egg yolks beaten until light in ½ cup broth. (If you like a wine flavor in the sauce you may use ½ cup Madeira or sherry wine instead of broth.)

Mix sauce with chicken and mushrooms and taste for seasoning. Pour into casserole, top with mushroom caps, put cover on and keep in cold place until next day.

GRILLED TOAST POINTS

Remove crusts from 5 medium-thin slices of bread. Cut each slice into 4 even squares, then cut diagonally across each little square to make 2 triangles. Thus 5 slices of bread will make 40 triangles. What arithmetic! Grill the points slowly in a little butter or margarine until they are a strong golden brown on both sides. Set aside for next day.

Along toward noon the day of the party put the covered casserole in a 400°F. oven. When chicken is piping hot, reduce oven to very low temperature, arrange toast points in a spiked border around rim of casserole and return to oven until ready to serve.

MELBA-TOAST CURLS

Make these the day before and let them spend the last ten minutes in the oven with the casserole. Cut day-old bread into the thinnest possible slices and remove crusts. Spread lightly with butter or margarine that has been creamed until soft. Then roll over two diagonally opposite corners a little past the middle, the way napkins sometimes are folded, and pin them in this napkin position with a toothpick. Place on a cooky sheet and toast under broiler, but not too close to it, until brown on both sides, and leave in a low oven until completely dry. Remove toothpicks while toast is still warm.

APRICOT-SPONGE CAMILLA

With this dessert you'll have to start the night before the day before. Cover 1 pound dried apricots with cold water and let them stand overnight. Get fancy fruit for this if you can, but the variety found in the average grocery store is all right. The next morning, boil them gently with cover on until they are swollen and very tender. Strain off and reserve juice and press fruit through a fine-meshed sieve.

Soak 2 tablespoons unflavored gelatin in ½ cup cold water, add 1 cup boiling apricot juice, 1 cup boiling orange juice and 3 tablespoons sugar, and stir until gelatin is dissolved. Combine this mixture with apricot pulp, add 4 tablespoons lemon juice and 1 cup marshmallow whip, and when thoroughly blended beat with rotary beater a minute or two. Chill and fold in 1 cup heavy cream, whipped until stiff. Rinse a bowl with cold water, pour in apricot sponge and place in refrigerator.

GOLDEN SAUCE

In top of double boiler melt 3 tablespoons butter or margarine, add 2 tablespoons flour and stir until blended. Add slowly 1 cup boiling water, stirring constantly, ¾ cup sugar, a pinch of salt and 2 teaspoons vanilla extract (2 inches of vanilla bean may be used, but should be removed after the sauce is cooked). Place pan over boiling water and stir until thick. Take double boiler from heat, add well-

(Continued on Page 114)

It's the New All-American Drink!

BLENDED
ORANGE AND GRAPEFRUIT JUICE

Taste it...
Just taste it TODAY!

ver until now have you tasted such a blend—such a rich and combination of two delectable juices. Never until now have t such a refreshing drink trickle down your throat. It is Blended e and Grapefruit Juice—the juice of Florida's favorite fruits heir flavors intermingled.

l best of all, this healthful juice—extra rich in vitamin C—a helping hand in building health every time you drink a glassful. drink so healthful, so easy to serve, so inexpensively priced and cious to drink, that this tempting blend is bound to become the te drink in your home!

Try ALL these delicious Florida Juices and Fruits

Canned Grapefruit Juice

•

Canned Orange Juice

•

Canned Grapefruit Sections

•

Canned Tangerine Juice

● FLORIDA CITRUS COMMISSION · Lakeland, Florida

Just open the can and pour!

A HELPING HAND in saving time, trouble, and cash . . . and in fighting infections, colds and fatigue with abundant VITAMIN C.

Canned

FLORIDA ORANGE-GRAPEFRUIT
BLENDED JUICE

(Continued from Page 112)

beaten yolks of 5 eggs and beat with rotary beater a couple of minutes. Cool, and when very cold fold in 1 cup cream beaten until stiff and, if you like, 3 or 4 tablespoons of good brandy. (Note: Obviously an angel-food cake is indicated in the near future. We've been mighty gay with our egg yolks.)

But we aren't through with this dessert. A large bunch of pale green grapes is involved. If you peel the grapes—I think it improves them—sprinkle with a little lemon juice.

Now we're ready for arrangement. Turn the sponge onto a serving platter and make a deep indentation in the center. A small wet bowl is handy for this operation. Now take a spatula and push the sponge around until you've made a nice big hole in the center for the sauce. Don't make it look too much like a mold. The crater of a volcano is more or less the idea. Use the grapes for decoration—maybe a border and clusters running up the sides of the mound of sponge. The grapes will stick wherever you place them, so go to it and make a lovely sight of your Apricot-Sponge Camilla. If you prefer to have it already served in compotes, do the same thing on a smaller scale.

Service. Here we have a wide choice. This can be a sit-down meal, of course, with all eight at one table. Or we could follow the pattern of seating everyone at card tables and bringing plates in from the kitchen already filled. But we're going to be pretty stationary all afternoon, and I think it's more fun to work out some sort of buffet service which will be gay, informal and, incidentally, give everyone a chance to see these food arrangements you've cooked up. There's no getting around it—seeing beautiful food glorifies the eating of it. Why does an expert waiter bring an especially fine roast or bird or whatever to the table, remove the cover with a stylish flourish and let all have a good look before he takes it aside for carving? Well, you know and so do I.

If you have a tea cart, arrange the food on it and place it between the two tables. It can be wheeled from one table to the other, you can do the serving or each guest can serve herself. Or you could move a serving table into the living room, arrange the food on it and let everyone serve herself. In both these cases the card tables would be set up with linen, silver, water goblets and so on. But you could dispense with table setting entirely and have your living room free of clutter when guests arrive. The buffet could be set up in the dining room, the meal could be served in three courses, salad first, and conversational groups could form at will.

Whatever method you choose, if you plan carefully and follow through, there'll be no luck involved in making your luncheon a complete success. As for luck at the bridge table, you should be in fine form to deal with it as it comes.

TIMEPIECES

(Continued from Page 53)

Variety at teatime. I suppose a tea table is capable of more whims and fancies in the way of food than anything else in the world. Cakes and cookies; tarts and turnovers and sandwiches—all as appropriate to the time and the table as an apron at a barbecue.

Sweet things and those that are anything but sweet, all will fade away in less time than it takes to say "butter," especially if you're holding forth at an open-house tea party. You'll find out if you don't have a lot. So have a lot, of all the kinds you choose; and now I shall give you the ways and means to some little sweet and not-so-sweet things that Sarah and Polly may not know about. Then you'll hear some oh's and ah's. And that should be music to your ears.

EGG-AND-AVOCADO SANDWICHES

For 3 dozen small sandwiches.

Buy unsliced bread the day before. Fresh bread doesn't slice so easily. Slice thinly.

Before Buying Yo

NEW RANGE

Harper Center Simmer Burners a superior to all other top burners beca each Harper burner is really 2 burners i As shown in diagram, the big outer bur brings foods to a quick boil. Turn han until it "clicks" and the big burner goes o leaving only the small, efficient inner bur lit to finish the cooking.

Only the separate Harper Center Simr gives you the controlled low heats you n to keep foods warm for serving . . . eliminate pot watching and boiling dr to allow cooking with little water, wh saves time and gas and keeps the aver kitchen 9 degrees cooler. Only the Har separate Center Simmer can help you much in your cooking.

Insist on Harper Burners!

18 Leading Gas Ranges are Harper Equ*

HARPER-WYMAN COMPANY, CHICAG

HANDY HELPER'S

What mends a dollar when it's torn,
Or reinforces papers worn?
What holds the pieces where they're matched
Without obscuring what is patched?

JINGLE QUIZ No

Dennison

TRANSPARENT MENDING TA

At Stationery Departments Everywh

THE MELVILLE CO., Dept. 4276, CINCINNATI

FREE! AMERICA'S Most Beautiful

SEED AND NURSERY B

Pictures newest, choicest flowers, roses, shrubs trees, fruits, seeds, etc. Natural colors. saving offers. First quality guaranteed sto

INTER-STATE NURSER

517 E. STREET HAMBURG.

KVP Dusting PAPE

2 hard-cooked eggs fine. Add ... of lemon juice, a pinch of salt, ... of pepper and 1 tablespoon of mayonnaise to make the whole thing spreadable. ... add 2 tablespoons of finely ... do. Add another tablespoon of mayonnaise if the spread seems too dry. Cut ... read into small 1½ inch rounds. ... nters out of half the rounds. (Think ... dear old doughnut cutter right now.) ... d circles with soft butter or margarine. Put together with the filling. Keep ... covered with a damp cloth. Just before serving garnish the top openings with ... strips of avocado or small sprigs of ... y.

PISTACHIO-CHEESE SANDWICHES

For 3 dozen small sandwiches.

... ½ package of cream cheese, add 2 ... poons of sieved blue cheese and a ... of salt. Thin, so it will spread, with ... e cream. These are open-faced sand... s, and smiling ones too. Use any ... cutter for the thinly sliced bread. ... d with softened butter, then the ... e. Sprinkle with finely chopped pista... nuts (and if pistachio nuts aren't ..., some nuts will be—all good) and ... h, if you please, with strips of pi... o.

BRAZIL CHIPS

... r ½ pound of shelled Brazil nuts ... ater. Simmer 4 minutes. Drain well. ... thin lengthwise slices with a sharp ... The cooking softens the nuts so ... an be sliced without crumbling. ... them out in a shallow pan and dot ... or 2 table... s of butter or ... rine. Sprinkle ... alt. Toast in ... derate oven, ..., until light ... and crisp. ... on absorbent

CORNETS

... 3 dozen cor...

... 1 egg till very ... Add ¼ cup of ... ittle by little, ... well after ... ddition until ... hick. Sift to... ⅓ cup of flour, ... oon of baking ... and a pinch of salt. Fold into the ... ixture. Flavor with a few drops of ... flavoring. Drop by teaspoons on ... eased cooky sheets, several inches ... (The cookies, not the cooky sheets.) ... n a moderately hot oven, 375° F., ... 5 minutes. Loosen from the sheet ... spatula and, while hot, roll them ... at one end, pinching together with ... ers to resemble a horn or lily shape. ... become too crisp to roll, put them ... n the oven a minute or two and ... soften up for rolling. (And they'd ... roll, or else.) Cool on a rack. Make ... butter icing or hard sauce, using ... ioners' sugar flavored with lemon. ... red sugar is just as good.) Start ... tablespoons of butter or margarine, ... cup of confectioners' sugar and a ... rated lemon rind. Put a little of the ... the hollow of each cornet. Garnish ... ttle pieces of candied cherry.

EATIME JELLY ROLLS

... 2 eggs in a bowl, add ... teaspoon ... ng powder and a pinch of salt. Place ... smaller bowl of hot water and beat ... s until light. Add 6 tablespoons of ... gradually until mixture becomes ... nd light-colored. Remove the bowl ... er the hot water. Fold in 6 table... of cake flour and add ... teaspoon ... lla. Turn into a greased shallow ... ll pan, lined with well-greased wax ... Spread evenly. Bake in a moderate ... 50° F., about 9 minutes. Turn ... ... at once onto wax paper sprinkled ... onfectioners' sugar. Remove ... and cut off the crisp edges of the ... ect of cake. Cut the cake into ... rs. Spread each quarter thinly with ... elly. Roll up. (Have you tried that ... plum yet?) Cover with a cloth. ... Chill and slice when it is needed.

...one bakes fruitcake. ... ...dy bakes a fruitcake—or more than ... r the holidays. Can you ...

DEAR ME

Probably even the saintliest of us swears unknowingly. Although the mild-mannered and God-fearing cleric who says "Dear me" may not be aware of it, he is none the less guilty of swearing. The expression is derived from a corruption of an Italian phrase, "Dio mio!" literally, My God!

—DAVID T. ARMSTRONG.

... ...ing one ... ...

"My right arm could be pensioned," says Mama since S.O.S., the magic cleanser, does my clean-up chores

"Tie one hand behind me," says Mama, "then give me S.O.S.—and I'll have those blackened pots shining like new in a hurry. Easy as easy. For with magic S.O.S., no matter how crusted your aluminum may be, burned-on food goes, shine comes!"

Look for the YELLOW and RED package

"My favorite helper on the sink-shift," says Mama, "is S.O.S. It's a complete cleanser. It's handy, thrifty, husky and fast. It has soap in the pad. I use it on dull aluminum —dullness goes, shine comes!"

"No more overtime," says Mama. "No more struggling with old-style dishrags and gadgets. Just S.O.S. for me! It cleans, scours and polishes in one simple operation. A dip, a rub, a rinse—grease goes, shine comes!"

S.O.S the magic cleanser of pots and pans

The S. O. S. Company, Chicago, Illinois, U. S. A. • S. O. S. Mfg. Co. of Canada, Ltd., Toronto, Ont.

(Continued from Page 115)

d as popular at your New Year supper as e new parson at the Ladies' Aid.

To strike the right note

AVIAR EGGS "ON THE HOUR"

Stuff the eggs with a well-seasoned yolk ixture beaten up with mayonnaise, to hich plenty of chopped onion has been dded. Cover each half with a layer of red black caviar. (You remember that so-lled red caviar is just salmon roe. But 't's call it caviar.) The clock business is ade from fine toothpick-width strips of ard-cooked-egg whites. Follow the pat-rn—you can't go wrong.

BAKED-HAM GLACÉ

Bake the ham as usual. Take off the skin nd score the fat while hot. Stud with oves and glaze as you always do, but don't se brown sugar. Use a light sirup. I think pricot sirup such as is used here is about ps. You have to add enough sugar to boil own to a glazing thickness, around ⅔ cup sugar to the sirup from a can of fruit, nd boil 5 minutes. Baste the ham with e glaze as it bakes for 30 minutes in oderate oven. It will catch on. Now ill the ham as cold as can be—and that eans chilled like all get out—or it won't ke the aspic glaze. You'll do all this the y before, or maybe even two days before. hat is, if you are wise you will.

Aspic Glaze: Now r the aspic glaze use nned consommé. it's the condensed nd, take 2 cans and lute it with 2 cans water. And add salt, epper and a little orcestershire sauce. ave it well seasoned. oup is soup—it's a am you're dealing ith now. Heat to a oil. Soften 2 enve-pes of unflavored elatin in 6 table-oons of cold water. dd to the hot con-mmé and stir un-l it is all dissolved. ool to a thick sirup. our the first coating ver the ham by oonfuls. Put the am back in the re-igerator to chill. eep your aspic at oom temperature. (If should get to mak-g jelly by itself. aping ahead of you, hy, just put the bowl a pan of warm water. That'll learn it to ehave itself and stay pourable.) From me to time as the aspic "sets" on the am, add another coating. Keep this up ntil you get a real winter overcoat on your am. Decorate the ham to fit your taste nd hold the decorating in place with nore coatings of aspic. And keep up that illing business or you'll eat the decora-ons, aspic and all, with your best silver oup spoons. So—chill it. When you serve he ham, chop up all the leftover aspic nd garnish the platter with it.

hese for company. To go along with the am, in all its glory, there ha to be something ot, best in a chafing dish. For my money, ve me a fine oyster stew or a great dish of calloped or fried oysters. Or creamed ysters with oyster crabs. But I have written many words on all these things, that this me I've branched right out and gone in for uite another kettle of fish, as they say. And very appropriate saying it is too.

SMOKED FISH AND SHRIMPS

Soak 1 large smoked finnan haddie over-ight in water enough to cover. Drain and oach in milk until tender. Drain again nd flake the fish, removing the bones and kin. Also cook and shell 4 pounds of hrimps. Mix the fish with a good rich ream sauce and season to taste. Serve ery hot with biscuits or in patty shells.

Just a small thing. But very good, I do ssure you.

HORSE-RADISH APRICOTS

Use the drained canned whole apricots. Remove the pits without completely split-ting the fruit in two. Drain and stuff with—well, guess! Horse-radish and such, of course. Add 2 tablespoons of horse-radish to 1 package of cream cheese. Add a little sugar, salt and pepper to taste, then stuff. And these, my dears, are good at any meal, with any meat. I love fruit with meat, anyway, don't you?

Now the dessert. Come to think of it, there has to be a dessert. No dinner, no supper is half the meal it ought to be, if the last course turns out to be the tail end of the vegetables or something. There's only one reason for such goings on. One, I mean, that ought to be accepted and glossed over by the honest and tactful guest. That is when the dessert is a soufflé and has gone to the bottom of the dish, flat as a flounder. The other—if there is another—excuse for dessertless dinner is that the cook has packed and left right after the string beans were passed. Only commiseration is indicated here.

Well—where is that dessert? Right here—and right good too!

PINEAPPLE-COCONUT TORTE

Cream ⅔ cup of shortening with 1 cup of sugar until very light and fluffy. Add 3 egg yolks, beaten until thick and lemon-colored. Mix very well. Flavor with 1 teaspoon of vanilla, or you can use part lemon or almond flavoring. Sift 1¾ cups of cake flour with 2 teaspoons of baking powder and ¼ teaspoon of salt. Add alternately to egg mixture with 6 tablespoons of pineapple juice. Spread into three pans, well greased and floured. Use kind that have slip bottoms. Now make the meringue: Beat 3 egg whites with ¼ teaspoon of salt until they hold a peak. Add 1 cup of sugar a spoonful at a time, until the meringue will hold its shape. Keep up the beating. Add 1 teaspoon of vanilla. Now add ⅔ cup of dry coconut—don't use the moist—and fold it in. Spread the meringue over the cake batter. Sprinkle 1⅓ cups coconut over the top. Bake in a moderate oven, 350° F., for about 35 minutes. Cool a few minutes and remove from the pans onto a rack. When really cool, put the layers together with a pineapple filling.

And this is the filling, and I will tell you just how it is made—thuswise:

The Filling: Heat a large can of crushed pineapple. Mix ½ cup of sugar and 3 tablespoons of cornstarch and ¼ teaspoon of salt. Stir into the hot pineapple and cook, stirring until thick and clear. Beat 2 egg yolks slightly. Add the hot mixture to the eggs. Stir well, put back on the heat one minute, stirring constantly. Remove from the heat and add 1 tablespoon of lemon juice. Cool and chill before putting between the layers of the cake.

So to time. As the years move along, what sadness can there be? Does one hate to grow old—or wonder what the years have done in achievement and in happiness? The clocks strike the passing hours. The seasons come and go and come again. The moments of our joys and sorrows are ephemeral. We can treasure them or let them go. They are ours only while they last and we remember them.

These are very old thoughts—and very long thoughts. We cannot see their end. But the brand-new year is here—the cycle is completed once more. Like the smell of soft leather in the firelight of a high dim room, the indefinable grace of a day that is gone assails us. And with all this, once more I wish you a glad, gay, Happy New Year. Don't make too many resolutions. Bet you won't keep them.

I sometimes think mothers get more pity than they require: There is much talk lately about how difficult it is to bear a child, and too little talk about how nice it is to have one. If babies were not worth the pains and confinements they cause, there would not have been a billion of them born in the past hundred years. Motherhood is never honored by excessive talk about the heroics of pregnancy.

—LEONARD FEENEY, S. J.:
The Leonard Feeney Omnibus.
(Sheed & Ward).

The best way that a man could test his readiness and encounter the common variety of mankind would be to climb down a chimney at random, and get on as well as possible with the people inside. And that is essentially what each one of us did on the day that he was born.

—G. K. CHESTERTON.

---

create beauty for your home with

BUCILLA imported needlepoint

Enjoy the fascinating art of needlepoint and create that rare, exciting beauty in your own home. Ask for dozens of lovely embroidered Bucilla imported needlepoint designs. All complete. And all with the background and Bucilla Tapestry Wool. Fine, tough, vibrant wool worthy of these exquisite creations. At the art needlework counter of your favorite store. Bucilla Products, 63 Fifth Ave., New York 3, N. Y.

Burpee Gigantic ZINNIAS

75¢ PACKET FOR 10¢

You'll have the largest and most colorful Zinnias you have ever seen—up to 6½ inches across!

Unsurpassed giant blooms in rich pastels and brilliant hues—apricot, peach, salmon, rose, pink, lavender, yellow, orange, buff, scarlet, etc.—some in two-tone harmonies. The sturdy plants will grow 3 ft. tall, well-branched.

Some have curled petals, like chrysanthemums. Striking in the garden, wonderful for bouquets. Grown on Burpee's Floradale Farms.

Very Easy to Grow

Just plant the seeds outdoors in spring when soil has become warm, and you will have a lovely garden all summer and fall.

SPECIAL—This Big 75c-Pkt. Seeds postpaid for just 10c—

Send Dime Today!

Burpee Seed Catalog FREE See the amazing new Burpee Double Snapdragons, more new flowers, more Burpee Hybrid Vegetables. 128 pages, hundreds of pictures, many in natural color. Send postcard or coupon right away!

Burpee Seeds Grow

W. Atlee Burpee Co.
425 Burpee Building Philadelphia 32, Pa. OR 425 Burpee Building Clinton, Iowa

ORDER DIRECT FROM THIS AD

W. ATLEE BURPEE CO.
425 Burpee Building, Philadelphia 32, Pa. or Clinton, Iowa

☐ Send 75c-Pkt. Burpee's Gigantic Zinnias (No. 3235) postpaid. Enclosed is 10c.

Name

St. or R.D.

P.O. & State

☐ Send Burpee's Seed Catalog FREE.

take time off!

... and really scrutinize your skin. Are tiny lines and wrinkles telling your age? To help you gain back a younger, softer bloom, Helena Rubinstein blends her ESTROGENIC HORMONE CREAM— blends it with the science and high art that have made her famous throughout the world. ESTROGENIC HORMONE CREAM contains an active, natural ingredient which your skin absorbs (the equivalent of a substance rich in young skins, but decreasing as you grow older). Each night, smooth on this silky cream. By the time you're ready for your second jar, you'll notice a rewarding change—a younger look!

[illegible] HORMONE CREAM 3.50

[illegible] HORMONE OIL (so rapidly absorbed you [illegible] skin) to feed the cells day and night

[illegible] treatment 5.00 plus tax

helena rubinstein

[illegible] • [illegible] • LONDON

LAWRENCEBURG VERDICT

(Continued from Page 6)

of course, be entrusted for any solution it is likely to have.

The one thing I felt to be perfectly valid in Mr. Bumpus' thesis was the idea which lay beneath all the vituperation, to wit: that this is primarily a Southern problem and the intrusion of any element from the other parts of our society is likely to be resented—and, being so resented, is likely to make things worse rather than better.

The Negroes have a long, hard row to hoe, but those who wish to help them will have to learn how to appeal to the good will of Southern white men, our brothers and our fellow citizens, who have so magnificently proved their mettle by their verdict in this case.

Where did the twelve good men and true get the spirit that brought in this verdict? They got it from the whole complex of American life, which is still, in spite of many contradictions, the best life yet achieved on this planet for masses of men.

They are like Beryl Sellers, the Associated Press reporter from Chattanooga, who used to work side by side with Negroes on his uncle's farm in Georgia, shaking peanuts for fifty cents a day, and has nothing but compassion for them.

They are like the Thigpen brothers, who have the taxi stand a block away from the county courthouse: Oren was a crew chief on a C-47 in our Troop Carrier Command in England, and his brother Jimmy was a machinist's mate on the Maryland in the Pacific.

The man who drove me to the Nashville airport, Ed Lane, jumped on D Day in Normandy with the 82nd AirBorne. These people have no use for racism of any kind. Their inherited problems are tremendous, but so are their energies and their will. It all depends on them.

THE TERRIBLE MISS DOVE

(Continued from Page 31)

he is able to go many days without water." And they knew what was meant. "Above the fiftieth parallel," sixth graders wrote in their notebooks (keeping the margins even), "life requires hardihood."

Occasionally a group of progressive mothers would nearly rebel. "She's been teaching too long," they would cry. "Her pedagogy hasn't changed since we were in the third grade. She rules the children through fear." They would turn to the boldest one among them. "You go," they would say. "You go talk to her."

The bold one would go, but somehow she never did much talking. For under the level gaze of Miss Dove she would begin to feel—though she wore her handsomest tweeds and perhaps a gardenia for courage—that she was about ten years old and her petticoat was showing. Her throat would tickle. She would wonder desperately if she had a clean handkerchief to cough into.

And then there was the little matter of the state achievement tests. Cedar Grove always placed first in geography.

Occasionally, too, there would be an independent child who did not yield readily to group discipline. Miss Dove knew how to deal with him.

Once she had overheard two small boys talking about her at the drinking fountain. (They had no business at the fountain; it was their library period. But the librarian was lax.)

"I bet Miss Dove could lick Joe Louis," one of them had said.

"Who? That ole stick?" the other one had jeered. "I could beat her with my little finger."

He had glanced up then to see Miss Dove looking down at him. She had looked at him for a long time. Her light gray eyes were expressionless. Her long nose was pink at the tip, but no pinker than usual. At last she had spoken.

"Thomas Baker," she had said in the tone of one making a pure observation, "you talk too much, don't you?"

"Yes, ma'am," Thomas had said in a tiny voice. He went off without getting any water. Seven years later he sweated when he thought of it. He could not know that Miss Dove also remembered. But she did.

Ever since Pearl Harbor Miss Dove had been troubled. She lived quite alone, for her sisters had married and her mother had departed for a place not on the map. (But decently, with every possible comfort. Miss Dove liked to remind herself of that.) And one evening while she was correcting papers she sensed, with that uncanny perception of the teacher, that something intruded upon her solitude. She turned quickly and looked about the room. A starched white curtain rustled in a puff of wind; her grandmother's rosewood whatnot cast a curious shadow on the polished floor; a finger of lamplight picked out the gilt titles of her father's old brown travel books. There was nothing else. But the red correction pencil was shaking in her fingers; for a moment her throat ached with a spasm of desolate, unaccountable grief, and—less familiar still—with a feeling of her own unworthiness. Miss Dove had never felt unworthy before in her life.

After that the thing happened frequently, until at last she saw who the intruders were. They were the children she had taught long ago.

War had scattered those children. There was a girl—a vain, silly little piece she had been—who was a nurse on Corregidor. At least, when last heard of she had been on Corregidor. One of the boys was dead in Tunisia. Others were on the Anzio beachhead, or in the jungles of New Guinea, or in the flak-brightened skies over Germany. But they came back to Miss Dove. She saw them as they had been at seven, at ten, at twelve. Only they had a beauty she had never seen in them then. They lifted their faces like starry morning flowers. Their limbs quivered with the unreasonable joy of childhood. And as Miss Dove looked at them they grew still. Their faces paled. Their eyes stopped dancing. They folded their little hands. They faded and were gone.

The child who came oftenest was Thomas

What Your Dime Does

WHEN the dreaded infantile paralysis strikes, the victim and his family do not need to fight alone. They can call on the National Foundation for Infantile Paralysis. Through the funds voluntarily contributed each year to the March of Dimes, the Foundation maintains 2712 local chapters covering the 3070 counties in the United States. At these local chapters, a family will find factual information to allay their panic, concrete dollar assistance for the best available medical care, to give the patient a fighting chance for full recovery and to keep the family financial structure from foundering. No one, insists the Foundation, must go into debt or make drastic changes in his way of life before being eligible for help. The cost of infantile paralysis is considered a deep-rooted part of the disease; and in the all-out war on infantile, the National Foundation for Infantile Paralysis is aiming to wipe out not only the pain, but the costs of pain.

COLD-NIGHT COMFORT

USE THE SAFE HEAT OF CASCO

VETPROOF ELECTRIC HEATING PAD

ven though Jack Frost is at the window pane, ou can relax and sleep wonderfully on chilly ights with the blissful, cradling warmth of a asco Electric Heating Pad. Constant, soothing, afe heat is yours at the flick of a switch. Safe ith wet packs. Exclusive Nite-Lite switch: ial in the dark any one of 30 constant tem- eratures to suit your need. Removable wash- ble cover. Underwriters' Laboratories approved r your protection. Thousands of Casco pads re used in hospitals and by doctors.

...sco Heating Pads from $... at ... Drug, Department, Electrical and Hardware ...

ASCO PRODUCTS CORPORATION • BRIDGEPORT 2, CONN.
...merica's Largest Manufacturer of Electric Heating ...

Baker. The town paper had been full of Thomas. His slap had been heard, the officers killed, and Thomas had taken over. A hundred men owed their lives to the peculiar of mind. For days he had floated on a raft with no food and only the water in his canteen. When they picked him up his tongue had protruded from his mouth black and swollen with thirst. That was what got Miss Dove he had run out of water.

The Thomas who came to stand before her now was a sturdy boy in knickers. He held his chin at a cocky angle, but the dimple in it trembled. He ran the tip of his tongue over his lips. He looked thirsty.

But they came only at night. When daylight returned Miss Dove could believe she had been imagining things. She would eat her customary boiled egg and her whole-wheat toast; she would take an extra vitamin pill with her orange juice; she would walk forth at her usual measured pace and assume her usual role of unshakable authority. The children at the school would seem plain and ordinary. They would have little in common with those graceful and evanescent figures that haunted her. And no intruders dared come into the geography room. Or they never had until this morning.

> "Research" is a high-hat word that scares a lot of people. It needn't. It is rather simple. Essentially, it is nothing but a state of mind—a friendly, welcoming attitude toward change. Going out to look for a change instead of waiting for it to come. Research, for practical men, is an effort to do things better and not to be caught asleep at the switch. The research state of mind can apply to anything: personal affairs or any kind of business, big or little. It is the problem solving mind as contrasted with the let-well-enough-alone mind. It is the composer mind instead of the fiddler mind. It is the "tomorrow" mind instead of the "yesterday" mind.
>
> —CHARLES KETTERING.

A boy on the back row cleared his throat. One by the window followed suit. Soon the whole room was dotted with the sound, a rough "h-hrmph," like frogs in a distant marsh. Miss Dove knew what the sound meant. It was the school's traditional signal—a kind of dare. She had heard other teachers speak of it in exasperation. It had never happened in her room before.

Slowly Randy Baker raised his hand. The sounds stopped. Silence like a caught breath hung on the room. Miss Dove could see a fine dew pop out on Randy's brow; his open palm was damp and gleaming.

"Yes, Randolph?" she said.

Randy stood up. Miss Dove's pupils always stood when they addressed her. He smoothed his round stomach with his hand. "I got a letter from Tom yestiddy," he said.

"Received, Randolph," said Miss Dove. "You received a letter from your brother yesterday. That was nice."

"Yes, ma'am," said Randy. He paused. He was clearly floundering. "He sent me a dollar he won playing poker in the convalescent hospital."

"I am sorry to hear that Thomas gambles," said Miss Dove, "but we are all very proud of his war record. If you have nothing more interesting to tell us you may take your seat, Randolph."

"H-hr-rmph!" went the boy behind Randy.

"He's been decorated," said Randy, "for bravery beyond the call of duty." The high words seemed to inspirit him. "He sent a message to the class."

"Did you bring the letter?" asked Miss Dove. "If so, you may read that part aloud."

Randy took an air-mail envelope from his hip pocket. Miss Dove noticed that Thomas' handwriting was as sprawling and untidy as ever. Somehow the observation pleased her.

The class stirred. The ghost of a titter rippled the air.

"Attention, please," said Miss Dove.

for CHAPPED DRY HANDS

1. Quicker results. Softens roughest, driest skin over night.
2. Proved effectiveness for 65 years in cold Canada.
3. A pure, rich concentrated emollient. Aids healing. Choice of countless doctors, nurses, housewives, mothers.
4. Economical—spreads widely—single drop serves both hands.

At cosmetic counters—10¢, 25¢, 50¢ and $1.00 a bottle

Campana Balm
THE SKIN SOFTENER

YARN 100% PURE VIRGIN WOOL
...
...ETER PAN YARNS, 363 Grand St., N. Y. City Dept. ... Estab. 1920

"Soaping" dulls hair—
Halo glorifies it!

Yes, even finest soaps and soap shampoos hide the natural lustre of your hair with dulling soap film

- Halo contains no soap. Made with a new patented ingredient it cannot leave dull soap film!
- Halo reveals the true natural beauty of your hair the very first time you use it, leaves your hair shimmering with glorious highlights.
- Makes oceans of rich, fragrant lather, even in hardest water. Leaves hair sweet, clean, naturally radiant!
- Needs no lemon or vinegar after-rinse. Halo rinses away completely!
- Carries away unsightly loose dandruff like magic!
- Lets hair dry soft and manageable, easy to curl!

HALO REVEALS THE HIDDEN BEAUTY OF YOUR HAIR!

Slim Black for a Lovelier You

Style No. 972 . . . Black, saddlestitched in white to emphasize slimming vertical lines . . . Smart for its uncluttered look. A Martha Manning Original of Gypsy rayon crepe. In "Illusion" Half Sizes 16½ to 22½. Under $10.00. Exclusively at one fine store in most cities.

Guaranteed by Good Housekeeping

MARTHA MANNINGS COME IN WOMEN'S AND "ILLUSION" HALF SIZES

rhapsody in blue

"Individually Yours" by Dutchess

Here's the underwear you would design for yourself. Feels lighter than air. Its wonderful "built-in" resiliency gives with every movement of your body. Its touch is a caress, for it's Dutchess-knit of smooth, soft Bemberg*, Aristocrat of Rayons. And its lovely Alaskan Blue shade is as refreshing as a shower. Trunks, 4, 5, 6, 7; Bra, 32 - 36.

At Leading Stores. Dutchess Underwear Corp., Empire State Bldg., New York 1

Dutchess

ALASKAN BLUE

*Reg. U.S. Pat. Off.

Randy opened the letter. The paper was smudged and crumpled. Obviously it had suffered many readings and many hands. Randy cleared his throat. The sound was not a link in the chain signal. Miss Dove could tell the difference. "It's sort of long," Randy demurred hopefully.

Miss Dove knew there was naughtiness afoot. The frog noises as well as Randy's hesitation had told her that. But she did not believe in avoiding an issue. She made a practice of facing impudence in the open—and facing it down.

"We can spare the time," she said.

Randy began to read. His voice was high and clear; it had the girlish sweetness that comes just before the breaking point.

"The funny thing about the world," Randy read, "is that it looks just like you think it does. When they flew me back to Cal. in a hospital plane I looked down and, heck, I might as well have been looking at those diagrams on the geography board back in dear (ha, ha!) ole Cedar Grove. I spotted a peninsula just as plain. A body of land almost entirely surrounded by water. I saw some atolls too. And they really are made in rings like doughnuts, with palm trees sprouting out of the cake part and blue water in the hole in the middle. The water is the color of that blue chalk I swiped once and drew the picture of Miss Dove on the sidewalk with. Remember?"

So it was Thomas who had drawn that caricature. She had always suspected him. "Proceed, Randolph," she said.

"You want to know if I was scared when the little yellow insects from"—Randy swallowed and went on—"from hell" in his embarrassment he brought out the word with unnecessary force—"dive-bombed us. The answer is, you bet. But it came to me in a flash that I wasn't much scareder than I was that time ole lady Dove caught me bragging about how I could beat her up at the drinking fountain. 'I didn't run that time,' I told myself, 'so I won't run now.' Besides, there wasn't any place to run to."

The class laughed nervously.

"And later," read Randy, "when I was bobbing up and down like Crusoe on my raft, what do you guess I thought about? Well, it wasn't any pin-up girl. It was Miss Dove. I thought about that fishy stare she used to give us when we needed a drink of water. So to make my supply hold out I played I was back in the geography room. And even after the water was all gone I kept playing that. I'd think, 'The bell is bound to ring in a few minutes. You can last a little longer.' It took the same kind of guts in the Pacific it did in school. Tell that to the kids in Cedar Grove." Randy stopped abruptly.

"Is that the end?" asked Miss Dove.

RANDY looked directly at her. For a fleeting moment she thought he was going to say yes. If he did, the incident would be closed, of course, for Miss Dove never questioned a child's word. That was why they generally told her the truth. He shook his head.

"No, ma'am," he said. "There's a little more." His face turned the color of a nearly ripe tomato. "He says here"—Randy gulped—"he says"—Randy took a deep breath—"he says: 'Give the terrible Miss Dove a kiss for me.'"

"Well, Randolph," said Miss Dove, "I am waiting."

There was an electric stillness that was followed, as the full meaning of her words penetrated the children's consciousness, by a gasp. Randy folded the letter and put it back into his pocket. Then he began to walk toward her. He walked with the deliberate stoicism of a martyr going to the chopping block. Miss Dove inclined her head and turned her cheek in his direction. He did not come any closer than he had to. He leaned forward stiffly from the waist and placed his puckered lips against her cheek. (He smells like a last year's bird's nest, thought Miss Dove. It was strange. However frequently a twelve-year-old boy was washed, he always smelled like a bird's nest.) Randy smacked. His kiss resounded, a small explosion in the room.

"THANK you, Randolph," said Miss Dove. "You may give Thomas my regards." She straightened up and faced the class. To her surprise, nobody was grinning.

Jincey Webb spoke. She did not raise her hand first for permission. She just spoke out. "It's like a medal," said Jincey softly. "It's like he pinned a medal on Miss Dove."

For a moment a lamp seemed to burn behind her face. Then over the light swept a shadow, a look of awe. It was as if Jincey had glimpsed some universal beauty—of sorrow, perhaps, or of nobility—too poignant for her youth to bear. She began to cry. She flopped her head down on her desk with her red hair falling forward and spreading out like a crinkly fan.

All the other girls were weeping too. All the boys were trying not to.

For the first time in her teaching career Miss Dove was at a loss. She wanted to make a speech. She wanted to say something beautiful and grateful about what life really meant to her, about the overwhelming generosity of children. No, not generosity. It was something better than that, something much harder to come by. It was justice. And Miss Dove did not know how to say what she felt. She had never thought it dignified to express emotion.

But as she stood there waiting for the words to form in her mind, she realized that she was neglecting her duty. The first duty of a teacher was to preserve order.

She fished a piece of string from a receptacle on her desk. She walked down the aisle to Jincey Webb. She took Jincey's hair, that marvel of art and nature, and bunched it in her hand. She tied it securely at the nape of Jincey's neck with the little bit of grocery string.

"Now it will be out of your way," she said.

At the sound of her voice, cool, precise and natural, the children rallied. They sat erect. They blew their noses on clean handkerchiefs. They folded their hands on their desks.

"Get out your notebooks, class," she said.

A transient mist came over her eyes. Through it, as through a prism, the children glowed. Freckles, cowlicks, pinafores and polo shirts seemed bathed in a rainbow iridescence. Her love flowed out to her children—to those opening their notebooks before her, and to those in the far places she had once helped them locate on the map. It did not flow tenderly like a mother's coddling love. It flowed on a fierce rush of pride and hope, as an old general's heart might follow his men into battle.

She went to the blackboard and picked up a piece of chalk. "Above the fiftieth parallel ——" wrote the terrible Miss Dove.

This Kind of Growing Pain

BY MARY POOLE

"You must be growing!" you mock me.
"See, now we are mouth to mouth;
And once I remember clearly
Your head was a shoulder
south.
I thought of you, one hour,
As an arrow-eyed weather vane;
Now you're a brazen sunflower
And gaze and gaze again."

You hold me again, tiptoeing,
A kiss is a crisis now;
And the pain of perpetual growing
Is worse today, somehow.

Chest Cold Misery Relieved by Moist Heat of ANTIPHLOGISTINE

SIMPLE CHEST COLD
SORE THROAT
BRONCHIAL IRRITATION
SIMPLE SPRAIN, BRUISE
SORE MUSCLES
BOILS

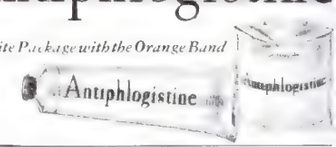
The moist heat of an ANTIPHLOGISTINE poultice relieves cough, tightness of chest, muscle soreness due to chest cold, bronchial irritation and simple sore throat.

Apply ANTIPHLOGISTINE poultice just hot enough to be comfortable—then feel the moist heat go right to work on that cough, tightness of chest, muscle soreness. Does good, feels good for several hours.

The moist heat of an ANTIPHLOGISTINE poultice also reduces swelling and relieves pain due to a boil, simple sprain, bruise, or similar injury or condition and limbers up stiff, aching muscles. Get ANTIPHLOGISTINE (Aunty Flo) in tube or can at your drug store NOW.

Antiphlogistine

The White Package with the Orange Band



Now Many Wear FALSE TEETH With More Comfort

FASTEETH, a pleasant alkaline (non-acid) powder, holds false teeth more firmly. To eat and talk in more comfort, just sprinkle a little FASTEETH on your plates. No gummy, gooey, pasty taste or feeling. Checks "plate odor" (denture breath). Get FASTEETH at any drug store.

FOR QUICK EXTRA MONEY
Sell Name-Imprinted FLORAL NOTES

20 Folders Printed with Sender's Name
New—EXCLUSIVE IDEA! Sell to friends and others. 20 Correspondence folders decorated with watercolor florals, 10 lovely designs. Sender's name printed on front. Inside blank for writing any personal messages. Sells 20 for $1.50—you make Big Cash Profit.

NAME HERE

FOR ALL OCCASIONS
Ideal for Thank You notes, Invitations, Get-Well Messages or for correspondence. Year 'round sales to everyone. Also earn extra cash profits daily with smart Everyday Assortments to sell for $1.00. Get FREE samples. Write now.

Sells 20 for $1.50

FREE Samples

M. B. GROGAN CO., 30 E. Adams St., Dept. G-1, Chicago 3, Ill.

SELL FAMOUS SUNSHINE "EVERYDAY" CARDS

1947 CREATIONS NOW READY
Take orders galore from friends, neighbors, for AMERICA'S MOST BEAUTIFUL EVERYDAY ASSORTMENT, 14 folders. Costs 50¢. Sells for $1.

EARN MONEY EASILY

SUNSHINE 21 NOTES—A LEADER
Feature-packed Appealing! The fastest-selling note box in the U.S.A. Costs 50¢. Sells for $1.
21 Sunshine Folders for Birthdays, Get-Wells
Entirely new ideas. Never before offered. Charming, cute folders. Very popular. Cost 50¢. Sell for $1. Also BIRTHDAYS, CONVALESCENT GIFT WRAPS, ECONOMY NOTES. SAMPLES ON APPROVAL. WRITE TODAY.
SUNSHINE ART STUDIOS, DEPT. LE-1, 115 FULTON ST., NEW YORK 8, N. Y.

sow SALZER'S seeds

Salzers 3 Big Offers!! All postpaid!
NO. 1: 19 pkts. most popular garden vegetables for complete home garden, all for $1.00. NO. 2: Salzers Hortensia Pansy—A NEW ROSY PINK PANSY with lovely dark blotch. Excitingly different! Pkt., 25 cts. NO. 3: 5 Pkts. Salzers popular annual flower seeds for cut flowers, 50c value for only 25 cts. SPECIAL: All 3 offers for $1.25 postpaid. All seeds 99% plus pure.
Send for Big FREE catalog. Complete listing of garden seeds, plants, bulbs, shrubs, trees, field seeds.

1947 FREE CATALOG

John A. Salzer Seed Co.
Box 23-J
La Crosse, Wis.

THIS IS FOR KEEPS

(Continued from Page 51)

give her hand to B. B. Bunting. said, "Who is it?" and then she saw n standing very tall and broad- ldered and she smiled again and ed.

Sally," B. B. Bunting said, "this is Jack n, from Texas. Jack, Sally Barton. He ed to meet you, child; why, I don't ."

lly Barton said, "Hello."

Hello," Regan said.

it down, for goodness' sakes," B. B. ing said. "Gods! Young people are be- ng more like totem poles each passing Bore each other to death. You asked his. I'll see you later," and B. B. Bunt- as off through the bar, shouting helloes ty people as he passed from sight into obby.

it down," Sally Barton said. "Do we a mutual friend who told you about gan found a chair and sat beside her, some little distance from the table. " he grinned. "I heard you buying a and I liked your voice, that's all."

Thank you,"she said. "I'd introduce you y friends, but they're arguing about the n dances and would only grumble and t your name."

That's all right," Regan said. "I don't mber names myself."

What are you doing up here, Mr. Regan?" Barton asked.

Call me Jack," Regan said. "I'm looking sh skeletons and impressions."

Call me Sally," she said. "You're ?"

gan grinned sheepishly. "I'm sort of an eur ichthyologist, Sally. I thought be I could dig around in the hills and dry es and maybe find something. I'm ing on a theory that all this land was under water."

t was," a skinny young man said sud- y, turning from the general knot of heads arms. "How are you, my name's Brown, might find 'em at that, call me tomorrow I'll show you around." And with a flash- grin, Brown dived back into the discus- around the table.

You've met one of them," Sally said ly. "Jim Brown is one of our best an- thropologists, Jack. He knows this country like a book."

"Well, look," Regan said. "What do you do? I mean, couldn't you show me around a little bit?"

She smiled vacantly and Regan decided he wasn't making much of an impression on Sally Barton, and he also wondered if it was the fact that he seemed quite sane and sensibly dressed in comparison to her friends.

"Yes," she said. "I'll be happy to show you some of our nicest spots. Are you here in the hotel, Jack?"

"In the hotel?" Regan said absently, staring at her. "Oh, sure I am. Room three-eleven over the patio. Nice view of people viewing other people very quiet, only about ten outbursts per night. When do we go to the woods?"

"You say you were from Texas?" Brown asked, turning again from the table.

"Houston," Regan said firmly.

"Oil or cattle?" Brown asked.

"Why?" Regan asked, and then he remembered how people in other states felt about Texas, how they resented the confidence and state love every true Texan carried with him like a coat of armor. Texans had a bad habit of listening to the attributes of other states and then calmly telling of something in Texas which was so much bigger and better no one could find an adequate comeback. People always thought every Texan had two hundred oil wells and fifty thousand longhorns just running wild in the hills, and most of the Texans did little to discourage this idea. It made it hard on Regan, who, not for the world, would ever tell a soul his father just happened to have fifty oil wells and countless cattle running wild. Regan never spoke of his state; although he loved it dearly, he was the silent Texan who bided his time, and to those who knew men he was by far the most dangerous type.

"Well," Brown grinned, "aren't you going to tell us about Texas?"

"What for?" Regan asked timidly. "Everybody knows."

"Jack," Sally Barton said, "I am beginning to love you. Let us leave these nitwits and go hunt fish impressions."

"Without me?" Brown said, turning again.

"Mind if I walk outside and see if anyone whistles?"

WHERE FORM COUNTS--IT'S

Merry-Go-Round*

A PETER PAN BRA

BETTY GARRETT

CALL ME MISTER

MERRY GO ROUND

PETER PAN BRASSIERES—GIRDLES 116 EAST 27 ST., N.Y. 16

better FIT...

more COMFORT

Miss Swank*

straight + bias

SLIPS

The exclusive Miss Swank patent — straight-cut sides plus bias-cut front and back — prevents riding up, bunching, twisting. To be sure — look for the Miss Swank label. Finest fabrics, exquisite tailoring — quality in the Miss Swank tradition. At better stores $3. and up.

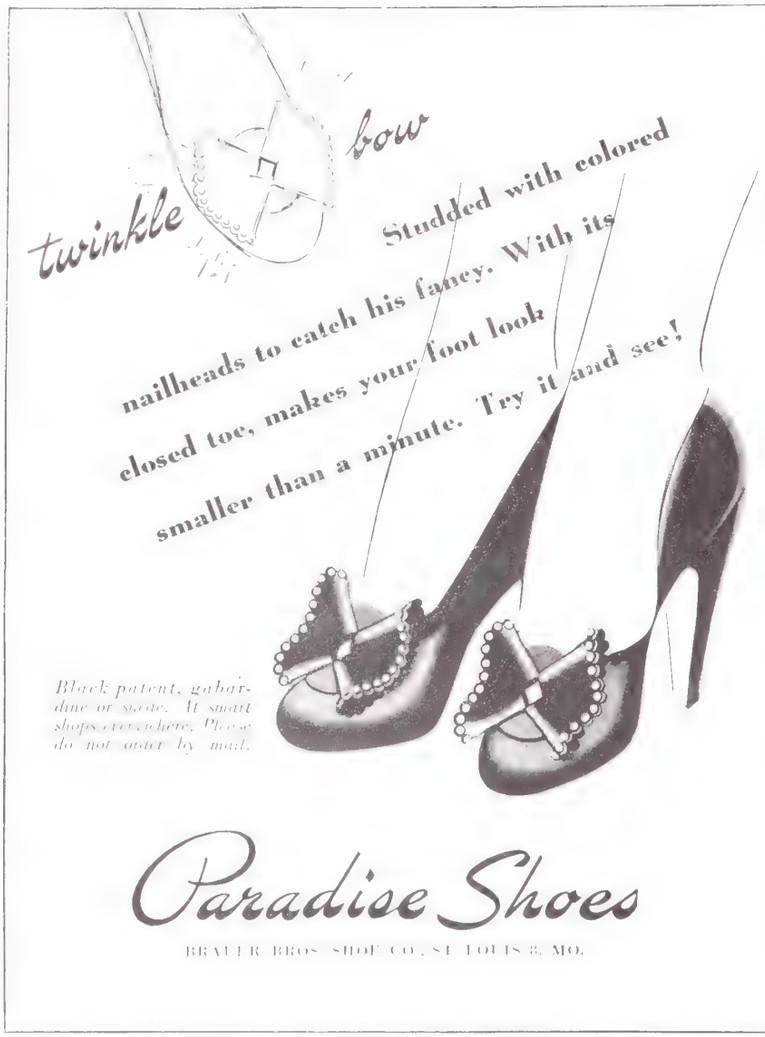
FEATURING BURMA QUALITY RAYON FABRICS

* Reg. U.S. Pat. Off.

© 1947, MISS SWANK, INC. 112 MADISON AVE., N. Y. 16, N.Y.

Miss Swank*

the only slips with this patented straight + bias construction



twinkle bow
Studded with colored nailheads to catch his fancy. With its closed toe, makes your foot look smaller than a minute. Try it and see!
Black patent, gabardine or suede. At smart shops everywhere. Please do not order by mail.
Paradise Shoes
BRAUER BROS. SHOE CO., ST. LOUIS 3, MO.

Regan thought that Brown must have four ears, two to carry on one conversation and two to tap another which did not concern him. He had missed Brown's look toward Sally Barton before and the certain twang in Brown's cultured, polished voice.

"Harvard?" Regan asked innocently.

"Quite," Brown said. "How did you guess?"

"Your intelligent conversation," Regan said. "Your ears maybe."

"My ears," Brown said, fingering his small, well-shaped lobes. "I say, I never thought of that before. Do we have a definite shape, Regan?"

"Something like aircraft pickup equipment," Regan said sweetly. "So much goes in that should be filtered out. You ready to push of., Sally?"

OUTSIDE, standing in the sunlight of the fall day, Regan knew he would not like the man named Brown.

Sally Barton said, "You put Jim in his place. That's the first time I've seen him bested. Now where would you like to go first?"

"Anywhere," Regan said. "With you."

"Silly," Sally Barton said. "Don't start so fast. Let's get to know each other a little bit. I'll tell you all about my horrible life and you tell me about Texas."

"Don't you want to know about me?" Regan asked.

"Jack," Sally Barton said, "if you just tell me about Texas, I'll know all about you, won't I?"

"You win," Regan said. "Just tell me about yourself and show me some good places."

"Do you have a good car?" Sally Barton asked. "You'd better. Some of these spots are a little off the beaten track."

"You point," Regan said. "I'll drive."

Regan had occasion to regret those words in the following days. Sally Barton directed and accompanied him to Taos and far up into the Sangre de Cristos to such places as Truchas and Cordova, and west across the valley to Abiquiu and Chama and Capulin Peak. They drove to Hyde Park and had hamburgers and coffee sitting on the veranda bench and watching small boys climb to the ski run and slide down the slick grass on their behinds. They drove south into the dry-wash country around San Felipe and Cochiti, and prowled eastward toward Las Vegas and the Tererro Forest. Regan saw the country around Santa Fe in minute detail, and he saw Sally Barton in minute detail, wearing green one day and blue the next, and most of all he liked her in an old gray sweater and faded Levis, her hair pushed under an ancient felt hat. Regan saw her and forgot the mountains and the parks and the towns; he looked for signs of fish long gone and the only thing gone when they returned to Santa Fe on the fifth day was his heart. Sally Barton had that, much as the mountains and canyons had swallowed all signs of ancient fish that might have cavorted in some ancient ocean over this mountain land.

On the fifth day they pulled into town about midafternoon and stopped at the Pink Adobe for a hamburger and coffee and apple pie with cheese; and Regan wolfed his food and lit a cigarette and stared meaningly at Sally Barton. Regan screwed up his courage and pointed one thumb at her Adam's apple.

"Back in Texas," he said, "I know fifty women."

"How wonderful," Sally said. "I'll bet they're all eight feet tall and have red hair."

"Wait a minute," Regan said. "Let me finish. I know fifty women back home and every one of 'em is prettier than you are."

Sally Barton made a face and the wrinkles on her nose made little scallops of golden brown.

"That I grant," she laughed. "But you know, Jack, my father once told me I was an ugly little girl and the only way I could get a man was to make him believe I was beautiful. That's my deep, dark secret."

"Every one of 'em," Regan said, "and I could marry any one of them, and you know something?"

see what you can make with a fine yarn!
No one will believe that you made a fashion like this yourself. It looks like a Paris import! Fleisher's Yarn is so remarkably smooth and rich in texture, so soft and springy, that all your hand-knits have that expert finished smartness. It's a yarn that washes perfectly, too, and holds its shape beautifully.
Send 15c for Vol. 23 containing instructions for making this sweater and other smart new fashions to Fleisher Yarns, 230 Fifth Avenue, New York 1, Department H-17.
Fleisher's Yarn
GOOD WOOL IS THE FOUNDATION OF GOOD KNITTING

When You Buy
HANDKERCHIEFS for yourself and for your family
SAYLERIZED
PERMANENT FINISH
Look for this Label
SAYLERIZED* cotton handkerchiefs have a linen-like beauty and a lasting appearance of freshness that endure through repeated launderings. This process minimizes lint and fuzz.
Also Saylerized cotton wash goods and organdie curtains.
Saylerized fabrics are used by many of the country's leading manufacturers.
* Reg. U. S. Pat. Off.

DO YOU SHRINK
FROM WASHING SWEATERS?
USE ME!
WOOLFOAM
Guaranteed by Good Housekeeping
"Quick as a wink, I wash sweaters, sox, blankets and baby things ... leave them clean and fluffy as kittens! Colors remain bright; delicate fibres stay alive!" Endorsed by America's leading sweater manufacturers. A 25 cent box of WOOLFOAM washes 16 sweaters. Grocery, Drug or Department Stores.
Made for Wool by a Wool Firm
WOOLFOAM
WOOLFOAM CORP., NEW YORK 10, N

"I know," Sally Barton grinned. "You nt to marry all of them, and Texas won't nge their laws for you. You poor boy." "Look here," Regan said desperately, m trying to say I have fallen in love with —why, I'll never know, but that's how s. What do you say to that?" he added ligerently.

For the first time in five days Regan saw amazing spectacle of Sally Barton with- words. She held her coffee cup halfway ner mouth and looked at him wide-eyed, mouth open and trembling, and then she the coffee cup on the table and leaned ward.

Jack," she said, "don't you ever say t again. You know all about me and you say that. You know I'm a bad little girl here from the East, a sort of fugitive n a debutante gang. I don't spin or sew eap. I just live on my father and love it. an't buck a horse or steer a rope or do atever your Texas gals can do. I can't boil ee in a can and I won't sing The Eyes of as and I refuse to love oil and cattle. You w all this and you tell me you love me"— looked down at the table and got red in face—"and you know doggone well I'm ng in love with you."

Regan had wilted and now he blossomed a quick-rising sun. He said, "Why didn't say so?" and reached for her.

Wait, Jack," Sally Barton said. "Not so . I said that I was falling, but I could er go all the way. Do you want to know ?"

Regan plummeted into the depths of ckness. "Why?"

You're a big strong man," Sally Barton . "You have brains and money and nice s and the most lovable, level, un-Texas osition I ever saw in my life. That's the ible with you. Remember these last five s? That cop stopped us and you smiled took the ticket and didn't argue. The tress browbeats you in the hotel dining m. Jim Brown sneers at you and you just like a sick calf and let him insult you t and left. You just go along on that l plane of yours and you don't care what ple say about you. I thought Texans got l and fought anything at the drop of a I want some spirit in the man I love."

GAN edged back from the table and ed weakly at Sally Barton, and snubbed his cigarette and wished he could tell her w things he dared not mention in Santa such as his summer roustabouting with father's oil crew and busting cattle on the eau west of Kerrville and fighting on the versity boxing team and doing a few odd s in Italy and France and Germany; and t of all, he wished he could tell her that doctors and his father had warned him to lose his temper as he had when young very hotheaded, and tear up three or buildings and send twenty people the nearest hospital. All these things e behind Regan, by choice and command, and he had been riding rough herd on his own temper for over a year.

"All right," Regan said weakly. "I'm sorry, Sally. I ——"

"That's the business in a nutshell," Sally said. "I [illegible] That's all you ever say or do. Now you listen to me, Jack Regan. I'll be your friend while you're here, but that's all. I won't let myself fall for you, you great big hunk of jelly." She brushed at her nose and said, "By the way, we are invited to a dinner party tonight. Mrs. Crafthouse, of New York you know, the Crafthouse bonbon fortune. She wants to meet you. Will you go?"

"Why not?" Regan said sorrowfully. "As one bonbon to another, what can I lose?"

REGAN returned to the hotel after dropping Sally at her home, and arriving in his room, he packed his bags and placed a long-distance call for his father in Houston. He ordered coffee, and some minutes later he sipped a full cup and talked to his father, who said:

"Well, Jack, what's the dope?"

"I'm leaving tonight," Regan said. "Right after a party I've got to attend."

"Never mind the parties," his father growled. "How about the business? Anybody suspect you?"

"No," Regan said. "I told 'em I was an ichthyologist and ——"

"What's that?" his father shouted. "Talk English."

"A guy who studies fish," Regan shouted back. "I met a girl and she went all around with me. I mentioned names and she thought going to the different places was her own idea. I saw every one you charted."

"Any good signs?" his father asked.

"Some," Regan said. "I marked all the spots. We can shoot the seismograph crew up in the spring and double check. After that it's lease and gamble. Okay?"

"Good boy," his father said. "You say you met a girl?"

"Met is right," Regan said. "I'm leaving tonight."

"H'm-m-m," his father said. "Get in any fights?"

"That's the trouble," Regan said. "She thinks I'm a cream puff."

"Never mind that," his father said. "Come on home and we'll talk about it then. Good-by."

"Yes, sir," Regan said. "Good-by."

Regan slammed the phone on its hook and started dressing for the party. He didn't care if the roof fell in or fifty people insulted him; he was licked and he was going home before he lost his temper and tore up the town. He cursed manfully over his collar button, squirming into tails and white shirt, and barely made it to Sally Barton's in time to pick her up and pull into the Crafthouse front yard on time.

Mrs. Crafthouse was a large and ebullient lady, veteran of several marriages and some six or seven odd full-grown children, and somewhat of a wit on various subjects. Regan

Back and other views of Hollywood Patterns on pages 50 and 51

1980. Two-piece suit: 12 to 20; 25c. (35c in Canada.)

1998. Two-piece dress: 12 to 20; 25c. (35c in Canada.)

1999. Blouses: 12 to 20; 25c.

1684. Blouse, bolero and skirt (the bolero and skirt are not illustrated on pages 50 and 51): 10 to 18; 25c.

Let Noxzema nurse Chapped Hands

How Famous Formula Soothes, Helps Soften and Heal Faster!

Painful chapped hands are actually tiny cuts... or skin irritations that need healing! Care for your chapped hands as thousands of nurses do—with soothing, medicated Noxzema Skin Cream.

Actual tests by physicians on scores of people prove NOXZEMA helps heal chapped hands faster—quickly helps restore red, rough hands to normal soft loveliness.

NOXZEMA is a snow white cream—dainty and greaseless—can be used day and night. Millions use it regularly as a "first aid" for externally-caused blemishes, chafing, minor burns, windburn and many other annoying skin irritations.

Get your jar of NOXZEMA Skin Cream at any drug counter today—10¢, 35¢, 50¢, plus tax.

LAYMON'S
Cosmetics
Ask for Laymon's Face Powder, Rouge, Lipstick, Nail Polish
Sold from counter display cards in drug and other stores WORLD'S PRODUCTS CO., Spencer, Ind.

INGROWN NAIL
Hurting You?
Immediate Relief!
A few drops of OL-TORO bring blessed relief to tormented, pained nerves and OL-TORO brings on the skin underneath the nail, glossing the nail today-out and out, preventing further pain and discomfort. OL-TORO is available at all drug counters.
Whitehall Pharmacal Company, New York 16, N.Y.

Vaughan's
Gardening Illustrated
265 FLOWERS IN FULL COLOR
More than 2500 new varieties and old favorites listed in this beautiful catalog. [illegible] gladioli, annual, perennial [illegible]
Vegetables, too, of the luxury quality which only home gardeners can enjoy, are offered in this annual, which is packed with information invaluable to anatour. It tell how to grow [illegible] about the new world [illegible] and just what to and [illegible]
SPECIAL FOR 1947. Rated by many the most beautiful of cut flowers, the gold-veined Salpiglossis can be grown in any garden by the [illegible] included [illegible] Packet of seed [illegible] all colors, and [illegible]
VAUGHAN'S SEED STORE, Dept. 111
10 W. Randolph, Chicago 1 • 47 Barclay, N.Y.C. 7

When colds prey ... gargle and spray ... with
GLYCO-Thymoline

● Soothing, refreshing, cleansing—GLYCO-THYMOLINE helps effectively to ease nose and throat tissues inflamed and irritated by common winter ills. Keep a bottle of this alkaline solution handy ... use it regularly as a gargle or spray.

MANY DOCTORS RECOMMEND IT!

Now—
SHE'S WALKING
On Air

There's a world of thrilling comfort for tired, burning feet in a jar of Ice-Mint. So get foot-happy today—rub on this frosty-white cream and feel how its cooling, soothing, medicinal action drives out fiery burning and aching tiredness. Grand, too, to soften up corns and callouses. At drug and department stores. Get a jar today.

don't let Dry Skin
make you look older

new Woodbury Special
Dry Skin Cream

- discourages tiny dry-skin lines
- gives a fresher, younger look
- softens winter-chapped skin

BEWARE! Dry skin brings deeper lines, flaking . . . may make you look years older than you are!

Here's a cream whose powers to combat dryness have been proved. Woodbury Special Dry Skin Cream is enriched with Vitone . . . a special dry-skin "smoother". . . better than lanolin itself! Plus four more rich oils. Apply to face, hands, throat overnight, or for just 15 daytime minutes.

- works fast . . . prove it!

Tonight, make this easy beauty test. Smooth on Woodbury Special Dry Skin Cream. Sleep in its magic overnight. Tomorrow morning, feel! Already your skin seems smoother, deliciously soft to touch. Woodbury Special Dry Skin Cream is a "must" if you've reached the 30-plus mark . . . a wise investment for under-30's. See its beautifying benefits on your skin now.

met most of the usual crowd in the living room, among them Jim Brown and his retinue of arguers, and he withdrew to a corner through the predinner hour of sparkling conversation.

Sally joined in the festivities with her usual verve, talking animatedly with Mrs. Crafthouse and dodging the attentions of Jim Brown, who pursued her about the room with all the enthusiasm he would have had for a rare and just-dug-up anthropological bone of great value.

Regan was placed at the far end of the table during dinner, and found himself on the left of a slender, beautifully voiced gentleman who carved the roast with delicacy and who, as far as Regan could tell, was unable to do much else. Regan chewed his roast and ate his peas and finished with his coffee, thinking of the drive home and hoping it would be clear weather all the way so he could leave the top down and feel the cool night air.

Dinner broke up and Regan followed the others into the living room, and then he got mad, a slow, burning anger that started building up in him, and he wanted to get out and go to the hotel and grab his bags and go home. He didn't want to look at Sally Barton any longer, and he didn't like Mrs. Crafthouse and her bonbons, and he was afraid he would pinch Jim Brown between his thumb and forefinger if he looked at that gentleman just once more.

Regan walked across the living room and stood before Mrs. Crafthouse, who was bending over a large tank of water with Sally and Jim Brown. Regan said, "Sorry to bother you, ma'am, but I'm not feeling so well. I'll have to say good night."

"Just the man I'm looking for," Mrs. Crafthouse boomed, not hearing a word he spoke. "My goldfish are dying and Sally tells me you know fish."

"Pretty well," Regan said. "Why?"

"Here," Mrs. Crafthouse said. "This one has passed to the other land. Won't you take it along in the interest of science, Mr. Regan, and perform an autopsy and tell me what the poor dear died of?"

Regan accepted the dead goldfish and wrapped it in his handkerchief. "I'll take a look," he said. "Don't know what I'll find."

"Hmph," Jim Brown said.

With effort Regan held himself gentle. He said, "I'll say good night now, Mrs. Crafthouse. Thank you for a fine time."

Sally Barton turned and said, "Jack, are you going?"

Regan grinned weakly and said, "Time to push along, Sally. You'd better go home with someone else. Good-by."

"Good-by," Sally said.

"Adios, then," Regan grinned. "Be good."

REGAN went through the hall and outside to his car before she could say another word, and driving fast down the driveway and into the road that led to town, he remembered her face and eyes and how her mouth had trembled for no reason at all when he said good-by. He thought of the goldfish in his pocket and growled, "In the interest of science, Mr. Regan," and turned the corner into the hotel parking lot.

He slammed the car door and walked across the sandy parking lot toward the rear door of the hotel, and his nose tickled and he grabbed for his handkerchief and blew mightily, stopping the sniff and making his ears ring; and then he remembered the goldfish and felt for it.

The goldfish was in the sand and Regan was no spoilsport; he had played the fish lover for a week and he intended to take that goldfish to Texas and have his friend, the professor, examine it, and then send the data to Mrs. Crafthouse.

REGAN got out a package of matches and began lighting them and looking in the sand, and after ten matches and no goldfish, he looked up and saw the policeman standing over him with a curious, suspicious glint in his fat face.

The policeman said, "And what are you doing?"

"Looking for a goldfish," Regan said.

"A goldfish," the policeman said. "Look, bud, don't take another snort. Just get along home with you."

Regan was in no mood to dicker. He said, "I lost a goldfish. I had it in my handkerchief, where I put it when Mrs. Crafthouse gave it to me, and I blew my nose and the thing slipped out."

"Something slipped out, all right," the policeman said. "I think maybe it was you."

"Got a match?" Regan said. "I'm all out."

"Come on, bud," the policeman said. "I don't like jokes. Goldfish in the middle of the night and you want a match. I'll match you. We're going to the station house."

"Look," Regan said. "I lost a goldfish and I want it. Stop standing there with your bare face hanging out and give me that flashlight. All flatfeet carry 'em, don't they?"

"Flatfeet," the policeman said. "First it was goldfish, now I'm a flatfeet."

"Foot," Regan said. "And also in the head. Well, where's the light?"

"Where's the fish?" the policeman said. "Now wait a minute, this has gone far enough. Come on."

The policeman reached out for Regan and that was the beginning of the end. Regan had held everything back for a long time, and now it all seemed to boil up and blow through the crust of his timidity. The policeman had one hand on Regan's arm at the same time the patrol car stopped, and several curious people hesitated in the hotel patio to see what was happening. And Sally Barton and Jim Brown, with several of their friends, drove into the parking lot and saw Regan and the policeman, and came that way as if drawn by a magnet, which was mostly Sally hunting for Regan.

"Come on where?" Regan said, his voice very soft and sweet.

"To the station," the policeman said, and then the fun began.

Regan threw the policeman a good ten feet through the air into the nearest cactus plant. The policeman blew his whistle and the two policemen in the patrol car blew their whistles and came running, and all the curious people in the hotel patio came running, and Jim Brown and his friends came

Old Man in the Shade

By Ethel Barnett DeVito

Listening to young men, sometimes he thought
How arrogant their talk through which was strung
The creed that courage was only in the young,
Their special province, nowhere else begot—
Whereas he knew, how well he understood
That only the old lived danger:
when Death stalked
Behind their chairs, by every road they walked,
Masked as a stairway, or as a favorite food.

But sometimes he guessed this notion was no more
Than one of an old man's vagaries;
no doubt
He'd pluck Death's sleeve a hundred times before Death had the time to come and hear him out,
When, likely, Death would grumblingly be led
To find him where he best belonged—in bed.

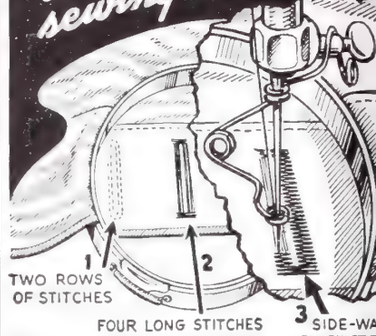
New EASY WAY Makes BUTTON HOLES with your own sewing machine!



Darn Stockings, Mend Tears, Attach Zippers and Sew On Buttons, too!
Once dreaded by every woman, now button hole making becomes as easy as basting them with this sensational new invention! You'll get twice as neat results in half the time, too! Fits any sewing machine . . . attaches in a moment. Simple to operate. Comes complete with hoop for darning stockings, a button hole guide and easy directions in picture. Test at our risk no and realize a new thrill in sewing.

New! Improved! NOW ONLY $1.00 NOTHING LIKE IT!

FREE NEEDLE THREADER. As a gift for prom action, you will receive with your order the marvelo time-saving, eye-saving needle threader. Don't wa but send your name today.

SEND NO MONEY — ORDER NOW. Just se your name and when you receive your new improv button hole attachment and gift needle threader, c posit only $1.00 plus C.O.D. charges thru postma Do this on the guarantee that if you aren't delighted every way, you may return purchase for full refur Or send cash with order, we pay postage. Special 3 for $2.50 NOW . . . Mail your name and address

LONDON SPECIALTIES, Dept. 31-A, 8505 S. Phillips, Chicago 17,

MONEY for YOU

Do you want extra cash?
Would you enjoy starting the
New Year with a roll of bills?

IF YOU want to earn $50 in the ne thirty days . . . if you want to ke on earning all through 1947 . . . send r your name and address on a postal. N charge for supplies, no expense to sta Address your postal now to

M. E. Nichols

CURTIS CIRCULATION COMPAN
Box 668, Independence Square, Phila. 5, F

FLOWER LOVERS
LILY Special
35c EACH 4 FOR $1.00 POST PAID
SUPERB—CALIFORNI
ESTATE LILIE
Now you can grow the same ma nificent satin white lilies formerl sold only to nurseries and florist Profuse blooming—hardy, self mu tiplying. An outstanding bulb offe order early. Money back guarante
35c ea.—4 for $1.00 postpai
'47 TREASURY OF GARDEN BARGAIN
Trees, shrubs, flowers, bulb Hundreds of special offers.
SEND FOR Free COPY TODAY
SPRING HILL Nurseries
TIPP CITY, O., Dept. M-

SAVOGRAN
REMOVER & BLEACHER
Renews Floors!
AT PAINT AND HOWARE STORES
WRITE FOR CIRCULAR K
THE SAVOGRAN CO., BOSTON 10, MASS.

GEE! IT'S Easy TO MAKE BIG MONEY THIS WA

No experience needed to earn splendid, year 'round income. Doehla's superb greeting cards, correspondence notes, gift wrappings sell themselves. 16 new $1 box assortments — you make up to 60¢ a box! Write for samples on approval. Make sales first day, or return at our expense.
HARRY DOEHLA CO.
Dept J-1, Fitchburg, Mass
Doehla Cards Birthdays Get Well Anniversari Gifts • Ba Sympathy • N

KNITTING YARNS Prompt Mail Serv
Send for FREE Samples
COLONIAL YARN HOUSE, 1231-R Cherry St., Phila. 1

unning; and Regan turned in the middle of hem and breathed a deep, happy sigh and lexed his shoulders.

Jim Brown came too close and Regan aught him by the nose and belt and swung im around three times and tossed him into he laps of the two fresh policemen; and then Regan began methodically, and with great elish, to take the joint apart.

He banged on the heads of the policemen vhen they tried to get up, and threw Jim Brown into the cactus beside the other po-iceman and tore the pants off Jim Brown's riends—an old and treasured trick of his—nd finally engaged in a beautiful and won-erfully satisfactory brawl with six new olicemen, the hotel detective, the assist-nt manager, and one traveling man from lbuquerque who got too near the center f the whirlpool and lost his balance and he sight of both eyes for seven days from hat date.

They finally roped and hog-tied Regan ith their arms and legs, and carted him ff to the police station, and Sally Barton ollowed, trying to make a decision between aughter and tears.

Regan paid his bail and came into the uter corridor some three hours later, after aking several long-distance phone calls to arious people in Texas who made several ng-distance phone calls to various people n New Mexico; and the policeman came in with the battered and practically unscaled goldfish and apologized profusely, and Regan gave the sergeant a hundred dollars to pay for cuts and abrasions and a few drinks for the boys.

Regan paused in the corridor and a timid voice said:

"Jack?"

Regan growled, "Yeah?" feeling very good inside, and then he whirled and saw Sally, and everything was black and no good for him. "Well," he said. "What do you want?"

"I want to be with you," Sally Barton said softly. "Do you mind?"

"Mind!" Regan said. "How do you mean that?"

"You're so timid," Sally said. "So very timid, Jack. Why didn't you tell me how you went wacky?"

"What for?" Regan asked testily. "If you mean with me, that means for keeps. Right?"

"Right," Sally Barton answered him. "For keeps."

Regan took her arm and they went out to face the rising sun.

Sally Barton grinned then and said, "One thing, Jack. Do you really know anything about fish?"

"Not the first stinking thing," Regan said happily. "But I'll show you a lot about something I really understand."

Bringing up Parents

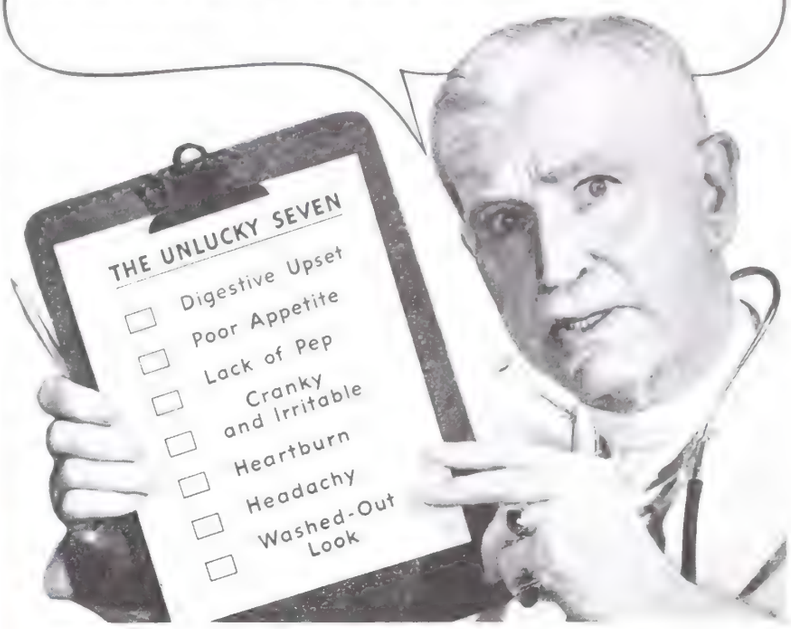
BY DR. BARBARA BIBER

Consultant Child Psychologist, Bank Street Schools, New York

You can make double trouble for your first-born by turning away his "embarrassing" questions about where the baby came from, with some story about the stork, the department store or the doctor's satchel. To a child, the appearance of a new baby on the family scene is like an act of magic, and his natural and healthy reaction is to want to know how it's done. Unless you want to take the chance of making life a perpetual mystery to him, he deserves a straight answer. Even very young children are ready to know that babies are born from their mothers—and that fathers play a part in the process. It's hard enough for any child to adjust to a new baby. He ought not to have the additional burden of confusing answers to his natural and important questions.

"His mother told him she got it here, and he insists on a refund."

WHICH OF THESE SEVEN SYMPTOMS DO YOU HAVE?



Each is a sign you may need the prompt gentle relief of Saraka!

Don't ignore any of the unlucky Seven Symptoms due to irregularity. They are nature's way of telling you that you may need the benefits of pure vegetable Saraka! At the very first sign of any of the Unlucky Seven, try Saraka! Millions know Saraka is so gentle and pure, so thorough and sure!

A Concentrated Combination of Pure Vegetables!

Saraka is entirely different from mineral oil, milk of magnesia, or psyllium seeds! It's a combination of two of the most effective pure vegetable ingredients, each with a distinct, necessary function. One acts much the same as beneficial, high-residue foods, like apples and dates . . . but in concentrated form! The other provides just the right amount of gentle smooth action needed to give the thoroughness you desire.

No Seeds, Oils or Harsh Chemicals!

There are no scratchy seeds, lazy oils, or harsh irritating chemicals in Saraka! Only 100% pure vegetable content. Thus, with Saraka, results are so nearly natural that most people have no sensation of ever having taken a laxative! And there's no two or three-day wait—Saraka usually works overnight to start your day right. That's why Saraka is the largest selling bulk-type laxative in the world. Your own doctor can tell you about Saraka's superiority!

Pleasant to Take! And So Economical!

Saraka is as pleasant to take as your favorite food! The tiny, tasteless granules can be swallowed right off the spoon, with water, or sprinkled on applesauce, cooked cereal, or fruit. Saraka is economical, too. The introductory 49¢ package contains 20 full helpings. Larger sizes are even more economical. Caution: Use only as directed. Get the original and genuine Saraka in the bright orange and yellow box today. At all drug counters.

Double your money back if not completely satisfied!

The Original Pure Vegetable

SARAKA

SO GENTLE AND PURE, SO THOROUGH AND SURE!

Beautiful Hair

B R E C K

We believe you will never again depend on an all-purpose shampoo after you have used one of the Breck Special Shampoos. The reason for this statement is very simple. Hair tends to be dry, oily or normal. Because of this, three Special Breck Shampoos have been developed. If your hair tends to be dry, we hope you will ask for Breck pH8 Lather Oil Shampoo. Be sure to ask for Breck Lacene Shampoo if it is oily. Should a normal hair and scalp condition exist, you will find Breck Regular Shampoo is useful. Thousands of women have found that the use of one of these special Breck Shampoos has helped them improve the appearance of their hair. The Breck Preparations offer you a complete line of preparations for the care of the hair — Shampoos, Hair Lotions, Hair Creams and Specialty Preparations — produced for those who want the best — gentle enough in their action to be used on little children.

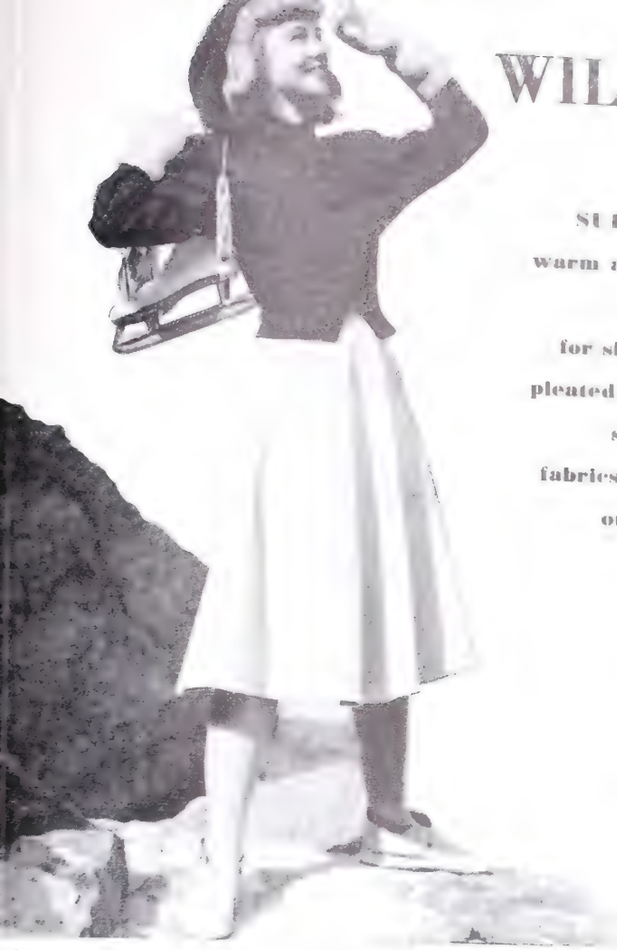
Now at leading Drug Stores, Dept. and Department Stores throughout the United States and Canada

JOHN H. BRECK, INC. • SPRINGFIELD 3 MASSACHUSETTS
CANADIAN LABORATORIES: 47 CLARENCE STREET • OTTAWA

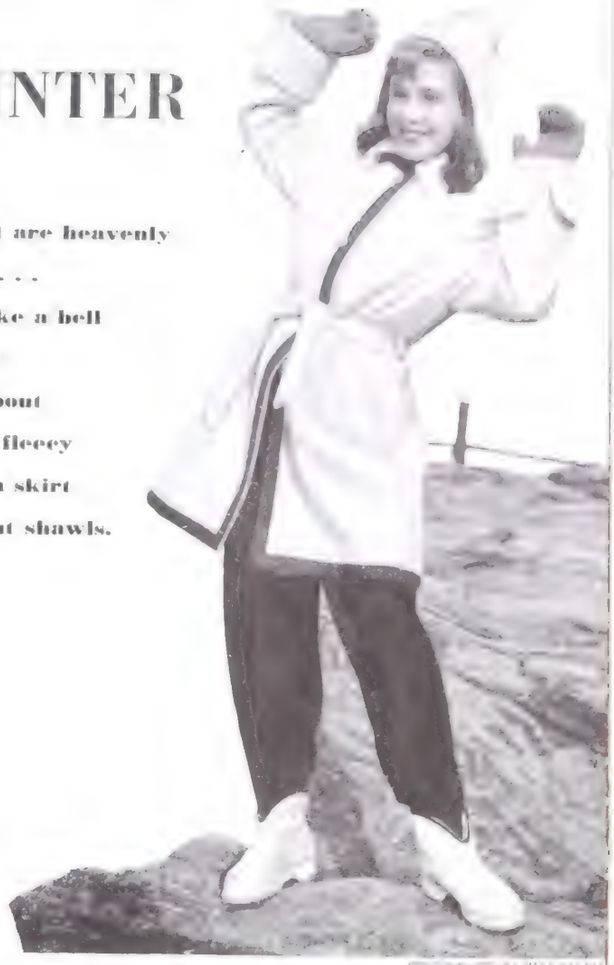
WILD ABOUT WINTER

By Josette Daly Lutz

SUB-DEBS are wild about hoods that are heavenly warm and do wonderful things for faces . . . about skirts that flare out like a bell for skating . . . about short, short plaid pleated skirts and tight, tight belts . . . about shoe-boots made of plaid or fur or fleecy fabrics . . . about bright yarn fringe on a skirt or a shawl . . . and really wild about shawls.



Skating belle: circular skirt in bright yellow wool with black wool basque top: Ceil Chapman design.



The haunting hood on a white fleece coat lined with green; matching snow pants; Mackey's white fur boots

Fun by the fire: fringed wool skirt and shawl by Greta Plattry, with felt slippers by Renée Montague.*

Strike a new match with plaid wool shawl and slippers to wear indoors with slacks and shirt.

Rave notices for short pleated skirt by Helen Morgan; Greta Plattry's cable-knit sweat

"I got kissed for this lighter cake but I could have kicked myself!"

"Jim simply raved about that cake I baked—and no wonder. It was as light as a cloud—moist and tender—and o-o-oh so deliciously rich! And all because I'd learned a bit of baking magic.

"Such EASY magic, too. I just used Crisco and a new Crisco Success Cake recipe. The combination's unbeatable! Why, you get better cakes on every count—richer, lighter, tenderer, moister. With Crisco, you see, you get cakes such as no other type of shortening can give you, because Crisco has a baking secret. And these new Success Cake recipes take special advantage of that secret.

"And think of it—Crisco's new recipes are quicker than old-fashioned ones, too. It takes only 4½ minutes to mix a Crisco Success Cake. Of course, Crisco is perfect with any recipe, but pure, all-vegetable Crisco plus the quick new Success Cake method is absolutely tops.

"I sure COULD have kicked myself! I [illegible], not [illegible] tried Crisco for cakes long ago. Why, I've always used it for frying. 9 out of 10 doctors, you know, say Crisco is digestible. And I'll depend on it for [illegible] cakes, pies and fried foods—Crisco improves all 3."

[illegible]

WHITE MAGIC CAKE WITH CHOCOLATE ICING

Don't worry if you've never made a cake this way before. Measure ingredients exactly . . . follow the simple directions carefully . . . be sure to use Crisco. Only with new Crisco can we promise you a better cake or your money back!

Measure into mixing bowl (All Measurements Level):

2 cups cake flour*
(sifted before measuring)
1⅓ cups sugar · ½ cup Crisco
1 tsp. salt · ⅔ cup milk

Blend vigorously by hand or with mixer (medium speed) 2 minutes. Now stir in eggs, all by itself:

3½ tsps. baking powder

Add: 4 egg whites (unbeaten)
⅓ cup milk · 1 tsp. vanilla

Blend by hand or in mixer (medium speed) for 2 minutes. The batter will be smooth and thin. Pour into two 9" layer pans (1½" deep) rubbed with Crisco and lined with waxed paper. Bake in moderate oven (360° F.) about 25 minutes. Frost with your favorite chocolate icing. Decorate with chopped nuts.

*Do not use emergency flour with this recipe.

Double-action or phosphate type (Calumet, Davies, Rumford, Clabber Girl, KC, etc.). With cream tape (Royal, etc.), use 4½ tsps.

SEND FOR CRISCO COOK BOOK. 64 pages of easy, sure-fire "Recipes for Good Eating," including more of these Success Cake recipes, for just 10¢ in coin. Address, Crisco, Dept. HJ, Box 837, Cincinnati 1, Ohio. Offer good in U. S., including Hawaii.

In everything you fry or bake

use Crisco...

it's digestible!

From generation to generation—at Green Leaves, "welcome" is more than a word; it's a way of life.

MEET THE BELTZHOOVERS, of Natchez, Mississippi

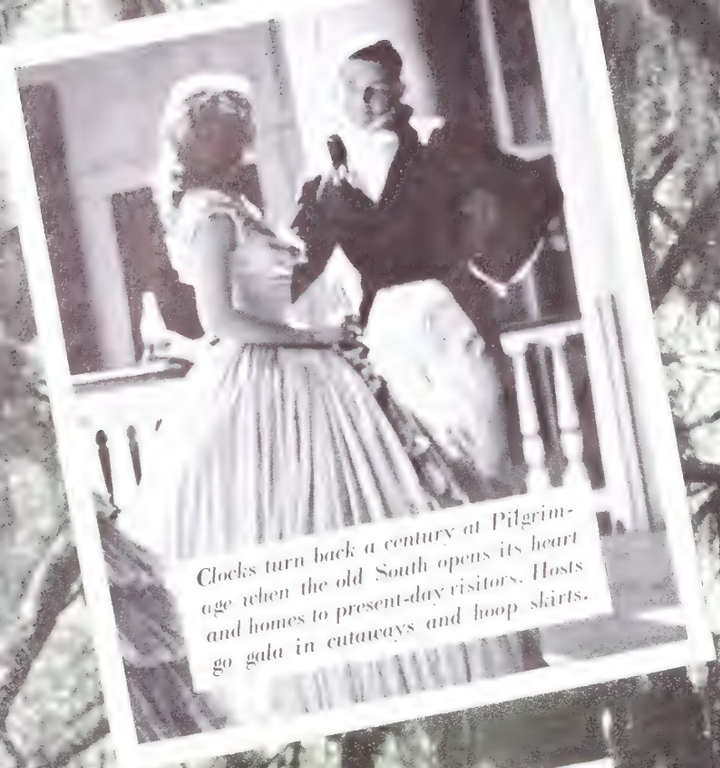
By Struthers Burt

IN the garden of Green Leaves, the Beltzhoover house in Natchez, Mississippi, is a live oak 351 years old. Tradition says this tree was the council oak of the Natchez Indian chiefs. Strong, verdant, catching and holding the light in the delicate fashion of live oaks, the tree seems a symbol of the South's finest qualities, endurance and regeneration, and of the endurance and courage of the family which for four generations now, ever since 1849, has owned and inhabited the gracious, tree embowered plantation house. A plantation house, like most of Natchez's plantation houses, situated in the town itself. The house is warm and solid and a part of the family; the family is solid and affectionate, and a part of the house. The tree, with its garden, a tapestry of iris and azaleas and camellias and japonica in the spring, completes the trinity. Along the huge lower branches of the tree the Beltzhoover spaniel and the Beltzhoover cat romp and chase each other in perfect amity. The tree, and the family, and the house have known much vicissitude and storm, along with many sunny, tranquil days. Many people have been born in the house, and have been married there, and have died in the house. Green Leaves witnessed intimately a terrible war. But the house still stands, and so does the family, and so does the tree.

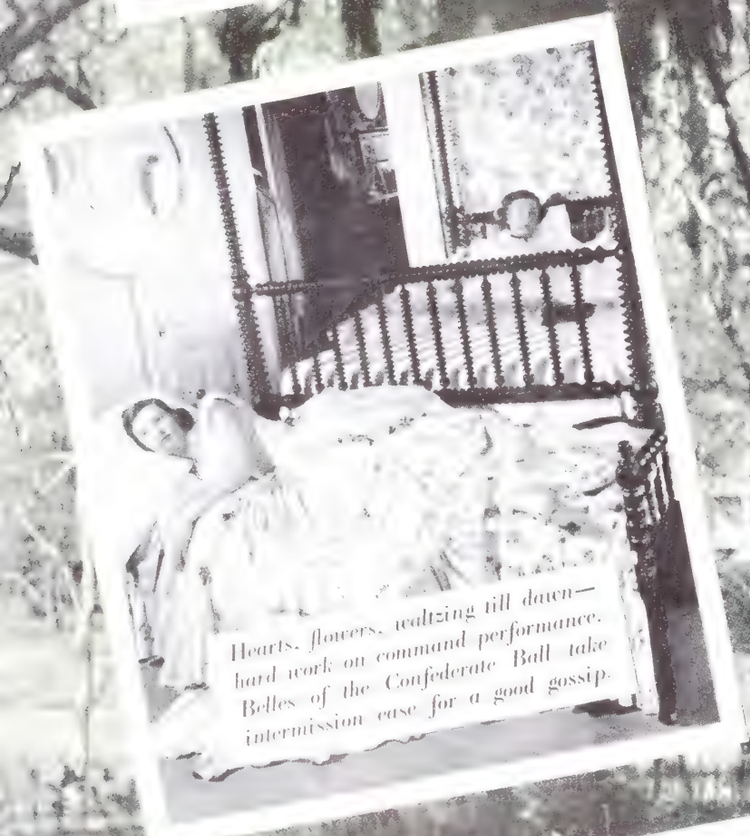
If the house has any ghosts—and it is old enough to have them—they must be gentle and affectionate ghosts, warmly approving of the young life that with each generation fills the house with laughter and hospitality.

No one can understand the South, especially such pools of tradition as Natchez, unless he understands the passion certain Southerners, a large

Yesterday's enchantment lives today at Natchez hospitality



Clocks turn back a century at Pilgrimage when the old South opens its heart and homes to present-day visitors. Hosts go gala in cutaways and hoop skirts.



Hearts, flowers, waltzing till dawn—hard work on command performance. Belles of the Confederate Ball take intermission ease for a good gossip.

Crinoline meets up with a workaday world. Beruhoovers recapture bygone glamour to guide Pilgrimage tourists through shrines of Confederate gaiety.

"In the South, a man's ancestors are his best friends"—and a century of festive ghosts are said to return for gala doings on Green Leaves' white-grilled galleries.

and widespread class, have for their texture and the coherence of their families. They wear their houses like their skin and bones. Nowadays, Green Leaves has entered another cycle of its existence and is once more largely in possession of a younger generation.

THOSE living there now are the golden-haired, still-young widow of Melchior Roch Beltzhoover, Sr., born Ruth Audley Britton Wheeler, of Natchez; her only son, Melchior Roch Beltzhoover, Jr.; his wife, born Mary Jane Butler, of "down country" Mississippi; and the youngest of the family, Virginia Lee Beltzhoover, aged eighteen. The household, however, circles about the elder Mrs. Beltzhoover and her invaluable adjutant, Crissie. We'll come to Crissie presently. Gently but firmly, unobtrusively, Mrs. Beltzhoover is still very much in control. But she is wise as a mother as in other respects. She recognizes her son as the male head of the house and is gradually turning over to him the numerous family affairs, including the family business, a most successful one, for which she was directly responsible.

Mrs. Beltzhoover is a remarkable person. She is a "career woman," and a brilliant one. A career woman, to be sure, made by chance, not choice, but one who through intelligence, and audacity, and grim, yet smiling, bravery turned the darkest sort of ill luck into good fortune. And she did all this not by restlessly fleeing to some great city, but by staying right at home and patiently gathering together, and improving, the broken remains of the assets left her. Her story is as heartening a one as you can come across. And yet, by all New York standards, no one seems less of a "career woman" than Mrs. Beltzhoover. Her soft voice, her gentle manners, practical wisdom of men are typically Southern. So [illegible] "no head for figures." Perhaps; but she has a very clear and imaginative head for buying and selling, and feminine styles; and for ten years she has run the biggest store of its kind in Natchez, and one of the leading stores in that part of the South: the Beltzhoover store, now known as the Natchez Department Store, but originally, and for many years, the old Famous & Price Store.

An odd name for a store, and one, naturally, that has led to the suggestion that under its present excellent management it should change its name once again, into Famous in Price. But not so odd, the original name. It was merely that one of the original partners was named Famous and the other Price.

Southern women are deceptive. They always have been. They are among the most resourceful and executive of American women. After all, it was they who for generations ran the hardest end of the huge plantations: the household end, in a period when most food was grown and processed at home, when most clothes and materials were homemade, and there was a multitude of house servants and field hands to be looked after. And after all, it was the Southern women who had most to do with lifting the South out of the dreadful slough of Reconstruction. Today it is the Southern women who are back of most of the reforms now spreading slowly but surely through the South; reforms in whose path are entrenched difficulties the rest of the country has difficulty in imagining.

To get the full impact of Ruth Audley Britton Wheeler's story it is necessary to remember that she was born to the complete tradition of the non-working Southern lady. She was a Natchez belle, and a belle still means something in the South, especially in places like Natchez. Furthermore, until ten years ago she was a wealthy and protected woman, the center of a fashionable circle in both Natchez and New York. She had had a fairy-tale youth and a fairy-tale marriage. She had married a gay, handsome, charming young man, the greatest catch in [illegible] Melchior Roch Beltzhoover, the son and grandson of rich men. "From the first time I set eyes on him when I was a little girl," says Mrs. Beltzhoover, "I knew I was going to marry him." She had gone to a children's party at Green Leaves. At the time the Beltzhoovers owned, in addition, an elaborate estate, Roachroane, at Irvington-on-the-Hudson. Green Leaves was their winter home.

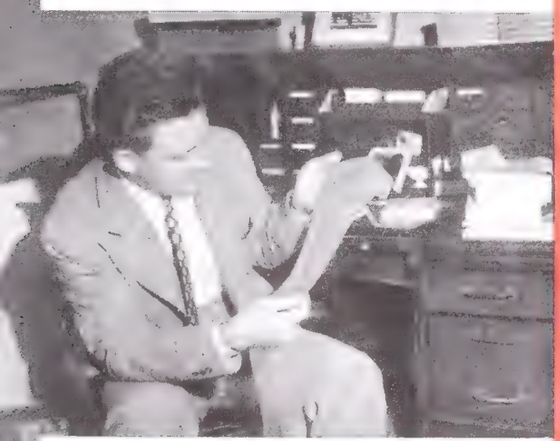
Like so many early Mississippians, bankers or cotton magnates, their family was part Northern and part Southern, although it speedily became Southern by tradition and point of view. Until 1803 and the Louisiana Purchase, Mississippi, like Louisiana, was foreign country, French and Spanish by turns. After 1803 it became a new American frontier; where the great river ran, an Eldorado of rich black soil, into which poured ambitious young men, many of them with their families, from all over the Southern and Northern seaboards. They found wealth beyond their greatest expectations, and within the next five decades indeed, until the very eve of the War Between the States built the magnificent mansions and plantation houses of which Natchez contains some thirty or more examples, for the most part beautifully preserved. Natchez was one of the centers of this princely wealth and princely way of living. And, to its good fortune, Natchez, because of cotton, has maintained throughout most of its history a fairly close connection with New York and the other financial centers of the country.

THE founder of the Natchez branch of the Beltzhoovers was George Washington Koontz, a young Pennsylvanian, born in Washington, in the western part of the state. He was the grandfather of Melchior Roch Beltzhoover, Sr., the beloved and charming, whose presence, only recently removed, still so dominates Green Leaves the house and the garden. George Washington Koontz immigrated to Natchez in the 1830's, and entered the bank of

The past goes on parade at the Confederate Ball, where the old Natchez rules again in scenes from the 1850's. The $3.00 admission tickets sell out twice weekly and, gendering a well-earned round of applause, even Skeptic admits that the pageant has given a pressed-out life to tarry and traditions.

"It certainly stretches" say those in the know about Southern hospitality. Weekdays, the Beltzhoovers' heirloom silver and hand-painted Audubon china are on display for connoisseurs of the antique. But Sunday evenings Ruth Audley "relaxes" with a probable minimum of forty guests. Any invitation is "standing" in Natchez, and no matter what the turnout, the edibles hold out.

"I had a career by chance, not choice." But in ten years as director of the Natchez Department Store, Ruth Audley has maintained her home, educated her children, convinced hard-to-convince local belles that fashion can flourish on Main Street.



"Getting down to business" is a welcome change for Melchior Beltzhoover, Jr. As a water tender on U. S. S. Bennington, he saw months of Pacific service. Now trading an engine room for an office, he'll learn from mother what puts the n in nylon.

Audley C. Britton, the present Mrs. Beltzhoover's grandfather. In 1849 he purchased Green Leaves. After the War Between the States the Britton Bank became Britton & Koontz, and flourished mightily, even after 1865, partly because of New York connections.

No one knows just how old Green Leaves is, but it was built sometime prior to the War of 1812: a long, spreading, one-story house, whose classic portico you reach from the street by a series of steps, ascending terraces planted with azaleas and live oaks. The house is in the shape of a square, one side missing, and the garden in the rear fills the missing side. The people of Natchez like their gardens in the rear, hidden and unexpected, so that they can make of them outdoor sitting rooms. From the front door, you look straight through a long hall, hung with family portraits, to the blaze of bloom which is the garden. To one side of the front door, at about the height of a man's head, is a bullet hole. This marks where George Washington Koontz stood, shortly after Appomattox, defending his house from a band of looting renegades.

But if no one knows just how old Green Leaves is, it is known who built it and his story.

The house was built by Jonathan Thompson, a wealthy cotton planter, and in a single day Jonathan Thompson and his entire family, his wife, all his children, were wiped out by one of the yellow-fever epidemics which, in those days, stalked on ghostly feet up the river from New Orleans. Jonathan Thompson's wife fell ill, and Jonathan Thompson sent for the doctor. By the time he came, Jonathan was dying, helpless beside the other members of his family, already dead.

GEORGE WASHINGTON KOONTZ married Mary Roane Beltzhoover, who had also been born in Pennsylvania, but whose family had moved to Natchez shortly before 1839. This was the first marriage between the Koontzes and the Beltzhoovers. George was a brilliant man, a leading figure in the Confederacy, an intimate friend of Jefferson Davis. During the war, he was sent by the Confederacy to Europe to negotiate loans.

Like all the old houses of Natchez, Green Leaves is a museum of priceless furniture, silver, portraits and mementos of all kinds. The Natchez families have persisted in an obstinate refusal to sell their beloved possessions. This has turned out to be a fortunate obstinacy. Among the various heirlooms at Green Leaves is a set of Audubon hand-painted china, a hundred pieces. In the library at Green Leaves is a glass-fronted cabinet containing a memorable Jefferson Davis and Lee collection: letters, documents, even a button from General Lee's uniform. In the cabinet, also, is the letter of amnesty, signed by President Johnson, restoring George Washington Koontz to American citizenship.

GEORGE WASHINGTON KOONTZ'S youngest daughter, Virginia Lee, married Melchior Stewart Beltzhoover, of Pittsburgh and New York, a cousin of her mother, and so we come again to Melchior Roch Beltzhoover, Sr., the son of this marriage. But first it is necessary to relate an incident concerning Melchior Stewart Beltzhoover, the father; to explain how the Beltzhoovers, like the Koontzes, came to make Green Leaves their permanent home, instead of merely a winter one; to point out and emphasize the curious family trait of instant audacity and courage. The ability to rise to the occasion—the refusal to allow malign Fate its way.

In 1905 Mississippi cotton was stricken by the boll weevil and Natchez money began to be ruined. In 1913 the town's First National Bank failed, and Britton & Koontz would have failed, too, had not Melchior Beltzhoover, the First, but without the Roch as a middle name, liquidated most of his New York assets and rushed them down to save the family institution. It is said that he even shipped barrels of gold and silver. When the run began on the bank, there was Melchior Stewart Beltzhoover, with all the money in the world, to meet it. After that, he lived in Green Leaves most of the time with his family.

His son, young Melchior Roch, graduated from Princeton in 1914, and a couple of years later married Ruth Audley Britton Wheeler, his childhood sweetheart; the little girl, grown up, who, seeing him first at a children's party, knew she "was going to marry him."

For twenty-eight years it was a perfect marriage. Everyone says that. Green Leaves Startling white was this pre-antebellum mansion in the friendly eyes of the great live oak. Under its boughs, the Natchez Indians once gathered for their tribal ceremonies. Spanish grandees outlined their bodies. Confederate planters discussed their crops. Now, festival guests sip drinks—coffee in the morning, Bloody Marys at noon, Daiquiris at the pool. Designed by Melchior Beltzhoover, Sr., to set off his famous gardens, the long, low lines of the house flow like a cascade between waterlilies, azaleas and crimson and white camellias drift with the wind. gardens. In long, low lines of the house flow like a cascade between waterlilies, azaleas and crimson and white camellias drift with the wind.

"We've got three industries in Natchez—cotton, oil and the Pilgrimage." And never believe that the last of these isn't a practical crop. In 1946, visitors left more than a million dollars behind with 75% divided among the 22 houses on display and 25% going to the Club. But town stresses its best profit: "By sharing it, our heritage can never die."

is a lovely place for a continuing honeymoon; a lovely place to entertain. Three children were born. The Beltzhoovers traveled a lot; they were in New York and at Irvington-on-the-Hudson a good deal, but Green Leaves was their home. Distinguished friends from all over the world came to stay with them. But Melchior Roch Beltzhoover was not an idle man. He worked hard in the family bank, took care of the large family interests. Like mos Mississippians—like his son, young Melchior Roch, Jr.—he was a great sportsman, a fine shot. In the hall at Green Leaves is a gun case filled with magnificent shotguns. And then one spring the Beltzhoovers drove over to the Kentucky Derby, and, coming back, out of a clear sky, Melchior Beltzhoover was stricken with a rare and fatal illness. For six months he was in a hospital, his wife by his side, and when he came back to Green Leaves, it was to stay most of the time on the wide, white-pillared gallery which, at the rear of the house, on two sides, faces the garden.

He was told he could no longer exercise. He was told he would have to take constant care of himself. If he did this, he might live several years longer. As a matter of fact, he lived nine. And sitting in a long chair on the gallery, this active, still comparatively young man changed his life. The garden became his main interest; his strong, flame-colored hold on reality. Before long he was one of the leading camellia experts of the world, developing ninety-nine new varieties. His other especial care was the live oaks. By scientific watering he proved you could increase their growth by many inches, no matter what their age. Botanists from everywhere came to see him, and interesting people of every description. He had always been a popular man. Now the garden gallery of Green Leaves grew to be a mecca. Jonathan Daniels, in his book, A Southerner Discovers the South, mentions as one of the high points of his travels sipping mint juleps with Melchior Roch Beltzhoover.

Another thing the man on the gallery did was to add the blue-walled swimming pool. In the spring, flame-colored azaleas drop into the swimming pool, and crimson and white camellias, and drift with the small winds.

Misfortune, however, does not come singly, as most of us know. These were the days of the depression, and gradually, at first almost imperceptibly, what with one thing and another, the family wealth began to slip away. Presently, with a shocking finality, there was not a single asset left but the shares in the Famous & Price Store, in which the Beltzhoovers until then had never taken more than a nominal interest. It was the least considered of their possessions; now it became an anchor, a rock, a lighthouse. Mrs. Beltzhoover did that. She saved Green Leaves, she protected her husband, she finished the education of her children. Before long she took over the store completely and became its owner, and began to expand it greatly with the help of an extremely capable young manager, a Northerner named Karl Brofofsky. Like all capable executives, Mrs. Beltzhoover knows how to choose her assistants.

But remember again that she was a mature woman when all this happened, and that she had had not one moment of business experience. She was unarmed except for her good taste, her desperate courage and her experience of the world. Calm outwardly, trembling in wardly, she went to New York to buy. The description of that first buying trip is a saga. Ruth Audley Wheeler Beltzhoover did not even know the terms used, the necessary quantities, in this strange new world, seen now no longer from the bird's-eye view of a rich and protected woman. This hard-boiled, competitive world of buying and selling! She learned as she went along by keeping her eyes open and her mouth shut, and by asking carefully thought-out leading questions. The sellers taught her, unaware that they had an innocent in their hands. But she bought beautifully from the first, spring and autumn, and pretty soon the store she had taken over, and all Natchez, began to respond. Tradition, and good taste, and knowledge of the world are, after all, important assets.

And so Ruth Audley Wheeler Beltzhoover protected the remaining years of her husband, and educated her children, and preserved Green Leaves. That's something of a story, isn't it? It shows what a woman can do, especially if she has a stricken husband, and children to educate, and a home to preserve.

Now Mrs. Beltzhoover is as well known in New York buying circles as she was once well known in New York drawing rooms.

Melchior Roch Beltzhoover, Jr., ever since his discharge from the Navy, has been working in the family store, preparing eventually to take over. The youngest member of the family, Virginia Lee, a tall, quiet, good-looking blond girl, has also entered the store. She has just graduated from Finch Junior College, in New York, where, very wisely, her mother sent her to study fashions and merchandising. The fourth member of the (Continued on Page 160)

Walt Disney

presents

AN EPOCHAL EVENT IN SCREEN HISTORY

SONG OF THE SOUTH

His first live-action feature... a great musical drama in Technicolor including animated tales of

UNCLE REMUS

For the first time Walt Disney creates a romantic live-action musical drama... filled with all the warmth, gaiety and laughter of old plantation days. You'll lose your heart to two exciting new stars—Bobby Driscoll and Luana Patten. You'll hear new song hits including "HOW DO YOU DO"..."UNCLE REMUS SAID"...and others. And the whole family will roar with laughter at Br'er Rabbit, Br'er Fox and Br'er Bear—in the famous Uncle Remus tales that are so delightfully woven into the real-life story. "Song of the South" is the kind of picture you'll want to see again and again. Released through RKO Radio Pictures.

*Zip-a-dee-doo-dah! Zip-a-dee-ay! My oh my what a wonderful day! Plenty of sunshine heading my way! Zip-a-dee-doo-dah, zip-a-dee-ay! Mister Bluebird on my shoulder! It's the truth, it's actually the truth! I feel good, knew I would, now I know I've got to sing a song! Whistle a happy tune, and every step you take, every move you make, every day of your life, you're gonna find out bluebirds keep singing at you! Zip-a-dee-doo-dah, zip-a-dee-ay! Wonderful feeling, wonderful day

Since 1899 they have met the Test of Time

Glad Awakening . . . when sheets are fresh-feeling, sleepy-soft as a dream . . . when they wear well, wash well, stay beautiful—when they're THOMASTON Sheets . . . Ask for them by name at your favorite store—a quality for every purse and purpose.

THOMASTON Fabrics

ALSO MAKERS OF THOMASTON "Pedigree" PRINTED TABLECLOTHS AND BEDSPREADS

KEEP YOUR BATHROOM fresh and sweet

✓CLEANS TOILET BOWLS WITHOUT SCRUBBING
✓BANISHES TOILET ODORS

GOOD EQUIPMENT Needs a PREMIUM OIL

HOUSEWIVES!
• RUSTPROOF
• LUBRICATE
• CLEAN
Iron ornaments and light appliances with

FIENDOIL

Economical 3 oz. spout can 40c
At your Department, Hardware and Sports Store
McCambridge & McCambridge Co. Baltimore 23, Md.

Guaranteed by Good Housekeeping

OSTERMOOR
BUILT! NOT STUFFED
Since 1853
AMERICA'S QUALITY MATTRESS
See your Local Dealer . . . or write Ostermoor & Co., Bridgeport, Conn. or Chicago, Ill.

The beauty of it is that in a luxurious, comfort Ostermoor you get premium quality at a standard price.

FEMININITY BEGINS AT HOME

By Louise Paine Benjamin

FEMININITY, in spite of the title of this article, does not begin at home, but in back of that, in the mind. It is an attitude. It is a feeling about living and, in particular, a feeling about one's relationship to people—including men. As nearly as I can discover, it is a true and delicious womanliness which causes its possessor to feel she is lucky to be a woman and, therefore, a potential sweetheart, wife and mother.

Just being born to wear skirts doesn't make a woman truly feminine. It is, rather, the conviction on the part of a girl child from her kindergarten days upward that she should take pride and satisfaction in her sex. Her whole future happiness will be largely determined by this ability, and willingness, to respect herself as woman, instead of feeling that she is in a race against man, and handicapped, at that. True femininity does not compete with man, but prefers to co-operate, or, better yet, to enlist his co-operation—charmingly.

It has so often been said that Southern women have a knack of developing and utilizing their feminine attributes, that it is worth while to consider their viewpoint. Not that they have a monopoly on engaging manners, but natural aptitude plus training has given them a well-deserved reputation. Nor is it all done with droopy eyelashes and a cream-caramel accent. The girls go about it with practical realism. They probably always did, in spite of the magnolia-blossom tradition about fragile Southern womanhood.

The truth is that in the days of great plantations and innumerable servants, the woman whose husband was a big landowner needed to be a gifted executive. She had a whole community to watch over. She had to understand wholesale planning and ordering and be thoroughly versed in all sorts of domestic crafts that machinery and electricity have done away with. She had a working knowledge of first aid, for the doctor was often miles away by horseback. She helped the servants with their spiritual problems. She had to be as ready as a hotel owner to entertain unexpected guests.

With it all, she held tightly to her femininity. She refused to look like a high-powered executive. Instead, she was canny enough to see that her setting, clothes and manners bespoke her a cherished woman; she recognized blandishment as a better weapon than any bludgeon.

In the South of today the words may be different, but the music, so to speak, is the same. Girls are still taught that there is nothing lovelier in the world than a lovely girl. So why not be one? At Southern Seminary, in Virginia, where there is a perfect flower garden of girls under constant cultivation in the direction of well-rounded womanhood, the director, Mrs. Margaret Durham Robey, mixes tradition with a nice sense of present-day needs.

Here are examples of some of the nuggets of wisdom Mrs. Robey deals out as occasion arises:

First step to pretty manners is a thorough grounding in conventions. Etiquette can be treated lightly only after you know all the rules. Learn the accepted way to meet and introduce people, say good-by and go through the other routines of polite society before you introduce any casual touches. Even then, remember there is a lot of difference between informality and intimacy.

"Dress up for a fight"—which doesn't mean a scrap, but a challenge of any kind. The better groomed you are, the more confidence you have in yourself on an important occasion. And if you look your best all the time you will be ready for an unexpected opportunity!

Be especially nice to older people, not only for their own sakes but because you are quite likely to learn something from them that will make you more interesting to your own generation.

A man may not keep chasing the trolley he has caught, but neither does he run after one that is standing still. Give the illusion of pursuit—delicately!

Never ignore your current partner in favor of more attractive possibilities in the stag line. Make yourself look so sweetly engrossed in the person you are with that every man watching you will wish he were that man.

A pleasing voice is one of woman's greatest assets. Only an empty mind resorts to slanginess or profanity.

Learning games that can be played only on teams doesn't make a true sportswoman. You can't count on having a team around all your life. Learn at least one sport that is socially useful: riding, swimming, tennis, golf and, of course, dancing. The more things you know how to do, the more easily you fit in with a crowd. This makes you a much pleasanter guest to have around.

As to being a guest, the first rule about being one is to be sure you have your invitation, and that you know exactly when, and how long, you are asked to stay. Don't ever take an invitation or the length of your visit for granted.

Cultivate the spiritual side of your life by regular attendance at some form of worship and by faithful participation in charity activities. There come moments in every life when there is need of spiritual strength and comfort, and it will mean much to you to be able to find a steadying belief within yourself.

While the teen age is admittedly more susceptible to training than the later years, it is still a wholesome idea to check up once in a while and see how one is making out in a given field. If you feel you are growing more—or less—feminine with the passing years, take a look at the following questions. They do not offer a complete diagnosis, but a few good clues.

HOW FEMININE ARE YOU?

1. Do you consider yourself complimented when you are told you "have brains like a man"?

Why should you? Men have wonderful brains for all kinds of powerful enterprises, but women are generally conceded to have a sensitivity and special kind of quickness all their own. Even in the animal kingdom. Remember, the best Seeing Eye dogs are female!

2. Do you resort to tears as a useful weapon in an argument?

A woman's tears have all the weight of tradition behind them, but a modern woman who can't find a better method of persuasion admits to a highly limited diplomatic equipment. The honeyed word was ever better than dripping eyes—and nose. Dreadful destroyers of beauty!

t that, a weeping woman is to be ed to a shouting or sarcastic one.

you expect extra consideration traveling just because you are a n? The services of the only bag- porter? First chance at the sta- axi?

ances are that if you are a pleasant- ing, nice-mannered sort of per- ou will find things made easier for tomatically. But if you demand spe- vors as your right, you may get a gh snubbing from an otherwise decent male. Do you really blame you resentful when a man fails move his hat in an elevator, or you are not offered a seat in a subway?

gallantries are undoubtedly agree- ut not always practical. Consider an in a crowded elevator: even if by ni-like manipulation of his arms he nem enough to get his hat off, where oing to hold it? Also, we must ad- owever regretfully—that in being ed the opportunity of hustling right t the male elbow in pursuit of a pay e, we may have forfeited some of tler considerations.

you often use the excuse of ng a headache" when you wish out of an irksome duty?

lest you fall into a pit of your own g. By leaning too heavily on this excuse, you will have nothing to hen an occasion of real distress ar- and will get very little sympathy ou crave it most.

hen a man pays you a heavy- d compliment in public, do you graciously (however bored), t him lightly, or pin back his ith a sharp quip?

ore foolish you, if you give way to of the latter temptations, for no how stupid the offender or how lit- care for his particular opinion, you ourself down in the eyes of the by- rs as a woman of uncertain temper ould rather be clever than kind. ery mother's son shies away from a with a two-edged tongue.

you think quickly on the tele- when pressed to do, or buy, hing which doesn't interest you, so that you can say "No" without leaving a sting?

Ah, there is woman's wit at its best. They must be so, since most men declare they would rather be shot than have to extricate themselves from a high-pressure telephone approach.

8. Are you tempted to offer to go Dutch on a meal check when you know your escort has a small salary?

Don't do it. Make it up in other ways: with return entertainment in your own home, or with other forms of hospitality which your woman's ingenuity can devise. No proud male wants to feel that his dinner companion believes he is financially inadequate—but he appreciates a smart girl who keeps a kindly eye on the right-hand column of the menu!

9. Do you give instructions to the waiter, or the taxi driver, when you are with an escort?

At the risk of biting off your tongue, don't. Deference to male authority in public places is one of the prettiest gestures a woman can make—also one of the best investments, since a man feels like doing ten times as many things for an agreeable companion who acts pleased with his management as for a bossy one.

10. Do you make a point of proclaiming, in mixed company, "Thank goodness, I know how to look after myself and don't have to ask any favors from anybody!"?

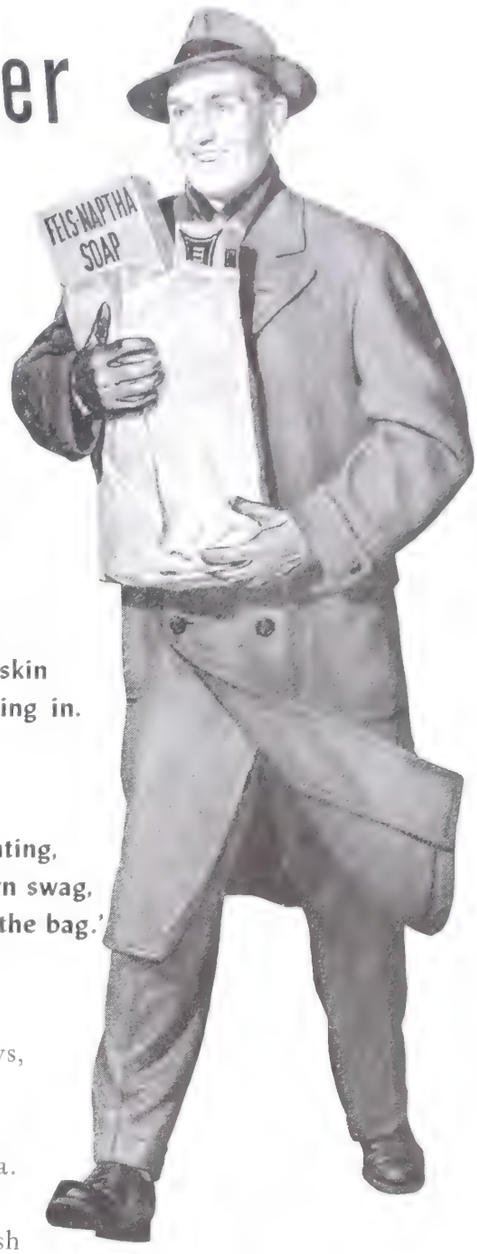
That is probably the No. 1 rule for what not to do, if you wish to reap the delightful rewards of true femininity. No, silly, no one wants you to go simpering around with downcast eyes and a look of being too, too helpless. But any man worth his salt has inherited a touch of the When Knighthood Was in Flower strain from his forebears, and thrives on having a sense of responsibility where womenfolk are concerned. Why freeze willing males off with a loud boast of independence, and do yourself out of a lot of pleasant and helpful attention? Of all laborsaving devices ever invented for women, none has ever been so popular as a devoted man!

You may not accept all the foregoing conclusions, but if you are in agreement on the majority, it is a safe bet that you are equipped with enough femininity to hold your own in any market, including the matrimonial. If you are too much out of line, better relax a little. You may be too aggressive for other people's comfort, and your own happiness.

"Mom, I've decided NOT to be a bachelor!"

The Good Provider



Bye, baby bunting,
Daddy's gone a-hunting
To get a little rabbit's skin
To wrap the baby bunting in.

* * *

Bye, baby bunting,
Daddy's back from hunting,
He landed 'baby' modern swag,
He has Fels-Naptha 'in the bag.'

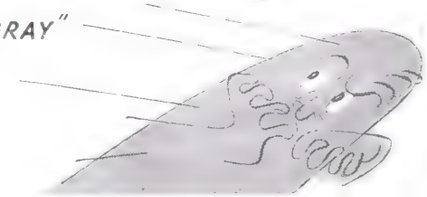
Even if a man can't manage mink these days, he might do a fair job just keeping 'the little woman' in Fels-Naptha. To a housekeeper faced with a big wash this grand laundry soap is almost priceless.

There's magic in the simple word naptha—when it's blended with good mild soap, the Fels way. Magic that makes dirt do a disappearing act—that makes your washing machine a 'quick change' performer.

When buying laundry soap means hunting instead of shopping—Fels-Naptha is the prize 'catch.'

Fels-Naptha Soap

BANISHES "TATTLE-TALE GRAY"



FULL FLAVOR
HEATS FROM ALL SIDES
Heats evenly. Flavor-laden steam rises to the moisture-sealed lid, falls back again and again to flavor and reflavor food.

New "Yum-m" in Fried Chicken with Club Aluminum

White meat juicy. Drumsticks tender. Crispy-brown crust all over. That's chicken fried the Club way!

For Club Aluminum Hummercraft Waterless Cookware can give you more of the natural Full Flavor in any food. More of the natural vitamins and minerals, too. No cooking odor. Cooler kitchen. Less pot-watching—more leisure for you. And the Club method also gives lower fuel costs.

Look for that silvery hammered finish, which will make you proud as a peacock of your cooking ware.

More than three million women own Club Aluminum. Have you started your set, yet? Club makes a perfect gift, too. Nine popular pieces now available at leading retailers.

...UMINUM PRODUCTS COMPANY • CHICAGO 14, ILLINOIS

Other distinctive Club lines . . . Club Glass Coffee Makers
...ub Coffee Dispensers . . . Club Household Cleaners and Polishes
Tune in "Club Time," ABC Network, Monday mornings

PHOTOS BY ST...

Mrs. Melchior Beltzhoover inspects just a bit of the magnificent old silver t... adorns the dining room at Green Leaves. It is used and enjoyed constan...

Shining Example

BY JUDY BARRY

SILVER gleaming like satin, furniture of rich, mellowed woods are truly a joy, but also a care forever, as the mistress of many a great Natchez mansion could tell you. Here are the secrets of keeping them beautiful, whether they're heirlooms or wedding-present new, some told to us by the curator of the American Wing in New York's Metropolitan Museum, some gleaned from generations of practice at Green Leaves.

MOST of us possess only one or two or three of such precious heirlooms and antiques as completely surround Mrs. Melchior Beltzhoover, mistress of beautiful Green Leaves. Quantities of softly gleaming old silver, quantities of richly hand-carved furniture, hundreds of pieces of fragile Audubon china painted by the great man himself, enormous mirrors framed and festooned with gold leaf—these are the daily bread of the Green Leaves family. Mrs. Beltzhoover says casually of these treasures that leave most of us breathless:

"Antiques are easy to live with. One more ring on a table that's held mint juleps for generations doesn't really matter. The tip of a French porcelain angel's wing broken? We'll mend it with a bit of tape—that angel has been flying for a hundred years! They've all lived so long I just enjoy them and let them live longer happily!"

In many of the great Natchez houses, museum pieces of old silver, china, furniture and bric-a-brac are thus taken for granted by their possessors. They're lived with, loved and used every day, as they have been for generations. This, indeed, probably accounts for much of their beauty—that extra bloom that china, wood or silver, no less than children, acquires with love and constant devoted care.

Use it, polish it, use it. This truly is the best protection you can give silver. Silver is no fragile flower—much of the Green Leaves silver has lived through five generations of washing and polishing.

Because it is a porous metal, skillful polishing not only removes tarnish but tones down and blends together the tiny scratches that come with use, giving it depth and luster.

There are many good silver-cleaning creams and liquids, and some good polishing cloths. The museum uses a fine soft cream, or a polishing cloth which is impregnated with jewelers' rouge. Other experts like a liquid type because there is no deposit left to remove from the more ornate pieces, as there is with cream. Just be sure that whatever type choose is fine and velvet-smooth, out any coarse gritty abrasives.

e chemical method of silver ning consists of putting it into an inum pan containing boiling water a tablespoonful each of salt and g soda to each quart of water. It is sary that each piece of silver touch r the aluminum or another piece is in contact with the aluminum. re is a new product for cleaning chemically which may be used hot, not boiling water, and a small inum plate or piece of aluminum This method removes tarnish ly and easily, and according to ex- who have performed careful tests, grains of silver are removed than the mirrors—hot water, am- nia, chamois, tissue and Henry.

bbing. Many connoisseurs do not ove of it, however, for they feel in time it destroys the satiny n and aging "tone" of the metal. emical methods should never be on patterns with an oxidized finish h outlines decorative details, or on are with hollow handles. It should ed on the plainest of patterns only when the metal has become blue- with tarnish.

arnish is caused by sulphur its compounds. They are pres- n the air and in many foods, es- lly eggs, as you've undoubtedly ed after breakfast each morning. e are little packages of treated r, very convenient to use on the [illegible] tipped tip of [illegible] just wipe them off with a fresh sheet of the paper while they're wet, then rinse thoroughly.

Some tarnish makers can be avoided by being a bit careful. Don't handle polished silver if your hands are perspiring freely. Don't put your silver on a rubber mat, or use rubber bands around its flannel or tissue-paper wrappings. And never let a pencil with a rubber eraser stray into the silver drawer.

Salt is another enemy of silver. Instead of leaving a tarnish film, as sulphur does, it's corrosive and actually etches the surface, making it very difficult to polish the silver smoothly. Don't keep salt shakers in the same drawer with silver if there is any possibility that spilled grains may sift about among your forks and spoons.

The silver was the butler's pride and joy in the days of butlers, and its beauty one of the means by which his efficiency was judged. Often hours of hand-rubbing, actually with the bare hand, using no cloth or polish, produced the rich color and mellow finish of silver that is now museum treasure. A present-day bride's new silver very likely already has a "butler finish." This is the name of a fine lustrous glow applied by modern methods of manufacture to simulate the effect achieved by the long hand-rubbing of olden days. It's produced by buffing with carefully selected abrasives. Thus our modern

Continued on Page 111

Cora gives mahogany polish occasionally, plenty of elbow grease.

★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★

bor of love. Anne and Virginia, great-granddaughters of Green Leaves, finish an antique cradle for the new great-great-granddaughter.

NOW! YOU CAN MAKE Real CHILI CONCARNE AND OTHER DELICIOUS MEXICAN DISHES

WITH THIS Original GEBHARDT SEASONING

Genuine Flavor-Rich ANCHO CHILI PEPPERS are grown and sun-dried in Mexico especially for Gebhardt

Gebhardt's Chili Powder brings you the concentrated flavor of genuine, imported Mexican ancho chili peppers and other spices blended by the exclusive Gebhardt process into an original and complete seasoning for Chili con Carne and other Mexican dishes.

Keep a bottle of this famous seasoning handy . . . use it to duplicate the flavor secrets of real Mexican cookery. Try it in the famous Gebhardt Mexican recipes packed with every bottle. Use it to add new flavor-zest to your stews, sauces and gravies.

MADE IN SUNNY SAN ANTONIO SINCE 1896 BY GEBHARDT CHILI POWDER CO.
Write for Free Recipe Book

Famous MEXICAN RECIPES PACKED with EVERY BOTTLE

Gebhardt's EAGLE CHILI POWDER

They're here

the Famous DAZEY Kitchen Helps

The Ice Crusher

Easily crushes ice cubes fine, medium or coarse...sturdy... rustproof...an unusual gift item. In white enamel..$5.95

The Super Juicer

Spins the juice quickly from citrus fruits...strains pith and seeds with a single action... easy to clean...sturdily built. No 100 Plastic.....$3.25

The DeLuxe Can Opener

Prevents jagged edges . . . holds cans firmly, swings aside when not in use. Guaranteed 5 years $2.25

*Repair, sharpening or replacement guaranteed for only a 25c service charge if defective.

All 3 Fit 1 Bracket — The famous Dazey "One-For-All" Wall Bracket fits all Dazey Kitchen Helps . . holds them firmly in place. Change in just a few seconds

Buy these Dazey Kitchen Helps at your hardware or department store.

DAZEY Products

DAZEY CORP., ST. LOUIS, MO.

There's a world of happy eating in Derby Steak Sauce . . . a drop or two glorifies a steak . . . a spoonful (stirred in while cooking) gives leftovers the "come hither" of a brand new dish. Send for Free Recipe Book.

GLASER Derby Steak Sauce

● Steak Sauce... Barbecue Sauce... Hot Sauce Worcestershire Sauce... Chop Suey Sauce
GLASER, CRANDELL CO., Chicago 8, Dept. B1

FIRST AID FOR CLEVER COOKS

Flavor! Nutrition!
Econom-e-e!
Blue Bonnet Margarine gives "ALL 3"

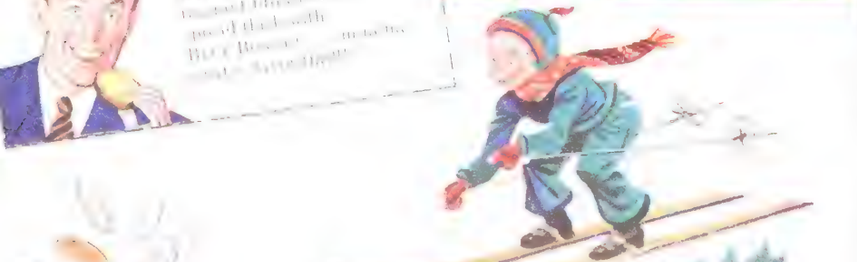
Flavor– delicious flavor! Fresh, delicate, country-sweet. And BLUE BONNET keeps its fresh, sweet flavor even when half-melted on piping-hot foods.



Nutrition– proved nutrition! BLUE BONNET is rich in Food-Energy, rich in Vitamin A, just the kind of food growing youngsters, everybody needs!

BLUE BONNET comes white—color for table use.

Econom-e-e– yes, you save real money with BLUE BONNET! And you get so much in return... delicious flavor, proved nutrition!

Charming Ruth Tudley Beltzhoover, mistress of Green Leaves, takes great pride in this family treasure—the famous china service hand-painted by Audubon. Each piece is different.

CULINARY COLLECTION

By Louella G. Shouer

THE spacious high-ceilinged dining rooms of the romantic old houses in Natchez, Mississippi, tell a story of their own—a story of gracious living, hospitality and fine food beautifully served. In the old-fashioned kitchens adjoining, generations of colored cooks have produced an endless array of the good food for which this part of the South is famous. They are proud of their cookery traditions, handed down from mother to daughter, and a family recipe is considered just as much a treasure as the mirrored mahogany dining table or the stately silver candelabras that grace it.

If you collect regional recipes with as much enthusiasm as you do Chelsea teacups or first editions, you'll want to add these few from Mississippi kitchens. Collections grow. That's the thrill of it.

No collection of old Southern dishes would be complete without a jambalaya, which is a rice specialty laced with oysters, shrimp, ham or chicken. There are many variations of this dish. It mostly depends on who is making it and what you have on hand.

In the collection of old family Natchez recipes, we found a recipe for Miss Mary's Oyster Jambalaya. I can't tell you about Miss Mary, but I'm sure you'll agree she was an excellent cook.

MISS MARY'S OYSTER JAMBALAYA

Melt 1 tablespoon butter or margarine in a skillet. Add 4 slices bacon cut into pieces. Cook bacon until just about done; remove from pan. Fry 3 tablespoons chopped onions in the fat. Return bacon, add 3 dozen oysters. Cook over low heat until oysters are just plumped—no more than 4 minutes. Add 2 tablespoons tomato paste; stir in 3 cups freshly cooked rice. Season with salt and pepper. Mix with 2 forks. Cover and set in warm place for 20 minutes before serving to blend the flavors. A double boiler would be good. Serves 6-8.

Hope Farm Jambalaya, according to Mrs. Balfour Miller, is usually made with ham. This dish appears on the table when the time comes to use up the last of a baked ham. There's no set rule as to quantity of ham. With the jambalaya, you will want to serve delicious little corn cakes if you want a truly Mississippi meal.

HAM JAMBALAYA WITH CORN CAKES

For the jambalaya, grind what ham you have left—it will probably be about 2 cupfuls, if you've eaten the ham about down to the bone. Measure half as many onions (1 cupful), chopped. Sauté the onion with 2 or 3 slices bacon cut into small pieces. Add 1 quart canned tomatoes and 2 tablespoons minced parsley. Simmer together about 15 minutes. Add 3 cups freshly cooked rice that has been rinsed in boiling water and drained. Season up well with salt, pepper, Worcestershire and Tabasco sauce. (All Mississippi cooks lean heavily on Worcestershire and Tabasco—use it as New Orleans cooks use herbs.) Add the ham. Pour into casserole and bake in moderate oven, 350° F., until liquid is absorbed and rice browns on top—about 45 minutes to one hour.

For the corn cakes: Sift 2 cups white corn meal (down South they use nothing else but! Yellow corn meal just isn't considered) with ½ cup flour, 2 teaspoons baking powder and ¾ teaspoon salt. Add 2 cups milk to make a thin batter. Then add 1 egg, beaten, and beat up well. Drop by tablespoonfuls into hot shortening or salad oil. The fat shouldn't be as deep as for fritters or doughnuts, but deeper than for sautéing. When brown on one side, turn lightly and brown on the other side. Drain. Serve with butter or margarine as an accompaniment for jambalaya and en vegetable. They are wonderful for eakfast, too, with butter or margarine, ple sirup and sausages.

With the Mississippi right at their very or and the Gulf of Mexico not too far ay, it's no wonder the colored cooks of tchez work so many miracles with fresh and sea food. Their ways with shrimp d red snapper as well as river bass rival se with ham and chicken. Here's a ipe for a subtly seasoned baked stuffed , a way to use up leftover fish—specialty the Monmouth House—and a way I'll ger you never thought of serving shrimps.

BAKED STUFFED BASS

Wash a 1½ to 2-pound bass (any bakable could be used). Brush it inside and out h salad oil. Sprinkle with salt and pep-. Make a stuffing of following: Cut 2 es bacon fine. Fry. Add 1 cup dry bread mbs, 1 hard-cooked egg, chopped, 1 on, chopped, 1 tablespoon melted but- or margarine, 1 teaspoon chopped pars-, ¼ teaspoon thyme, 1 teaspoon Wor-tershire sauce and 3 tablespoons chicken ck or broth made from chicken-bouillon es. Season well with salt and pepper. uff the fish and sew or skewer edges to-her securely. Place fish in a well-greased king pan; dredge lightly with flour and with butter or margarine. Bake in hot n, 400° F., 30 minutes. Serve with lemon tter. Serves 4. Double quantity of stuff-for larger fish.

MONMOUTH FISH WITH RICE

To 2 cups flaked cooked fish add ½ cup am, 1 cup cooked rice. Mix well and son with salt and pepper. Heat up well. r in 2 beaten egg yolks. Stir until thick-ed over low heat. Serve with lemon. ves 4–6.

BELL PEPPERS WITH SHRIMP FILLING

Split and seed 4 large green peppers. rboil them in salt and water. Fry one all onion until golden in 2 tablespoons tter or margarine. Add 1 clove garlic, nced, 1 teaspoon minced parsley, 3 ge peeled tomatoes, chopped, or 1 No. can tomatoes and ¼ cup fine bread mbs. Simmer until all are cooked. ason with 1 teaspoon salt and some pep-r. Stir in 1 well-beaten egg and 1 cup arsely chopped cooked or canned rimps. Stuff peppers with this savory xture and top with additional buttered ead crumbs. Bake in moderate oven, ° F., about 20 minutes. Serves 6–8.

If you ask for potatoes down South you get sweet potatoes. Here is one way they are sometimes prepared way down upon the Mississippi.

MISSISSIPPI SWEET POTATOES

Boil 6 medium-sized sweet potatoes or yams in their jackets until tender. Peel and slice them ¼ inch thick. Place in greased baking dish. Make a sirup of 1 cup brown sugar, ½ cup hot water, 1 teaspoon cinnamon and 1 tablespoon lemon juice. Add ¼ cup butter or margarine and 1 teaspoon salt. Pour over the potatoes. Bake in moderate oven, 350° F., until the sirup glazes the potatoes and they are clear and shiny looking. Baste occasionally. It takes about 45 minutes. Serves 6–8.

The sideboards in the Natchez dining rooms are so ample in length one dreams of the days when they were graced with crystal bowls of sillabub, trifle and quaking puddings, silver baskets of black fruitcake, delicate slices of yellow spongecake. I'd like to think brown-sugar cookies were placed there, too, for the children in the family.

PLANTATION SOUR-CREAM COOKIES

Cream ½ cup shortening and 1 cup brown sugar together. Add 2 eggs, beaten light, ½ cup thick sour cream and ½ teaspoon vanilla. Sift together 2 cups flour, ½ teaspoon baking soda, ½ teaspoon nutmeg, ½ teaspoon salt. Add gradually to first mixture. Mix well. Drop from a spoon onto well-greased cooky sheets and bake in a moderate oven, 350° F., about 12 minutes. Makes 50 cookies.

Southern pies and tarts are really sweet—more of a confection than the fruit or custard tarts of the North. Did you ever eat molasses pie, sirup pie with pecans, transparent or jelly pie? The following recipe is a handed-down specialty of one of Natchez's famous families.

LINDEN-CLAYTER TARTS

Line small tart pans with pastry. Put a spoonful of strawberry jam in each. Cream 6 tablespoons butter or margarine with ⅔ cup sugar. Add 2 well-beaten eggs and 1 tablespoon flour. Flavor with 1 teaspoon vanilla and a pinch of salt. Fill tart shells with this mixture and bake in hot oven, 425° F., 8 minutes. Reduce heat to moderate, 350° F., and bake until set (about 5 minutes). Makes 10–12 tarts.

Here's a lucky catch—a string of beauties from the Mississippi. Melchior Beltzhoover and his wife, Mary Jane, both ardent fishermen, enter the sport on other continents, too.

Always delicious... always ready

With Van Camp's always at hand you have a meal in a minute at your command. A tempting, nourishing meal . . . a delectable, digestible meal . . . with every plump, choice bean rich with the flavor of the secret, savory sauce.

For good, healthful food . . . for the pleasure of good eating . . . serve this take-it-easy treat often.

VAN CAMP'S FOODS — Products of Stokely-Van Camp, Inc., Indianapolis, Ind., and Stokely-Van Camp of Canada, Limited.
FAMOUS SINCE 1861

RICH SHORT-CUT FUDGE

takes none of your sugar!

EAGLE BRAND IS THE SECRET OF THIS MAGIC RECIPE!
Smooth, Luscious Short-Cut Fudge
2 (7-oz.) pkgs. semi-sweet chocolate
1⅓ cups (15-oz. can) Eagle Brand Sweetened Condensed Milk
1 teaspoon vanilla
1 cup chopped nut meats
Melt chocolate in top of double boiler. Add Eagle Brand Sweetened Condensed Milk and stir until well blended. Remove from heat. Add vanilla and nut meats. Pour into pan which has been buttered or lined with wax paper. Chill for a few hours. When firm, cut into squares. Makes about 2 pounds. (Note: Salted Spanish peanuts may be used in place of nut meats.)
ONLY 5-MINUTES COOKING
NO BEATING

Eagle Brand saves you time! Insures perfect, luscious results always!

Eagle Brand is pure, whole milk and sugar blended to glorious creaminess! It makes your job easy! Insures perfect results . . . velvety smooth ice creams, jiffy-mix cookies, frostings that swirl into place—never runny, never grainy!

Lady, we promise you, Eagle Brand will win a place of honor on your pantry shelf! It's real quality! Made to meet Borden's high standards!

Borden Co.

Free! Book of Magic Recipes—every single one foolproof. Every one easy, quick. Send post card to Borden's, Dept. LH-17, 350 Madison Ave., New York 17, N. Y., for free copy today!

QUICK AND EASYS for Two

BY LOUELLA G. SHOUER

YOU'RE just starting out on a brand-new career of making a home and cooking for two. You've made up your mind you're not going to be a slipshod, indifferent cook, even though your time in the kitchen may be limited.

You've bought a basic all-round cookbook that is your guidebook when you're puzzled about a cookery operation. You steer clear of complicated dishes until you're more experienced and have more time, but you aim to make the simplest dish superlatively. Making good coffee, a really smooth custard, a perfectly combined salad, is much more important to you than turning out perfect cream puffs.

You serve your meals with a certain amount of style, but you simplify them. You aim to be a good plain cook first—but you don't want to be a dull one.

Your resolve is high, as a resolve should be. And here are some suggested meals that I hope will fit in with your way of life and that will help you live up to your ideals.

January Thaw

Bouillon Demitasse
Veal Kidneys Continental
Buttered Asparagus Tips with Soft Egg and Lemon
Radish-and-Scallion Salad
Parsley Dressing
Compote of Rhubarb and Bananas
Coffee

You don't look for robins yet, but there's a mood about occasional warmish days in January that makes you want to buy a gay new hat. You want some new fresh tastes. The market stalls may tempt you with out-of-season fresh rhubarb and asparagus—a little puny-looking, but its price isn't. You settle for a bunch of radishes and one of scallions, but satisfy your yearning for rhubarb and asparagus at the frozen-foods counter. The frozen variety is just as enticing. You can have spring for dinner without the chore of cleaning and cutting these two, and at less cost. A meal on the quick side with fresh trimmings is what you're after, and this little one above is so easy and effortless you'll have plenty of time to dream of pussy willows and daffodils while it's in the process.

When you first get home, cook the frozen, cut-up pink rhubarb according to directions on the package, adding sugar or honey as desired. It takes only a few minutes. Get it into the refrigerator to chill, for it should be cold if it's to be refreshing. Just before serving time, lace the sauce with sliced bananas. Their smooth texture and mild flavor blend beautifully with the sweet sharp tang of rhubarb.

Next comes the salad dressing. All you'll do to this tonight is to add a good quantity of quickly chopped parsley to your usual French dressing, which you make up whenever your dressing bottle is empty. It's just right for a salad of greens, sliced radishes and sliced scallions—use the green part of the scallions too. Scissors make the quickest work of cutting the scallions. Get your salad together, but don't combine it until you're ready for dinner.

Of course you could have bought lamb chops to broil, but it may be you've had them frequently of late. Tonight try your hand at doing kidneys the way they are often prepared abroad.

SAUTÉED VEAL KIDNEYS

Remove the fat and membrane from 1 large or 2 small veal kidneys. It's easy—just sort of peel it off with your hands. Slice the kidneys very thin. Snip out the white membrane in center of each slice with the scissors. (There are the scissors again. If you don't keep a pair handy in the kitchen, you ought to. You'd be surprised at the many, many jobs they do with quick dispatch.) From here on, the dish takes only 8–10 minutes' cooking. Sauté the kidneys in hot butter or margarine, with 2 tablespoons chopped onion. Stir frequently as they brown. Season with salt and pepper. After about 3 minutes' cooking, add the juice of 1 lemon and put a lid on the skillet. Simmer over low heat about 5 minutes. Add another tablespoon of butter or margarine and sprinkle with 1 teaspoon juniper berries that have been crushed to a powder. Serve on toast with the juices poured over the kidneys. The juniper berries are optional, of course, but they do add an interesting flavor, if you can get them. Juniper berries are used more in flavoring meats in Europe than they are here. It's fun to learn to use new seasonings, don't you think? If you feel inclined toward sophistication, you may use 4 tablespoons white wine instead of the lemon juice in the simmering process.

The asparagus should be cooking while the kidneys are simmering if you want everything to finish up together. Package directions will tell you how. And here's a way to serve the asparagus that is simply delicious.

Have ready 2 three-minute soft-cooked eggs. Season and butter the asparagus after you drain it. Put it on a small platter. Scoop out the soft eggs onto the asparagus—the eggs should be nice and runny, just barely cooked. Pour a little more melted butter or margarine over the eggs. Next squeeze a lemon over that. You're using the three things that make a hollandaise the good thing it is. This is simpler and much more unusual.

And that's why I've suggested Bouillon Demitasse. It isn't always what you have that makes a meal fun to cook and eat, but how you do it. Change is the thing. Just for tonight, heat up some canned bouillon, or make it in a jiffy with boiling water and a bouillon cube or a spoonful of meat paste. Serve it in your after-dinner coffee cups just for fun. Surprise him with this while he's reading the paper. You haven't time to sit just now. Things are brewing in the kitchen.

ou'll sip yours on the beat. It'll perk you while you're cooking and won't be too ich before the main attraction. Try it and e. It's just an idea.

Minute Meal à Deux

Deviled Fish Fillets—Lemon
Quick Creamed Potatoes
Peas
Chicory Salad
Hot Cherries with Sliced Oranges
Coffee

Some cuts of meat are just right for two, t you are more limited in choice than ger families—who don't have any too ch choice, either, these days. If you two ve ever tried to use up a leg of lamb, you ow how boring the same meat can be day er day. Two or three appearances are ough of any one meat for anyone.

Filleted fish is a good buy for two and you n't have to worry about leftovers. Don't ays fry it. There are many gourmet ways. ached and broiled with flavor additions, quickly done. Here's one way:

DEVILED FISH FILLETS

Buy 1 large or 2 small fillets of flounder or er mild fish (about ½ pound). Wash, e dry and place in small shallow pan. son with salt and pepper. Spread with ixture of 2 tablespoons prepared mus- d, 2 tablespoons chili sauce and 1 tea- on horse-radish. This same sauce, led and with the addition of Worcester- re and Tabasco sauces, is good to keep hand in the refrigerator for oyster and imp cocktails. Broil the fish just long ugh for the flesh to turn white and for frosting to brown a bit.

The potatoes are a quick-to-make version Ann Batchelder's special creamed pota- . And they are something!

eel and shred 1 large potato. Use the edder that has holes in it the size of the of a pencil eraser. You should have 1 ful. Put on to cook in a small pan with up cream and 2 tablespoons butter or rgarine. Season with salt and pepper. hey thicken—the starch in the potato s it—add 3–4 more tablespoons milk. minutes is all the cooking they need. t is certainly quick enough for anybody.

or the salad, use chicory—the green with permanent wave. Toss sippets of toasted d in with the greens and the French sing. Slice an orange apiece for the des- Heat pitted canned black bing cherries a piece of lemon rind and pour them the oranges.

Dinner in 1-2-3

Quick Mushroom-and-
Oyster Soup
French Bread
Apple-Celery-and-Grape Salad
Puffy Dutch Pancake with Lemon and Honey
Coffee

ou could have dinner in 1-2-3—just open a of salmon, make some coffee and section apefruit—but that isn't what we mean. ou strive for interesting meals—and I v you do—at least once in a while you a meal that has a punch to it, one you kick out of preparing as well as eating. this isn't the only meal you could pro- with this sort of qualification, but it is -and one that will appeal to you, I hope. ake the salad first, as it will improve by ding in the refrigerator. Once done, you forget about it till serving time. You how it goes, you've made it before:

diced apple, chopped celery, and seeded grapes—combined with salad dressing or mayonnaise and the whole thinned to the just-right stage with lemon juice. (Your efforts had best be concentrated on the soup.)

MUSHROOM-AND-OYSTER SOUP

Bring to boil 1 can condensed mushroom soup and 1 cup rich milk. Season with a little grated onion, about 1 stalk celery cut fine and salt and pepper to taste. You will have bought just 6 oysters for this soup. Bring the liquor drained from them to a boil, add the 6 oysters and cook for only about 2 minutes. Combine the 2 mixtures. Turn off heat until you're ready to serve. Then bring it to bubble stage and serve hot with French bread. The celery stays crispy, for it isn't really cooked. You'll like the crunchy texture, I think.

You could very easily skip dessert entirely, since the salad would be a perfect entremets with crackers and cheese, but as a finish you might like to take this light-meal opportunity to whisk up a Dutch pancake. Wait until you've both finished your salad, however. There isn't much do to this once you have ingredients measured, but what you do and how you do it is the secret of success. It's a last-minute quick trick. Keep your dinner partner busy with some really good strong coffee—the kind you always make.

PUFFY DUTCH PANCAKE

Put 2 eggs, ½ teaspoon salt, 1 teaspoon sugar, ¼ cup flour and ½ cup milk in a bowl. Beat all together hard with a rotary beater or an electric mixer beater until very light and well blended. The beating is most important. Heat 1 tablespoon butter or margarine in a 9 or 12 inch skillet. Let it get very hot—sputtery hot—but don't let it burn. Pour in the batter and cook 1 minute, just to brown it on the bottom. Transfer to a very hot oven, 450°–475° F. Reduce heat to 375°–400° F. after first 5 minutes and bake until it rises well up on sides and is nicely browned—about 10 more minutes. When you remove it to a serving plate, dot with butter or margarine while hot and pour a mixture of ¼ cup honey and 1 tablespoon lemon juice over the pancake. Or if you have a fruit sauce such as apple or rhubarb in your refrigerator, spread some of it on the pancake and fold it over, pouring the lemon and honey over all. Eat the pancake while it's hot.

Food and a Friend

Ham Sticks—Tomato Juice
Veal Parmesan
Hot Red-Cabbage Slaw
Buttered Noodles with Croutons
Green Salad
Yellow Cake
with Black-Raspberry Sauce
Coffee

You and yours like to have a guest for dinner now and then, but it isn't like you to plan the menu days ahead, spend the evening before the event composing a casserole, making the dessert, and so on. You have too many other things to do in your little leisure. Your favorite guests are the ones you can ask to come and share whatever you have, but you make sure you ask him or her when the meal planned has more substance than poached eggs on toast. For such semi-impromptu occasions you like best the kind of unstudied meal you can get on the spot, allowing no more than an hour from start to finish with time out in between to chat. Your kind of meal is one to which you can add a cozy first course that can be enjoyed elsewhere than at the dinner table, and one that won't put your budget too far off the beam.

Well, this little meal is a candidate—chosen because you can sail through its making with the greatest of ease. The red cabbage is all cooked and comes in a jar. Add a little water, a cut-up apple and maybe a little butter or margarine and salt if it needs it. It will simmer along while you get the rest of the one with Tender BEEF Added!

This ONE stands out...

A SWIFT QUALITY FOOD

It's SWIFT'S... Say PREM!

ENDEVIDEAL MEAT LOAVES—Combine 1 can Swift's Prem, 1 egg, ½ cup milk, ½ cup fine dry bread crumbs, 1 tablespoon minced onion, ½ teaspoon salt, ¼ teaspoon pepper. Shape into 4 individual loaves; place in shallow baking pan. Bake in moderate oven, 350° F., about 30 minutes. Serve with sizzling platter of crisp-cooked bacon and tomato halves. 10 minutes to serve.

BETTER FLAVOR! Fine pork or beef alone tastes good. Combined, the flavor is doubly good . . . really extra fine eating—as these individual Prem loaves will prove.

BETTER NUTRITION! Prem gives you the important nutrients of both pork and beef . . . high quality proteins, minerals and B complex vitamins.

BETTER TEXTURE! Prem is firm, tender and juicy. Cuts cleanly and evenly—cold or hot—slices, or loaves as shown.

3 TO 1 PREFER BEEF ADDED! Tender, flavorful beef has been added to Prem because homemakers wanted it—by better than 3 to 1. From their experience they knew that beef and pork combined was bound to be better. So try Prem soon . . . see how much better you like it!

RICH
...VY
...WN
WITH KITCHEN BOUQUET

Kitchen Bouquet gives rich brown color—brings out the full rich taste of the gravy. Contains no vinegar—no artificial flavorings to "smother" the natural food flavor.

USED BY GOOD COOKS AND CHEFS FOR OVER 70 YEARS

When warm, sunny days follow frosty nights, Vermont maple trees are quickly tapped—because the early sap makes the best syrup.

For those who love real maple sugar flavor

There's no more delightful treat than the flavor of real maple sugar. And you'll find that flavor in every bottle of our Vermont Maid Syrup.

To get that real maple sugar flavor, we first choose a maple sugar that has a rich, full flavor; then we blend it with cane and other sugars.

This makes the maple flavor uniformly rich and delicious. You get that real maple sugar flavor every time you pour our Vermont Maid Syrup on your pancakes or waffles.

Penick & Ford, Ltd., Inc.,
Burlington, Vermont

Vermont Maid Syrup

the food going, as you can't overcook it. It improves with time. If you don't like red cabbage, there are lots of other vegetables to choose from. Tomato juice is a stand-by predinner choice because you always have a can ready in the refrigerator.

If you had a spaghetti supper a couple of nights ago, you probably have some bread sticks left. If you don't, this little trick is worth getting the sticks for especially. Wrap one end of each stick with a two-inch-wide strip of thin-sliced boiled ham (the delicatessen variety). It holds together by itself.

Instead of potatoes tonight, settle for noodles. Noodles don't call for peeling and they are quicker to cook. When they are drained, toss with melted butter or margarine—be generous—and toasted croutons cut from 3 slices of bread. If you want to get this dish out of the way ahead of the last-minute dish-up, put the noodles on a heat-proof platter or in a shallow casserole after you add the butter. Sprinkle with the croutons—you had the oven on for them anyway—and the whole dish will wait well in a low oven—particularly well if you pour ¼ cup cream over all.

The yellow cake is bakery-bought unless you are the kind of person who bakes cake as Sunday-morning recreation. I don't want to discourage you, but you're better off to buy a plain unfrosted loaf cake and save your sugar for other things. It's harder for families of two to get by on their sugar ration than larger families. The following sauce is sugarless and delicious on plain cake—dresses it up too.

RASPBERRY CREAM SAUCE

Mash ½ banana with pastry blender. Add ⅓ cup raspberry jam, the grated rind of ½ lemon, a pinch of salt and 2 unbeaten egg whites. Beat all up light and quite thick. Fold in 1 teaspoon lemon juice and 1 tablespoon cream. We call this raspberry cream sauce, but its only claim to being called a cream sauce is that it has a creamy texture. Leave it unnamed, and it's still good.

VEAL PARMESAN

Have your butcher pound and flatten out 1 pound thinly sliced veal cutlet. He does this with the flat of the cleaver. One pound is just right for three; ¾ pound will be enough for another time when you are just two. This dish takes less time to do than to tell about it, once you get started. Whether it's your habit to buy a chunk of Italian cheese and grate it yourself or whether you buy it already grated in a jar or package doesn't matter, as long as you have it. For it's the cheese that gives this dish its distinction.

The butcher did his share of pounding, now it's your turn. Put the thin meat slices on a board. Sprinkle with salt and pepper and pound the grated cheese into each piece with a mallet or edge of a saucer—doesn't matter how, just so you get in as much as it will take. Warning: don't pound so viciously you cut through the meat and tear it.

Now about 8 to 10 minutes before you're ready to serve and after your noodles are all ready and waiting in the oven, heat 2–3 tablespoons salad or olive oil in a skillet. Have a clove of garlic in the pan too. Brown the cutlets quickly with heat high—turning them as soon as they brown. The emphasis is on speed, as the meat is thin and you want to keep it tender and juicy. Just before removing from pan, add ½ cup water and let it boil up once. That's all there is to it, but it's really special-tasting. Don't forget to fish out the garlic, and you may use ½ cup white wine instead of water if you wish.

SHINING EXAMPLES

(Continued from Page 139)

silver may come to us with the bloom of years of meticulous care already upon it; all we have to do is keep up the good work.

Since a factory-applied "butler finish" is actually formed by microscopic scratches running parallel to one another, it's important to polish in the direction of those lines. Flatware and trays are polished lengthwise; hollow ware—bowls, water pitchers, and so forth—are usually polished round and round.

More skill than energy should be applied, always rubbing in the proper direction—for polishing in dibs and dabs and little circles robs silver of its even luster.

Silver should be washed in hot soapy water, as soon as possible after it is removed from the table. The fewer pieces in the dishpan at a time, the less danger of scratching. Rinse in plenty of clear hot water (silver dried out of soapy water will tarnish much faster than silver rinsed well), dry thoroughly with a soft cloth. If you don't use it every day, keep it in a tarnish-preventing chest or flannel wrappers.

Some decorative silver is lacquered at the factory—candlesticks, centerpieces or things of that sort. As long as the lacquer is intact, it won't ever need polishing; but when it looks as if the silver were peeling, plunge the whole piece into boiling water and the lacquer will peel off in strips, like unglazed Cellophane. After cleaning, you may relacquer it at home with one of the preparations which are now sold for this purpose, or take it back to your jeweler to have a professional job done again. Much of the silver at the Metropolitan is lacquered, and little boxes containing camphor crystals are kept in each glass case.

Furniture is never "finished," in the sense that once a finish is applied it can be forgotten. The care of wood is surface care, and the kind of wood makes no difference in its treatment. Whatever the finish, it must be "fed" occasionally to keep it from drying out, and old-fashioned elbow grease is still the best method of building up a beautiful surface.

Again, as with silver, the rich patina of the furniture in many old Natchez houses was acquired by patient rubbing with bare hands, using no cloth or polish.

It is often impossible for even an expert to tell what type of finish has been applied to wood, so it's well to find out when you purchase a new piece. Usually the finish is oil, varnish or lacquer, often with wax applied in addition. Shellac is used only on custom-grade furniture, as the basis for French polishing, a hand-rubbed finish applied at the factory.

There are new synthetic-resin varnishes which produce a very fine finish, resistant to heat, water and alcohol.

Four types of care are necessary to wood, regardless of its finish: regular dusting, periodic cleaning, polishing and rubbing.

You Are These Things

BY JOSEPH AUSLANDER

Your face is as the lighting of candles in a cold gloom;
Your voice is as the folding of hands, the shutting of wings;
Your step is as a Mosul prayer rug in a narrow room—
You are these things.

If, after three years, I should knock in a wind at your door,
Lift the gnarled little knocker and let it rustle the wood,
Bringing the gaunt fragrance of my dreams to you once more—
Oh, if I should ——

Would you remember . . . forget . . .
remember . . . stand there,
Shivering, inarticulate, your mouth twisted with pain,
And then, like the lighting of candles,
like hands and wings and prayer,
Color my dreams again?

The kind of duster you use is most important, for a harsh one will scratch, a damp one will cloud the wood's surface, an oily duster will leave a dust-catching film, and a dirty one is worse than nothing, for it soils and scratches as it dusts.

A good duster can be prepared in this manner: Pour two tablespoons of furniture polish into a glass jar, and shake it around. After the inside of the jar has been well coated, pour out the polish and place in the jar a piece of soft, old, clean silk or chamois, and allow it to stand for a day or two. The cloth will absorb the polish lightly and evenly.

When the duster has become soiled, wash it, and repeat the process.

At Green Leaves, where much of the furniture is heavily hand-carved mahogany, a soft brush is often used to dust the carvings.

The American Wing's precious furniture is polished with a mixture made of equal parts of boiled linseed oil, turpentine and vinegar—all the fine-grained woods, that is. Wax is used on the oak and pine furniture. Scratches, which do happen even in museums, it seems, are painted in delicately with a fine brush and artist's oil colors. This oil-and-vinegar polish must be rubbed and rubbed until the surface is thoroughly dry. All experts agree that results of any polish depend chiefly upon rubbing, and that the surface must be clean and dust-free to begin with. Two or three times a year is enough to apply polish, if in-between care is given regularly. It should be applied sparingly with a soft clean cloth or cotton waste, then the excess wiped off with another clean cloth. The surface should then be rubbed with the grain until the wood is thoroughly dry and the fingers leave no mark on the surface.

At Green Leaves, polish is applied to the carved furniture with a soft brush, very sparingly so that no sticky accumulation will remain in the crevices, then polished, first with a stiff brush covered with a piece of flannel, finally buffed with a flannel polishing cloth.

Between polishings, wood surfaces need to be rubbed up often with a soft flannel polishing cloth, rubbing with the grain of the wood, until the surface is lustrous and the beauty of the wood's grain revealed.

White rings on a varnished surface, those heart-rending after-effects of dishes too hot, water or alcohol spilled, may often be banished by rubbing them lightly with flannel dampened with spirits of camphor, essence of peppermint or a drop or two of ammonia on a damp cloth. After a few minutes, follow this treatment with an application of furniture polish.

In many damp climates, varnished pieces often develop a milky film. Rubbing with linseed oil sometimes helps this condition, but usually the piece has to be entirely refinished.

A satin sheen on varnished wood, rather than a harsh gloss, may be produced by rubbing with a paste of rottenstone or powdered pumice and boiled linseed oil, working with the grain, until the desired finish is obtained. After wiping off with a clean soft cloth, rub it up well with a flannel polishing cloth.

Treat your own precious silver and furniture in this manner, using it, polishing it lovingly, caring for it well—and while it may never wind up in a museum, it will respond gratefully by being a joy forever to you.

LEASE CCEPT THIS 14-PIECE CAKE SET

only $1.00 AND ONE SOFTASILK BOX-TOP

For a short time only, General Mills now makes this amazing offer to acquaint you with SOFTASILK... the Betty Crocker Cake Flour!

SET INCLUDES ALL THIS

These hard-to-get items can make a real difference in your baking and cooking. They'll make mixing more efficient, and measuring more accurate, to help insure finest results!

- 2 fine aluminum, round, 8-inch cake pans; 1½ inches deep! Specially suited for most Betty Crocker New Method recipes with Softasilk—for they are extra deep! A new and unusual feature is that these cake pans nest to save space in the cupboard!
- 4 nesting measuring cups made of plastic! 4 colors—4 sizes! (¼ cup, ⅓ cup, ½ cup, and 1 cup). This type measuring cup is extra handy for measuring flour, sugar or shortening . . . You simply even the cup off with a straight-edged knife and you have the exact quantity.
- A set of four aluminum measuring spoons! ¼ teaspoon, ½ teaspoon, full teaspoon and full tablespoon!
- A "Rubbermaid" scraper with a removable handle for easy cleaning. An item you probably haven't seen for a long time—especially in this extra-fine quality!
- A set of 24 paper baking cups for making cup cakes.
- A complete Betty Crocker book of New Method Cake Recipes, made with Softasilk Cake Flour . . . giving 47 different Betty Crocker New Method Cake ideas, 27 delicious fillings and icings, 50 priceless Betty Crocker cake making hints . . . and illustrated beautifully in full color!
- A Betty Crocker Cake Making Plan showing how to make cake baking easier, how to save steps in the kitchen. This illustrates the type of utensils you will need, and how to lay them out before you start to work!

Money Back Guarantee!

We are so sure you'll agree this is the most remarkable Cake Set offer you've ever seen that we make this unconditional guarantee! . . If you are not completely satisfied, simply return the set, and we'll refund your dollar!

However, once you try your Cake Set, using those wonderful Betty Crocker New Method recipes, with Softasilk, you'll realize what a perfect combination this is! (Remember, complete collection of these recipes included with set.)

Imagine! Using these Betty Crocker New Method recipes, with Softasilk, you don't cream the shortening! You don't beat the eggs! You use only one bowl! And you mix only four minutes! Easier! Faster! Yet cakes turn out extra high and light . . . More delicious!

HERE'S HOW YOU GET THIS 14-PIECE CAKE SET!

Get a package of Softasilk Cake Flour from your grocer! Softasilk is the Betty Crocker cake flour made for cakes and cakes alone! Milled extra-fine to give you more delicious cakes . . more satisfactory baking results! Betty Crocker recommends it!

Cut off the top of the Softasilk package and send it, together with only one dollar and your name and address. It's as easy as that! Your 14-piece Cake Set, complete, will be mailed to you immediately! Ask your grocer for Softasilk Cake Flour today.

Betty Crocker says:

"To bake cakes you'll be proud of, you need the right flour . . . the right recipes . . . and the right tools to work with . . .

Good, deep, well-made cake pans are of great help. And, of course, accurate ingredient measurements are essential to real cake-baking success."

RRY! Scarcities make many of the items in ie Cake Set very difficult to obtain! Some are impossible to find in stores! Our supplies, too, efinitely limited! Quick action on your part is ial, because the Cake Sets we have on hand o to those whose orders are received first!

Copyright 1946, General Mills, Inc., Minneapolis, Minn. "Betty Crocker" and "Softasilk" are registered trade marks of General Mills, Inc.

MAIL THIS COUPON NOW!

SOFTASILK BOX 7140, CHICAGO, ILLINOIS

Please send my 14-piece Cake Set at once. I am enclosing one Softasilk box-top and one dollar.

NAME.....

ADDRESS.....

CITY.....STATE.....

General Mills, Inc., Minneapolis, Minnesota

SEE WHAT WE MEAN BY...

Up to Date Ideas?

Windows that capture every glint of sunshine...bright, gay colors to add cheer to your work . . . modern appliances. And a cupboardful of famous Ann Page Foods to assure grand eating!

Yes, Ann Page Foods are definitely part of the up-to-date kitchen. Their quality is so high you can forecast compliments every time they're used. And they're thrifty as well.

You see, these famous foods are made by A&P. Ingredients, processing, packaging . . . every step is under strict quality-control. And because A&P also sells them, many in-between expenses usual to marketing are eliminated. Result: modest prices on all 33 Ann Page Foods.

So keep on the lookout for Ann Page Products! They make good meals better every time.

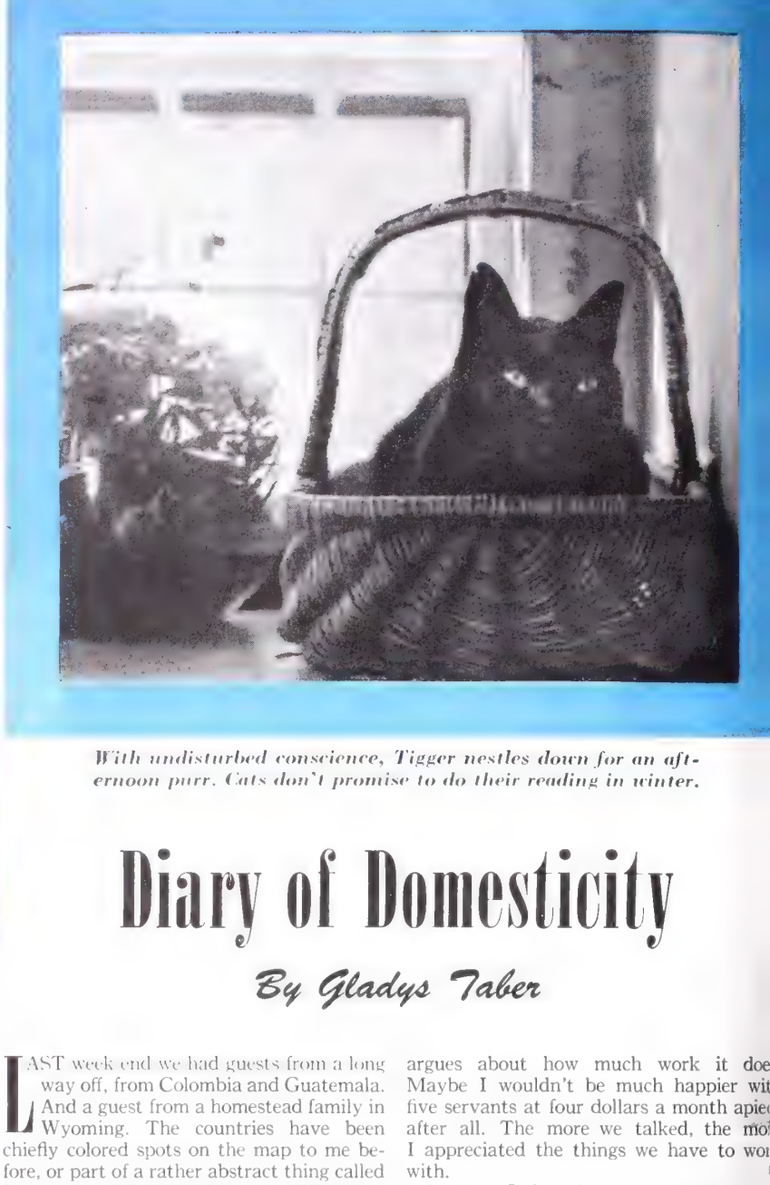
It pays to choose

Ann Page

FOODS

Made, Sold and Guaranteed by A&P

A&P



With undisturbed conscience, Tigger nestles down for an afternoon purr. Cats don't promise to do their reading in winter.

Diary of Domesticity

By Gladys Taber

LAST week end we had guests from a long way off, from Colombia and Guatemala. And a guest from a homestead family in Wyoming. The countries have been chiefly colored spots on the map to me before, or part of a rather abstract thing called International Relationships. And Wyoming has just been a state I have never seen, but which has to do with the old wild West.

Sitting in front of the apple-wood fire in this little New England house, we ate rosy home-grown Baldwin apples and toasted-cheese sandwiches, and comfortable talk filled the room, while two cockers tried to sit on Carlos' lap and a black cat perched on Luis' shoulder. Bettina was curled up with Cicely, my own daughter, on the sofa, hunting up the best Latin-American records to play.

Cicely put on Noche de Ronda, and brought in another bowl of apples. The men began to talk of home, and suddenly Colombia and Guatemala were no longer colored sections on a map; they were the places where our friends lived. The houses, the families, the way of life began to seem real. I imagined the servant going every morning to the market, everything fresh every day, because refrigeration is so rare. And everything growing all the seasons round, so canning and preserving are unnecessary. So Carlos had to see the freezer with six months' supplies packed in it—broccoli, corn, spinach, chicken, strawberries, raspberries, mince pies. Then the ironer and the washing machine and the electric range and the heaters fascinated him. Of course, in his home a family of two has five servants, but, he said, each servant does only one thing. One markets, one cooks, one makes beds.

"I like this way better," he said. "Here you have everything in equipment, everything so clean and efficient." He said, "When you have many servants, you have many difficulties also."

I looked at the washing machine with new respect. It never quarrels or talks back or argues about how much work it doe Maybe I wouldn't be much happier wit five servants at four dollars a month apie after all. The more we talked, the mo I appreciated the things we have to wo with.

Later on, Luis, a doctor, got out pictures his wife and two grave-eyed lovely babie He had left them for a long time in order study in the United States and go back carry his knowledge to his country. H wife had a lovely delicate beauty and inte ligent wide eyes. And a wistful mouth. Ar suddenly I thought about this little fami and their contribution to the world, and wondered how many North Americans t doctor would meet would respect this.

When we had dinner, the two men wip the dishes for the girls, and half the tin Spanish and half the time English sounde over the rattle of the silver. And the laught was in the same universal language. The in the morning, Carlos said proudly, "I up my bed."

I wondered whether many North Amer cans would adjust so easily and gaily to different way, for simple housework mu have been very strange and new to the

After breakfast the two girls and Carl went for a walk, so Bettina could see t trees. How wonderful were the trees, s said. She had never seen a tree except t Chinese elm at home. The great lattic branches of the old quiet trees were a my tery and a wonder to her. They are a my tery and a wonder to me, too, and yet th are so familiar one easily takes them f granted.

The doctor said shyly, "May I play t phonograph, please?"

I nodded, and went on peeling the pot toes for dinner. Then I laid down the kn and listened in amazement. He was r playing Borrachita, or La Comparsita. was playing, "I am the Lord High Exe tioner," from The Mikado. I went into t front room and he was beaming over t phonograph, radiant. Gilbert and Sulliv 5 drops and your man's won!

Yes! The zesty flavor of Frank's Red Hot Sauce wins his taste every time! Give a lift to many a dish with this choice blend of Louisiana peppers and spices 10 drops to soups, salads, eats and casserole dishes, vies, fish, spaghetti.
A 10c Bottle Flavors 108 Meals
FREE! 32 Man-favorite recipes in New Booklet, "The Way to Your Man's Heart." Write for copy today. Address The Frank Tea & Spice Co., Dept. W, Cincinnati 2, Ohio
Only 10¢ on most grocers' shelves and meat counters
Frank's RED HOT SAUCE

Z-LIFT cup-lifter
AT YOUR DEALER
Guaranteed by Good Housekeeping
STEWART PRODUCTS INC. NEW YORK 14, N. Y.
Bottle Squeeze OPENS VACUUM JARS AND CANDY TINS — WITH CAPS UNBENT CUBES ICE CUBE TRAYS

REE PROOF!
CAN EASILY MAKE
G MONEY
BIRD DS VERY ION: rsary Well day Baby thy ndence es ppings
Earn money in your spare time taking orders from friends, neighbors and acquaintances for Bluebird Greeting Cards and Stationery. Everything furnished FREE. No experience needed. Write for FREE SAMPLE OUTFIT and full details. Send no money. No expense. Write Bluebird Studios, Dept. J-11, Fitchburg, Mass.

H TASTE THRILL!
Ellis
ONE ROYALTY BY QUALITY
TAMALES
SMOTHERED WITH CHILE
15 CANNING CO. Denver, Colo.

NATION'S FAVORITE
TENDER, HULLESS—PACKED AIR-TITE TO POP PERFECTLY
JOLLY TIME POP CORN
JOLLY TIME POP CORN

STRAWBERRY PLANTS
Our FREE Berry Book ... the best Varieties and How To Grow Them
W. F. Allen Company, 16 Oak St., Salisbury, Md.

he had heard as a child in Guatemala and he loved them!

I did not need any lectures on World brotherhood, it was right in my lunchbox. The world, I thought, is not full of hills, and all those far-away places. I may not see really the home of my friend ... but as all are kin, no matter what tongue we speak, and just as soon as everyone realizes it, what a world we shall have!

My father sang those songs to me when I was a child in Wisconsin, and the doctor from Guatemala heard them when he was a child in Latin America, and now we hummed the gay tunes together. "A wandering minstrel I – a thing of shreds and patches ——" "He polished up the handle so carefully, that now he is the ruler of the Queen's Navee."

"Thank you very, very much," he said, as he turned the last record.

And with a burst of pride, I summoned up my best. "De nada," I said. "It's nothing."

Actually, though, if we speak the same language with our hearts, the language we speak with our lips is not so important!

Week-end cooking for guests is not too hard if part of it is done in advance and if the main meals are simple. Our guests from the south found no difficulty in eating New England meals.

A real Russian dish tasted very good. Which seemed also to me to bear on this whole world problem, though I know folks who would say international relationships and cooking have nothing in common! This dish is from my friend in South Dakota, Esther Konotopha. Inexpensive except for the eggs, but the eggs take the place of meat.

To make this, you use 1 quart cottage cheese and add 1 egg, 1 tablespoon sugar, and salt to taste. Cook a box of noodles as directed on the package, mix in the cottage cheese and put in a greased baking dish – the two-inch-deep long one is best. Over this pour a mixture consisting of 1 cup thick sour cream and 4 eggs. Mix this but do not beat it. Fork it lightly through the noodles and cheese and bake one hour in 325° F. oven, or until the center is quite firm to the touch.

> When you have children of your own you will wonder how father could have been so patient.
>
> From What This World Needs, by John W. Raper > (Copyright 1945 by The World Publishing Company, Cleveland and New York).

With a green salad this is the whole meal. It ought to serve four or five, but my sister Jill and I ate a whole batch the first time we made it. For the last helping, the dish becomes dessert with a sauce made of thick sour cream, a dash of salt, and jam, jelly, preserves or fresh sugared fruit. This is a wonderful dish, and easy to prepare, and saves meat. We like the bulk cottage cheese, so the top is rather rough in texture, and I bake it until the top begins to brown a little like a soufflé.

For afternoon tea on a winter's day, nothing is better than Alice Adams' coffeecake. The first time we had this was at her house in early autumn when it was still warm enough to have tea under the grape arbor. Tea was boiling hot, fragrant and nicely steeped, and there were thin bread and butter, cherry jam and this hot spicy cake. There were a gay young Irish-English actor, a lovely Frenchwoman, the stately and gentle English setter around the tea table, all enjoying the cake, especially the setter.

The coffeecake recipe came home with me, together with five or six other elegant ones. It calls for ¾ cup sugar, ¼ cup butter or margarine, ½ cup flour, 1½ teaspoons baking powder, ½ teaspoon salt, 1 teaspoon or more cinnamon. This is well blended, then you must keep out ⅓ cup of it for the top of the cake. Mix ½ cup milk with 1 beaten egg and add to the other ingredients. Spread on top the mixture reserved for this, with some extra sugar added. Bake twenty minutes in a moderate oven in a round deep cake pan. Serves five and an English setter.

Midwinter is a fine time for jobs that never get done in summer. We cleaned the cellar last week, and sorted all the jars according to size. This is one of the greatest time and energy savers I know of, for when you need seven pints for tomato juice in canning time, it is maddening to have to hunt through everything to find them. We test the edges of the jars as we sort them, feeling for nicks and cracks; we fit on good covers, and line them up on shelves ready for the next season. Then as the new pack is used up, the empty clean jars can go where they belong.

It is a good time to check on the canned supplies and on the freezer, so that the rest of the winter you can use what there is most of and not end the season with dozens of jars of beets and nothing else.

Frozen peaches should not be opened until you are ready to serve them. Keep the cover on the container while they thaw, and this will help prevent the brown color that peaches get. Incidentally, if you crush wax paper and stuff it in the top of the container when you pack the peaches, it will prevent their turning color.

We usually have some plain frozen fruit juice which can now be used for fresh jelly. When sugar is scarce, this way of budgeting it along the year is a great help.

If you put a few shavings of paraffin in the bottom of the glass and pour the jelly over it, the wax rises to the top and seals the jelly without your having to struggle with a pan of sputtering paraffin.

Now when we walk down the snowy road, we often cut some evergreen branches for the house. A beautiful arrangement can be made in an old white ironstone tureen of mixed evergreen branches and three scarlet geraniums from the window box. I make mine with the branches for the height and a focal point of the three geraniums in a triangle near the base of the container. It is dramatic and beautiful and lasts a long time.

Begonia cuttings make nice bouquets, too, and if you leave them long enough they usually root and there you have a new set for another window box or row of pots. The begonia is an amazing plant anyway; it just keeps going along and blooming, and when cut back, it starts up again.

Those long winter days when city folk wonder what we find to do are gone in a flash. I am always saving up two-volume books for this month, and never getting through them. This winter I was going to read the Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire, and I often cast apologetic glances at the massive tomes as I whisk by after sandpaper to take the finish off the pine chair. I promised myself Shakespeare from stem to stern, too, especially the less familiar plays which I have not read for a long time. And I manage to read over my favorite passages and that is all. For while the beans are simmering in the old black pot on the back of the wood stove, there is just time enough to wash the milk glass and wax the pine chest again.

Maybe I can read the Decline and Fall next summer, say in August. Meanwhile I can dip into Keats, which is mostly by-heart anyway. Or read a little of the magic of the Irish poets. And do very well.

I hear the shadowy horses, their long manes a-shake,
Their hoofs heavy with tumult, their eyes glimmering white;
The North unfolds above them clinging, creeping night ——

Then I open the door and look out in the silent night, and listen, and I hear them, too, the shadowy horses with long manes shaken out, and they are part of the shadowy winter hills and the deep cold sky. But where they go, I know not.

I know the house is secure against the night and the bitter wind, cockers drowsy on the warm hearth, candles lighted in the pewter candlesticks, and the woodshed filled with dry logs.

And I know a new year is coming with the miracle of spring and the fulfillment of summer, and therefore we should be of good cheer, and look toward tomorrow with hope.

Butterscotch Pudding that's My-T-Fine
Easy recipe for Cut-n-Mold pudding. Prepare My-T-Fine Butterscotch Pudding according to simple directions on the package. Top each serving with a swirl of whipped cream and chocolate-dipped mint and nutmeat halves. Delightfully delicious when you serve it!
5 delicious My-T-Fine desserts
Butterscotch
Chocolate
Vanilla
Nut Chocolate
Lemon Pie Filling
MY-T-FINE

MEALTIME ECONOMY
for many of your 1095 meals in 1947
Chicken a la King
Southern-style chicken in cream sauce. Ready to heat and eat.
Morton's CHICKEN A LA KING
Chicken and Noodles
Chicken in every bite. Rich egg noodles. Ready to heat and eat.
Morton's NOODLE CHICKEN DINNER
Chicken Giblets and Noodles
Tasty giblets and noodles. Economical. Ready to heat and eat.
Morton's
Guaranteed by Good Housekeeping
Morton's QUICK-FIX DINNERS

When MINUTES Count

"Ho . . . hum! What a swell friend Old Dutch is going to be tonight!
Just two spoonfuls in the dishwater and these glasses and dishes'll sparkle!

Those greasy pans? They're not so much! 'Cause Old Dutch dissolves grease . . . fast. Yes, and that Seismotite in Old Dutch . . .
now there's the stuff for getting rid of dirt and stains.
That's Old Dutch for you . . . sure-fire for faster, easier cleaning!

So ladies, remember my little hint on dishwashing. And try Old Dutch Cleanser yourself. See how many minutes, how much rubbing you save on soiled,
greasy pans and dishes . . . your sink, tub, and washbowl!

P. S. Louise says to notice how easy Old Dutch Cleanser is on the hands."

DON'T DIVORCE YOUR CHILD

(Continued from Page 6)

It certainly plays the leading role, and among young couples the chief cause of estrangement is, perhaps, the sexual disappointment of one of the partners. But there is seldom a marriage in which there is not some degree, at some times, of sexual disappointment, and sexual attractions are by no means monogamous.

A girl should be taught to try, at least, to picture the boy to whom she is so attracted in the role of a husband and a father, and a boy should be helped to realize that when he marries he is not picking up a permanent "date," but marrying a mother for his children.

It may seem extremely undemocratic, as well as unromantic, but few marriages prosper where the couple come from radically different social backgrounds. King Cophetua and the Beggar Maid is a tale far from reality. The ending of such romances is seldom happy. Incompatibility is the basic cause of divorce—not "mental cruelty" or even adultery. Many a marriage has successfully survived a stray infidelity. Some, after much pain and patience, have become the more firmly cemented after such lapses. But few happily survive myriad, continual little habits that grind on the nerves of one or the other partner. Men have left their wives because when the first blind bliss wore off they have realized an ugly harshness of voice or vulgarity of manner, or that the lady whose nails are so nicely manicured is sloppy about the unseen things.

> The lucky ones seem to be always as if they just came into the world. . . . There is still in them something of Adam upon the first day: they reconnoiter, with shining eyes, the layout of the garden, and stare in admiration at such novel curiosities as the moon and stars.
>
> —C. E. MONTAGUE.

Furthermore, in marriage, each inherits to a degree the other's family and friends. The background of the home from which each comes cannot be eliminated; it intrudes itself in every personal habit.

The families who try to help choose the companions of their children in the realization that like usually cleaves to like—although like is often flamingly, if temporarily, attracted to unlike—may be accused of "exclusiveness," but they are more likely to promote enduring relationships.

If a marriage breaks to the point where real divorce has occurred and legal divorce seems indicated, it still, to my mind, should not be made easier, because it offers freedom from reasonable responsibilities.

Some states—the State of Vermont, for instance—forbid remarriage of the divorced partner until after a certain lapse of time, say two years. There is sound common sense in this; and there would be even more sense, since so many divorces are collusive, to decree a lapse of time before the decree becomes absolute for either.

The object is to discourage the husband or wife from shaking off one marriage to jump hastily into another. Such rebound marriages also often end in divorce courts. Such restrictions are also inconveniences to those men and women who think lightly of breaking up another's home—a frivolity which the law should discourage. Remarriages, perhaps especially where children are involved, are not, in my opinion and experience, to be frowned upon. A child with an affectionate stepmother or stepfather is restored to a far more normal life. It is only impulsiveness which should have some restraints put upon it.

But under no conditions should parents be allowed to divorce their children. No court should grant any decree leaving the future of the child in question, even if the parents or their lawyers may have agreed to a "friendly" arrangement. For that matter, any court granting a divorce involving children—and these are the ones that are of public concern—should retain a degree of jurisdiction over them during their minority, with power to exercise that jurisdiction throughout the nation.

Many an arrangement has been made between divorcing parents that afterward ceases to be kept, or that should be adjusted to suit changes of circumstance. The existence of no common law or practice ar the states makes escape from responsib relatively easy. The delinquent parer he—or she—moves to another state fro one in which the divorce was granted, escape being served with a summons. I present welter of divorce laws he may find that he is not divorced! A financia rangement, touching the support of the may be morally invalidated by change cumstances. One parent may, for inst be wealthy at the time of the divorce, under these circumstances may freel sume full financial responsibility for child or children, only to find in some that the fortunes of each parent have cally changed, to great disadvantage o parent and of the child.

A Federal law should, therefore, framed as to permit the reopening o matter of parental obligation, in respe the support and care of the child, a time, by the child's guardian. The ject should be to prevent either pa throughout the child's minority, fro caping any portion of the obligations he or she would owe the child had th vorce not occurred, and the parents sh be obliged to answer a summons is anywhere in the United States to a for a review of the as touching the before the approp court in the pla residence of the

For the child's is a continuing with continuing ur seeable problems emergencies, ratio and morally der ing continued pr tion of the child's interests by the au ities who have legalized the dissoluti his home. The state, in legalizing the ration of his parents, cannot, I think, ab itself of maintaining further guardia during his minority. The divorce o parents must never be a divorce of e from the child they have mutually br into this world.

This view has, in fact, been repea sustained by courts. But the chaos of A ican divorce laws frustrates the inter

Finally, though I have lived much life as a newspaper reporter fightin free access of the public to all sorts formation, I have become convinced the details of divorce cases and of all tal disputes, especially where childre involved, are not proper material for lication.

Again, the person to be considered child. To have the troubles of his home in the press and known by his compa is a peculiarly horrible mental and psych ical torment. Children, who identify t selves with their parents, loathe having discussed. Though parents too often f protect their children, it is touching to to see how children protect the reput of their parents. So much depends fo child on his own opinion of his parents the attitude toward them of society, children should be protected in their even if the parents hardly deserve i least as far as is humanly wise and pos

It is to be hoped that we shall on have a Federal divorce law based o real cause of broken marriages—prof incompatibility—thus doing away the phony and unjust charges whic escaping mate is required by most laws to make against the partner. B any case, life within the family shou recognized as privileged against the of the curious general public.

The announcement of the divorce only fact of public importance. The F recognize this and the press voluntar strains itself from reporting the intima tails of marital difficulties leading t divorce courts. This practice shou emulated.

CLOROX DEODORIZES AND DISINFECTS MANY HOME "DANGER ZONES"!

MOTHER knows . . . she has relied on Clorox for many years to provide greater home sanitation. By passing this knowledge on to her daughter, she is helping create another American household that guards against home infection risks the effective, dependable Clorox way. Regularly used in routine cleansing of bathroom and kitchen "danger zones" Clorox imparts the type of disinfected cleanliness recommended by health authorities. It also bleaches, removes stains. Simply follow directions on the label.

AMERICA'S FAVORITE BLEACH AND HOUSEHOLD DISINFECTANT

CLOROX

FREE FROM CAUSTIC

Years of unsurpassed quality and performance have made Clorox the choice of millions . . . it's always uniform . . . it's always dependable!

JUST WHAT SHE WANTED

curious in that beautiful shop of exclusive Once she had run past on her way to the station, and it was not until she was on the train that she realized that the small round bowl she could not put out of her mind was one she had seen in Fayot's without being aware of it.

And now, as she passed with the girls, four quick steps and on to the flower shop, she knew that she had seen something that she would never forget. Rose's silly question did not matter; she answered it again and again as they went past the flowers, past the cakes, past the shoes. She answered it once more near the bottom of the hill, thinking all the time, My life is in a teapot. My life is in a teapot in Fayot's window and I must pour it out bit by bit. It is all the time under my fingers, moving, and my life is moving within it.

Nobody else, of course, had noticed the four-piece tin tea set on the wooden tray in Mr. Fayot's silver show window. But Miss Sand had looked at it—in the ten or twelve steps it had taken her to cross before the store—had, without further examination, looked and known that she would buy it.

It would wait for her, she thought happily, as she walked silently with her charges; it would wait until she was ready for it, that wonderful teapot, with its beak bending thin between her fingers and not breaking. And one day he would give her sugar from that bowl, sugar that was like honey. Or is it honey that is like sugar? she wondered, looking at the girls and daring them to know how delightfully mad she felt. Peaches that are like skin or skin like peaches? Snow white as milk or milk white as snow? Kisses hot as wine or wine hot as kisses?

But oh dear, she thought, kisses and wine! She might as well think of swearing and rum. Or of cheese and beer. Or of doughnuts and coffee. Or of opium and absinthe. Or of bread and water. Or of cake and milk. Or of pills and medicine. Or of pie and cider. Or of biscuits and tea.

Ah, tea, she said to herself, rubbing her hands as she shifted her skates once more. It was the best of them all. Especially when you missed it. She felt suddenly empty inside for tea; she felt hollow, green, unfillable. If only they'd pass a grocery store, she'd be content. It would be even better than a tea shop, where others were already drinking. There was so much pleasure shut up in the tin boxes, in the neatly prepared tins. Prepared for fun, each of them, she thought happily, although she knew better.

But still, the grocery store wouldn't be enough, she decided. You had to have a solid and a liquid for everything. Even love, she supposed; you solid and me liquid. Good heavens, she said to herself, couldn't she think of anything respectable today? How could she ever have scolded Rose for skating with that nice strange young—yes, young, she repeated defiantly, staring at Kate's boyish head in front of her—man?

Perhaps, after all, the tea set was only a dream, she thought, as she saw it again in her mind. She visualized the shop inside, crowded with silver Cupids and bronze Mercuries, with rows of Venuses, sitting, standing, lying, naked and draped. She saw the ash trays and the flower bowls and the cigar boxes. The candlesticks rose high, taking little room but making the store crowded. Between them lay round platters, fat and thin, of tin and silver. But nowhere was there the quiet beauty of the four pieces in the Wine makes a man better pleased with himself. But the danger is, that while a man grows better pleased with himself he may be growing less pleasing to others. Wine gives a man nothing. It only puts in motion what has been locked up in frost. But this may be good or it may be bad. —SAMUEL JOHNSON.

---

---

why risk offending?

air-wick kills household odors

"All traces of the smoky odor which I detest disappeared immediately," writes Mrs. S. M. Mars of Long Island.

"air-wick* makes an amazing difference in my little apartment when I am cooking onions, cabbage or fish," writes Miss Mary Duggan, United Air Lines stewardess [illegible]

"I make my patients get two bottles . . . one for the sickroom and one for the bathroom," writes Miss T. L. Linder, private nurse.

Yes, air-wick, the little bottle with the magic wick, is bringing clean smelling air into millions of homes. To kill household odors, simply open the bottle and pull up the wick. air-wick contains chlorophyll, the miracle substance which nature stores up in green plants and which makes every blade of grass a miniature purifying laboratory.

Guaranteed by Good Housekeeping

air-wick deodorizer and household freshener is fully protected by U.S. Patent . . . a trademark of Seeman Brothers, Inc., New York 13, N. Y.

Tune in "Monday Morning Headlines" with Sandy Saunders, coast to coast ABC Network, 7:15-7:30 P.M., EST, directly following Breakfast Parade and hear [illegible] of Things to Come.

MAKE EXTRA MONEY EASY WITH GORGEOUS Everyday GREETING CARDS

WOMEN! Turn your spare time into cash — visiting friends and neighbors — and take orders for thrilling new Wallace Brown Everyday Greeting Cards! Magnificent Assortment of 21 Exclusive Designs for All Occasions — Birthday, Get-Well, Baby, Friendship, Sympathy, Anniversary, Thank-You, etc. Earn profit up to 50¢! Sells on sight everywhere! Your orders soar with other wonder-value Assortments — Gift-Wrapping, Easter, Humorous, Floral Stationery, Personal Notes — all fast-selling, big profit items. Also Name-Imprinted Stationery. Start earning money now — Write today for samples on approval.

SEND FOR SAMPLES

WALLACE BROWN, INC.
Fifth Ave., Dept. K-9, New York 10, N.Y.

TOP-SUDS" WASHING
ets Clothes Cleaner
WORLD'S SAFEST WRINGER
Voss Floating Agitator washes clothes in top suds — gets them cleaner. Voss "Electro-Safe" Wringer . . . The World's Safest. Electric and gas engine models.
OSS WASHERS
Time Tested Since 1876
OSS BROS. MFG. CO., DAVENPORT, IOWA

Send for your FREE copy
HENDERSON'S
100th ANNIVERSARY
SEED CATALOG

PETER HENDERSON & CO., Dept. 13 J
35 Cortlandt St., New York 7, N. Y.

It's easy to work magic when you knit with

BEAR BRAND quali-tested
YARNS

Looking for striking effects! For a yarn with a luxury look and feel? Then look for, ask for, insist on Bear Brand Yarn! It's so smooth-textured and pliant...so wonderful...that whatever you knit fits superbly, washes perfectly. For instructions for making this sweater and many others send 35¢ for the Bear Brand Fashion Book, Vol. 330, to Bear Brand, 230 5th Ave., New York 1, N. Y., Dept. JY-17.

window. Nowhere, not even in the back of the shop, where the artist sat making things of his own because he was unable to sell even the Venuses. Nowhere, she was certain, not even in museums.

Especially not in museums, she thought fondly, possessively, seeing it in the home it would one day grace, herself mistress. The room would be brown and half dark, with people in loose clothes laughing quietly, waiting for tea.

"You must not mind the weather, Professor Beard," she was saying, leaning slightly toward the teapot and touching the beak before taking the smooth wooden handle. "You must not mind anything."

The Beard cup, so white and empty, suddenly was filled with a warm colorful liquid that trickled from the thin spout. Color, movement, sound, they all came. But substance? Was the dear man—professor of languages, she decided—going to drink anything real at all? He might not think color, movement and sound enough.

"Hot or cold," she was saying, "war or peace. Love or hate. Life or death, sweetness or bitterness, age or youth, fire or ice. It's all the same, all meaningless. The only difference there is between one thing and another is the difference there is between other liquids and tea."

Madeleine, my dear, she said to herself, if that teapot were a man, it could make you very foolish indeed. What would the professor think of her saying a stupid thing like that? He would never come again. He would tell all their friends and none of them would come again. Her Thursdays—or Tuesdays; she hadn't quite made up her mind—would be long and empty and her lovely chairs unused. Her pictures would not be looked at, nor her tea set used. She would have everything to herself and nothing to do with it.

She needed somebody, something, to transmit her joy in her possessions to. She could never be satisfied in enjoying anything without wanting to communicate the pleasure. The lack was in her, she knew; her particular weakness of character, she supposed. And all that would be gone, all that orderly and delicious routine she had planned so happily from the moment (was it only three blocks away?) she had seen the tea set in the window and had known it would bring her a husband, a home and friends. It would all be gone and she was a fool to risk the going for a senseless observation, one she did not mean and could not even remember any more.

Of course she was worrying about nothing, she realized, as she said good-by to the girls at the bottom of the hill and turned the corner into her own street. She had merely looked at a teapot; it was silly to have bought it, used it and have it either make friends for her or unmake them, all before she had even asked the price of it. Everything would turn out all right; there would be magic somewhere. There usually was for her.

A good deal of it, she said to herself, walking up the narrow street, depended on herself. But with the teapot, she thought lovingly, she would know how to make people love her. She would simply sit and say anything, no matter how stupid, and give them tea from the enchanted tin. It would pour the kind of tea to make people dream, that teapot, long, thin dreams, winding into delicate patterns, seeking each other in infinity.

She would pile the cakes, thin and dry, around the teapot beside plates of flat bread and butter. These, she was sure, would exercise an irresistible fascination such as no other slices of bread and butter had ever had. The more stupid things she said, the less attention people would pay to her and the more to her charming bread and butter. Then they would stay, would come again, and tell their friends that she was the most gracious hostess in Lausanne.

So she really would be safe in buying the tea set, she decided. For a moment, as she approached the house and saw that her mother had left the blinds up for her to see the new red lamp shade they had sewed together, she hesitated. She could not buy it immediately; she did not have the money, whatever it was. Her new skates—she looked at them grudgingly—the newspaper subscription, her mother's new eyeglasses and the material for the new dining-room curtains had all come out of her savings. She could not spare a penny for a long time, but it did not matter. She was confident that the set would wait. Mr. Fayot never sold anything. He just sat in the back of his shop and made new things for his own home.

When she walked the few steps from the gate to the door and rang the bell, because her mother liked to come to meet her, she was unreservedly happy about her future. How silly of her to have minded the girls' talk about thirty-year-olds.

The only thing, she remembered, as she hugged her mother and went upstairs to put on her house slippers, that she had not thought about was the husband for whom that first cup of tea was to be served, the husband who would sit in their lovely house and admire her as she poured tea. A satisfying, if lazy, picture, she thought contentedly. She had no image of him as tall or short, blond or dark, quick or slow—just somebody sitting in a chair. What kind of husband did she want, anyhow, she wondered, as she washed her hands; one as mad as herself, she supposed. One who would see in the teapot what she saw in it. Of course, a good one, she added hurriedly, thinking suddenly of her mother.

But what was a good husband, she asked herself, combing her hair. Was he made up of various qualities like love and good looks and attentiveness and cleverness plus something unknown, something indefinable, as a dinner was made up of food and people and hands touching under the table? Or as the day was made up of light and activity and longing for the night?

There she went again, she thought, opening the dining-room door. She couldn't keep her mind on anything sensible. Perhaps she would find her husband tonight as she stared quietly into her bowl of soup. Ridiculous thought, she decided, as she kissed her mother; if she was going to get through the evening safely, without having her adorably sane mother commit her, she had better take hold of herself.

"Eat your cereal, dear, so you can grow up strong enough to make your children eat theirs!"

It was at the ice pond, not in the bowl of soup—fortunately—that she met him. Only this time he was real, not just a daydream. She had flirted with him as she was always telling her girls not to flirt, and they had gone off together. As they walked down the hill together later, the girls kept looking at her strangely, but they didn't say anything. Better manners than I have, she thought, taking an unwarranted and passing pride in the management of the pensionnat.

His name was Émile Duclos, a common-enough one, she supposed, and he worked as second violinist in the casino at Montreux. She had been there once for tea, with the father of one of her girls, but she had been too busy trying to enchant her dashing escort to notice a second violinist. The man she was with, she decided, was a storybook hero destined to turn heads heavier than hers. Tall, blond, English, he was an engineer going to Africa to build incredible things in an incredible country. He spoke French carefully, daintily, as though it were a delicious toy he was playing with, and Madeleine's romantic heart swelled with pride that he had asked her out at all and contracted with fear (delectable, nevertheless) that he might ask her to go to Africa with him. But he did not ask, and after he took her back to Lausanne he took the night train for Paris. En route to Alexandria, she reflected bitterly.

Émile she found no less suddenly exciting. Although he was a Vaudois, like herself, and had never been farther from Lake Leman than Bern, he had read Rolland, as she had; had decided that Beethoven was the one master whose music he could not do without if he had to choose only one, just as she had; and he kept in his room, he told her, a color print of El Greco's Toledo, just as she did. He was no taller than she (but she was tall for a girl) and he was not blond and his French had no engaging foreign accent, but his eyes were large, black and daring, and his figure was slender and strong. He told her that he loved dancing and that, too, seemed like a miracle to her, as she loved it enough to dance by herself at night in her room.

During the spring he took her to the local concerts and called at her house every Sunday night for supper and bridge. The regular fourth was a neighbor, a mild, kindly man of sixty, who lived frugally on a hard-earned income and played a close game. During the play he was silent, intent; immediately after he was merry and loose-tongued, insisting each week that the coffee Madeleine gave them was better than the week before and hinting good-naturedly what a fine wife Madeleine would make Émile. Her mother would smile with pretended embarrassment and Madeleine would resign herself to such innocent pleasures, thinking with disappointment what a far cry her present "parties" were from the splendid ones she presided over in imagination.

One Sunday afternoon Émile paid a friend to substitute for him in the casino ensemble and he took Madeleine to the mountains. The setting was too ordinarily romantic for her to want him to propose, and she was glad that he did not; but as they walked home she began to wonder if he ever would. With their combined salaries they would have quite enough to set up a small but pretty ménage—she would see to that, she thought, her mind buzzing with curtain trims and names of polishes—and have enough over to keep her mother in her present house. After several years they might manage an automobile and take trips to Italy. If a child came, they would manage that, too, she decided, somewhat reluctantly, her eyes on Lake Como and Lake Maggiore.

When he did say it, as they approached her home, she did

(Continued on Page 152)

Men took their lives in their hands when they took her in their arms!

RKO PRESENTS

LARAINE DAY
BRIAN AHERNE
ROBERT MITCHUM
GENE RAYMOND in

From one man's arms to another,
she fled—trying to escape
the evil memory of the tragic trinket whose strange power changed her life . . . destroyed her loves!

The Locket

with

SHARYN MOFFETT · RICARDO CORTEZ · HENRY STEPHENSON

Produced by BERT GRANET • Directed by JOHN BRAHM • Written by SHERIDAN GIBNEY

R K O RADIO

ANY

Hail to this conquering casserole... HEARTY! SAVORY! NEW!

BAKED LIMAS

Strong men weaken with one whiff—lose their hearts completely with the first marvelous mouthful! It's different—it's delicious... a new triumph for Grandma's famous recipe file! But remember, only Grandma's Old Fashioned Molasses will make it perfect—give it the mellow molasses flavor that conquers all comers!

Grandma's Old Fashioned Baked Lima Beans

1 lb. dried lima beans
¼ cup chopped onion
¼ lb. finely diced salt pork
½ cup Grandma's Molasses
½ cup catsup
1 tsp. dry mustard
2 tsp. salt
1 tbsp. Worcestershire sauce green pepper
frankfurters

1 cup Grandma's Molasses equals 1 cup Sugar in sweetness

GRANDMA'S OLD FASHIONED MOLASSES

NEW COOK BOOK—FREE!

(Please Print Plainly)

(Continued from Page 150)

not hear him. He repeated it, simply, like an uncertain lover, not at all like a violinist from the worldly casino of Montreux. "Will you marry me, Madeleine?"

Suddenly the Italian lakes disappeared, and blond engineers going to Africa, and giggling schoolgirls turning up their noses at men of thirty, and she was still and alone. She did not even feel Émile, standing so shyly, so nervously beside her. The hills around her seemed to swim and the little houses float like flowers.

"How about it, Mad?" Émile was saying.

"Of course," she said in a low voice. She took his arm and they walked very slowly, deliberately, without looking at each other, to the house to tell her mother.

But she did not really feel engaged until she had told them about it at school. Her mother had taken the news calmly; she had realized that those interminable bridge games were not for nothing. Madeleine's fellow teachers accepted it calmly, too, quite politely, without comment. The students, however, regarded it as a phenomenon, slow to believe that a masculine hand had placed that lovely little ruby (Émile's grandmother's) on her forbidding finger.

She had to describe Émile in detail to both groups and was amused to find herself talking about him differently to the teachers and to the students. With the former she stressed his tender care for her mother, his good manners at cards (wasn't that an indication of character?), his steady work at the casino (he had been there three years—a commendable constancy in a musician), his fondness for concerts. With the latter she exaggerated the gaiety of his eyes, his grace in dancing, his musicianship. He was an unqualified success with both groups, and Madeleine closed both accounts with a romantic list of trips she and Émile intended to take before they were married, of their plans to wait for six months and enjoy all the pleasures of courtship.

In the light of vitamin-conscious today we wonder how mankind actually kept going before we moderns happened along. Consider that orange juice was once used in the West Indies to polish floors; pineapples first sold in London for $20 apiece; in the days of Henry VIII vegetables were considered unfit for humans and were fed to pigs; lemons were used by the ancient Romans to keep away moths.

The second day that Madeleine was engaged—Émile had called for her the first—she decided to walk home slowly and look in the shopwindows. It was early twilight, warm and glowing, and it was pleasant to know that soon as a married woman she would be able to buy many of the things she had always looked at longingly.

She lingered before the lingerie shops, making mental purchases, admired men's ties, desk articles and unbreakable teacups, appraising everything good naturedly as she built up and broke down innumerable imaginary homes. She was in a fine mood, warm and glowing like the day, her thoughts coming and going in waves. It was only right that she be completely happy. She had an acute feeling of pleasure even before she approached it, and then she found herself in front of Fayot's, staring at the tea set she had seen a year and a half before, this time alone and this time remaining.

It was the same. The wooden handles shone against the dull metal; the teapot rose tall and elegant, aristocratically slim, from the waxed tray. It looked, and it was, a masterpiece of design, of workmanship; and her heart leaped at its beauty. This time she had only to buy it to make those long-dreamed-of hours between tea and dinner a reality. She would use it for the first time for Émile and herself alone, she decided, looking at it lovingly.

She was happy. Everything was turning out much better than she had ever expected; for she had really expected nothing. Even she, with all her daydreaming, had her share of Swiss common sense, perhaps tinged with a romantic bitterness, and never actually hoped for the things she enjoyed making herself hope for. But now? Émile and music, and her mother taken care of, and dancing at the casino. And the teapot. The day she had passed with the girls it had said, "Nev mind, you will be loved, you will be happy and it had said it softly and clearly, in a w she would have mocked at if it had been a other inanimate object talking to any oth person.

She looked in her purse. Five francs. S would get some money from her stockin drawer bank at home and buy it the fi thing in the morning. No, when she we home for lunch; then she could have mo time with Mr. Fayot. Not that it would ne much, she decided, looking hungrily, almo angrily at the teapot. There was no need her to order it now. It would wait for h overnight as it had waited for her that lo time. A year and a half ago she had thoug it sold when she looked for it the morni following her first sight of it. But now rich were being poured to the rich.

She was very happy and very silly, t way the teapot had made her that nig long ago, for it seemed very long ago to now. All her old dreams came back th night: her drawing room, her teas, her ha approaching the teapot and the conversati stopping, everything silent, wakeful, as touched the beak. The generals, the ladi the writers, the painters, the professors, th were all there. The soft low chairs, the flow tables, the expensive magazines careles laid on other tables, everything was the But now the man was there too. Inde Émile was everywhere, for some reason his neat black working evening cloth He was the center of everything, he and tea set. Two centers, really, quite baroq

A thing and a pers she thought, lovi both. She alwa needed a thing and person for happine she was closer to person through thing. More indepen ent souls could with one or the oth or with neither. needed both. In dream she and Ém touched the teapot the same time and was like touching e other, only sweeter, more meaningful and th became a third thing outside themselves a her heart beat so wildly she woke up.

Morning came too quickly; it passed slowly. Finally she was in the store, taking her right glove as Mr. Fayot came toward h

"May I see the tea set in the window With her prudent shopping sense she h decided not to tell him she wanted it.

"Certainly, mademoiselle."

He took it out and placed it under fingers, which hovered lightly, like a love

"I should like to buy it," she said.

"I am very sorry, mademoiselle, but it v sold an hour ago."

"Impossible. It's been here a year an half."

"I beg your pardon, mademoiselle. here. In London. It's been on exhibiti But I regret to say, it was sold an hour ag "Impossible," she said again. "I ca here to buy it."

"I am very sorry."

"Impossible," she said once more un her breath, her mouth, her mind tighteni

Her walk home was long and tireso Lunch was worse, and the girls were unu ally boring at school. All day she thou some fool, some puffed-up fool—she did even care who—was making excuses fo because it was tin, not silver. Somebody e equally besotted, probably saying, "Oh, h perfectly sweet! Where did you pick it u

In the evening Émile came, eager bustling, with a package in his arms. T kissed in the hall. Émile smiled boyishly told her to turn away while he unwrap something he had just bought for their home. A good-looking tea set ——

She knew it. She knew it. But she never thought it would be Émile. W unheard-of good luck!

—— that she was sure to love, thin and and wooden. "And what a bargain," he s

ODORS TALK!
Silence them with INSTANT
Sweet-Aire
AN ORIGINAL AIR DEODORANT

Give your home a welcoming air with Instant Sweet-Aire! From attic to basement, atomize away odors from cooking, smoking, stale air, pets, etc., with this fast-acting air deodorant. In a jiffy room air is fragrant . . . fresh . . . all odors neutralized. At drug, department, hardware stores . . . beauty shops.

Miller Protecto Products Company
Kalamazoo 41, Mich.

Dealers: Write us for the name of jobber in your line who can supply you.

Cedar Pine or Oriental
4-8-16-oz. Bottles

NO WICK! NO WAITING!

EVERY BOTTLE SHOWS HOW
GRAVY MASTER
Guaranteed by Good Housekeeping
MAKES RICH, DELICIOUS GRAVY

MERCY ME! I DON'T SEE HOW A'BODY CAN KEEP HOUSE WITHOUT 3-IN-ONE!

3-IN-ONE OIL

LOOK FOR THIS NAME
MORGAN
Masterpiece Furniture

KVP Household PAPERS

...ing, with the ... and with her back to him, trembling. "What a ... he exclaimed. "But it was the best I could get for the price."

She stopped trembling; she almost stopped breathing.

"Of course it isn't silver," he ... placed it piece by piece—she heard the sounds—on the hall table, "but you don't mind, do you? We may get a silver one later as a present or something. But this will do in the meantime, won't it?"

She did not answer.

It was smart, after all—indeed, very chic, he said, patting the pieces; and they did need a tea set, he supposed, even if teas were a waste of time, but maybe they'd have to entertain a music-hall manager or someone someday and she wouldn't mind pouring, would she, he asked, taking her limp shoulders and turning her around and asking her how she liked it.

How did she like it? How could she know anything when every drop of blood seemed drained from her brain and she was ready to collapse if Émile took his strong fingers (his violin fingers, she thought proudly, wondering that she could think of them now) from her shoulders.

"It's beautiful, Émile," she said. "Thank you very much." Should she add, "Just what I wanted"? She didn't feel like talking.

She put her cheek on Émile's and let her girlhood go. She was almost twenty-six, time enough for soberness, she decided gloomily. After all, it was just a teapot, even if it had been on exhibition in London and had (long before she knew that anyone else had seen beauty in it) given her a delicious excitement such as nothing, no, not even anyone, had ever given her. Not even Émile, she thought, rubbing her cheek against his, not even the man who gave it to her. It wasn't his fault that he couldn't see it the way he did, no two persons ever ... anything in the same way. Her way was simply better for her. That was all. And it could always be, if she never told anyone about it. It would have been marvelous to share her rhapsodies with someone she loved, but it wasn't really necessary, she decided, kissing him gently. Not at all, not when you were as wonderfully lucky as she was and able to have both things, both the teapot and the man, and the way she felt about both. She felt her strength returning. Putting her lips to his mouth, she gave him a proper kiss and smiled. It was high time, she thought as she did it, that Émile had a decent thank you.

"It's very, very lovely, my dear, and you were sweet to buy it for me," she told him. "It's too pretty for us ever to want to replace it, but if you ever should, of course we'll get a silver one. Only I don't think we'll ever want to."

Émile's eyes shone gratefully. She felt like an actress being applauded.

"Let's take it in to show mother," he said. "She'll wonder why we're out here so long. I hope she likes it too."

Didn't she ever think of anyone but herself? How kind he was.

"I love you, Émile," she whispered, as they gathered the things together. It was the first time she had ever said it, she realized with astonishment.

He kissed her abstractedly. "Here, you carry the teapot; I'll take the rest," he said.

★ ★

Ask Any Woman

BY MARCELENE COX

AFTER timing myself, I no longer dread ironing my husband's shirts. With six staring up at me from the depths of a basket I say, "Only a little over thirty minutes to present my husband neatly to the world, to give him pride in his appearance, to fill him with the confidence that comes from knowing there's a 'loving' flatiron in his life."

The old proverb still holds: "Halving your wants quadruples your wealth."

I feel sorry for the couple who couldn't think of anything to say to each other after the rattle was taken out of the car.

An ideal marriage binds two persons together like an elastic band.

No woman should ever get to the point of looking upon her job of housekeeping as so dreary that she should have a medal pinned on her for doing it.

The first time my husband had a free day to work at home his horoscope in the morning paper read: "Overexertion may be harmful. Go easy!" . . . He went back to bed.

Lament from a boy: "Well, gosh, mom! How do you expect me to go to sleep when my room's so straightened up!"

I kept a box of tumeric for six years, then threw it away. The seventh my neighbor wanted to borrow some.

A little girl puts a straightforward question to her parents: "Why don't you let us children fight out our decisions? You do!"

A child is really up against it in dealing with his adults; he is handicapped by physical inequality, by having more honesty, and rarely having any money.

The best chaperon a child can have is the one that has been built into his character.

For a time, every mother must be the contact person for her child with the world.

Nothing shows more clearly the little-boy quality in a grown man than the way he wrings the neck of a bouquet of flowers.

Children seldom sit, or should. The little girl in Riley's poem who kept so still she heard a fly whisper to a ladybird, "She's the stillest child I ever heard," is lovely only in poetry.

Once a mother, going into plump middle age, was comforted when her young son, squeezing her enthusiastically, exclaimed, "I just love mothers your size."

After a house-cleaning spree, a mother was confronted by her tearful young daughter: "Just because you had a lot of children would you want someone to decide which ones to throw away?"

A woman who once chose a career in preference to marriage recently observed, "Now that I am older, I think it would be nice to have someone to sit down with occasionally."

Some parents have the equivalent of a born gardener's green thumb; they can pick up a child, examine its works, shake it, thrust it carelessly (although lovingly) aside—and the child blooms gloriously.

A wife should never attempt to change her husband's career, habits or waistline unless she has the "go ahead" sign from him.

Some teen-agers are like watches that have been wound and are full of power, but need a gentle shaking before they'll start to work.

One man wants to nominate his bride "The Wife of the Year: the woman who learned Braille so she could read in bed and the light wouldn't disturb her husband."

Sparkles
LIKE STARS IN YOUR KITCHEN

my
DUNBAR GLASS

Every woman who cooks with my sparkling Dunbar glass utensils knows they're like stars that lighten and brighten kitchen chores. See what you cook from any part of the kitchen. Cleans easily, quickly — reasonably priced, too. Send for my favorite recipes to Jane Dunbar, Dunbar Glass Corp., 301 Payne Ave., Dunbar, West Virginia.
Jane Dunbar

FLAME-RESIST DUNBAR COOKING GLASS

26% more juice
More EASILY . . .

WITH THE MASON aluminum
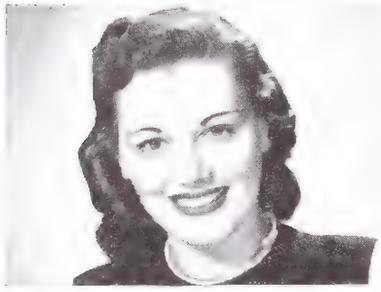
JUICER!

Gives 26% more juice by impartial laboratory test.
Special reamer blades make juice flow faster.
Guaranteed by Good Housekeeping
Handle adjustable (Style #210) 6 ways for proper wall clearance.
Polished aluminum . . . rinses shiny-clean under running water!

Priced from $2.95 to $4.79
(Table Models Also Available)
At all good department and hardware stores, coast to coast. Buy yours today!
L. E. MASON COMPANY
Boston 36, Massachusetts

New Charm for your Smile

with the triple-action tooth powder



1. BRIGHTENS TEETH!

And cleans 'em clean. Five cleansing and polishing ingredients make Calox a whiz at bringing out all the natural brilliance of your teeth.

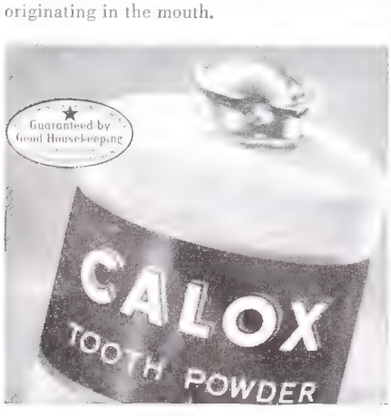
2. FRESHENS MOUTH!

You'll love the tingly fresh-as-a-breeze taste of mint-flavored Calox. It tastes so wonderful ...and leaves you feeling wonderful.

3. SWEETENS BREATH!

Romance-minded? Important secret of every attractive girl is her breath-less beauty. Calox gives you extra protection against bad breath originating in the mouth.



made by McKesson & Robbins with 114 years of pharmaceutical know-how

UNDER-COVER STUFF

(Continued from Page 4)

ing his secretary, a young woman half his age, he determined with her to start a new life in a new country. They moved to the United States, where they lived for a year, and then went on to Brazil, still seeking the land of peace. In 1942 the two Zweigs were found dead in each other's arms. Beside them were the two glasses from which they had drunk poison, and a letter of farewell: "My energy is exhausted by long years of peregrination as one without a country. I believe it is time to end a life which was dedicated only to spiritual work, considering human liberty and my own as the greatest wealth in the world."

• • •

"One of the most accomplished and interesting impostors in history," was the judgment of the Psychical Research Society in 1884 on Mme. Helena Petrovna Blavatsky. PRINCESS OF THE OCCULT, by Gertrude Marvin Williams, is the true story of this fantastic figure—spiritualist medium, founder of the Theosophical Society, hardheaded businesswoman. It is a story of lovers, lawsuits, converts; and it all started, strangely enough, in a house on the corner of 8th Avenue and 47th Street, New York.

• • •

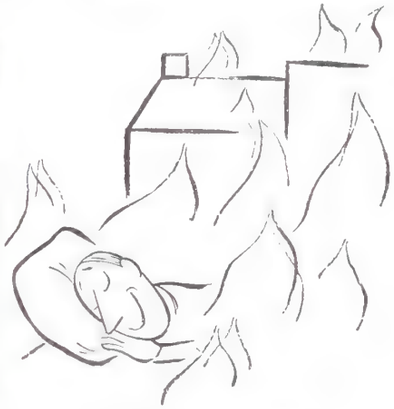
MR. BLANDINGS BUILDS HIS DREAM HOUSE, by Eric Hodgins, is a hilarious book. And its chief delight is the multiple agonies which such a vast number of misguided citizens share with the author. The craze for buying a house in the country seems to be sweeping the land. But it won't any more—not now, after Mr. Blandings has told all. Whether it is fear of future atomic bombs, or just old age creeping up, is a question. But the urge for a "country place" does seem to envelop a certain group of city dwellers just at that confluence in their affairs when their children have arrived in their teens, when they themselves are nearing forty, and have enough customers or clients or backlog in the bank to feel modestly secure.

Forty, we're told, is the age at which you feel oldest. Fifty seems young because it isn't yet sixty, and every year from there on is a matter for self-congratulation. But forty is sad. Youth is definitely on the wane, no matter how you fool yourself. And that's when the casual apartment liver wants to go back to the land.

The Blandings were typical. They bought their spot in Paradise, and from the first moment of ecstatic confirmation over the telephone they never drew another easy breath. They were gypped on the land, the house was crumbling, the title wasn't clear, the architect was dreamy, the workmen terrorized them, the villagers laughed up their sleeves, the costs mounted and mounted, time went on and on and on.

The person who reads this book will look cautiously before he—like Blandings—takes the plunge. And country folks, on the periphery of big cities, had better watch out. For if ever there was an indictment—of contemptuousness, of near dishonesty, of slyness, of meanness—here it is in the lean bony figure of a New England village. But we're getting too serious. This is a comic. It's one of the best laughs of the season.

DRAWING BY STEIG FROM MR. BLANDINGS BUILDS HIS DREAM HOUSE



He was dreaming that his house was on fire.

THE TWIN BEDSIDE ANTHOLOGY, edited by Charles Lee, is a smart idea. It comprises two volumes: one "His Reader," the other "Her Reader." "His Reader" contains such come-on titles as Terminating a Love Affair (Steele), An American Lover (Marquand), An Apology for Idlers (Stevenson), The Marriage of Venus (Schneider), A Coquette's Heart, to say nothing of Balzac's story of the walled-in lover (La Grande Bretêche) and Boccaccio's Fourth Story: First Day. Our guess is that She will be reading His most of the time, while He shuffles around waiting for it. One of the less serious items in "Her

A-M-N-H. PHOTOS

Norma Norman

Facts on Figures: The average American girl can boast that her hips are narrower than Venus de Milo's, her legs more slender than the Gay Nineties girl; but her measurements are sturdier and stockier than the fashion-model "ideal" of 34-inch bust, 24-inch waist and 34-inch hips—according to the findings of Dr. Robert Latou Dickinson, who has modeled Norma as the "norm" for the eighteen-year-old female figure of our time. Norman—Norma's twenty-year-old male counterpart—is taller and huskier than the men of his father's generation; taller and more agile than the Greek ideal of 400 B. C.

Reader" is Cornelia Otis Skinner's The Body Beautiful, which opens with the woman in a fitting room, standing before one of those three-part adjustable mirrors, "suggestive," as Miss Skinner says, "of a primitive triptych—that is, if she has sufficient imagination to turn the triple reflection of herself in a pink slip into a trio of medieval saints."

• • •

Helen Beningtон is an English teacher, wife of a professor at Duke University, who has apparently had just enough of the pomp of the literary great. In a delightful book of verse, DR. JOHNSON'S WATERFALL AND OTHER POEMS, she comes right out and punctures the balloons of her own classroom. Concerning Mrs. Trollope's visit to the United States, of which that lady wrote home to England rather disagreeably, you'll remember, she has the following to say:

MRS. TROLLOPE IN AMERICA

Mrs. Trollope took a doleful view
Of us, in 1832,
Whose native latitude she knew.

And every time a gentleman spit,
Not being edified a whit,
She made a plaintive note of it.

Her agitation grew so great,
At times she seemed to lie in wait
For somebody to expectorate.

But we, in 1832,
Took a broad, dispassionate view,
And spit whenever we wanted to.

Special for DRY SKIN

Beautiful Mrs. George Whitney, Jr., says: "Pond's Dry Skin Cream is the best help I know for dry skin."

Rich, rich, rich—like real country cream! Pond's Dry Skin Cream has special skin softening power. It goes on so easily, with lovely smoothness. Not sticky nor "draggy"—but satin-soft and luscious.

3 Special Features

Rich in Lanolin—very like oil of skin
Homogenized—to soak in better
Special Emulsifier—extra softening aid

Work the seepy smoothness of Pond's Dry Skin Cream well over face, throat. Leave 5 to 15 minutes—or overnight. Your dry skin seems to "drink it up"—looks softer, firmer, prettier. Use every day. You'll love this richest Pond's cream!

Pond's DRY SKIN Cream

COLD SORE STICK!
EASY TO CARRY—HANDY TO USE
Check cold sores with COLD SORE IVO. Medicates, lubricates, protects. Feel relief instantly! Made by the makers of famous LIP-IVO since 1907. At drug stores 35¢.
IVO, INC., WEST BEND, WIS.
Cold Sore-IVO

Get Into the BIG MONEY!

NOW'S the time to get your share of big subscription profits! You'll be amazed how easily you'll make money. You'll sell because people want to buy! Whether you can spare only a few hours each day or give your full time, you can earn.

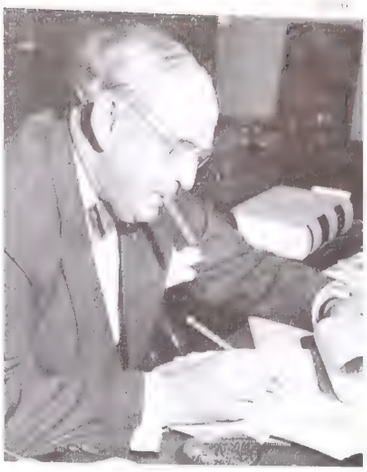
Join our Selling Staff and do it now! We'll furnish all the supplies you need without cost. Just send your name and address on a penny postal and let us do the rest!

M. E. Nichols

CURTIS CIRCULATION COMPANY
Box 666, Independence Square, Phila. 5, Pa.

NURSERY BOOK
FREE THE EARL FERRIS 78th ANNIVERSARY BEAUTY EDITION!
Our finest catalog and guide in 78 years, more pages, more lovely colors —and more money saving offers on FERRIS Northern Grown EVERGREENS, Shade Trees, Ornamentals, Flowers, Shrubs, Bulbs, Fruit Trees, Berry Plants, etc. Write—it's FREE!
EARL FERRIS NURSERY
675 Bridge St. Hampton, Iowa

FREE SAMPLES - 100% VIRGIN WOOL KNITTING YARNS
Selected yarns for your every want direct from mill at money-saving prices. Write for free samples.
FRIENDSHIP HOUSE, Dept. 157, WINCHESTER, MASS.



ARTHUR VANDENBERG thinks he'd live his life pretty much the way he has. "I'd advise any young man who could scrape two dimes together to marry the right wife as soon as he found her. I should never advise politics as an immediate goal."

IF I WERE 21

(Continued from Page 37)

so far, and made a success of all of them? William Benton, at 46, can look back at a large and rapid business success as a founder of Benton & Bowles advertising firm, from which he retired when he had made all the money he planned to; nine years as a leader in education, vice-president of the University of Chicago; and now important public service as Assistant Secretary of State in charge of the Government's foreign-information service.

Between almost constant telephone calls in his State Department office, Mr. Benton said, "I don't know what I'd really do if I were 21." (Into the telephone: "Cancel the plane ticket and get one for tomorrow.") "It's one of those fanciful concepts like wondering what you'd do if you had a million dollars." ("The Beyrouth office ought to be able to take care of that.") "Of course, most men who do make a million dollars try to hold on to it and run it up to five million." ("Get Paris on the wire at five their time.") "But I'll tell you what I'd suggest to someone who is 21 right now, instead of merely wishing he were, like me." ("Ask him if he can dine with me in Los Angeles Friday.")

"My recommendations," Mr. Benton went on, "boil down to five. First, don't be dependent. Acquire a salable skill, so that you'll always have something personal to sell, no matter what changes come over the world. Whether it's a profession like medicine or a craft like writing or stenography or bookkeeping, the skill should be something which puts you in business for yourself, even if you work for a company. With such a skill, you can go anywhere, taking your business in your hat, striking out for yourself whenever you are ready.

"SECONDLY, I'd say to this lucky youngster of 21, don't stand for regimentation. Don't let your boss or your wife, your parents or your newspaper get you into a rut of living or thinking. Talk back to the boss, throw up the job, move to another city, do anything necessary to break away from any rigid set of rules that hems you in. There was a book published in 1922 (when I was 22) called Babbitt; it struck out against the pressure toward regimentation that had subdued so many men of that time. Get a copy of it and find out how lucky you are to be 21 today, instead of then.

"DON'T be afraid of change. Sometimes I think no man should stay at the same job for more than ten years and no woman live in the same house for longer than that. Keep your mind fresh and ready to explore as much of life as you can.

"The world is not only changing fast—it's changing at a rate of speed that increases every year. Things like technical 'know-how' can become out-of-date rapidly; the man who has lost his adaptability suffers in times like these. But basic qualities of mind and character, on the other hand, have gained a new importance today; the man who possesses them will never be at a loss, for he will have retained the habit of learning new things every day. Change in the world can mean adventure to him and not tragedy.

"Fourth, young man or woman, don't divide your life into compartments. Let everything you believe and do enter into your whole life. If you have a religion, apply it in your work. If your work interests you, do some of it at home, as well as at the office. Have the same kind of manners for everybody—the people you meet at a party and the people you meet on a bus. Zest can be carried into even the dullest activities of the day.

"Lastly, don't live for yourself. For if you do, you'll be the loneliest man in the world. To be happy, you have to become a part of something bigger than you are—something big enough so you can fight for it and live for it.

"As to what this interest might be: even before the last war, I'd have advised young men and women to interest

EDUCATION FOR SECOND CHANCE

NOT only prominent Americans but the whole country has an idea of what it would do with a second chance. "If you were 18 again, what would you try hardest to do differently?" was asked in a recent JOURNAL survey. One in every three people spoke out for book learning. Of those who went to high school, 37 per cent wish they had higher education. Among the college graduates, 29 per cent feel their training insufficient.

Ten per cent would like to change their profession—prepare for a different career, learn a trade, go into business for themselves. Eight per cent would try for more money—either by saving or earning. Seven per cent would improve their characters. Three per cent would play more, get more fun out of life. Two per cent would use better judgment, wouldn't be so impulsive. Fourteen per cent named personal problems they'd like to be rid of: the farmer wants the city; the minority groups seek tolerant communities; and one frank soul wouldn't work at all!

Your eyes tell you... what your skin has always known

There is only one Kleenex

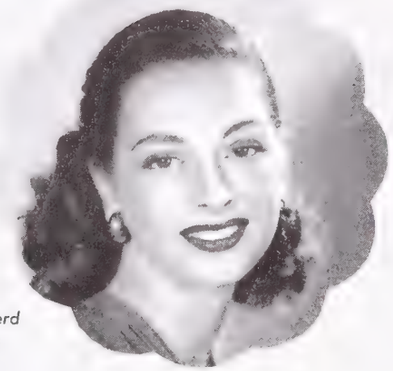
Hold a Kleenex* Tissue up to a light! You won't find lumps, or weak spots. You'll see Kleenex quality come smiling through! Each tissue always the same . . . with that special quality of softness . . . strength . . . you depend on in Kleenex, your favorite of all tissues.

And only Kleenex gives you the Serv-a-Tissue Box. You pull a Kleenex Tissue, and up pops another!

America's Favorite Tissue

Liked best in a nation-wide survey by 7 out of 10 tissue users.

Glamorous Hair Invites Romance



Miss America is Marilyn Buferd of Los Angeles

Miss America uses Fitch Shampoo. Your hair can be like Miss America's . . . velvety soft . . . sparkling with radiant highlights! Do as Miss America does . . . use Fitch's Saponified Cocoanut Oil Shampoo. Made from mild cocoanut and pure vegetable oils, this efficient shampoo does not "dry" the hair. Delightfully fragrant, it produces a rich, billowy lather that completely removes all scalp odor. Fitch's Saponified Cocoanut Oil Shampoo contains its own patented rinsing agent, so only an ordinary water rinse is needed. No dull film remains. At drug or toilet goods counters . . . or have professional applications at beauty or barber shops.

Fitch's
SAPONIFIED COCOANUT OIL SHAMPOO

themselves in community concerns—and to remember that the world is also a community. A spell in practical politics or government service will be enlightening to almost any youngster, no matter what his main interest is to be. And today, with the threat of the atom bomb hanging over us all, 21-year-olds must interest themselves in political problems—if only to save their own skins.

"One final word: remember that since you're a human being, your plans will never work out quite as you had hoped they would, though your life may be very successful and happy. But even at 21 you have already learned the truth of the words by James M. Barrie: 'The life of every man is a diary in which he means to write one story and writes another. And his humblest hour comes when he compares the volume as it is with what he vowed to make it.'"

Representative Clare Boothe Luce, when I talked with her, looked cool and gay in a pair of black-and-white Chinese pajamas, the gift of Mme. Chiang Kai-shek. But there was nothing frivolous in the living room of her Washington hotel apartment, where twenty-four volumes of St. Thomas Aquinas peer from one set of bookshelves and Toynbee's six-volume history from the other, and stacks of Congressional reports fill the green felt table in between.

"If I were 21," said Mrs. Luce, "I'd correct one of the major errors of my own career: I'd get a college education, by hook or by crook. And in college, I'd study the 'humanities'—I'd read the great books of the past, in their proper historical setting. I'd delight my mind with the great literature of the past, and discipline my mind with its most austere masters of religious philosophy. I'd do this even if—particularly if—I intended to devote the rest of my life to marriage, with no outside career. For if you can't get straight with God, you'll never get straight with your husband or your children."

THEN Mrs. Luce—who has tasted success as editor, war correspondent, playwright, politician, and who collects new accomplishments as some women collect china—went off into what seemed at first to be an impersonal speech on the high value of the old-fashioned career of full-time wife and mother.

"The most satisfying lifework for the normal woman," she said, "is in marriage—and here she finds the broadest scope for her abilities. Why, a mother can be an economist and a philosopher, a dictator and a servant, a teacher, nurse, social scientist and the undisputed leader of a loyal group. The career of motherhood—it is as wide as the universe.

"But in every generation there are some extraordinary women, whose interests take them outside the home. Some such women have become saints, and others have manipulated governments from the background, or done their work as artists and writers. Too often, they have sacrificed their normal women's lives to these concerns. And yet we now see that it is quite possible for a woman to have the best of both worlds: many of the most successful modern women writers, from Mary Roberts Rinehart to Margaret Landon, the author of Anna and the King of Siam, have been happily married women. Mothers cannot work in an office or practice a man's full-time career with success. One thing or the other has to be sacrificed if they try it. But there is no reason why a woman cannot choose a line of part-time work which makes greater and greater demands on her time just at the period when her family is growing up and needing her less and less.

"The wife and mother can, for instance, play an important part in the community. She can, if she likes, take an interest in local politics and increase her sphere of activity as her free time increases and her children leave the home. Married women can play a big role in government, planning to hold office at state capitals as they grow older. . . ."

Mrs. Luce interrupted herself with a sudden smile.

"Do you know," she said, "that I just realized I am plagiarizing from the diary that I wrote when I was 16? I read it lately and in it I outlined the kind of life I hoped to

SCENTED Zelo SUDS
ECONOMICAL—MAKES DISHES SPARKLE!

Can a Woman My Age BECOME A HOTEL HOSTESS

Even Though She Has No Previous Hotel Experience?

Would you like to step into a well-paid position as Hotel or Club Hostess, Executive Housekeeper, Apartment Hotel Manager or Assistant Manager? Would you like to be able to look forward happily to the future? The success of Lewis graduates from 18 to 50 PROVES you can—though you never had a minute's experience in hotel work.

Now Assistant Manager of a Beautiful Hotel Though Inexperienced in Hotel Work

"Being 'over 40' no longer worries me. Even before I finished Lewis Training I secured my first hotel position. Now Assistant Manager of this beautiful hotel. I am delighted with my work, surroundings and salary. When I contrast this with my previous office work, I am thankful to Lewis Training," writes Mrs. May McKenzie.

STEP INTO A WELL-PAID HOTEL POSITION
FREE Book Gives Fascinating Facts

Our FREE Book, "Your Big Opportunity," explains how you can qualify for a well-paid position at home, in leisure time; tells how you are registered FREE of extra cost in the Lewis National Placement Service; shows how you can be a Lewis Certified Employee—certified to "make good" when placed in a position. Mail the coupon NOW!

VETERANS: Course approved for Veterans' Training.

LEWIS HOTEL TRAINING SCHOOL 31 SUCCESSFUL YEAR
Room LA-5241, Washington 7, D. C.

Send me the Free Book, "Your Big Opportunity," without obligation. I wish to know how to qualify for a well-paid position at home, in my leisure time.

Name .....
Address .....
City ..... Zone ..... State .....
Check here if you are eligible under the G. I. Bill ..... (veteran)

THREE KNITTING BOOKS—Styled by HILDE
Each book 24 pages
Vol. 51—Children's Fashions in Wool.
Vol. 52—Socks, Gloves and Mittens.
Vol. 53—Boy's and Girl's Fashions in Wool.
Together with "Susan Bates" Glamour Knitting Aids.
All for $1.00 including postage—money back guarantee
WRITE TODAY TO
FASHIONS IN WOOL, Box #5, Dept. L, Mt. Vernon, N. Y.

YOURS NOW...
A HAND CREAM
THAT HELPS KEEP HANDS SOFTER,
SMOOTHER...AND
IS NOT STICKY—
NOT GREASY!

Luxor contains Carbamide, the ingredient long familiar to surgeons, which helps relieve the tiny cracks and scratches that make hands look red, feel rough!

Luxor HAND CREAM

YOUR SHOES ARE SHOWING!

EMBARRASSING, ISN'T IT?
YOU NEED SHINOLA

● So don't be caught short. When you're stepping out for the evening, and want to look like a million dollars—see to it that your shoes are shined. There's really no excuse for untidy-looking shoes. You'll find it pays to keep a supply of Shinola Shoe Polishes on hand.

Shinola's scientific combination of oily waxes helps to hold in and replenish the normal oils in leather—helps maintain flexibility—and that means longer wear. It's smart to KEEP 'EM SHINING WITH SHINOLA.

SHINOLA PASTE OR LIQUID ALL COLORS

IN CANADA IT'S 2 IN 1

QUICK COMFORT for TIRED ACHING FEET

Here's most joyful relief for feet suffering the aching and burning of strain from the day's work. It only takes seconds to dissolve a little soothing and cooling MU-COL powder for a foot bath that's totally refreshing. That's a hospital nurse's discovery. See package directions for many other valuable uses; MU-COL should be in every medicine cabinet. Sold at drug stores; sample free by mail. Use the coupon.

THE MU-COL CO., Dept. LH-17, Buffalo 3, N. Y.
Please send free sample.
Name .....
Address .....
City, Zone ..... State .....

have. It was a good plan for a woman's life, although it has not been mine.

"I said then that I would like to marry a publisher. Well, I did that. And I said that I would have three children. That never came true. And so the rest of it didn't come true, either: my plan was to build a creative career around my children. I wanted to write and illustrate children's books that would keep pace with their interests as they grew older. And then—I had it figured out quite carefully—by the time they had grown up, I'd be ready to write novels for grownups to read. And so I'd have a going career to fill my days after the children had married and left home. It was a good plan. I give it to any girl of 21 who can make use of it."

Thus Mrs. Luce expressed a kind of envy for being young today. So did Fleet Admiral Chester W. Nimitz, of the U. S. Navy, as he sat, surrounded by maps and battle flags, in his large office in the Navy Building in Washington.

"Youth today," he said, "is better off in America than ever before in my memory. If I were 21 or younger I'd take time to figure out what I wanted my life to become. In the late '20's, when I was setting up the ROTC at the University of California, I found that almost no freshman knew, when he arrived, where he wanted to go. The young man wasted much of the first two years of college drifting about, over the whole field of knowledge, picking up unrelated courses here and there. That's one mistake no young man need make, if he'll take the trouble to chart his course for life in the summer vacation after high school ends."

He has never regretted his choice of the Navy as a career, he said. Never. But he would not say, as some admirals might, that it is "the only life."

"Today," the admiral said, "the field of choice for an able youngster is vastly wider than it was when I was a boy. Today, with technology on the march, the opportunities have widened; there are dozens of specialties we had never heard of when I was young—electronics and nuclear physics and a dozen more. These are careers of the future, that stir the imagination."

SIMILARLY, Dorothy Thompson—columnist, lecturer, foreign correspondent and eminently successful woman of her day—might, today, beginning again, follow a completely different career.

"The world stands in too desperate a need of fundamental rehauling," she said, "for the young and able to find satisfaction in reporting the mistakes that statesmen make. Yet that is about all that the journalist can do. His best efforts can affect only the short-range course of events. Writers of my sort may be very well paid, but they have little sense of genuine accomplishment. At the end of five years, all that is left of our best efforts [illegible]

But Miss Thompson does not despair of the importance of what a single determined man or woman can do to resolve the confusions of today.

"There are magnificent careers open to the ambitious young. They can become scholars and give the world a clearer comprehension of the past. They may be architects and leave beautiful buildings for later generations to enjoy and use. They may turn to many such lasting things."

MISS THOMPSON talked in her charming and livable house in New York's East Forties, sitting on a long, tufted couch with arms that fold down, as they do in a limousine, so that four people may sit at ease when the circle of guests is large. Many of these guests are European émigrés, old friends of Miss Thompson from her years abroad, or friends of her husband, a Czech painter who suffered greatly in Europe for his political views. The walls of this room, as of all her others, are lined with books.

"Books are my best friends," Miss Thompson said. "To anyone of 21, I should say, 'Learn how to bring books into your everyday life.' The best of every author is in his writings: you can learn far more from reading him than from meeting him. Even for success in journalism, I believe that familiarity with the best books is more important than acquaintance with the best people."

But, books or no books, if she were to do it again, she'd travel a great deal in foreign countries.

"The advantage of living abroad," Miss Thompson says, "is that you see your country in a new and sounder perspective when you are outside it. And political forces operate the same the world over. It is impossible ever to escape them. Even so revolutionary a development of new force as the atomic bomb doesn't change the fundamental truths of politics."

But, getting back, the career which would greatly tempt Miss Thompson if she were 21 (and brave enough to undertake it) is the scientific study of societies and governments.

"I should start out," she said, "with a gathering together of all that is known about human psychology. I should study, through the centuries, what kinds of societies have given birth to the best individuals. The problems facing us and clamoring for an immediate answer are: 'What is a good society?' And then, 'How can we achieve it?'

"Certainly we have not achieved it today. Man's fundamental instincts are frustrated in this age of automatic factory operations. Henry Ford once said, 'I could run a large part of my factory with feeble-minded employees.' Normal men don't want to do work that uses only a small portion of their capacities. A student of good societies would apply some of the lessons of the past to modern problems like this.

"What men believe is the important thing—their actions, their work, their human relations all spring from that. All wars are religious wars. If I were 21 I should try very hard to add something, even a very small bit of new knowledge, to what we know about the effect of men's beliefs on the world they make and ask other men to live in."

Now, Miss Thompson, you see, would turn, on her second chance, away from journalism. But Senator Arthur Vandenberg, the leading Republican spokesman in Congress on foreign

"How you have improved, Donald! Won't daddy be pleased?"

Young Mother!

HERE'S WHY MOST MOTHERS DO THIS WHEN CHILDREN CATCH COLD

Distress of her cold is relieved as she sleeps

Let this picture remind you that tonight you can relieve distress of your little one's cold even while she sleeps!... with nothing to swallow ...and nothing to upset her delicate stomach.

Now here's what you do: At bedtime rub warming, comforting Vicks VapoRub on throat, chest and back.

Even as you rub it on, VapoRub starts right to work to relieve distress.

IT PENETRATES to cold congested upper bronchial tubes with special soothing medicinal vapors.

IT STIMULATES chest and back surfaces like a good, warming poultice.

And . . . this special penetrating-stimulating action of VapoRub keeps on working for hours to bring relief while the child sleeps! Often by morning most distress of the cold is gone.

Only VapoRub gives you this special penetrating-stimulating action. So be sure you get the one and only Vicks VapoRub. It works to relieve miseries of colds while you sleep!

Best-Known Home Remedy You Can Use to Relieve Distress of Colds.

Used by 88 out of 100 Rochester Mothers

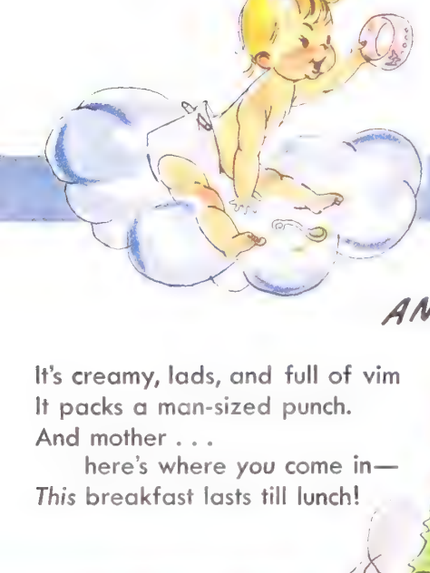
In a door-to-door survey in Rochester, N. Y.—a typical American city—88 out of every 100 young mothers called on said they use Vicks VapoRub whenever their children catch cold. Benefit from their experience . . . and when anyone in your family catches cold, rub on Vicks VapoRub. Then you'll see what grand relief it brings. Then you'll understand why most mothers always use Vicks VapoRub.

IT'S S-M-O-O-O-T-H...



So very smooth on baby's tongue,
So easy to digest,
So perfect for the very young . . .
Here endeth Mother's quest!

AND CREAMY...

It's creamy, lads, and full of vim
It packs a man-sized punch.
And mother . . .
here's where you come in—
This breakfast lasts till lunch!

AND IT'S DOUBLE-FLAVORED!

Two flavors . . . tasty malt and wheat—
A blend beyond compare!
Most grownups hanker for this treat—
Resist it . . . if you dare!

Free to you!
Write for 4-serving sample of Malt-o-Meal
FOSHAY TOWER, DEPT. B.
MINNEAPOLIS 2, MINN.
THE 1 WHEAT CEREAL WITH 2 DELICIOUS FLAVORS THAT COOKS IN 3 MINUTES!

MEET THE BELTZHOOVERS

(Continued from Page 134)

family, the elder daughter, Ruth Audley, Jr., is now Mrs. Richard Connor, of Vicksburg, up the river. She, too, is a blonde, but shorter than her sister. During the war, young Lieutenant Colonel Connor, a fighter pilot in the 8th Army Air Force, who had been shot down over Germany and had escaped through Russia, was home on short leave, and wooed and won Ruth Audley, Jr., in a whirlwind courtship. The second time he saw her, he asked her to marry him, and she did. After that, he went back to the war. The young people had grown up together, but never before had there been the slightest signs of romance.

And then, of course, there is Crissie.

Crissie would make a fortune in the motion pictures. Busy as the Beltzhoovers are with the store and their numerous other interests, it is difficult to see how Green Leaves could run without Crissie. Crissie is a working major-domo; she plans the meals, markets, cooks when necessary, has charge of the entire household economy. Nobody knows how old she is, but she is somewhere around eighty. She is dignified beyond measure. If you are finally accepted into her good graces, that is something. She guards the Beltzhoovers night and day. Most of the time she wears a "head handkerchief," old style. The rest of her costume consists of calico dresses, ankle length, tied around her spare figure by an enveloping apron. In her wonderfulold mahogany face, shrewd, unfathomable eyes see everything. Crissie is constantly passing along the gallery or through the house on her endless errands like a thin, indefatigable shadow.

Crissie was Mrs. Beltzhoover's nurse, and the nurse for all the children. When any of them were sick, she slept in a trundle bed at the foot of their beds. She still claims a priority over any child born into the numerous clan.

Crissie's first baby of the present generation, Melchior Roch Beltzhoover, Jr., is now a stalwart, reddish-haired young man of twenty-nine. During the war he spent most of his time as a water tender, first class, on the U.S.S. Bennington. He was educated at Lawrenceville School, in New Jersey, and Tulane, in New Orleans. Like his father, he is an ardent sportsman, an enthusiastic fisherman. Almost every holiday that comes along, he and his small blond wife, Mary Jane, disappear in the direction of hidden lakes and bayous. The rest of the time he is a very hard-working young man, well aware of his growing responsibilities. Like all his family, he is quiet and self-possessed and a little shy. There is also plenty of fire and quick decision and action, underneath.

A WILL AND A WAY

HANDICAP'S a word that doesn't exist in Paul Kenyon's vocabulary. It's never had a chance since a stubborn little boy threw away a crutch and then a brace—and then the whole idea that infantile paralysis could ever be a barrier to full living.

Today full living is an understatement of the "git up and git" that takes Paul from beat to beat as a newspaperman, to hammer and saw as master rebuilder of his eighteenth-century house and to "spare-time" work with the Coast Guard, the school board and the town Planning Committee.

If you're needing the know-how to convert a bad break to the best of good fortune, meet Paul, his designer-wife, Louise, and their two sons.

THE KENYONS, OF GLOUCESTER, MASS.

How America Lives

The February Journal

MOST Americans now know of the annual Natchez Pilgrimage, which occupies the entire month of March, and every year more and more Americans are making a point of visiting this lovely and moving and rewarding spectacle. Because of the fame of the Pilgrimage, tourists are searching Natchez out any day of any week. The Pilgrimage is not a carnival like the Mardi Gras of New Orleans; on the contrary, it glorifies the tradition of family life, and its romance, and the romance of old houses and gardens. ... quiet and leisurely and sunny; filled w... the shining green of boxwood hedges, and ... delicate green of live oaks, and the s... brightened gray of Spanish moss. And ... flame of camellias and azaleas, and the w... and violet of iris. You go from the shir... mahogany shadows of the old houses into ... shining gardens. You are allowed to t... your time, to wander, to soak it in. ... tually, you should spend at least two we... in Natchez during March; the whole mo... would be better.

EVERY morning and afternoon, in caref... scheduled rotation, certain of the magnifi... old houses are open; twenty-eight of ther... the moment. And what names they ha... D'Evereux, Richmond, Rosalie, Dunle... Gloucester, Auburn, Green Leaves, M... teigne . . . and best of all, perhaps, Pro... quity! You see them in the brightness of ... morning, in the lengthening shadows of ... afternoon, at d... by candlelight. ... women of the v... ous household... young and old, e... the little girls, ... days their homes ... open, dress in ... crinolines and ... square-cut, low-n... dresses of the C... War period. ... come to the con... sion that this ... the most becon... costume wor... have ever worn.

Twice a week ... ing the Pilgrim... in the town a... torium, there is w... is known as the C... federate Page... tableaux of a... bellum life. ... stage is a mas... dogwood bloss... Old people, ... young people, ... tiny children ... part in these ... leaux. The last ... leau, a year ago, ... of twelve girls ... crinoline; back ... them, twelve yo... Confederate ge...

als, erect and gorgeous in their gray, g... embroidered frock coats, collars and ... banded with the yellow or crimson of ... cavalry or the artillery. The twenty-... young people came down to the floor of ... auditorium and danced a quadrille, meas... and stately. And then went back to the st... and suddenly a boy in the uniform of a C... federate private came running to the st... holding aloft a crimson-and-gold Confede... battle standard. The audience, the nig... was there, leaped to its feet and roared, ... high above the roar was the strange, s... cry the Union armies called "the Rebel y...

Well, that is all right. Any traditio... gallantry is a fine thing when properly ... corporated into the life of a nation. ... point is, every one of the young "Confe... ate generals" had just come back from ... German front or the Pacific, and service ... the Army or the Navy of the United St...

Busy and imaginative people seldom ... fine their activities to one thing alone. ... isn't the way their minds—or, even mor... portant, their hearts—work. Ruth Au... Wheeler Beltzhoover takes an intere... everything to do with the good of Nat... She is an active churchwoman; she wa... of the women who fifteen years ago rea... what a priceless possession Natchez h... its history, its old houses, its gardens, a... started the Pilgrimage, an offshoot o... Natchez Garden Club. The Pilgrimage l... in 1932 in an amateur, tentative fashion...

Knoll

-the name that enjoys the Confidence of America's Mothers!

Look for the name
KROLL when you choose baby's carriage or crib, and you'll find many exclusive, patented safety and comfort features to guard your baby's health. America's babies deserve the best.
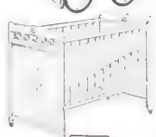
Sold At Leading Stores
FREE FOLDER
Write
KROLL BROS. CO.
Chicago 16

Guaranteed by Good Housekeeping
SATISFACTORY OR A REFUND OF MONEY
IF DEFECTIVE OR NOT AS ADVERTISED THEREIN



VENILE FURNITURE
BABY CARRIAGES

Baby coming? Nurse her right

By all means, nurse her your- if possible. But if (and when) takes to the bottle, have the facts ut bottle feeding. (See free book- offer, below.) . . . Your baby erves Davol "Anti-Colic" brand ni-Tab" nipples which promote lthy sucking action—and through ural exercise, help develop mouth, and tongue.

"Anti-Colic"
AVOL BRAND NIPPLES

YOU—FREE—The facts about feeding. free booklet, "Baby Feeding Made ," just address Dept. L-7-1, Davol ber Co., Providence 2, Rhode Island.

MATERNITY DRESSES
le Book FREE
y for the new Empire Dresses plain wrapper). See the newest in youth- ity Dresses for home, street and party ring dresses for comfort and ease of with prices so surprisingly low you a dress for every occasion. EMPIRE Y, Dept. 262-M, 212 Wilson Ave., Jefferson, Iowa.

SOMETHING NEW and SENSATIONAL in EVERYDAY CARDS
Gorgeous Satin and Velour Designs
Show rich new Satin and Velour Greeting Cards. Astounding value, 16 for $1. Get easy orders FAST! Pays up to 100% cash profit. 14 other assortments retail 50c to $1. SAMPLES on Approval. Write today.
Make Money Easily
2801 Locust, Dept. 713-A, St. Louis 3, Mo.

HANX AIDS IN CORRECTION OF THUMBSUCKING AND NAILBITING
A "STILL" PRODUCT

like all things of its kind, was at first regarded by the majority of the "practical" men of Natchez as just another "feminine notion." Strange that men, having lived with women so long, are still so impractical! The Pilgrimage has turned out to be about the most practical thing that has happened to Natchez since Charleston fired on Fort Sumter. In 1941 over half a million dollars was left in Natchez in the month of March alone by visiting Americans. Last March the Pilgrimage, which was abandoned during the war, having been resumed—over a million dollars was left in Natchez. Unlike cotton, the Pilgrimage is a crop not subject to spectacular ups and downs. Unlike oil, recently discovered near Natchez, it does not devastate a country, and then move on. It just keeps on growing, watered by the increasing interest of Americans in their own country, their love of travel. The Pilgrimage has made Natchez famous again. It has helped to restore and maintain some of the old houses that were falling into disrepair. It has brought prosperity to all kinds of people, including some of the owners of the old houses. There is no end to what it may accomplish.

But Southern women are very modest and gentle. Ruth Audley Wheeler Beltzhoover is one of the most modest women imaginable. The women of Natchez take the Pilgrimage in their stride. They think it is something intelligent women could do anywhere, given a background to work with. Possibly, but the adjective "intelligent" is a large one.

PERHAPS as good a story as any to end with is what happened last year, during the Pilgrimage, to Mary Jane Butler, the younger Mrs. Beltzhoover. It is a good story because it is typical of the deep South, of Natchez, of Green Leaves, and because, having cool courage themselves, the Beltzhoovers seem to marry women with the same cool courage. Mary Jane Beltzhoover, running down the only pair of stairs in Green Leaves—the one in the wing over the kitchen where she and her husband, young Melchior, live—caught her foot in the lowest hoop of her crinoline skirt, and fell the full length of the stairs, injuring her foot in the most agonizing manner imaginable. She was on her way to the Confederate Pageant; instead, she went to the hospital. Three hours later, piquant, pretty, reclining on a sofa in the library of Green Leaves, she was very much a part of the midnight supper which followed the Pageant.

The supper was as unexpected as her fall. Half a dozen older friends of the family had been asked in for cold turkey and quiet drinks. Some forty or more people turned up, mostly young, including several of the "Confederate generals." The younger members of the Beltzhoover family apparently had issued invitations right and left at the Confederate Pageant. Nobody was astonished, and everyone was pleased. For some odd reason the turkey held out plentifully, and so did everything else. The long, shining mahogany table in the dining room, lit by silver candelabra, was crowded with an amazing variety of good things to eat which appeared as if by magic from the kitchen to the rear. But then, no one in Natchez knows just how many people are coming to parties or are going to sit down to meals. The tradition of ample hospitality remains unaltered. The Beltzhoovers, and Natchez, still cling to the ancient American custom, now mostly abandoned, of three-o'clock dinner. The town wakes early, and goes to work early. A good idea, especially in the heat of Mississippi summers.

Neither Crissie nor Mrs. Beltzhoover knows just how many people will be at those three-o'clock dinners. Besides, as a rule—another unshakable Southern custom—there are usually several house guests, friends or relatives from all over the country. And when they come, they visit. They do not come just for week ends. This lack of exactitude disturbs neither Mrs. Beltzhoover nor Crissie.

Green Leaves is solidly founded in the past, in the present and, now, in the future. In the garden, the giant live oak, the patriarch of them all, is still growing, despite its age.

"You're not s'posed to enjoy this ride, mom!"

BABY: This may not be any joy ride for you, Mom—now that you're being me for a day!

MOM: Joy ride! I should say it isn't! Wriggling around in these straps makes my skin so uncomfortable I could howl!

BABY: I hoped you'd get to see it my way, Mom! Now maybe you see why you ought to keep my skin protected with Johnson's Baby Oil and Johnson's Baby Powder!

MOM: Write your own ticket, lamb! But tell me now, why do you need both?

BABY: A cinch, Mommie. Pure, gentle Johnson's Baby Oil to smooth me over after my bath. And more of the same at diaper changes, to help prevent what my doctor calls "urine irritation."

Other times, Mom, lots of soft, soothing sprinkles of Johnson's Baby Powder, to chase chafes and prickles and keep me purring!

MOM: Angel, I've been an awful flat tire about this! Just step on the gas and let's be on our way to the nearest headquarters for Johnson's!

Johnson's Baby Oil
Johnson's Baby Powder

Johnson & Johnson

"That's Nothin'- I'VE BEEN SEEING Gordon STYLES FOR 75 YEARS"

Grandpa's right. Since 1872 men, women and children have been "seein'" the Gordon label on the newest and smartest styles of hosiery, underwear and play wear.

Experience and creative ingenuity keep Gordon tops in better looking, better wearing merchandise. And today more than ever it's best to insist on Gordon when you buy hosiery or underthings, or polo shirts for the little 'uns.

1872 - 1947

FOR CHILDREN — Socks, underwear, knit suits and polo shirts.
FOR WOMEN — Hosiery, underwear and lingerie.
FOR MEN — Socks and underwear.

Guaranteed by Good Housekeeping

★ ★

I Nursed My Babies

BY GLADYS HASTY CARROLL

IT is rather a common occurrence for articles to be written and published in an effort to convince women that new babies should be breast-fed if this is by any means possible. The points in favor must be familiar to every literate mother, actual or potential. Breast milk is Nature's provision for the newborn, and except in extraordinary cases no formula can equal it in food value or in digestibility; it renders the child less susceptible to disease during the all-important early months of life, and tends to lighten the effects of any illness which he may contract; it is good for the development of a well-shaped mouth and strong, well-spaced teeth; and it is also a health-and-beauty treatment for the mother.

The spreading of this information is no doubt an excellent thing. But simply knowing that a baby should be so fed, and wanting to so feed him, is not enough to solve the problem which still exists, particularly among women who have their babies in hospitals—and these are the great majority.

How many women do you know who say they wanted to nurse their babies, but could not? Do you believe them? I do, because of my own experience and that of my very intimate friends, and that of new mothers I have heard sobbing as they lay on their high beds surrounded by flowers and packages wrapped in tissue and tied with ribbon.

> It is with men as with horses: those that do the most prancing make the least progress. —BARON DE STASSART.

Yet very few women are actually incapable of providing this safeguard for their children, any more than their mothers and grandmothers were. Many who find, after giving birth, that they cannot provide it, could have done so if they had been prepared for it, under their doctors' direction, during pregnancy. Many more, with or without preparation, could do it if they were helped to believe that they can and must and will do it, and were given all possible help and encouragement by the doctors and nurses who have each case in charge.

In 1932 I had my first child, in Minneapolis. I wanted to nurse him. My obstetrician took it for granted that I would nurse him. He was born at seven o'clock in the evening, and was brought to me at five o'clock the next morning. The milk supply was scanty as long as I remained in the hospital. The baby was hungry. He received no supplementary feeding. He chewed. The nurses used hand expression after each feeding and treated my honorable wounds. The baby lost weight and did not gain. My doctor chuckled comfortably, "He'll make up for it."

WHEN I left the hospital I had been taught to do hand expression after feedings, and I continued this for several weeks. When I stopped, the supply was ample, he was a husky, contented boy, and I was blissfully happy. I nursed him until he was nine months old, though by then it was only once a day. The only illness he had was chicken pox, and he never knew he had that.

I was the first among my contemporary friends to have a child. In the years which followed, the others were having them, from one to four apiece, and I was amazed that none of them nursed their babies. I asked, "Don't you want to? It's so easy, and it's such fun." They all answered that they had wanted to but couldn't; the doctor said they couldn't; they didn't have enough milk. One of these babies died of streptococcus infection at the age of seven months.

I did not have my second child until 1941. I was then living in a different part of the country. My new obstetrician did not mention nursing, during my pregnancy, but I had been taught how to prepare myself for it and did so.

My daughter was born at three o'clock one afternoon. Bewildered by sedatives, I did not realize that I did not see her, except as a nurse held her, for the two following days. I did not know whether she was one hour or forty-eight hours old when my doctor said to me casually:

"Do you want to nurse this baby?"

I said, "Why, of course I do. I'm going to."

He smiled indulgently. "Well," he said, "we'll see what we can do."

But she was already on a formula.

WHEN she was brought to me she was not hungry. She would not try to get food. The nurse left her with me, but despite all my efforts the baby fell asleep.

When the nurse came back I said fretfully, "She isn't hungry."

"Ho-ho," said the nurse. "Well, better luck next time."

I didn't have much better luck for a week. They weighed her before and after nursing and found she took one ounce, or one and a half ounces.

"She can't gain on that," said the nurses—triumphantly, it seemed to me.

At the end of the week I made the request—it really was an order—that supplementary feeding be stopped.

All eyebrows were raised. It was clear that obstetrician, pediatrician and nurses considered my contribution the supplementary element, and a very poor supplement at that. But I made a scene, ran a temperature, and so alarmed my doctor that he persuaded the pediatrician to humor me for a few days.

My daughter became hungry. She caused trouble in the nursery. She chewed. That made more trouble for the nurses. And, most damning of all, she lost weight. They told me, "You see? You can't do it."

I stormed, "I don't see—except that you have handicapped me and don't help me a bit. I'm doing what hand expression I can, but I'm not very strong yet. Why don't you do it?"

They looked at me curiously, as if I were primitive. They replaced dressings, saying, "Tch-tch! If we don't watch out, we'll get an infection here."

I said, "Why don't you give me a lot to drink? I hate to drink, but I can."

They told me, "You can have it, but it will only upset you. It won't do a bit of good."

My doctor asked me gently, "What makes you think you can nurse this baby?"

"Because I nursed the other one. For nine months."

"But this isn't then, my dear. It's now. This is a different baby. You're older."

"If I'm young enough to have a baby, I'm young enough to nurse it."

The pediatrician went into a rage, washed her hands of the case, and drove her car out of the hospital yard with a roar I could hear plainly in my room.

I was sorry for my doctor. He looked distraught and helpless. I was angry with the nurses. I felt sure they had begun with the formula again.

I said I was going home. My husband supported me. No one could prevent me. I went.

Before I left, the nurses brought me the baby's formula very neatly written. My doctor asked me if I had bottles at home. I told him I had not. He wrote down an address where my husband could stop for them as we drove by. He fixed me with his

Embroider THIS BABY DRESS AND SLIP SET $1.00

QUICK AND SIMPLE TO COMPLETE

DRESS WITH SLIP EMBROIDERY THREAD INSTRUCTIONS $1.00 POST PAID

Dress and Matching Slip of quality, sheer, white baby Hemstitched for crochet or and stamped for embroidery completed Size 1, infants to months. Complete instructions embroidery thread included ey back if not 100% satisfied. only from U. S. and Posses- Order by No 834 please REDERICK HERRSCHNER CO. S. WABASH AVE., CHICAGO 3, ILL.

Baby is SAFE in a BABEE-TENDA Safety Chair

Don't let this happen

Can't be tipped over Converts into play table Used for years Ideal gift Sold only direct to you, NOT IN STORES Consult Phone Book for local agency, or write us for FREE folder.

THE BABEE-TENDA CORPORATION
651 Finance Bldg. • Cleveland 15, Ohio
In Canada Write: 347 Bay St., Toronto 1, Ont.

LEARN MILLINERY AT HOME

Design and make exclusive hats under personal direction of one of America's noted gners. Complete materials, blocks, etc., furnished. Every illustrated. You make exclusive salable hats right from start. We teach you how to start a profitable business in e time. Low cost and easy terms. Expert milliners are in and. Free National Placement Dept. Send for free catalog.

LOUIE MILLER SCHOOL OF MILLINERY
3 N. Wabash Ave., Dept. 31, Chicago 1, Ill.

KNITTING YARNS

For over 35 years

ASK FOR FREE SAMPLE CARD

Pre-war quality

CLIVEDEN YARN CO.

Dept. E-T, 711 Arch St., Phila. 6, Pa.

BRINGS MIGHTY FAST long-lasting relief for MUSCULAR ACHES-PAINS

If you want fast long lasting relief from aching, stiff sore muscles, lumbago misery or neuritis pains—rub on good old reliable Musterole at once.

Musterole instantly starts to relieve the painful soreness—it helps break up the surface congestion and checks irritation. You can actually feel it work!

This famous family standby offers ALL the advantages of a warming, stimulating mustard plaster yet is so much easier to apply. Just rub it on. In 3 Strengths.

MUSTEROLE

gaze and said, "I can't believe you will be foolish. You have been so sensible about everything but this."

I said, "I shall not be foolish."

We did not stop for bottles. I never saw the formula again.

We took our baby to our home, deep in the country. She was hungry. She chewed. I hand-expressed. She wasn't "good." She continued to lose weight for another week, because I had lost so much time.

But came the day we weighed her and found she had gained—oh, blessed morning! From then on she continued to gain, and a month later, when I went back to my doctor to be discharged, she was getting fat, she was happy, she woke for only one feeding between six P.M. and six A.M. I took her snapshot to show to my doctor, to reassure him.

He studied it and remarked, "She's awfully little, isn't she?"

I stiffened. I said, "She was little when she was born. She was littler when I took her home. But she is getting bigger every day."

He only looked at me quizzically. I am quite sure he still thought I was mad.

I nursed her until she was nine months old. That just carried her through mumps, which did not stop her eating, sleeping or gaining.

When she was about a year old I happened to meet my obstetrician on the street. He said I was looking fine, and how was the baby? I told him the glowing truth. But he did not smile. He was still worried. He said suddenly, "Look here. How did you dare do it? That baby was losing weight when she left the hospital! How did you dare?"

Then I felt helpless. If he didn't understand yet! I said as quietly as I could, "I didn't dare not to do what I did."

My daughter had her fifth birthday recently. She has never had an illness which required a doctor. She has seen our family physician only for checkups, vaccination and inoculations. Her teeth are strong and perfect—like her brother's. She is four inches above average height for her age, and weighs in proportion.

PERHAPS I was just lucky. Perhaps everything would have been exactly the same if I had bought the bottles and used the formula.

But what the doctors and nurses seemed not to understand was that she obviously ran a risk either way, and I, as her mother, felt I had to decide between the two. Whether I was right or not, I have been proved not wrong.

It was not easy for me to put up this fight against such odds those first two weeks. I could not have done it without my husband's encouragement. I probably could not have done it if this had been my first child, if I had not been taught earlier by a doctor who believed in such a fight, and if my son had not grown up big and strong.

So it seems to me that women of our generation must do more than be willing to breast-feed their babies, knowing the reasons why they should.

Americans have a great respect for medical authority. It is far easier to accept than to reject it, whatever it is, and for no group of us more so than for women who have been under constant, kindly care for nine months and then wake up to find themselves entrusted with the richest possession—and the greatest responsibility—in the world.

Therefore the time to undertake safeguarding the child-to-be surely begins when we make our first visit to an obstetrician who confirms our hopes. He asks us many questions. Let us ask him some:

"Doctor, do you believe that new babies should and almost always can be breast-fed? Are you even a little bit fanatical about that? Because I am. Will you undertake to do everything in your power to make this possible? Will you send me to a maternity hospital which is staffed with nurses who will help me? Will you give me the name of a pediatrician who is opposed to the use of formulas except under truly extraordinary conditions? . . . If we can agree on this, I'll try to be a model patient. Otherwise it will be better for both of us if some other obstetrician takes my case. I am determined to nurse this baby!"

When baby's sobs mean "Childhood Constipation"

...give Fletcher's Castoria!

"It's the laxative made especially for infants and children."

WHEN your baby is tearful and fussy . . . when he sobs because of "Childhood Constipation" . . . it's wise to know what to do:

Give him Fletcher's Castoria. It works thoroughly and effectively. Yet it's so gentle, it won't upset his sensitive digestive system.

Why it's right for children

Unlike adult laxatives—which may be too harsh—Fletcher's Castoria is specially made for children. It contains no harsh drugs and will not cause griping or discomfort.

And Fletcher's Castoria has such a pleasing taste that children really love it. They take it gladly, without any struggle. Caution: Use only as directed.

Get Fletcher's Castoria at your drug-store today. Look for the green band on the package. It identifies the original and genuine product.

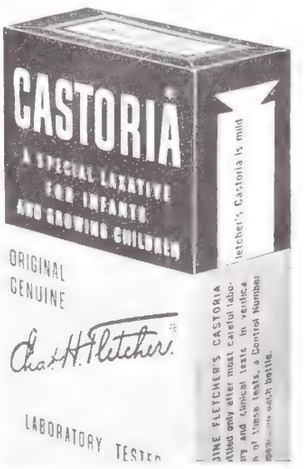
Chas. H. Fletcher CASTORIA

The original and genuine



ONE MOTHER TO ANOTHER

My, how we Mothers wait for baby's first smile - cherish each succeeding one. There's such a world of reassurance in watching the corners of that tiny mouth curve upward, as if to say, "Everything's fine with me."

Mrs Dan Gerber

Who says babies can't talk

Any mother knows what this baby's eyes are saying: "Hurry, Mom, I'm hungry. Gee, I hope it's something good."

And more than likely it's Gerber's on the way . . . the baby foods that have the confidence of millions of mothers.

For Gerber's are good: good to eat and so good for baby. Babies enjoy the natural taste of Gerber's. Carefully selected vegetables and fruits are washed only in pure, deep well water, then cooked by steam under pressure to retain precious minerals and vitamins. And Gerber's smooth, uniform texture means easy digestion.

Be sure to get Gerber's—with America's "Best-Known Baby" on the label!

YOUR CHOICE OF THREE SPECIAL CEREALS

Serve all three Gerber's Cereals for variety! Cereal Food (Blue Box) Strained Oatmeal (Red Box) and the new Barley Cereal (Yellow Box). All three rich in added iron and B complex vitamins to help build healthy babies. Pre-cooked, ready-to-serve—just add milk or formula.

It's wise to check your baby's feeding program with your doctor.

Gerber's BABY FOODS

FREMONT, MICH. OAKLAND, CAL.

CEREALS (3 Varieties) • STRAINED FOODS (18 Varieties) • CHOPPED FOODS (13 Varieties)

© 1947, G. P. C.

Free samples

Please send me samples of Gerber's Cereal Food, Gerber's Strained Oatmeal and Gerber's Barley Cereal. My baby is now ..... months old.

Address: Gerber Products Co., Dept. 81-7, Fremont, Mich.
In Canada: Dept. 81-7, 49 Wellington Street East, Toronto 1, Ont.

Name.....

Address..... City and State.....

H. ARMSTRONG ROBERTS

You can't tell ahead of time, but you've seen it happen before: fun with an aftermath of injury. Mothers should know and follow the accident rules.

YOUNG BONES MEND QUICKLY

BY DR. HERMAN N. BUNDESEN

President, Chicago Board of Health

NEARLY two million American children from three to eighteen years of age are disabled by injuries every year. As a hazard to life and health, accidents are deadlier for children than is any disease.

Of the more serious injuries, broken bones head the list. Healthy, active children at hard play or on skates or bicycles are bound to have many falls and bumps; if the blow is hard enough and if a bone sustains its full force, a break or fracture is likely to result. Unhappily, too, children are often the innocent victims of their elders' carelessness or lack of skill, and are badly hurt in automobile smashups.

Unless it involves the skull or the spinal cord, a fracture is rarely fatal. But every fracture, if it is not treated promptly and competently, is potentially a cause of lasting damage to the bone or joint. Furthermore, most bone specialists agree that the most important factor in the treatment of nearly every broken bone is the way the injured person is handled from the time of the accident until the doctor takes over.

Of course, many accidents occur away from home, and damage may be done by well-meaning but ignorant friends or neighbors. But usually—especially in the case of small children—mother is near at hand, and her skill and judgment become important factors in the child's recovery.

Almost always, except in the case of a finger or one of the small bones of the hand or foot, it is easy to tell whether or not a bone is broken. While knowledge of the nature and extent of the injury may not be specific until X-ray pictures have been made, often there are signs that point definitely to a fracture. For example, deformities caused by improper position of the bones can be seen at once, as when the hand is bent abnormally back along the forearm in a common type of wrist fracture, or when the long bones of the leg or arm are broken crookedly.

Sometimes, however, bones break incompletely and stay in place. In this case, loss of function or motion of the injured part severe pain, swelling or discoloration wil "give the fracture away." In all cases o accident, here is an important rule fo

(Continued on Page 166)

GRATEFUL young mothers from Maine to California tell us that Doctor Bundesen's baby booklets have been of the greatest help to them in caring for their own babies. The first eight booklets cover your baby's first eight months. They sell for 50 cents. The second series of booklets covers the baby's health from nine months to two years—seven booklets for 50 cents. The booklets will be sent monthly; be sure to tell us when you want the first booklet. A complete book on the care of the baby, a necessary supplement to the monthly booklets, OUR BABIES, No. 1345, is 25 cents. A booklet on breast feeding, A DOCTOR'S FIRST DUTY TO THE MOTHER, No. 1346, sells for 6 cents. Address all requests to the Reference Library, LADIES' HOME JOURNAL, Philadelphia 5, Pennsylvania.

A FAMILY AFFAIR

"Fresh up" WITH Seven-Up!

FIND FUN AT HOME—BE A "FRESH UP" FAMILY!

Cheerful 7-Up just naturally belongs in happy homes. That's because 7-Up is America's home drink . . . the lively "fresh up" drink that always adds to family fun. Seven-Up tempts the taste of every age . . . from toddlers right on up.

Be a "fresh up" family. As you enjoy your daily life together be sure to "fresh up" with 7-Up. Look for the famous 7-Up signs and order your supply.

COPYRIGHT 1948 BY THE SEVEN-UP COMPANY

YOU LIKE IT · · · IT LIKES YOU!

(Continued from Page 164)

mothers to follow: If there is any doubt at all, always do what you would do if you knew the bone was broken.

1. Immobilize the broken part. If someone is near at hand who knows how to apply a traction splint, this should be done. Traction pulls the broken bone ends apart and prevents the tightened muscles from drawing them past each other or grinding them together, causing further injury to the surrounding soft tissues. However, traction should not be applied by an untrained person.

If a skilled first-aider is not available, it will be of help to fix the broken limb by tying it firmly to a board, a rolled magazine or a pillow. This stops much of the harmful motion that cannot be avoided if the broken part is allowed to dangle while the child is being moved.

2. Move the child carefully, taking especial pains to minimize pressure on the fractured bones. (With a break in the upper leg, for example, do not let the child sit up in a car.)

If possible, get help. A suffering child is not easy for one person to lift and carry. Careless or inefficient handling can quickly turn a simple fracture into a compound one, in which a broken bone fragment pierces the skin, complicating the wound and adding the danger of infection.

3. If there is any chance that the back or neck is broken, do not move the child at all unless it is imperatively necessary. Movement in such cases always involves the risk of crushing the spinal cord and damaging the delicate nerve roots there, with resulting paralysis. Pain in the back or neck is cause to suspect spinal injury; so is inability to move the legs or fingers. If it is simply out of the question to leave the child where he is until expert help arrives, he should be moved only on a rigid stretcher or board—lying face down if the back is injured, and face up if the neck is injured. Never lift the head to give the child a drink or let him try to sit up if there is any possibility that the back or neck is broken.

4. Keep the child absolutely still, too, if there has been a blow on the head. Coma, drowsiness and blurred vision are danger signals. Skull fracture, with possible injury to the sensitive tissues of the brain, is the most serious hurt of all. In this case, unnecessary movement can cause irreparable damage or even death.

5. If the child is writhing or thrashing about, so that harm to the broken parts seems likely, give aspirin to relieve the pain and help keep him quiet.

Once the injured child has been brought to the doctor's office or hospital, mother's gravest responsibilities are over. X-ray pictures make it possible to tell exactly where and how the bone is broken, and thus serve to indicate precisely the right position in which it must be placed for mending. When bones are badly shattered, skilled orthopedic surgeons today perform near-miracles of healing with bone-graft operations or with silver wire or surgical "nails."

Today, too, casts are made with steel supports or stirrups so that often the child with a broken leg can go about his normal daily activities while the bone is healing. Doctors have found that the more the child moves about—once the bones are fixed in place and are on the mend—the less will be the stiffness and soreness caused by disuse of muscles, and hence the shorter the period of convalescence. Thus mothers must not "baby" the child with a broken bone or try to keep him quiet any longer than the doctor says is necessary. Exercise, too, will improve the appetite for the full, nourishing diet that is a great aid to healing.

Given the right chance, young bones mend quickly, and seldom does lasting deformity or loss of function result from a fracture which has had intelligent first aid and good professional care. When mother knows what to do and keeps her head at the time of the accident, the results are nearly always favorable.

From a loving family A ROOM ALL HIS OWN!

Nursery by L. S. Ayres Indianapolis

Thanks to Grandma, Aunt Sally, Uncle Peter, and Uncle John — and their thoughtful Christmas checks — this little skipper rates his very own room.

Can you see your baby surrounded by softly tinted walls, gaily decorated with amusing felt pictures? Jumping happily on these strong, firm, Whitney No-Sag Springs? Then falling off to sleep like a lamb in his oh-so-comfortable, cuddly Whitney crib?

And, Mother, how you'll enjoy the attractive, roomy compactness of the Whitney chifforobe and Whitney chest that are your favorite baby's own private property.

NOTE TO MOTHERS: Whitney cribs, chifforobes, and chests are built sturdily for easy baby care. They come in smart Modern style in Blond. In Colonial design in Warm Maple. Other smart designs in Blond, Maple and Rustwood.

FEATURE: Whitney cribs have comfy but posture-built springs to make sure Baby's back will grow strong and straight.

See this charming Whitney Nursery Furniture at your favorite store today, or write for the free, illustrated booklet, "For Babies Only." Address Department L1, F. A. Whitney Carriage Company, Leominster, Massachusetts.

The nursery above shows Whitney Cribs (No. 511) with matching chifforobe (No. 7) and chest (No. 6) finished in Blond.

F. A. WHITNEY CARRIAGE COMPANY
Since 1855
Leominster, Massachusetts

Whitney CRIBS

THIS IS A NIBBLER

THIS IS A WATCHBIRD WATCHING YOU

THIS IS A WATCHBIRD WATCHING A NIBBLER

By Munro Leaf

THIS silly creature that almost looks like some kind of queer mouse is a Nibbler. It is always nibbling and eating at the wrong time and then never wants to eat at mealtimes when it should eat the right food to make it well and strong. This Nibbler is munching something that is going to spoil its appetite for lunch, and you can see by that clock it is almost lunchtime now. Nibblers haven't much sense or they would stop being Nibblers.

YES WERE YOU A NIBBLER THIS MONTH? NO

Printed in U. S. A.

Ladies' Home

The Magazine Women Believe In • February, 1947 • 25c

JOURNAL

Who has Hair to Spare? Complete novel by W. O. Mitchell

W. O. MITCHELL

"I've had enough adventures to keep me writing for thirty years," says W. O. MITCHELL, author of Who Has Seen the Wind? "I've been a deck hand on a Greek ship, a lifeguard at Biarritz, a radio-advertising salesman, an insurance agent and a high-school principal—all within ten years. My wanderlust finally wore out in 1942 when I started writing fiction. This is the most interesting job of all, and so far I've found only one occupational hazard—two young sons whose favorite toy turns out to be my one and only typewriter."

BARBARA BENSON

"Public-opinion polls run in our family," says BARBARA BENSON, JOURNAL Contributing Editor and author of Would You Marry Your Husband Again? "My husband is a director for the Gallup Poll, and I spent fifteen years taking innumerable polls on advertising, movies and publishing. Since I always had a secret yen to do magazine work, my JOURNAL job of writing articles about surveys is ideal. Outside of opinion research, my main activity is cooking for my husband and two children, whose only comment is that as a cook I'm a very good researcher!"

JOHN WALKER

"The bare bones of my biography show thirty-odd years spent mostly in art galleries, first as student, later as curator," says JOHN WALKER, author of JOURNAL articles on American Art. "I specialized in modern art at Harvard, spent eight years in Italy studying Italian and contemporary fine art, and returned to the U. S. in 1939 to become chief curator of the National Gallery of Art in Washington. Looking after these great art treasures has been exciting and at times overwhelming, and so far has left me little time for what I like to do best—write about art."

JOURNAL

Contents

FEBRUARY, 1947

NOVEL CONDENSATION COMPLETE IN THIS ISSUE PAGE

WHO HAS SEEN THE WIND? W. O. Mitchell 17

FICTION

LEAVE US FACE IT George Bradshaw and Robert Thomsen 20
MARY HALLAM (Second part of three) Susan Ertz 22
MAY-DAY MADNESS Margaret Weymouth Jackson 40
ROSIE'S SIN Val Teal 44
DALE MACLAREN IS BACK IN TOWN Naomi A. Hintze 46
MARRIAGE IS SO COMPLICATED Ware Torrey Budlong 50

SPECIAL FEATURES

WANTED: A FEDERAL LABOR POLICY Dorothy Thompson 6
THE BIG FRONT DOOR Struthers Burt 6
AMERICAN ART John Walker 19
WOULD YOU MARRY YOUR HUSBAND AGAIN? Barbara Benson 24 BED MAY BE BAD FOR YOU Gretta Palmer 32
THE TEMPLE OF DEMOCRACY Maxwell Anderson 34
WOULD YOU VOTE FOR A WOMAN PRESIDENT? Judith Chase Churchill 48
IF YOU ASK ME Eleanor Roosevelt 49
HOW AMERICA LIVES: "BRACES AWAY" J. C. Furnas 161
DON'T LET IT GET YOU DOWN Leslie B. Hohman, M.D. 168
I WEAR THE APRON NOW David Duncan 179

GENERAL FEATURES

UNDER-COVER STUFF Bernardine Kielty 5
YES SIR—THAT'S MY GIRL! (The Sub-Deb) Edited by Maureen Daly 8
OUR READERS WRITE US 10
FIFTY YEARS AGO IN THE JOURNAL 15
JOURNAL ABOUT TOWN 15
FIRST AID AND THE HOME MEDICINE CABINET Dr. Herman N. Bundesen 149
THIS IS A RUNAWAY Munro Leaf 151
BRINGING UP PARENTS Dr. Barbara Biber 154
ASK ANY WOMAN Marcelene Cox 188
HOW TO INFURIATE YOUR HUSBAND James C. Adams 203
REFERENCE LIBRARY 219
DIARY OF DOMESTICITY Gladys Taber 226

FASHIONS AND BEAUTY

WHERE THE SUN SHINES Wilhela Cushman 36
LITTLE GEM OF A WARDROBE Ruth Mary Packard 42
POLISHED, PRESSED AND PREFERRED Dawn Crowell 171
WE HEAR YOU TALKING Dawn Crowell 213

INTERIOR DECORATION AND ARCHITECTURE

LITCHFIELD, CONNECTICUT Richard Pratt 26
DINING IN THE LIVING ROOM Henrietta Murdock 175
ROOM IN THE SUN Hal Williams 190

FOOD AND HOMEMAKING

LOOK YOUR PRETTIEST Ann Batchelder 52
LINE A DAY Ann Batchelder 54
RENDEZVOUS WITH YESTERDAY Gladys Taber 88
CONVERSATION PIECE Ruth Mills Teague 136
NEVER A DULL MEAL Helen Train Hilles 140
FOLLY COVE FAVORITES Louella G. Shouer 172
GETTING DOWN TO FREEZING Judy Barry 176
REPORT TO THE HOUSEWIFE Judy Barry 182
QUICK AND EASYS FOR TWO Louella G. Shouer 224

POETRY

OH, THERE SHALL COME A DAY Eunice Mildred LonCoske 56
AFTER SNOW Elizabeth-Ellen Long 71
THE STRANGER Kate Brackett 83
FORTUNETELLER Ethel Jacobson 99
HEARTBEAT Mary Norton Gordon 108
SECOND LOVE Leonard Snyder 119
THE DEAD R. J. Crot 145
LULLABY Mark Van Doren 158
TRUE LOVE Annie Laurie Von Tungeln 179
NEW FATHER Ethel Barnett deVito 186
TO A NEW LOVE Dorothy Quick 195
FOR MY YOUNG DAUGHTER GROWING UP Joseph Auslander 208
DEVOTED CLAQUE Georgie Starbuck Galbraith 211
SONG FOR FEBRUARY Elizabeth Coatsworth 216

Cover Design by John Engstead

[illegible] by The Curtis Publishing Company, Independence Square, [illegible] Entered as Second Class Matter May 6, 1911, at the Post Office at Philadelphia under the Act of March 3, 1879. Entered as Second Class Matter at the Post Office Department, Ottawa, Canada, by Curtis Distributing Company, Ltd., Toronto, Ont., Canada.

Subscription Prices: U. S. and Possessions, Canada, Newfoundland, Labrador, Costa Rica, Cuba, Nicaragua, Dominican Republic, Guatemala, Haiti, Honduras, Republic of Honduras, Salvador, Panama, Republic of Panama, Mexico, Spain and South America except the Guianas, 1 yr., $4; 2 yrs., $6; 3 yrs., $8. Other countries, 1 year, $4. Remit by money order or draft on a bank in the U. S. payable in U. S. funds. All prices subject to change without notice. All subscriptions must be paid for in advance.

UNCONDITIONAL GUARANTY. We agree, upon request direct from subscribers to the Philadelphia office, to refund the full amount paid for any copies of Curtis publications not previously mailed.

The Curtis Publishing Company, Walter D. Fuller, President; Fred A. Healy, Vice-President and Advertising Director; Mary Curtis Zimbalist, Vice-President; Cary W. Bok, Vice-President and Treasurer; Lewis W. Trayser, Vice-President and Director of Manufacturing; Benjamin Allen, Vice-President and Director of Circulation; Robert L. MacNeal, Secretary; Richard Ziesing, Jr., Manager of Ladies' Home Journal. The Company also publishes The Saturday Evening Post, Country Gentleman, Jack and Jill and Holiday.

CHANGE OF ADDRESS: Send change of address (naming magazine) to

THE CURTIS PUBLISHING COMPANY
Independence Square, Philadelphia 5, Pa.

[illegible] at least 30 days before [illegible] the issue with which it is to take effect. Send old address with [illegible] address label [illegible] unless you provide extra postage. Duplicate copies cannot be sent.

The names of characters in all stories are fictitious. Any resemblance to living persons is a coincidence.

METRO-GOLDWYN-MAYER'S LION'S ROAR

Published in this space every month

The greatest star of the screen!

This is the year of "The Yearling" and this month we're going to get a number of America's famous authors tell you about M-G-M's finest picture.

★ ★ ★ ★

All these writers saw the preview of "The Yearling" and it's a privilege to have them as our guest columnists.

NORMAN REILLY RAINE: "It's one of the truly great epics of the screen. 'The Yearling' is among the most enchanting, exciting and emotionally rewarding pictures ever made."

★ ★ ★ ★

MACKINLAY KANTOR: "'The Yearling' is the best thing Gregory Peck has ever done, and I believe that the audiences of this nation will share my opinion."

★ ★

URSULA PARROTT: "An enchanting background of woodland and wilderness, photographed in Technicolor so subtly perfect it deepens and intensifies every mood of the story."

★ ★ ★ ★

SARAH-ELIZABETH RODGER: "The brightest image in one's memory after seeing the picture is the compelling performance of young flaxen-haired Claude Jarman, Jr., as Jody. He is Boy in the same sense that Gregory Peck is Man."

★ ★ ★ ★

OCTAVUS ROY COHEN: "The outstanding feature of 'The Yearling' is (to my way of thinking) the superlative performance of Jane Wyman as Ma Baxter. She plays an exacting and difficult role with superb restraint and dynamic power."

★ ★

NEWLIN B. WILDES: "If you have a heart you will love 'The Yearling'. You will love it and be better for having seen it. It is a great and wonderful experience."

★ ★ ★ ★

CECILE GILMORE: "The picture shimmers with color. It has natural suspense. There are moments when the heart leaps. There are stark moments in 'The Yearling', but there are constant overtones of tenderness and humor, too."

★ ★ ★ ★

And that's why: This is the year of "The Yearling"!

—Leo

★ ★ ★ ★

"The Yearling", starring Gregory Peck and Jane Wyman, is a Clarence Brown production. The cast also includes Claude Jarman, Jr., as "Jody", Clem Bevans, Margaret Wycherly, Forrest Tucker. Screen play by Paul Osborn, based on the Pulitzer Prize Novel by Marjorie Kinnan Rawlings. Directed by Clarence Brown, produced by Sidney Franklin. A Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer picture in Technicolor.

"My veal sauté was so heavenly ...I was peeved as—

"Let's face it. The instant I tasted that divinely tender sautéed veal served up with zesty Fiesta Rice, I had to admit it.

"I've been the world's prize booby!

"Imagine! I've been telling anyone who'll listen what flaky pie crust Crisco makes, and yet somebody else had to tell me how grand Crisco is for frying!

"It makes me furious to think of all the delicious fried foods we've been missing. You can just bet we'll all be having lots of them from now on—Crisco-fried foods are okay for the children, too.

"It's a cinch to fry foods crisp and light with Crisco—it's pure, all-vegetable. Why, 9 out of 10 doctors say that foods fried properly with Crisco are digestible!

"Now digestible Crisco is my standby for all kinds of good cooking—cakes, pies and fried foods, too. Crisco improves all 3."

VEAL SAUTÉ WITH FIESTA RICE

Delicious and festive! The delicate flavor of the veal contrasts appetizingly with colorful, tangy Fiesta Rice. Quick and easy, too, fried the Crisco way.

1½ lbs. veal steak, ¼" thick
4 tbsps. Crisco
2 tsps. salt
Flour for dredging
1 cup rice
3 tbsps. Crisco
2 tbsps. minced green pepper
2 tbsps. minced onion
2 tbsps. minced celery
2 tbsps. chopped pimiento or tomato

All Measurements Level. Cut veal into serving pieces. Dredge in flour. Season. Brown well in 4 tbsps. of Crisco. (Pure, all vegetable Crisco has no taste of its own—brings out the natural flavor of even the most delicate foods.) Add ¼ cup water. Cover and cook over low heat 20 to 30 minutes or until tender.

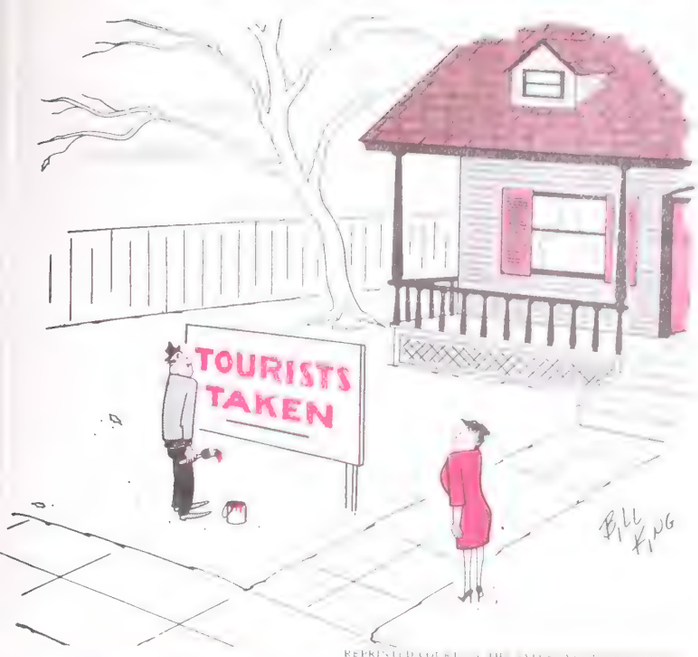
Cook rice in boiling salted water. Brown onion, celery and green pepper in 3 tbsps. Crisco. Stir in cooked rice and chopped pimiento or tomato. (And the kids can eat their fill—foods properly fried with Crisco are digestible!) Arrange with veal on platter. Serves 4-6.

★

CRISCO COOK BOOK—Send 10¢ in coin and a Crisco label (any size) to Crisco, Dept. HJ, Box 837, Cincinnati 1, Ohio, for 64 pages of "Recipes for Good Eating." Offer good in the U. S., including Hawaii.

Listen to
KENNY BAKER
with all-star cast on:
"GLAMOUR MANOR"
Fun! Music! Surprises!
A brand new kind of daytime show!
12 noon E. S. T.
Mon. thru Fri.—ABC Network

In everything you fry or bake
use Crisco
IT'S DIGESTIBLE!



"Hadn't you better change that to 'accommodated'?"

UNDER-COVER STUFF

By Bernardine Kielty

E Egg and I ranch is cashing in. The esent tenants of the farm charge a dol- car for sight-seers and are doing such a office business that they've aban- d chickens altogether. Tourists are much more profitable—reading tour- that is. . . . And speaking of chick- we hear that the United States Rub- Company is now making a fabric from ken feathers. A suit for an average- man takes thirty-eight broilers: for man's suit, size 18, thirty broilers. broilers yield a pound of feathers.) h small facts we absorbed from a ng of NEW RICHES FROM THE SOIL: PROGRESS OF CHEMURGY, by eler McMillen.

• • •

e of the high points of a vacation is the ent when you stop packing long enough k out the books which you want to take —the recent ones that you've missed the long-ago ones that you've never and always meant to. The books we sent vest for a month's reading took an in- ate amount of postage. But most of —read in the afternoons after long ings of riding the range—were worth it.

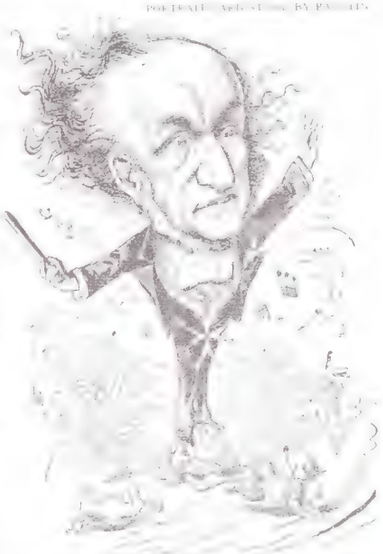
e was TRAVELS IN ARABIA DESERTA, h unfortunately we'd confused with OLT IN THE DESERT. But when it ar- —1370 pages of it—we took a try. all, it is a classic, and we knew we'd r again come so close to reading it. is the book, you will remember, that T. E. Lawrence's bible and guide— day-by-day, hour-by-hour record of two-year journey which Charles ghty took with the Bedouins of ia back in the 1870's. As Lawrence "The book has no date and can never old. It is the first and indispensable upon the Arabs of the desert." It is dern Library Giant.

HE CORRESPONDENCE OF WAGNER LISZT was an error in judgment, but because it nurtured a dislike already olished for the grumbling, whining, beg- Wagner, quite as garrulous in his rs as in his operas. Liszt, on the other , in contrast to the ornamentation and ripeness of his music, was admirably ained in his answers. In spite of which, rs still remain our favorite reading. (We recommend DEAR THEO highly—the letters of Vincent Van Gogh to his brother.)

• • •

Once in these pages we told a seal story, which we feel gives us the right to follow up with a beaver story. This one is culled from one of Sir Osbert Sitwell's books, and though he apologizes for repeating it, here it is: A beaver had been caught (probably in Bear Mountain) by a New Yorker, who took it home to his small apartment high up in one of Manhattan's towers, planning the next day to remove it to his country place. His wife was affable about the whole thing, and suggested that the animal spend the night in the living room. It was a pretty elegant room, but the couple found a wooden box, lined it with straw, put the beaver in it, and left, locking the door. The next morning when they entered they found nothing at all in the room except the beaver and a dam. Somehow or other a vase of flowers had been upset, and

Continued on Page 158



Letters to Liszt—Wagner was garrulous and grumbling in his operas.

Some girls have all the luck . . . or something!

The girls who get around have a lot more than luck. They have a way with their clothes . . . an appealing way of keeping everything they wear fresh and attractive. Look at a glamour girl from both sides. See what makes her click.

Come-closer Freshness: Her dainty undies get their dunking in Ivory Flakes to help their fleece and color last. No soap gives clothes or colors prettier care than the kind that's born of Ivory's pure hearts.

Cover-Girl Curves: Her girdle keeps those curves under control, thanks to frequent beauty baths in Ivory Flakes. Treat your girdles to rich, safe Ivory Flakes suds. See how much longer they keep their stretch and fit.

Clothes That Click: She keeps 'em clicking—heads for twice the wear with Ivory Flakes care. Even the newly developed Du Pont nylon chiffon in this Bonnaventure gown is made with mild Ivory Flakes. So are the matching gloves. But take a tip from fashion and fabric experts—shun rough handling—trust "special" clothes to the soap that's designed to pamper style and color.

Eye-Catching Legs: She doesn't worry about runs in those cobweb chiffons—even after a dozen rhumbas! Her secret? Nightly dips in Ivory Flakes—she takes no chances on the wrong kind of soap. Sudsing in gentle Ivory Flakes caresses runs! Strain tests prove it.

If it's lovely to wear
It's worth Ivory Flakes care

Ladies' Home
JOURNAL
Bruce Gould and Beatrice Blackmar Gould
EDITORS

MARY BASS, Executive Editor LAURA LOU BROOKMAN, Managing Editor

Associate Editors: HUGH MAC NAIR KAHLER, BERNARDINE KIELTY, ANN BATCHELDER, WILHELA CUSHMAN, FRANK ELTONHEAD, ALICE BLINN, RICHARD PRATT, HENRIETTA MURDOCK, LOUELLA G. SHOUER, MARY LEA PAGE, MAUREEN DALY, DAWN CROWELL, JOHN MORRIS. ● Contributing Editors: GLADYS TABER, LOUISE PAINE BENJAMIN, GLADYS DENNY SHULTZ, BARBARA BENSON, MARGARET HICKEY. ● Assistant Editors: JOHN WERNER, CHARLOTTE JOHNSON, ROBERT ATHERTON, DONALD STUART, RUTH MARY PACKARD, RUTH MATTHEWS, NORA O'LEARY, ALICE CONKLING, MILDRED ARNOLD, JUDY BARRY, JUNE TORREY, MARJORIE LEDERER LEE, EVELYN G. SAGER, LILY GLENDINNING, DOROTHY COUNSELMAN SELBY, JOAN YOUNGER. ● Editorial Assistants: BETTY NILES GRAY, KATHERINE WEST MILLER, SELMA RUTHERFORD BURGESS, ALICE KASTBERG, ANNE EINSELEN, DOROTHY VOORHEES, FRANCES RODMAN, JAN WEYL, EMILY ELMORE MACY, JOSEPH DI PIETRO, MARGARET WINSLOW O'NEILL, JOSETTE DALY LUTZ, IRIS WILKEN

THE BIG FRONT DOOR

By Struthers Burt

THE longer you live, the more you learn; and one of the simplest and surest things you learn is that nine times out of ten there are just three factors that make for success: loyalty, intelligence, and hard work. Nor is this any Horatio Alger talk; nor reaction; nor any desire to "keep the wage slave in his place." Personally, I'm a radical. I'm just repeating what all experienced men and women know. Luck has little to do with it. Only the young or ignorant talk much about "luck." Luck, for the most part, is the wisdom to know an opportunity when you see it, and, after that, to take advantage of what your wisdom has shown you.

I have placed the factors in question in their relative importance.

Personal relationships are the most essential things in life. Loyalty is a prime requisite for secure relationships. The disloyal man seldom gets anywhere; and if he does, sooner or later he will be found out, and all the riches in the world won't protect him. But loyalty, of course, like most virtues, works both ways. You can't be loyal to a disloyal boss. It is well, however, to find out first if he's disloyal. If you're both loyal, together you'll get somewhere. Yet loyalty in itself is not enough. Loyalty will get you a job, and keep you there, but it won't get you a better one. Intelligence and hard work are also necessary.

Intelligence is what makes you rise in the world, and what tells you that, on the one hand, loyalty is necessary, and, on the other, hard work is too. Yet intelligence just by itself is more of a curse than an asset. The stupid man dies in the job he acquired as a youth. The merely "bright" one moves from job to job, convinced that no one appreciates him. He begins as a nuisance to himself, and ends as a nuisance to everyone else. Brains without character are about as dangerous a gift as a man can have. They are much more likely to land him in jail than anywhere else.

It is the combination, loyalty, brains and hard work, that counts. And don't forget that everyone has to begin somewhere, and that work is only as menial as you make it, and that no honest labor is dishonorable.

Most of us remember the famous lines in Pinafore where the singer attributes his success to the fact that as an office boy he "polished up the handle of the big front door, and polished it so care-ful-ee, that now I'm the ruler of the Queen's nav-ee." As in most of Gilbert's lyrics, satire hides a fundamental truth.

"The big front door" still opens to the right knock. Neither injustice, discrimination nor monopoly has ever been able to close it for long. The trouble is most people pass it by, or, seeing it, seek a short cut, armed with burglar tools, through the second story.

It's a pity each new generation has to learn the facts of life for itself. It's a pity so much good material is always wasted in the effort. And, above all, it's a pity that the gigantic folly of war invariably upsets all values, so that, for a while, black seems white, and white seems black, and the truth seems foolish and outmoded.

Wanted: A Federal Labor Policy

By Dorothy Thompson

SINCE the end of the war a series of labor disputes culminating in strikes have repeatedly paralyzed the American economy and prevented its reconversion from war to full peacetime production. It has been estimated by official sources that between V-J Day and last May the number of man-days lost to industry by strikes was 110,000,000, or ten times that of the previous period, and that, at a rough guess, the loss to production was fully five and one half billion dollars' worth of goods. The repeated interruption of production has led to inflationary price rises canceling out the gains for which the workers struck. The chaotic condition thus engendered has favored those radicals among workers and workers' leaders, or "brain trusters," who welcome disasters as proof that the American social order is outmoded and must be replaced—if necessary, by violence. On the other hand, it has produced antilabor reactions both in and out of Congress. Since each extreme aids and abets the other, the social structure has become seriously weakened of reason and moderation.

The fact that such systems of democracy as ours have either passed away wholly or in large part in much of the world intensifies the anxieties of those who have most to lose from overturn, and stimulates the hopes of those who believe they have most to gain, while both viewpoints are influenced by highly colored and often deeply prejudiced reports of the success or failure of other systems in other countries.

A sober view should, however, remind us all that no sweeping and radical change of the American system is likely to occur except through a series of tremendous upheavals, entailing a long period of terrible suffering, economic collapse and political anarchy, with dreadful physical and spiritual burdens and losses to all parts of the population; with the ruthless suppression of liberty; with awful excesses due both to opportunities for bestiality to arise and to fanatic zeal, such excesses crying for revenge, which in turn calls forth further excesses induced by the fear of revenge, until entire classes of human beings are liquidated to assure the continuity of the new system, thus poisoning the new system at its very source.

It is, therefore, obviously in the interest of all Americans of whatever social class, or whatever color or creed, to try to make our system work with such justice and hopeful outlook as will assure our society against the catastrophic overturns that have periodically rocked and wrecked other societies and cost more misery and degradation than many a great international war.

AT the center of the problem of making our system work stands the matter of labor-employer relations. These relations are a primary concern to all, even to those not involved in them, since in our highly integrated industrial society disputes resulting in strikes, though directed against employers, damage the whole people, including those in no way party to them. The only protector of the higher interests of the whole community is Government. And thus there is a growing demand that Government "do something about strikes."

I, too, think that Government should do something; but the record of what it has done in the last decade, except for the extraordinary war period under an extraordinary President, suggests that a more rational, objective and expert approach is necessary. It is more than eleven years since Congress passed the Wagner Act, whose specifically expressed purpose was to reduce strikes and bring about more orderly and stable labor relations. Subsequent history has proved its inadequacy. Since then many labor bills have been passed and others proposed, among the former the Smith-Connally antistrike act, adopted over the veto of President Roosevelt, whose comment that it would tend to promote rather than ameliorate strikes proved accurately prophetic. The Hobbs anti-racketeering law is of

(Continued on Page 210)

Very personally yours

YOU enter smiling . . . as the overture brings back all the old enchantment. That night: still more close to the stars the topmost row of the balcony had seemed to you. That hush, when the lights lowered, and the curtain rose . . . wafting you into a make-believe heaven. Where the heroine's loves . . . tears . . . triumphs . . . were very personally yours!

Play-going is still one of your favorite ways of keeping life fascinating: fun. And strolling among those who come to see and be seen, you're poised . . . self-possessed, even at certain times. For naturally Kotex is your choice of napkins, knowing those flat, tapered ends of Kotex prevent revealing outlines.

You're sure, too, of extra protection, with Kotex' special safety center. Of heavenly softness that lasts, because Kotex is made to stay soft while you wear it . . . just as every Kotex napkin is made with a deodorant locked inside to keep you dainty, charming. And only Kotex has 3 sizes for different women, different days: Regular, Junior, Super Kotex.

And so, whatever the scene, you enter smiling . . . always confident; always young in that eager love of life . . . so very personally yours.

*More women choose Kotex than all other sanitary napkins

*T.M. Reg. U.S. Pat. Off.

THERE are some things every young girl should know. You can't find the answers in books—and won't get any wiser just daydreaming, but you might pick up a few right tips by listening to the boys. And these sharp comments, both candid and casual, come directly from top men in high school football captains, class presidents, high-school-newspaper editors and all-round smooth boys. This is a boy's-eye view of what the fellows are looking for in the "ideal girl to date." ("The ideal girl"—you, that is, if you would be.)

THEY LIKE TO STOP —

"To call for a date at her house and feel really welcome. Too many girls act as if this date was just another evening, and even if that is true, the least a girl can do is act as if she was hoping to enjoy herself!"

"The most important thing in a girl's bag of tricks is to make friends. Suppose you're at the local juke joint. Just the thought of everyone's coming over to shoot the breeze sounds fun, doesn't it? Well, who is going to want to try to make conversation if your current flame is one of those aloof, 'just me and my bunch' chicks?"

"She can kid around on a date, at school and just about always—and still she's not frivolous. She can figure out a fellow's mood and act accordingly. If he feels like joking, she can take it and joke back just as well. If the fellow's worried or tired—well, she knows just how it is."

"A girl must learn to be a good sport. We'll skip over the girl who thinks she's big-time and expects to be bowed down to and handled with kid gloves."

"Give me a girl that's truly feminine, not a tomboy, not a bundle of giggles, just a girl. She doesn't have to be the most gorgeous specimen of womanhood in the world; she has what I term 'quiet beauty.' She's kind to everyone, with no exceptions. She's human enough to like to dance and laugh and sing at the right time, but she can be serious too. Her politeness is incomparable. She may not be the most popular girl at school, but she's my friend and she's popular with me and that's what counts."

THEY LIKE TO LOOK —

"Not glamorous all the time, of course, but a girl can be neat and sharp even in jeans and an old shirt. It's not the clothes as much as the general attitude that counts. If it's one of sloppiness and 'don't give a darn,' no boy will be attracted or even look at the girl twice!"

"A girl doesn't need a million-dollar wardrobe to dress well; and believe me, the girl who dresses well is the one who attracts the boys. She should plan her clothes for some variety—and since school is where boys and girls meet most of the time, that's the place to put out the well-dressed 'date bait.'"

"Absolutely must wear socks or stockings."

"Give me femininity—a girl who knows when to wear jewelry, flowers, and bows in her hair. And let her know how to act the sophistication she looks in a formal. That must be hard, because most girls try to look bored-and-glamorous instead of poised-but-cute—a much better effect!"

"Sometimes a fellow actually likes to see what a girl really looks like—so none of that inch-deep war paint for me. Girls who spend hours with secret beauty lotions should take a tip from nature and just let their own faces show through. And get rid of that dark, greasy lipstick!"

THEY LIKE TO LISTEN —

"The girl who can carry on a conversation, not necessarily high-brow stuff, but just everyday chitchat, is over the biggest hurdle. There is danger of overdoing, however, and the real master is the girl who can talk—not a mile a minute, but in a normal tone as if she were talking to her girl friends. After all, a boy asks a girl for a date so they can become better acquainted—and the best way to become friends is through good conversation."

"Did you ever notice that the girl who is laughing and smiling all the time is invariably the one who gets around? It seems like the girl who is quick to smile and say a pleasant word just naturally sets the stage for a happy acquaintance."

"She doesn't like football, but she humors a fellow by listening; though admitting that she never understood the game. She may even argue against its merits, but the main idea is—she acts interested."

GOT A DATE TONIGHT?

If the answer is a small, sad "No," just send for the Sub-Deb booklet, Do Boys Like You? No. 1668, to check your dating charms. It's now ready and can be ordered from the Reference Library, Leaves' Home Journal, Independence Square, Philadelphia 5, Pennsylvania.

"She is generally well informed, sounds smart and has specific things to say. She doesn't agree to everything and can argue good-naturedly. And she likes to talk on a date—but not afterward!"

"When I go on a date I expect to have a good time, and sometimes I get stuck with a girl who is on a binge of gloom and gets sulky and silent. If it's a girl I know well, I may sympathize with her moods, but in any case I want an answer when I ask, 'Is anything the matter?'"

AND FOR ADDED ATTRACTION —

"Another important angle is the money deal. The average high-school boy lives on an allowance which, while it provides enough of the folding stuff for some entertainment, definitely doesn't put him in the night-club brackets. The girl who watches out for his pocketbook is on the inner track, but there is also the other extreme. If a boy wants to spend some money on a girl, it won't be much fun if the girl keeps nagging about extravagance."

"She knows that it helps dating to be interested in athletics—swimming, bowling or golf. It makes it easier for the fellow to think up places to go and things to do. He doesn't need a hay ride or a dance as an excuse for a date."

"If the fellow and girl are going steady, she takes a pride in his accomplishments and generally boosts his ego, even if he knows it's flattery. And she's reasonable about demands on his time, giving him plenty of evenings with the fellows. She doesn't try to monopolize his week ends, and she allows him to break a date occasionally—if the excuse is good."

"In high school, very few fellows think of getting serious, yet so many girls who are treated well on just a couple of dates like to think that they and the boy are going steady—and that's all, brother!"

"A smart girl will do and say the right thing at the right time—and will never make her date seem dumb or kiddish. Can't you just picture the perfect romantic setting, lights dimmed, soft music, and then the dream girl pipes up with an obvious, bright, brush-off, 'Well, what did you do at school today'; or, 'Did you hear about that interesting experiment we tried in chemistry'; or worse yet, 'Did you hear about that very funny joke Bob Hope told on his program last week? It goes this way: "Once there were two Irishmen. . . ."' There just isn't any justice! (And there isn't likely to be a second date, either.)"

Portrait of a Fussy Lady . . .

Listerine Antiseptic becomes a part of regular hair-washing as a precaution against ugly infectious dandruff

MAN you imagine what [illegible] could do to the health of your [illegible] and the luster of your lovely hair? The [illegible] ... Dandruff ... missing scales! The germ colonies on the scalp!

Fastidious women recognize this constant threat and make Listerine Antiseptic a part of regular hair-washing. It's so simple, so easy, so delightful . . . a wonderful precaution against infectious dandruff as well as a grand twice-a-day treatment.

Kills "Bottle Bacillus"

Why not start using Listerine Antiseptic whether or not you detect flakes and scales? You get the benefit of its cool, refreshing effect, and, if the "bottle bacillus" (Pityrosporum ovale) is present, Listerine Antiseptic kills it by millions. Remember, the "bottle bacillus", in the opinion of many dermatologists, is a causative agent of this distressing infection.

No Fuss . . . No Bother

You simply douse full strength Listerine Antiseptic on the scalp and hair and follow with vigorous fingertip massage for several minutes. No fuss, no bother, no messy salves or lotions.

How gloriously cool and fresh your scalp feels! How fresh your hair looks! How quickly flakes and scales begin to disappear! In clinical tests, twice-a-day Listerine Antiseptic treatment brought marked improvement within a month to 76% of dandruff sufferers. You know you've taken a precaution against infectious dandruff that can't be had with salves and lotions devoid of germ-killing power.

Make Listerine Antiseptic a "must" with your family at hair-washing time. It is a delightful habit worth sticking to. Listerine Antiseptic is the same antiseptic that has been famous for over 60 years in the field of oral hygiene.

LAMBERT PHARMACAL CO.
St. Louis, Missouri

AT THE FIRST SYMPTOM OF INFECTIOUS DANDRUFF . . . LISTERINE ANTISEPTIC

Balaiza

The soothing cologne with a new and inspired dimension

There has never been anything quite like Balaiza. For Balaiza is a cologne with a new and inspired dimension . . . a gentle, soothing quality that leaves your skin feeling soft and smooth. Use Balaiza after the bath, and through the day. Sense its lovely fragrance that clings and clings. See what tender ways it has with your skin. In these Lucien Lelong fragrances . . . Whisper, Indiscrete, Balalaika.

LUCIEN LELONG

Our Readers Write Us

Women in Labor

Baltimore, Maryland.

Dear Editor: I do not feel that I can be too extravagant in my praise of America's Greatest Problem (Labor Relationships), by Dorothy Thompson.

We need more women doers and fewer economic, labor and industrial experts for improving labor relationships. Women must start in the home. Labor-relations problems need an injection of women's iron and balance.

The LADIES' HOME JOURNAL and Dorothy Thompson deserve a Nobel Prize for being philosophers and advocates of labor peace, and if I had my way, you both would be the recipients for helping to solve America's most baleful and inescapable domestic problem.

Cordially yours,
ROBLEY D. STEVENS.

Seemah Admirer

Calcutta, India.

Dear Journal: To one who has centered all her ideals and ambitions in the United States of America since she was about ten years old, but owing to circumstances was not able to fulfill her ambitions, the JOURNAL brings me a lot that is dear to my heart.

My favorite corner is How America Lives. I am a white-collar girl myself (secretary to the managing director of a large chemical company) and hope to get to God's country some day.

Sincerely,
SEEMAH JOSHUA.

English Well Fed

Lake Providence, Louisiana.

My dear Editors: We English aren't starving! I came from England four months ago and I know! On my way over here I read an L. H. J. and decided that was my magazine. But so far, in every issue, somewhere, someone hands out a lot of sobs for the poor English. It's time you realize someone's "kidding" you.

Here in God's Own Country, when I get bacon, it's 90 cents a pound. "Rat" cheese is 80 cents a pound. Liver—50 cents a pound! I can't get fresh sea fish. (Oh, those creamy fresh Dover soles!) I give 95 cents a can for orange juice, lasting five days for Babe, whereas a 1/6 (about 30 cents) bottle of Rose Hip Syrup—which has five times as much vitamin C, incidentally—lasted three weeks and one day in England, where I lived during the war and after. I got Babe's three eggs a week always. I got half a pound of sugar for him and half a pound for myself every week, and one pound for each of us extra a month instead of preserves, if I wished, and lots extra every now and then at canning ("bottling" to us) times. My sister-in-law and I worked out that last year and every English person got three times as much sugar as every American.

Please stop pitying us! If you meet a "starving" English creature, it's sheerly due to his or her own mismanagement of food supplies and he or she would "starve" and "lack vitamins" in any country in this old world. Very best wishes,

MARJORIE McMASTER.

Likes Being Fenced In Chicago, Illinois.

Dear Editors: I'd like to write that I've found an answer to the problem of stubborn children. Our small ones are only babies—12 months and 23 months—but they are unco-operative to the *n*th degree and resist discipline to the last inch; consequently, they are always underfoot.

Perhaps a month ago, papa received a drastic edict. I announced that as of the following Monday he was taking a month's leave of absence; I was going out and work eight hours a day (what a glorious vacation it seemed to work only eight hours) come home to a dinner waiting for me and I was going to play with the children while he washed dishes, bathed children one at a time, and then relax with the newspaper while he tucked 'em in. Papa was speechless. After puffing away thoughtfully at his pipe for an hour, he came up with the solution. Taking over the two hellions all day was simply too much for him to even consider. Papa is wonderful—kind, generous, sympathetic and helpful as is humanly possible. He logically stated, "Fencing in the kids produces illness that can't be tolerated. With the kids underfoot, your life is miserable; therefore, why don't we just fence you in?"

He was right—a fence of big cardboard boxes filled with toys now fences me in while washing, ironing, and so on.

The first vociferous protest from the little ones is over; now only the eyes stand out accusingly as I merrily dangle an ironing cord out of their reach. Life is again wonderfully bright.

Yours sincerely,
MRS. E. P.

Nightingales No Longer Sing in Berkeley Square

The Duke's Cottage, Rudgwick, England.

My dear Bruce and Beatrice: I rather like winter. It is like "no hope can know no fear." You expect so little, and in England one often gets a nice surprise. The fuel situation here is chancy. One day the papers say "Fuel rationing? Baloney!" The next, a fuel cut is announced, and all heat and light go off for an hour or so.

There is fruit again on the London street barrows, quite nice pears and grapes, but bananas and oranges are still for children only. And now and again, if you get up early and run very fast, you can find an iced cake, perhaps.

The smart thing, if you are rich, is to have a jeep painted some fancy color—green or pale blue—to tottle about in. You have to be rich so that you can get your petrol on the black market. The most amazing cars have appeared on the roads, resurrected from government dumps. It looks like a sort of mechanical last trump.

Later. The grass has been resown in Berkeley Square, but I don't know about the nightingales. Houses are being repaired here and there, but fearful gaps still remain, like missing teeth, in Bond Street. The railings aren't going to be put back around the park, I understand, though the big iron gates are still ceremoniously closed at sundown, with the old cry "All out," of which no one takes the slightest notice, and no one expects them to.

The London squatters have all been pushed out and disbanded, but down here they are all cozy as limpets on rocks, sharing the camp with the German prisoners. Pity for the latter is already beginning to water down our rage. Bishops now welcome them to church, and I think that deep in most of our hearts is the feeling that we don't care about being slave owners.

I long to start that excellent postbox with a flag that I've seen in America. Here we have a most unhandy hole in the door. Not only do letters roar through it; so do the wind and the rain.

Later. We have all been stricken by a strange sort of gastric influenza, which descended like a pistol shot, and reduced us to so low a state that life no longer seemed bearable. But just as we went around with a rope with a noose to it, looking for a beam with a handy hook in it, we recovered. Mary and Annette, and Evie, the support and stay of Mary's home, all succumbed at the same time, but the new baby mercifully abstained. I recovered just in time to fill in the application form for my auxiliary petrol. This must go off early in the month, when a department goes broody on it for a bit, and then replies, usually most inadequately. On one person's ration I have to do all my own and Mary's carting and chores. Mary hasn't a car, but my suggestion that they let me have some petrol for her has so far brought forth nothing. I still get sixteen gallons odd a month for everything, and I'm six miles from shops. So you see.

The bitter part of it was, last time I applied for mercy, and got the usual terse refusal, I was accosted on the bypass by a complete stranger who offered me as much petrol as I wanted, then or at any time, without any coupons, and at a price. I've kept out of all that sort of thing all

(Continued on Page 13)

Ellie, the dissatisfied eyeful...

NOW ELLIE HAD...

ARTICULATE ANKLES...

NIFTY KNEES...

AND A TERRIFIC TORSO!

ET ELLIE OF ALL PEOPLE WAS STILL DISSATISFIED WITH HERSELF! AND HERE'S WHY!

TRY AS SHE WOULD ELLIE COULDN'T MAKE HER HANDS GIVE OUT GLAMOUR LIKE THE REST OF HER! THEY'D GET DRIED OUT CHAPPED AND ROUGH...

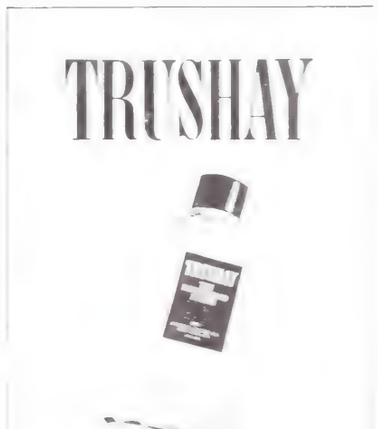
SO SORATCHY IN FACT, THAT HALF THE TIME ELLIE'S PUBLIC THOUGHT THEY'D GOT HOLD OF A PORCUPINE!

THEN ONE DAY NELLIE TOLD ELLIE ABOUT AN ENTIRELY NEW AND DIFFERENT HAND LOTION! THE BEFOREHAND LOTION... TRUSHAY!

SO ELLIE SMOOTHED CREAMY FRAGRANT TRUSHAY ON HER HANDS EVERY DAY BEFORE SHE TACKLED THE DISHES... BECAUSE TRUSHAY GUARDS HANDS EVEN IN HOT SOAPY WATER!

WHAT'S MORE ELLIE PUT ON TRUSHAY BEFORE SHE DUNKED HER LIGHT LAUNDRY — AND TRUSHAY'S SPECIAL OIL-RICHNESS HELPED PREVENT THE DRYING DAMAGE OF THAT SOAP-AND-WATER TASK, TOO!

WELL AS YOU CAN SEE BY THE ABOVE, ELLIE GOT SPLENDID RESULTS FROM TRUSHAY'S SPECIAL BEFOREHAND PROTECTION! — AND ITS WONDERFUL SOFTENING HELP! YOU WILL, TOO!



P. S. [illegible] Wonderful" on her rough, dry elbows [illegible] use a powder base... before and after exposure to weather. Trushay contains no [illegible] Buy Trushay at your

Mrs. George Jay Gould, Jr. goes to a theatre première

"Before I go out—always a 1-Minute Mask!"

Charming young Mrs. George Jay Gould, Jr. is greatly admired in New York society for her willow-slim grace and the camellia perfection of her skin. "Always when I'm dressing for an important evening," Mrs. Gould says, "I give my complexion a refreshing pickup with a 1-Minute Mask of Pond's Vanishing Cream. I know of no beauty treatment that pays such quick dividends as the 1-Minute Mask! Right away, it makes my skin look brighter and clearer—and so much softer! After a Mask, make-up is simply no problem at all. It goes on easily, smoothly—and clings!"

Smooth on a Mask of Pond's Vanishing Cream. Leave one minute.

"Keratolytic" action dissolves off stubborn dirt and dead skin particles! Tissue off.

Right away your skin looks brighter and fresher. Feels smoother, too!

Every day, too—for a silky powder base.

Every time you want to look your best—a 1-Minute Mask

(Continued from Page xx)

these years, but am beginning to envy those who make no bones about it, don't try, and go wherever they want to in their large cars, all the time. Rules and regulations are undermining our virtue sadly over here.

Down the lane, bedraggled as the returning German prisoners. The good-conduct ones—called Reliable—are now allowed to walk out in twos and threes, so they do. They look pallid and miserable and people go out and throw them apples, and cakes change hands furtively, even at the present cost B.U.'s.

I try very hard to tell myself these are the men to blame that I have no longer a son, that these are the men who flew over and dropped bombs on us, and I feel sorry for them just the same, and disgusted that we keep them here, and so does everyone else I have spoken to. The Master Race in real life has little that's glamorous about it. It is on the main pimply and undersized, and almost unbearably servile.

One of our worst troubles, which has got worse instead of better since war ended, is the laundry. It goes, but it does not come back again. Three, four and even five weeks sometimes elapse, the best part of our house linen far far away. And as we have no soap for home laundering, and can't buy spares to replace the missing articles and fill gaps on the shelves, some frightful dirty work has to go on with table napkins and even sheets and pillowcases, and a hot iron in a corner.

Love to you both,
DOROTHY BLACK.

Gratefully Received

Amsterdam, Holland.

Gentlemen: We noticed in your wonderful magazine two letters from Dutch ladies, expressing their rather divergent views about the sending of parcels. Sure, there is no more hunger, but, for so many of the inhabitants, your gift is just making the difference that makes life worth living: the surprised smile of a child that receives some candy sticks; the grateful look in the eyes of a young mother, receiving some extra diapers or warm children's clothes; the young man that gets from a friend in America a new shirt and tie and feels no longer shy in company with a worn-out collar; the girl that gladly accepts the stockings you don't need, and so on.

I can't see anything wrong when some help is given in such cases. They would have been glad to do the same for us, are doing now if you had been in their position. Most sincerely yours,

M. LAMERS.

Salty Retort

Senator Desmond's article, America Can Prevent Goiter, apparently contains several misstatements. The JOURNAL gladly publishes corrections as sent in by those who know.

W. G. Wilcox, president of the Mulkey Salt Company, of Detroit, Michigan, and chairman of the Research Committee of the Salt Producers Association, says: "From 98 per cent to 99 per cent of the edible salt produced in this country is produced either by drilling wells down to the deposit of solid salt or by mining the extremely pure natural solid-salt deposits, or from the solar evaporation of the waters of the Great Salt Lake in Utah and the ocean waters on the Pacific Coast. There is no iodine present in the crude salt thus obtained."

P. B. Dunbar, Commissioner of Food and Drugs, Food and Drug Administration, says: "Senator Desmond's [illegible] is a monumental challenge to the United States Food and Drug Administration: You can require the restoration of iodine in salt and wipe out simple goiter, or you can ignore the problem and be responsible for the suffering of millions.' The fact is that the Food and Drug Administration cannot require that salt be iodized. It it could, the necessary [illegible] been taken long ago. Congress has the authority to impose such a requirement."

Alexander Falconer, Secretary, Salt Producers Association: "The salt companies are willing and [illegible] they can, in working with the medical societies and public-health fathers, that simple goiter may be controlled. It is, of course, illegal and [illegible] agree among themselves [illegible] table salt containing .01 potassium iodide restraint of trade and, therefore, a violation [illegible] the penalties provided thereunder. The [illegible] taining and using iodized salt lies in constant education by the medical and [illegible]

Baby Rules—or You Do

Dear Mrs. [illegible] [illegible] check-up. I had [illegible] told me [illegible] wail or bluster. I [illegible] order and [illegible] carry on without it.

On my most recent visit to the doctor, I inquired about a [illegible] child and received a wounded look and the information that "we" no longer believe in formula. So Gretchen, at six weeks, has a diet rich with [illegible] banana and as much cereal as she will take.

Many mentors say that a well-regulated baby [illegible] to bed at the same time each day and he will learn not to protest against his nap. I have come to regard the information very lightly.

The twins have been put to bed after luncheon every day of their lives, yet the symphony of sound is undiminished. Chris and Aithea struggle down [illegible] ently, but the twins never say die and I am forced to the conclusion that no matter how well regulated his hours, a child who doesn't wish to nap will protest.

In my course of reading, I gathered that babies had no taste preference and would eat any food correctly presented. In Chris' case this was true. And when the time came to present solid foods to the twins, I went at it in the expectation that they would react as their brother had. This was clearly not the case. One made a horrible face and forcefully ejected her first spoonful of cottage cheese. The other gagged gently and disgorged her cherry gelatin. They are three years old now and I am still tabulating their dislikes.

And not long ago, Kathy held a strike against cod-liver oil. In the most Lachl approved fashion I ignored her outbursts and cheerfully offered it to her along with the others. Each day she cheerfully refused it. At the end of two weeks I was no longer cheerful. My daughter knew it. Appealing to her better nature didn't help. And the glad cries of the others, as they smacked their daily ration, didn't sway her in the least. My patience snapped. I did an old-fashioned, completely unapproved piece of disciplining. I held her nose and forced her to take her dose. She did. What is more important, she has never refused it since that incident. Perhaps I marked her personality, but I know that treatment [illegible] her a great interest not to bow her legs.

Four years of hard knocks have taught me to take exception to another established rule. Any dyed-in-the-wool reader knows that spanking is the mortal sin of motherhood. We never, never govern our children by force. Now that I have had some slight experience in governing with sweet reason, doubt rears its ugly head. Where [illegible] between [illegible] and [illegible] renegades are strained past bearing, I cannot always think in terms of their personality development. I can suffer frustration, too, and in the long run I'm sure a frustrated mother would have a horrible effect on her children.

We can change our methods and switch our schedules, but we'll never change our babies. They are little individualists, and [illegible] mothers of five babies: Do try to get the [illegible]

Sincerely,
[illegible]

Best in Dublin

[illegible] ing and certainly the most eagerly sought magazine to reach Dublin. When copies arrive at the main news agents, they are [illegible] charm of Grable, "looks" of Bacall or

Scottkins White Facial Quality

A SCOTT TISSUE

Soft-Weve

REG. U.S. PAT. OFF.

White-Facial-Quality

There's no denying Scott's new Soft-Weve is softer . . . it feels like cleansing tissue! What's more it's firm . . . a really practical tissue for every one in the family. Of course, there's only one way to judge it properly and that's to try it! Why don't you—today?

Cleansing tissue soft ...toilet tissue firm

P.S. a cleansing tissue by Scott

...so soft
...so firm
you'll like Scotties

'Scotties' Reg. U. S. Pat. Off.

Good...an' easy!

That's the wonderful thing about Treet!

Treet-and-Beans Casserole

Easy does it—when you're serving Treet! Good big dinners are so easy to prepare—and it's so easy to please the whole family with them. To prove both points, just try a Treet-and-Beans Casserole. Mix 1 tbsp. molasses and ¼ tsp. dry mustard with each can of Armour Star Pork and Beans and place in casserole. Top this with meat from 1 tin of Treet cut into 6 cubes and spread with a little molasses. Bake in 350° F. oven for about 30 min. Serve 3 or 4—with hot steamed brown bread and cabbage and apple salad. Treet's so good-tasting served this way—or any way you serve ham!

Treet—not one but two favorite meats

There's more to Treet than you see or taste—tremendous food values are concentrated in this blend of tender pork shoulder and sugar-cured ham. Treet is rich in proteins and calories, minerals and vitamins—and none of this nutritious goodness is ever lost for Treet is sealed in the tin before cooking. Remember, Treet is not one but two favorite meats—and you can serve Treet any way you serve ham!

For additional Treet and Canned Meats recipes, write Marie Gifford, Dept. 39, P. O. Box 2053, Chicago 9, Illinois.

The best and nothing but the best is labeled ARMOUR ★

Serve Treet every way you serve ham!

Who has Seen the Wind?

The strange boy stared with steady gray eyes; suddenly Brian knew. "This is your prairie."

HERE was the least common denominator of nature, the skeleton requirements, simply, of land and sky—Saskatchewan prairie. It lay wide around the town, stretching tan to the far line of the sky, waiting for the unfailing visitation of wind, gentle at first; later, a long hot gusting that would lift the black topsoil and pile it in barrow pits along the roads.

Where the snow white of alkali edged the course of the river, a thin trickle of water made its way toward the town low upon the horizon. Inhabited by some eighteen hundred souls, the town was made up largely of frame buildings with high peaked roofs, each with an expanse of lawn in front and a garden in the back. Cement walks extended from First Street to Bison Avenue, which crossed Sixth Street at McTaggart's Corner; from that point to the prairie a boardwalk ran.

Lawn sprinklers sparkled in the sun; Russian poplars stood along either side of Sixth Street. Five houses down from McTaggart's Corner stood the O'Connal home. Virginia creepers had almost smothered the veranda; honey-

This is a condensation of the book soon to be published by Little, Brown & Co.

ILLUSTRATED BY ROBERT G. HARRIS

The Journal's Complete-in-One-Issue Novel ★ BY W. O. MITCHELL

suckle and spiraea grew on either side of the steps. A tricycle with its front wheel sharply turned stood in the middle of the walk.

The tricycle belonged to Brian Sean MacMurray O'Connal, the four-year-old son of Gerald O'Connal, druggist, and Maggie O'Connal, formerly Maggie MacMurray. Brian at the moment was in the breakfast room. He sat under the table at the window, imagining himself an ant deep in a dark cave. He hated his mother and his father and his grandmother for spending so much time with the baby, for making it a blanket tent and none for him. Not that he cared; he needed no one to play with him now that he was an ant. He was a smart ant.

"Brian!" His grandmother stood high above him. "I told ye to go outside!"

He crawled from under the table. Behind the spectacles her eyes looked forbidding.

"If ye stay inside ye'll disturb the baby. Ye must go out!"

"Can I have a tent like the baby has?"

"Ye cannot. 'Tis bad enough having the baby ill without ——"

"Is he ill bad?"

"Aye. Now, be a good boy and do as ye're told."

Slowly he walked to the sand pile by the high caragana hedge that separated the O'Connal back yard from that of Sherry, next door. He hated his grandmother. Reflectively he stared down at the sand hump in one corner of the box. He hit the hump, and wished that it were his grandmother. He hit the hump again, being careful that it was with the sharp edge and not the flat bottom of the shovel.

He stopped. Directly opposite him, and low in the hedge, was a round and freckled face—a new face to Brian. The boy came to the edge of the sand pile. Hedge leaves hung to his sweater and to his hat, a blue sailor hat bearing the legend H.M.S. THUNDERBOLT.

"I'm coming into the sand pile." As he stepped over, Brian saw that his knees were scratched. "Let me hit some," the boy said.

"No," Brian said.

"I'm Benny Banana."

"Benny Banana—Benny Banana," chanted Brian; "Banana-Benny-Banana."

The boy sat down; he picked up a thin pebble from the sand. "What's your name?"

BRIAN plumped himself down by the boy. "Brian Sean MacMurray O'Connal."

"I'm Forbsie Hoffman." The boy touched the tip of his tongue with the pebble he had picked up. The pebble hung. To Brian it was magic.

"I'm going to do that. I'm going to hang a pebble to my tongue." He tried it. "Mine won't hang at all."

"Naw 'hinnyenouch," said Forbsie, with the pebble still clinging to the tip of his protruding tongue.

Brian found that a skinnier pebble hung.

"Do you know anything more?" asked Brian.

"I'm hungry. Maybe if you was to ask, your maw'd give us a piece of bread and butter."

"The baby's going to heaven," explained Brian.

"My dad's a conductor," Forbsie said, "on the C.P.R. He has got silver buttons."

"It's where God stays," said Brian, "heaven."

"No it ain't," said Forbsie. He lifted his arm and pointed. "God lives right in town. Over there. I seen Him lots of times."

"You have not!"

"Oh, yes! He's all grapes and bloody. He carries around a lamb."

Brian got up. "Let's us go over to His place."

Forbsie got up. "I guess I'll go home. I don't feel so much like going."

"I've got something to say to Him," Brian told his new companion. "I'm going to get Him after my gramma. You show me where it is He lives."

"All right," said Forbsie, and they started off.

Mrs. Sherry, with limp underwear in her hands, stared after the boys as they walked toward the front of the house.

At MacTaggart's Corner a tall man in shirt sleeves greeted them: Mr. Digby, principal of the school. He walked a block west with them. Digby could not be called a handsome man, largely because of the angularity of his face. His skin had the weathered look of split rock that has lain long under sun and wind. His sandy eyebrows were unruly over eyes of startling blueness, his hair lay in one fair shock over his forehead.

"We're going to see Somebody," Brian told him.

"Are you?" said Digby.

"Yes," said Brian; "God."

THE schoolmaster showed no surprise. "I'd like to come with you, but I have a previous engagement."

"What's that?" asked Brian.

"It means that I can't go," said Digby.

When the boys had turned off Bison Avenue and left the principal, they walked in silence. Three blocks took them to the gray sandstone church: KNOX PRESBYTERIAN—1902.

"Is this it?" asked Brian.

Forbsie said that it was.

"Let's go see Him, then."

"I'm going home, I think. It's suppertime, and I better get home."

"Not yet." Brian started up the stone steps; when he turned at the top, he saw that Forbsie was halfway down the block.

Brian knocked on the church door. A woman came out of the little brown house next to the church. She shook a mop, then turned to re-enter the house. Brian knocked again.

As he turned away from the door, he saw the woman staring at him. She ought to know if God was in. He went down the steps and to the opening in the hedge.

"I guess God isn't anywhere around."

"Why—what do you mean?"

"That's His house, isn't it?"

"Yes."

"I'm going to see Him."

The woman stared at him silently a moment; under the slightly gray hair, pulled severely back, her face wore an intense look. "God isn't—He isn't the same as other people, you know. He's a spirit."

"What's that?"

"It's someone—something you can't hear, or see, or touch." Her gray eyes were steady upon his face. "I think you better talk with my husband. He's the minister and he could tell you much more about this than I could."

"Does he know God pretty well?"

"Pretty well," she said. "He—he tells people about Him."

"My dad is a druggist. He works for God, I guess."

"He works for God," the woman agreed.

"If your husband works for God, then he could take me in His house for a while, couldn't he?"

"Perhaps he could. Tomorrow."

"Not now?"

"Tomorrow—in the morning—after breakfast." She turned to the doorway.

Brian walked back toward his home. He did not turn down Bison Avenue, but continued on, a dark wishbone of a child wrapped in reflection.

Several times Brian stopped: once to look up into the sun's unbearable radiance and then away; another time when he came upon a fox-red caterpillar making a procession of itself over a crack that snaked along the walk. He squashed it with his foot. Farther on he paused at a spider that carried its bead of a body between hurrying thread legs. Death came for the spider too.

He looked up to find that the street had stopped. Ahead lay the sudden emptiness of the prairie. For the first time in his four years of life he was alone on the prairie.

He had seen it often, from the veranda of his uncle's farmhouse, or at the end of a long street, but till now he had never heard it. The hum of telephone wires along the road, the ring of hidden crickets, the stitching sound of grasshoppers, the sudden relief of a meadow lark's song, were deliciously strange to him. Without hesitation he crossed the road and walked out through the hip-deep grass stirring in the steady wind.

A gopher squeaked questioningly as Brian sat down upon a rock, warm to the back of his thighs. He picked a pale-blue flax flower at his feet, stared long at the stripings in its shallow throat, then looked up to see a dragonfly hanging on shimmering wings directly in front of him.

And all about him was the wind now, a pervasive sighing through great emptiness, unhampered by the buildings of the town, warm and living against his face and in his hair.

Then for the second time that day he saw a strange boy—one who came from behind him soundlessly, who stood and stared at him with steady gray eyes. The boy's hair, bleached as the dead prairie grass itself, lay across his forehead in an all-round cowlick curling under at the edge. His faded blue pants hung open in two tears just below the knees. He was barefooted.

Brian was not startled; he simply accepted the boy's presence out here as he had accepted that of the gopher and the dragonfly.

"This is your prairie," Brian said.

The boy did not answer him. He turned and walked as silently as he had come, out over the prairie. His walk was smooth.

After the boy's figure had become just a speck in the distance, Brian looked up into the sky, now filled with a soft expanse of cloud, the higher edges luminous and (Continued on Page 92)

★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★

GILBERT STUART, 1755-1828. In two hundred years America has produced several great painters and among these one innovator of genius, Gilbert Stuart. Stuart, who arrived in London in 1775, a penniless young student, owed his training to his compatriot, Benjamin West. In West's studio he was taught the accepted methods of eighteenth-century portraiture: a general tint for flesh; certain fixed places for highlights and deep shadows; and often to improve the appearance of the sitter, touches of carmine in the nostrils and the corners of the eyes.

The young American was an apt pupil and soon had "his full share of the bust business in London, and prices equal to any, except Sir Joshua Reynolds and Gainsborough," to quote a contemporary, Dunlap. But he was not satisfied. As he said, "I wish to find out what nature is for myself, and see her with my own eyes."

Such freshness of vision was easier to achieve in the colonies than in the mother country, for in America no formula for painting had yet been established. Patrons like Mrs. Yates, the wife of a New York merchant, wanted to see themselves as they really were, and they were perfectly willing that an artist should make technical experiments if these led to a more accurate portrayal. Thus, after his return to America in 179[illegible] Stuart's power of observation increased, and he noted among other facts of vision, that "Good flesh coloring partook of all colors, not mixed, so as to be combined in one tint, but shining through each other, like the blood through the natural skin." In following out this and other discoveries about appearance, he broke with the eighteenth-century formula for portraiture, and anticipated many of the visual theories of the French Impressionists. Had there been the artists and the tradition of painting in America that there were in France, these innovations of Stuart's might easily have caused Impressionism to appear in the New World generations before it revolutionized art in Europe.

—JOHN WALKER
Chief Curator, National Gallery of Art.

★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★

MRS. RICHARD YATES

Painted by Gilbert Stuart

Leave us face it—

BY GEORGE BRADSHAW AND ROBERT THOMSEN

"HAT do I do," Katie said, "buy a lavender shawl and retire?"

"That's one way," I said.

"But I don't want to."

"Face the facts, dear."

She frowned. "I'm still extraordinarily attractive."

"Yes."

"And fascinating."

"Yes."

"And I love him."

"All right," I said. "Still, at your age, the fires of passion must be banked a little."

"Don't be rude."

"I'm not rude," I said. "After all, I'm the same age, kid."

"Listen, you can feel just as passionate at thirty-eight as you can at twenty. More so, even. At twenty you at least have hope to fall back on; at thirty-eight you're desperate."

"You don't look thirty-eight."

"I know. But I am. It says so in Who's Who."

"Advertising," I said.

"I don't have to advertise, Charlie. I'm a bright girl and everybody knows it. That's the trouble."

"Why trouble?"

"I can take care of myself. There's nothing wide-eyed and wonderful about me."

"Now you're being modest."

"Oh, shut up," Katie said. "And let me give you some advice, my dear, dear Charles. If ever you are born again, arrange somehow not to have a sense of humor."

"You think?"

"I know. Men who have no sense of humor are the great men of this world, and girls who have no sense of humor marry them."

"My," I said, "I must remember that. But what happens now?"

"Now I think I go. 'Exit Katie, laughing.' You see, I refuse to be competition to somebody named Mary Smith."

"That's small of you."

"I don't care."

"And I don't think it's very bright either."

"Why not?"

"You can think of something. You always have before."

Katie shrugged.

"It's your business," I said. "Look, how many dramas have you directed on Broadway?"

"That's beside the point. There's no third act in real life." She stood up and looked unseeing at Joe's really beautiful Georgetown drawing room.

"Perhaps it is," I said. "But with a little effort—I know you—you can stir up an awful lot of trouble."

"Um," she said. "Um ——"

"And remember, dear, you have this to work on. It's an old idea, I know, but I'm sure it's still good. When little Miss Smith is thirty, our Joe will be fifty."

"I hadn't thought of that," she said.

"There's quite a span right there."

"Yes."

"Can't you do something with it?"

Katie looked at me wide-eyed. "But, Charlie. In ten years—you know in ten years I'll be forty-eight."

I hit my head with the palm of my hand. "Ten years is a long time."

"I hope so," she said. "I sincerely hope so."

"And in the meantime?"

"In the meantime"—Katie laughed—"there's still Miss Mary Smith."

"That name scares you."

"It does."

"If you only realized how right, how incomparably right her name is."

She sighed. "Anyway, I'd better pull myself together."

"Yes," I said. "And fast." I had heard a key in the lock, and voices.

THEN they were in the hall, Joe and Mary. Joe was saying, "But you see I don't care for dogs. I like what flattery I get to be more articulate."

"Oh, Joe!"

The old line. I remember thinking; I'd been hearing Joe use words like that ever since New Haven.

But then they came into the room, so I said, "Hi," and Katie said, "Mary, you look dazzling."

And she was right. Mary Smith did look dazzling.

I wonder if there is any chance of my describing Mary. Personally I am against any attempt to put features down on paper. You so often read a paragraph about lips like cherries, cheeks like peaches, hair like corn silk that all you get is an anthropological fruit salad, which is not only distasteful but takes you pages to forget. Frankly, I have yet to see a peach that looked like anything but a peach.

The thing about Mary which was, in the end, so startling was that there was nothing unusual about her. Her hair was hair-colored, her features were regular, her body was in no way abnormal. She was, in fact, all the descriptions you have heard, all the pictures you have seen of the typical clean-faced American girl. Only—and this is what I must try to make plain—she was the epitome of the type. The commonplace was in her raised in intensity to a degree which made you stand and stare. She was the pattern, the ideal; she was what every other Size 12 in the country wanted to look like. Here in the person of Joe Dempster's young secretary was what the melting pot had finally brewed; no trace of any foreign influence remained; she could have come only from within the continental limits, she was the end product of the Zone of the Interior.

Furthermore, she was quite a nice girl.

IT was easy for anyone to see why she would drive Katie Hewitt crazy. Katie was, as she said herself, a bright girl of thirty-eight. On the whole, you know, female stage directors like female authors—are apt to resemble somebody's cook on the way to a fancy-dress party, but Katie was the exception. She was always immaculate and always gave the impression of a great, an almost brilliant chicness. But the point is, Katie had to work for this.

In the sunshine probably she looked no more than twenty-eight, or twenty-nine, but her looks were not everyone's looks. Of course, she had a few assets to start with: a pair of wonderful blue eyes, beautiful skin and a fine head of reddish-brown hair; but I was always aware of how well Katie was selling herself, how very cleverly she had staged Katherine Hewitt, the girl about town. And for me this was a real part of her charm. By just the right good clothes—usually suits magnificently tailored just the right jewelry and the right amount of subtle make-up she was constantly lending an expert's touch to Nature.

That was why, leaving Joe completely out of it, Mary was such a trial to her. There was no way to compete. Mary Smith, with her hair up or down, in any old clothes she happened to be wearing, with make-up or without, night or day, was perfection. Beauty is only skin deep, you can say; but face it, that is enough.

They had with them when they came in that afternoon a young man I'd never met before.

"This is Vic Hood," Joe called to us. "Be nice to him now."

"Be very nice to him," Mary said. "He was a hero, see. During the war he was all covered with ribbons; you should have seen him. A B-twenty-four pilot, or something."

"A very brave thing to be," Katie said and held out her hand.

(Continued on Page 193)

"I can take care of myself," said Katie:

but, when you're in love, is that an advantage?

ILLUSTRATED BY JON WHITCOMB

"I wanted to die," Mary told him. "Why should you try to change my mind?"

Mary Hallam

SHE HAD ALWAYS BEEN A GIRL WHO RAN FASTER

THAN LOVE—BUT COULD SHE RUN FAR ENOUGH?

BY SUSAN ERTZ

IT was hate at first meeting for Mary Hallam and her beautiful stepmother, Letty. For Letty was a woman who would have no rivals and who willfully turned her husband Nelson's heart against the shy little girl. As Mary grew older, she sought an escape and began to find it in piano study and plans for a concert career. But then came the taxi collision injuring her right hand—and she knew she would never play again. Ill and alone, caught between Letty's vanity and Nelson's indifference, there was only one way out: to meet and marry a man she could love.

Ferdinand Walsh was such a man. Easy with people and fond of music, he seemed to offer Mary a whole new world of hope and happiness. Until Letty found out, and then it began. Letty's wit against Mary's reserve, Letty's malice that could turn love to pity. Mary knew that her world had ended the night one of her blinding headaches had forced her to leave Letty and Ferdinand dancing in a night club—and Letty had not returned till dawn.

There seemed now another way out. Letty's childhood acquaintance from Boston, Maud Cotter, and Maud's friend, Lowell Pierce, were in London on their way to Paris—Maud to purchase paintings for her art gallery in Boston, Lowell to consult a famous heart specialist. If Maud would take her to Paris with her . . .

But even on the bright London streets, on the way to Maud's hotel, the memory of that night pressed down upon Mary. As Letty's bedroom door had swished shut, she had crept back to bed feeling as though she had walked through some searing flame and was now reduced to the size of a walnut. She was beyond tears. If Mary had known the trick of dying, she would have died then.

II

TOWARD seven in the morning, consciousness was blotted out by a short, picture-haunted sleep, but when Eva came in to draw the curtains at half past eight, Mary was lying with her eyes wide open, but staring and sunken.

Frightened, the girl ran down to tell Letty. By noon the doctor had been there and arrangements had been made to take Mary to a nursing home.

"If she escapes pneumonia," the doctor said, "we shall be very lucky."

"Well, I told her," Letty said, "that she wasn't well enough to go out last night, but she was determined to go. I did my best to persuade her not to."

"Has our patient had a shock of any sort?" the doctor asked. "She seems so—well, one might almost say numbed."

"Not that I know of," said Letty. "If she has, she's said nothing to me."

Mary was three weeks in the nursing home. Twice Ferdinand Walsh sent her flowers. She did not hear from him again. Knowing what she knew, she thought the more of him for it. Did Letty continue to see him? There was no way of knowing.

Some time after her return from the nursing home, when she was still convalescent, her father asked Letty in the girl's hearing, "Why haven't we seen Walsh lately? Will you ask him to dinner soon?"

Mary's heart shook her body with its beating; she listened with her whole being for Letty's answer.

Letty gave a light, good-humored laugh. "Oh darling, we're much too (Continued on Page 50)

Copyright, 1947, by

WOULD YOU MARRY

THE man you married—was he really the right choice? If you had it to do over, would you marry the same husband?

Four out of five married people of the country say they'd choose the same partner again—say it with varying degrees of conviction, ranging from a lukewarm "Well I guess so" to the calm assurance of "I'm certain I would."

But the rest of America's husbands and wives cherish a doubt. Though apparently settled in their married life, and living with their chosen partners, these people question, or even deny, that they would marry the same person again.

Among this group, 14 per cent say if they had it to do over, they wouldn't marry the same person, and another 5 per cent refuse to commit themselves even to the mild proposition that they probably would! The two groups combined add up to 19 per cent.

Almost one married person in five, then, doubts he (or she) chose the right partner for marriage, and most of these think they would decide differently if given a second chance.

These facts are the result of a new nationwide survey, in which JOURNAL interviewers talked to a cross-section of the country's adults, questioning them about their views and observations of marriage, and in the case of married people, talking over with them their own experience.

Here are the exact figures on choice of partner:

"I'm certain I'd marry the same person." . . . . said 56 per cent.

"I probably would—I'm not sure." . . . . . said 25 per cent.

"I don't think I would," or "I wouldn't." . . . . . said 14 per cent.

"I don't know." . . . . . said 5 per cent.

As to the 5 per cent who don't know, it's a pretty safe assumption that they secretly think they probably wouldn't. Answers to other questions show that their point of view is closest to that of the people who are definite in the view that they married the wrong person—or who regret marrying at all.

How does the table apply to your neighbors and friends, the married couple you know? You probably won't inquire—but it's a safe bet that these figures come pretty close to fitting your own circle of acquaintances, regardless of their circumstances.

For the people we've referred to as the "group" who, though living with their husbands or wives, wouldn't marry the same person again, are actually not a group at all; instead, the 14-plus-5 per cent includes individuals of all kinds—from every income group and educational level, from cities and towns of all sizes in all parts of the country, and of all ages over twenty. (The survey didn't include anyone younger.)

Judging by outward appearances, the people have nothing more in common than any other miscellaneous assortment of individuals; there are no two or three outward traits to distinguish them from the husbands and wives who firmly declare that they would marry the same person right over again.

At the same time, there are some factors which predispose people to doubt that they made the right choice, or which, at least, accompany the attitude of doubt more often than the attitude of confidence. For instance:

Income: The proportion of people who doubt that they married the right person is higher among people of less-than-average income (about $2000 a year) than among those of average or prosperous circumstances. The difference, though, isn't great; and even among the below-average-income group, the people who are certain they married the right person outnumber those who think they didn't, by three to one.

Education: And people who have never been to high school are more likely to wish they had married somebody else than are people with some high-school or college training. But again, the difference isn't great; a diploma doesn't guarantee your satisfaction with the person you married!

Home Ownership: If you own your home, you're less likely to wish you'd married somebody else than if you rent. It's hard to tell just what this proves, for owning a home is related to other circumstances, such as income. Maybe the mere fact of owning a home makes husbands and wives better satisfied with each other—or perhaps if they are satisfied with each other to start with, they are more likely to make the effort to acquire a home of their own. The survey demonstrates, but doesn't explain, the fact that people who own their homes are a little more likely to be satisfied with their choice of partner.

Church Membership: People who belong to a church are somewhat less likely than the rest to wish they had married somebody else—though even here the difference is slight.

But other factors, which you might expect to have as much bearing, or even more, apparently make no difference at all.

Age makes little difference; the proportion who doubt the wisdom of their choice is just about the same among people of all ages. That is, your age now isn't an important factor. But it does make a difference how old you were when you were married. On this point, more later.

Children: Childless husbands and wives are no more likely than parents to wish they had married someone else. Of this, too, more later.

So outward appearances don't reveal much; age, geography, parenthood have nothing to do with the case; and while income, education, religion and owning a home have some relationship, their influence is less than you might expect.

You can't identify by external circumstances a person who wishes he'd married somebody else, but there is an inward difference. Your reaction to the idea of a second chance is apt to reflect your satisfaction, or lack of it, in your own marriage.

But don't jump to conclusions! It doesn't always follow that the happily married person is certain he chose the right partner. Consider these facts:

People interviewed in the survey divide into three groups, according to the satisfaction they say they have found in marriage: those who say their marriages have turned out more happily than they expected, those who have found marriage a disappointment, and a group in between for whom marriage turned out neither happier nor unhappier than they expected.

Contrast the attitude of these three groups toward the individuals whom they married:

Did you marry the right man? Four out of five women say Yes! But the fifth—if she could turn back the clock—would trade her husband in for a new model!

BY BARBARA BENSON

Yes!

Yes!

YOUR HUSBAND AGAIN?

"I'm certain I'd marry the same person if I were doing it all over," said three out of four of the most happily married.....(75 per cent); said more than half of the middle group.....57 per cent);
said only about one in six of the disappointed.....(17 per cent).

"I don't think I would,"
said 4 per cent of the most happily married;
said 7 per cent of the middle group;
said 51 per cent of the disappointed.
(The rest are in the border-line groups who aren't sure, one way or the other.)

So it's very clear that if you're happily married, the chances are overwhelming that you're glad you married your spouse instead of somebody else. Even so, you may sometimes cast a backward glance.

Note that 4 per cent of the most happily married think they wouldn't marry the same person if they were doing it over! We can't cross-examine these anonymous individuals to find out why. Perhaps it's a matter of the good old American urge for self-improvement: no matter how well they've done, they think they could do better still, given another chance; or maybe they've decided, from their own experience, that a happy marriage depends more on individual effort, after marriage, than on the choice of partner beforehand. Or maybe they're just plain contrary.

Whatever the explanation, those 4 per cent remain a fact. So if the thought has occurred to you that, given a second chance, you might not remarry your spouse, it doesn't necessarily prove that your marriage has been a disappointment.

In the main, though, the rule holds: the happier your marriage, the more likely you are to be satisfied with your chosen partner; the greater your disappointment in marriage, the more likely you are to wish you'd married somebody else.

A THOUGHT FOR HUSBANDS

Women are a little more likely than men to be disappointed in marriage! The difference is not great, but it's consistent, and big enough to make the men a little uneasy! Look at the facts:

"Has your marriage turned out as happily as you expected?"
"No," said 22 per cent of the wives—more than one in five.
"No," said 13 per cent of the husbands—not quite one in eight.

"Would you marry the same person if you were doing it over?"
"No," said 16 per cent of the wives (and another 6 per cent wouldn't commit themselves).
"No," said 11 per cent of the husbands (and again 6 per cent wouldn't commit themselves).

"Were you happier when you were single?"
"Yes," said 19 per cent of the wives.
"Yes," said 11 per cent of the husbands.

There's less difference in the willingness of Mr. and Mrs. to try it again on the same income—only 2 per cent—but this small difference is in the same direction.

And, finally, 31 per cent of all wives interviewed wish they'd waited till they were older before they were married, as compared with 22 per cent of men.

Why? We can only guess, with a few statistical clues, a few hints from the remarks of wives. The explanation seems to be bound up with the responsibilities of marriage and rearing a family. Women are inclined to think an undue share of these responsibilities falls on the wives; the majority of women think they lead a harder life than men; and they think their happiest years end sooner. Perhaps, too, they think a housewife's life is duller; an earlier JOURNAL survey found that the group of workers least likely to enjoy their jobs was—housewives!

But there's a note of cheer for papa; whatever the source of discontent among wives, the idea of marriage hasn't lost its appeal. The wives of the country consider marriage a more important source of happiness for women than for men. Could it be that because women expect more from marriage, they are more likely to be disappointed?

MARRIAGE AND HAPPINESS

This survey adds more evidence to one of the fundamental conclusions of the JOURNAL'S survey of happiness: that a happy marriage and family relationship are among the basic ingredients of personal happiness.

For among people who classify themselves as "very happy," only 7 per cent have found marriage a disappointment. Among people who classify themselves as not very happy, 49 per cent say marriage has been a disappointment.

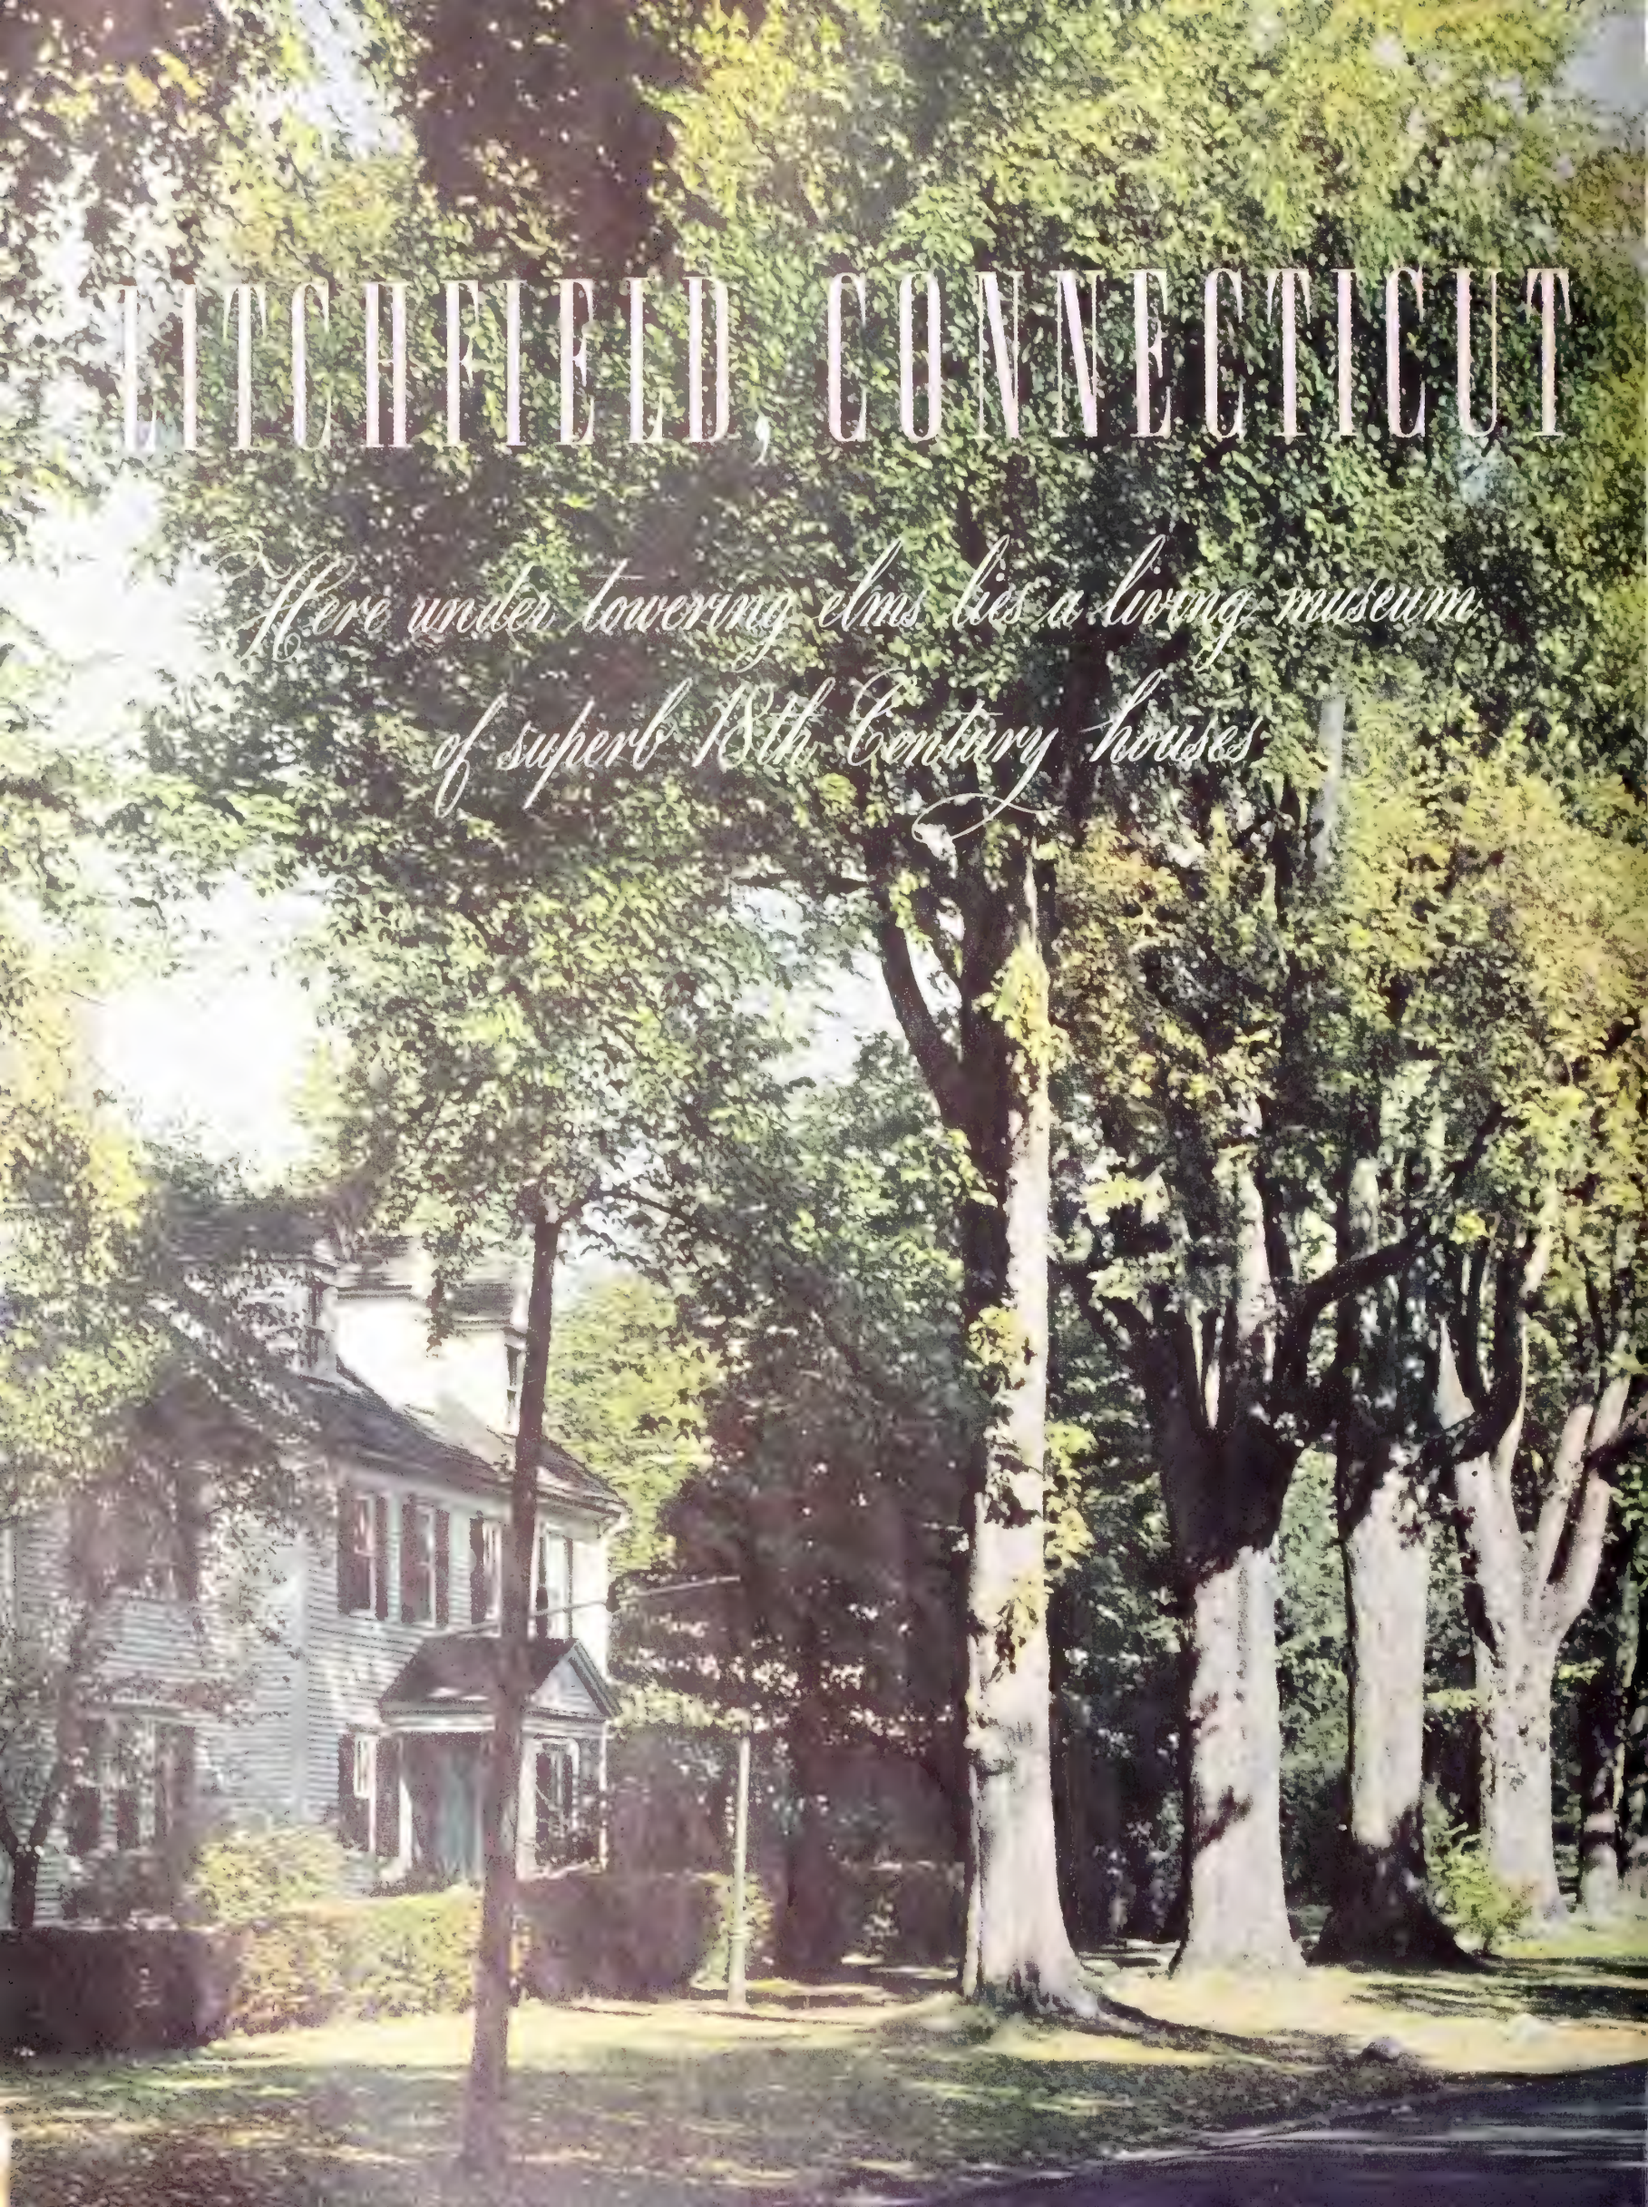
So—if you value your happiness, think twice before you join the minority who think they married the wrong person. Or if you already believe you made a bad choice, think about it some more—maybe you just married too young.

And, finally, remember that the great majority of all adults—men and women, married and single, widowed and divorced—consider marriage more important to a woman's happiness than a home, or a job, or friends, or plenty of money, or even children!

FACTORS IN HAPPY MARRIAGE

Since marriage is so important to personal happiness, let's look at some of the factors likely to accompany happy marriages. The survey was not designed to produce a blueprint for married happiness, but it did bring to light some interesting evidence and maybe a useful hint or two.

(Continued on Page 201)



LITCHFIELD, CONNECTICUT
Here under towering elms lies a living museum of superb 18th Century houses

Up North Avenue, close to where Henry Ward Beecher and Harriet Beecher Stowe were born, is the house built by Lynde Lord, Sr., high sheriff of Litchfield County. The doorway framing the date, and the fence and gateposts in the foreground are typically delicate details of this old town that still looks youthful.

This little building, in the garden of the Tapping Reeve house which is pictured on pages 30 and 31, is the first law school in the United States, where for sixty years from the time of its opening in 1784 more than a thousand of the nation's early legal lights from all parts of the country were prepared for their chosen profession.

By Richard Pratt

Architectural Editor of the Journal

PEOPLE call Litchfield the "parlor" town: and when you walk along up North Street, down South Street, and around the Green, it does make you think of a room where all the choice old family pieces have been miraculously protected from the wear and tear of daily living, for time on end. But a parlor is a place you think of as set apart with doors closed and curtains drawn for special occasions: whereas Litchfield gets lived in every day, and looks it—but lived in by people who appreciate the heirloom houses, the Aubusson greenswards, the priceless canopy of the elms. I suppose it is the most unspoiled community of anything like its age in the country, which keeps striking you as rather remarkable when you look at the dates above the doorways and consider how much time the town has had to come apart at the seams. As a matter of fact, the oldest of the houses looked as fresh and white and trim last fall as it must have looked the day Oliver Wolcott finished it in 1753. Even the youngest of the elder dwellings, which was built across the way in 1799 by Oliver Wolcott's namesake son, would have every right by now to be decrepit, but you can see for yourself in the lower corner of the opposite page how youthful it still looks, standing at the foot of South Street, its clapboards clean and bright, its framing firm, its beauty unimpaired, and as livable now as it was when its original owner was George Washington's Secretary of the Treasury and Litchfield's most distinguished citizen.

Litchfield crowns the hill country of Connecticut, though not without considerable competition from a widespread collection of other sparkling towns, which all, together with history and scene, help to make that whole region a real delight. You reach this particular town by road alone: the nearest train ten miles away. The road divides to skirt the Green: a pure white spire penetrates the sky, even above the elms: antiques beckon: and stretching down wide avenues on either side are these ageless houses of early America, where interested visitors are welcomed. If they seem very friendly and familiar, perhaps it's because in the course of a hundred and fifty years or more they have left their mark on millions of houses from coast to coast—for these originals of Litchfield really started something.

PHOTO BY PRATT

A HOUSE WHERE WASHINGTON REALLY SLEPT

One of the prize exhibits in the Litchfield collection of houses, in terms of both legend and beauty, is the one known for more than a century as Sheldon's Tavern. It was at first somewhat simpler in outward appearance when erected by Elisha Sheldon in 1760, and remained so when Sheldon's son turned it into a tavern twenty years later. Then about 1800 it was worked upon by an architecturally talented pioneer Connecticut builder named William Spratt, who gave it the impressively columned entrance with the graceful Palladian window and pediment above, together with the cornices under the eaves and over the first-story windows, adding, as you can see, considerable style of a most agreeable kind. It was in the upstairs bedroom to the right of the Palladian window, and before that feature was put on, that Washington, on his way through New England, spent at least one night and maybe more; the four-poster in which he slept still is in use.

ither side of the entrance hallway of the house spoken of as Sheldon's Tavern are two com- on drawing rooms, the one here at the right g also the one at the right as you come in. The of the furniture is beautifully in keeping with size of the room, whose delicately handled lwork complements the paper as effectively as nellow old floor boards set off the colorful bold erns of the hooked rugs. The pieces are all y American of the period of the house, the et under the mirror at the right having been e just about the time this house was built.

drawing room below, at the left as you enter house opposite, is largely paneled in painted , a perfect foil for the colorful glitter of a -framed embroidery piece and an eighteenth- ury American mirror. The secretary is a fine mple of sophisticated Colonial craftsmanship.

THE TAPPING REEVE HOUSE IN LITCHFIELD

One of the most finely proportioned and gracefully treated houses in Litchfield is the one Judge Reeve built for himself in 1773, and to which he brought his bride, the sister of Aaron Burr. It was here, also, that he entertained the great Frenchman, Lafayette; and it was in the garden next to the house that he built his famous little law school, the first in the country, which is pictured on page 27. In its beautifully furnished rooms you will get a good idea of what others of the town's interiors are like.

The large, low-ceilinged living room of the Tapping Reeve house, its walls appropriately papered, provides a perfect setting for furnishings contemporary with the house, all part of the Litchfield tradition. The Governor Winthrop desk is one which Judge Reeve used. Note above the noteworthy mantel the Early American clock, the luster vases, the crystal lamps. Flanking the fireplace are a four and a five-slatted ladder-back chair, and through the doorway you can see the fabulous sideboard of the dining room.

FOWLER

In the southwest bedroom of the Reeve house the dominating piece is, of course, the graceful tester bed with its early Connecticut quilt. But very fine indeed are the delicate Windsor chairs, while the Colonial hatbox covered with squirrel paper is an appropriately decorative note. The painted-pine paneling naturally sets the furniture off to the best advantage, as well as the gold-framed embroidery which hangs above the old brick fireplace.

The honeylike pine paneling of the Tapping Reeve study, with its fluted pilasters and its rosetted capitals, gives extraordinary style and color to one of the mellowest and most appealing rooms in the famous old house. The tall-backed Windsor chairs, one of them curve-backed, one square, are once-in-a-lifetime pieces, and are wonderfully constructed for comfort, strength and character, like the Litchfield houses for which they were made.

BED MAY BE

If Pfc. William Martin had received his serious head injury before the war, he would have been kept in the hospital, as motionless as could be, for a matter of weeks. But Bill got hurt in the 1944 South France invasion, when hospital beds were needed for the freshly wounded. And after he had been three days in bed, Pfc. Martin was pushed out by his Army doctor with a "Sorry, boy, but you can see for yourself we have to get these litter casualties off the floor."

This thing happened to a good many Bills in the American Army. It happened to soldiers with other kinds of injuries—wounded men, and men suffering from pneumonia, soldiers who were just beginning to recover from surgical operations and men with heart disease. These convalescents were often turned into ambulatory cases, walking about in the day and sleeping on litters at night because there were not enough beds to go around.

And they got well! They got well, in fact, faster and in a higher percentage of cases than patients suffering from these complaints had any right to get well. The "rugged" Army treatment, based on necessity, thus led doctors to one of the important medical discoveries of recent times: to the fact that civilian patients in the best American hospitals have suffered unnecessarily because they were kept too long in bed.

Medical magazines, in the past year or two, have abounded in discussions of the discovery. Dr. William Dock, of Cornell Medical College, has been one of the pioneers in preaching the belief that bed is a highly dangerous place for some kinds of patients to stay.

"Absolute bed rest kills more patients than anesthesia and all the drugs in the pharmacopoeia added together," Doctor Dock told a conference of New York State physicians. This statement, and his supporting records, shocked the medical world into a re-examination of hospital practice. Several bed-rest conferences of physicians have been held since then, and specialists in the major lines of medical research have studied the effects of early rising on patients of many types.

But Doctor Dock's report was made in 1944, after three years of front-line experience had taught Army doctors not to feel too bad about urging sick men back to their feet. It was reports from the war theaters which first led the Cornell group and other doctors at home to study the problem of whether too much rest might not be a bad thing for civilian patients too.

One of the most enlightening of the experiments which followed was designed to find out what bed rest does to individuals who are not sick at all. Dr. Ancel Keys, of the University of Minnesota, gathered a group of conscientious objectors who had volunteered to act as human guinea pigs for any kind of medical experimentation that was wanted. They were put to bed for six weeks of complete rest. At the end of this time, Doctor Keys found, the men had suffered very little loss of strength, but they showed a tremendous decrease in their ability to co-ordinate or to do sustained work. Physically, even these well men had deteriorated from the stay in bed; a special diet was required to keep their nitrogen balance up to par. No diet seemed to prevent calcium imbalance. The patients' chemistry, in every case, had been gravely disturbed—and by nothing but a "good rest" in bed!

Man, the medical world has concluded, was not made for quiet living; the human being is a dynamic machine which may run special risks through the mere act of slowing down. This is a paradox for which doctors were somewhat prepared by accident statistics. Year after year, National Safety Council reports show that 35 per cent of all fatal accidents occur in the home and that five times as many injuries take place there as on the highways. Staying indoors is a risky business; staying in bed is more so!

Old people especially may suffer from bed rest. Doctor Dock, at one of the discussions of bed rest and its danger, said, "In men over fifty, I know that there are more complications due to absolute bed rest and more deaths due to the resulting pulmonary embolism than can possibly be ascribed to exercise—even in those patients who never go to bed, or who go back to work as soon as the initial bout of pain and fever has subsided." Bed rest can actually kill!

What is so bad about bed? Well, say the doctors, many things. Slowed circulation and reduced breathing capacity occur when we are lying down. The patient in bed is prone to constipation and other gastrointestinal disorders. He is pretty sure to contract a backache and muscle cramps. Ulcers of the skin may develop. Lack of calcium balance makes it harder for fractured bones to mend. The patient's state of mind is less hopeful and purposeful than if he is allowed up for at least a portion of the day.

Bed appears to be a bad environment for man, well or ill. Studies have been made of the effects of shortened bed rest on patients suffering from astonishingly varied complaints; research has looked into such fields as the orthopedic and the psychiatric, the surgical and the cardiac; in every case, the results of cutting down the amount of time in bed have been good. Whether patients suffer from diseases of the bone or the heart, from scarlet fever or schizophrenia, they seem to be better off if they are not encouraged to skulk between sheets for an hour more than is necessary.

Take the matter of fractures—a type of malady which would seem to need rest, if any does. Dr. Ralph Ghormley, of the Mayo Clinic, reported to a medical convention that the length of time in bed for some such cases has lately been cut to one quarter of the former period. Patients recovering from spinal operations used to be kept in bed for twelve weeks, often inside plaster casts; now they are allowed up for a brief time every day after three weeks, and "they have an easier convalescence."

In chronic bone diseases the results are even more striking. Of his arthritis cases, Doctor Ghormley says, "I have often thought that the day an arthritic gives up and goes to bed is the day he becomes a total cripple." Patients who grit their teeth and keep up "usually come through the ordeal with much better joints than those who have been put to bed.

Another arthritis expert, Dr. Philip Hench, supports this view. Fatigue is recognized as a constant danger to the arthritis patient; but, he says, "the dangers of overrest in arthritis are as great as, if not greater than, the dangers of overexercise. When the patient overexercises he promptly knows he has done wrong, because of the increased pain. But when he overrests, the results of overrest work on him silently and maliciously—until one suddenly notes serious if not irreparable contractures."

And so arthritis victims today get out of bed earlier than any doctor, five years ago, would have dreamed desirable.

Similar shortening of the time in bed is being urged for sufferers from rheumatic fever; Col. E. van Nuys Allen, of the U. S. Army, was the first to point out that rest "encourages the development of nonorganic illness which centers about the heart and joints" and to question whether rest really prevents the development of heart disease in rheumatic patients.

The doctors specializing in this and other heart diseases have made elaborate studies of the effect of upright posture as against the flat-in-bed position. They got a valuable clue when Dr. Tinsley Harrison, of Vanderbilt University Hospital, discovered, in 1944, that his Negro patients were surviving heart attacks better than the whites. Investigation showed that the Negro wards in the hospital were overcrowded. Only the most urgent of these cases were hospitalized; the rest were given out-patient treatment and allowed to live at home. This was a lucky break for the Negroes; white cardiac patients, all of whom were given hospital care, died with greater frequency from "too much bed."

Experiments made since seem to indicate that angina-pectoris attacks come oftenest when patients are lying down. And another type of heart disease was studied when rats were given myocardial injuries by Drs. W. C. Thomas and T. R. Harrison, of Dallas. Some of them were put in cages so small that they could hardly move, others were permitted to wander about as they chose. The rats forced into stillness died at a far higher rate.

If you're sick, bed will make you sicker. If you're tired, you don't need a good

BAD FOR YOU

Men are not rats and beds are not cages, but Doctor Harrison, interpreting the results of this and other experiments, says, "There is no proof that rest in bed carried out for many weeks after symptoms have disappeared is of value in the physical management of the patient with congestive failure, angina pectoris or myocardial infraction. The available evidence points to the contrary. . . . Each additional week of complete rest can usually be achieved only at the expense of increased urgency on the part of the physician. This leads many patients to exaggerate to themselves the seriousness of their physical condition. . . . One sees many patients who live through years of psychic invalidism brought about as the result of the physician's insistence on excessive caution during a period of months."

Here, again, the fact is stressed that men and women do not reach out toward life as long as they are held in bed. Doctors have begun to recognize the fact that a patient allowed to take half a dozen supported steps across a room feels pride in his recovery—and that this pride makes his progress faster.

Such a desire to move about seems to occur almost immediately after surgical patients have regained consciousness from the ether. Dr. D. J. Leithauser, of Detroit, studied 15,000 surgical cases from overseas, in relation to length of bed rest; he decided that the period could safely be cut down to about one fifth of the usual period. He tried out this experiment on 913 patients. After abdominal operations, his patients got up after one day. Those recovering from simple appendectomies got up after two and a half days, instead of the usual ten; if the appendix was ruptured, they left bed on the ninth day.

The results were startlingly good: lung complications were reduced to one fourth; wound healing was faster; bowel and bladder complications were reduced; blood clots and embolisms did not appear.

Even more drastic experiments have been carried out by Dr. John H. Powers, of Cooperstown, New York. He reported on 100 surgical cases—hernias and pelvic operations as well as appendectomies—who were allowed to walk and sit up in a chair on the first day after the operation. The results, in every case, were excellent. Patients' pulse rates and temperatures were lower than those of similar cases who stayed flat in bed for the nine or ten days usual in his hospital. There was no increase of pain. None of the early risers developed the abscesses which sometimes occur under conditions of normal care. Wounds healed "kindlier" and more rapidly. And the men and women who got up on the first day returned to work 4.8 weeks after the operation, as compared with the 8.7 weeks which were required for other patients who were allowed a rest in bed.

"The improvement in [illegible] Doctor Powers reports, "from psychic [illegible] tales of relatives or friends, many patients anticipate surgical operations with fear and apprehension; gas pains, bedpans, enemas and hypodermics are foreseen with horror. When such a patient learns that he is to get out of bed and walk on the first or second postoperative day, be permitted the freedom of the ward on the third or fourth, and lead an essentially normal life shortly thereafter, his whole attitude toward the operation and his hospital experience undergoes a profound change."

To understand how moving about can speed a patient's recovery, a little lesson in physiology is needed. It explains why the two most serious dangers in prolonged bed rest affect surgical patients and those with heart and bone injuries primarily. (But they are worth considering when you or I too lightly say, "I'm going to stay in bed for a week or so and get rid of this cold.")

The human lungs are able to inhale 15 per cent more air when the body is upright than when it is lying down. This consideration is important for many surgical cases, since abdominal operations prevent the diaphragm from functioning normally. In such cases, the vital capacity of the patients' lungs is inevitably reduced from 50 to 65 per cent—more if he lies flat. If the patient is kept lying down, this reduction lasts for from seven to fourteen days; in that time the lungs act as inviting breeding places for bacteria, and bronchial pneumonia may result. But if the patient is allowed to sit up, the lungs recover their capacity in about half the time, and the chances of disease are more than halved. (That is a consideration which those with coughs or chest colds might also ponder; the lungs are always given a better chance when the body is not kept flat in bed.)

The second serious danger of bed rest involves the reduction of the rate of circulation of the blood, especially in the lower legs. This sluggishness may lead to thrombosis (clotting) or to embolism (a foreign body, such as a bubble, in the blood stream). These are serious dangers; 5 per cent of the patients at New York Hospital on whom autopsies were performed had died of pulmonary embolism, and the condition existed in the case of 13 per cent more. But pulmonary embolism, says the New York Hospital report, "is very rare in ambulatory patients, or even in those who lead wheel-chair lives."

Of these figures Doctor Dock has said, "There is not a shadow of doubt that these deaths are due to complete bed rest. Other deaths, probably equaling these dramatic ones in number, follow bed rest as indirect results, bronchial pneumonia being the most common sequel."

Such deaths are, oddly enough, made more probable by the excellence of modern hospital care. Before nursing had become a skilled profession, patients had to move around in bed when the position of the legs became tiresome or when the linen was changed. Nowadays, the efficient nurse can whisk sheets out from under a patient without his having to twitch a foot muscle; and when he wishes a change of position, she grinds up a crank, which raises the foot of the bed.

There are thus degrees of danger in bed rest—and the worst risks are run by patients who are kept absolutely still by modern sedatives. Dr. Ephraim Shorr told a New York State medical conference of other ill-effects, besides slow circulation, which result from lying still. Studies of normal sleep, made by the Mellon Institute, have shown that all of us move about constantly during the night; motion is the body's normal way of throwing off fatigue. Doctor Shorr suggests that moving the legs about, as we do in undrugged sleep, may carry away "products, such as lactic acid, which might accumulate in muscle."

And on this subject, too, Doctor Dock has been outspoken. "Because of the pain and the sedatives," he wrote in one paper, "surgical patients lie like logs. I think that is the reason they get into trouble. Two per cent of women with breast amputations have emboli from the legs. Why? These women are given morphine and kept very quiet, and that permits the emboli to form. Embolism has less to do with the type of operation than with how quiet the patient is kept after it." And embolism, remember, causes one hospital death out of twenty!

Even in the obstetrical wards the new Army-derived knowledge has brought about a great change. Experiments in a Los Angeles hospital proved that women who get up two to four days after childbirth are better off than those who stay in bed for two weeks. Again, it is the freedom from embolism that makes early rising the safer procedure.

Many of the medical reports on bed rest stress the deterioration of the patients' morale. And so it is not surprising to find psychiatrists rejecting immobility as a cure for nervous fatigue, or to learn that Dr. Karl Menninger, of Topeka, Kansas, speaking of nervous patients, has said, "Rest can be a very dangerous remedy and do a great deal of harm."

Doctor Menninger has severely criticized the old-fashioned recipe of a "rest cure made up of complete isolation, complete rest, no visitors, no letters, no reading." He also disapproves of its variation, the "trip treatment," which sends the patient to Florida or California or Europe for a "change of scene." Of these efforts to help the psychiatric case, Doctor Menninger writes, "They are not only futile and expensive, but very often [illegible]

est. The newest medical remedy: Get Out of Bed! ★ By Gretta Palmer

The Temple of Democracy

By Maxwell Anderson

ONE thing you discover in the theater is that a play is always at its best in rehearsal. There's some magic in acting on a bare stage that disappears when you put the people in costumes and sets. That was what first suggested Joan of Lorraine to me. I wanted an audience to see how a play was picked up from the floor by a handful of actors and made into a new world—a world more compelling than the real world around us. I wanted an audience in the theater to see the miracle happening that I had seen so often in rehearsals.

And when it came to the subject of the play in rehearsal, I looked for a story that would raise the question that has been torturing me during these last whirling years. What can one believe? What can one put faith in—and what reason can one give for keeping his faith, whatever it is? I came to the conclusion that all of us live by faith, but no faith is reasonable; all our faiths are as instinctive—or as defenseless—as Socrates' daemon or Joan of Arc's visions. And so I wrote a play about Joan, trying to dramatize her struggle to put her faith before the world, to keep her faith in the corrupt court in which it had to operate, and to defend it in the trial, after she had been taken prisoner.

The conclusion she comes to, with the help of her voices, is that "every man gives his life for what he believes. Every woman gives her life for what she believes. Sometimes people believe in little or nothing; nevertheless, they give their lives for that little or nothing. One life is all we have, and we live it as we believe in living it, and then it's gone. But to surrender what you are, and live without belief, that's more terrible than dying, more terrible than dying young." (Continued on Page 186)

INGRID BERGMAN, in Maxwell Anderson's magnificent new version of the Joan of Arc legend, plays Joan with such warmth and understanding that hard-boiled critics and theatergoers dusted off their superlatives, declared that Bergman had brought "an unaccustomed radiance into the theater of our day."

Strapless bathing suit takes all beaches by storm. Above: Clare Potter's painted plaid cotton on Bermuda's coral sands.

Bohemian fishing shirt and trousers are adapted in American linen for beauties on the beach. by Dorothy Cox.

White linen shorts, tablecloth-plaid cotton shirt, by Dorothy Cox for South and summer; Bernardo's white leather sandals.

WHERE THE SUN SHINES

e prettiest clothes of the year go south winter . . . invariably new and exciting fashion, color and fabric. This year: a w kind of swim suit that fits like a stocking l looks like a dream—elasticized sheer ol in pale shades; lovely American linen string-straight painter's shirts worn over n pastel trousers; the longer skirt and even hemline, right to the eye for the first ne, in cotton or enchanting puresilk nts. Sightseeing dresses are gay contras tions—with high necks and no sleeves, or v necks and long sleeves. Cotton evening sses have voluminous skirts, boned bod s, snug-me-tight jackets. The every-hour t has new bulkiness, roomier sleeves, ersize pockets. All these are present se in the winter sun . . . future tense for mmer '47. ★ BY WILHELMINA CUSHMAN

Sheer wool, shirred and elasticized—new figure-clinging bathing suit with sling neckline, rayon jersey shorts; by Claire McCardell.

PHOTO BY CUSHMAN

Gray jersey sheath dress by Claire Potter, clinched with a russet snakeskin belt, wonderful fashion for seashore and travel—never needs a press.

PHOTOS BY CUSHMAN-O'LEARY

Lightweight beige wool suit by Paul Parnes travels south, comes back for spring; worn with roomy red topcoat, a Ben Reig original by Omar Kiam.

Tattersall-checked cotton dress with favorite low round neckline, long soft sleeves; by Claire McCardell, worn with straw platform sandals.

Cotton fashion for resort or summer evenings:
bare-top plaid with voluminous skirt and slim-fitting peplum jacket: designed by Ceil Chapman.

Pure silk print, an old love come again, with longer skirt, uneven hemline—important length and silhouette for summer, by Ceil Chapman

May Day Madness

BY MARGARET WILMOUTH JACKSON

WHEN Lennetta came home with the information that she was to walk before the May Queen and scatter flowers in her path, the news was received in almost a stunned silence. The Tally family sat at the supper table and regarded Lennetta in astonishment. Nothing like this had ever happened to any of them before! The Tally family ran to boys. There was one older sister, now out of school and working away from home. She had never been a May Queen attendant, or even remotely considered for one. Between Bessie and Lennie there were four brothers, and below Lennie there were two more brothers.

They sat very tightly around the table in the corner of the kitchen, elbow to elbow on the oilcloth, and they all looked at Lennetta and for the first time it occurred to them all that she was kind of pretty! But—to be in the May Day procession, not just one child in a room making a big circle and all singing together, but in the real Queen's Court!

Mrs. Tally sat looking at her young daughter, and suddenly in her thin cheeks deep stains of color appeared. She got up and got the coffeepot and filled her own cup and reached across the table and poured fresh hot coffee into her husband's cup. Automatically she reached over and took the baby's hand out of his dish and put a spoon in his hand. The corn bread and beans, the bowl of greens (little beet tops, out of last summer's garden) cooked with pork, the bowl of applesauce, the glasses of milk were placed in geometric patterns on the table. Mrs. Tally liked everything always balanced by something else. She said to Lennie:

"What will you have to wear?"

"That's the question," said John Tally. "Will they give you your costume? Or can you wear your school dress?"

Mrs. Tally looked bleakly at her husband. "Of course she can't wear her school dress," she said. "Even the boys have to have their best corduroys clean to wear, and new blue socks for May Day, for they go onto the gymnasium floor in their stocking feet. I've been getting them socks one pair each week. And they are not to be in the Queen's Court."

"Who is the May Queen?" asked John Tally, and Lennetta said, "It's Iris Delaney. She's May Queen. She was 'lected. And she'll have eight girls to walk behind her, two from each class in high school, and me and Betty Plante will sprinkle her flowers and two other little girls will carry her train and Buddy and Dick will carry trumpets. We all went over to the gym today to begin practicing. And all of us little girls have to have long dresses, clear to the floor—formals. Just like the big girls will wear. Mine's to be pink and Betty's blue. Only we go first—we come out to the music ——"

She hopped down and walked across the kitchen in a kind of waltzing step. They gazed at her, supper forgotten. Her hair was the color of ripe wheat, thick and hanging to her shoulders. Her face was round and her cheeks were pink and her eyes were deeply blue like her mother's, with fair eyebrows like pressed-on moth's feelers. Even in her old dress, which was too long for her, and her faded socks and warped shoes she looked amazingly pretty.

Suddenly Mrs. Tally had a vision. She saw Lennetta in a floor-length pink silk dress, tight about the waist, with little puff sleeves and a crown of flowers in her fair hair, with white silk socks and white slippers on her feet, carrying a basket of rose petals and sprinkling them before the May Queen.

"Just like in heaven," she said, and caught her breath.

"It's madness," John Tally said. "A pink silk dress—on a little girl that's not got a good warm coat to her name."

Lennie came back to her place and the brother just older than she, Peter, who had been browbeating her for years, said, with respect in his voice:

"Who choosed you?"

"Can't you speak the language?" cried his father. "Can't you ask the girl who chose her?"

"Who chose you?" asked Peter politely.

"Iris did," said Lennetta. "She's allowed to choose her own flower girls and her trainbearers. She came down in the first grade this morning with the music teacher and she said she wanted me. She picked me right out of the whole room. Me and Betty. 'Cause we're the same size and color, she said. We all have to sing a song too. I don't know it yet, but we six from the first grade all sing together and, of course, I can sing best in my room."

"That you can!" said Mrs. Tally. "And who taught you, I'd like to know."

"You did," said Lennie. She began to eat the beans and the corn bread, the beet-top greens and the pork on her plate.

Mrs. Tally drank her coffee. But she did not eat another bite. Her eyes had a faraway look in them, her cheeks were flushed with color. John Tally regarded her in some alarm. He had not seen such a look on her face since—he could not remember when it was he had seen such a look. But he had seen it before, he knew. He realized that at once. He began, almost automatically, to complain.

"I WAS telling Mr. Alvin today," he said, "that it's all a man can do to make ends meet, with six sons in the house, not to mention a little daughter in her first year of school. I asked him, 'How am I going to buy twenty-one pairs of children's shoes a year, and food besides, with everything costing like it does?' So he says, 'You get free show tickets for all of them every week. It'll soon be vacation and the boys can go barefoot like you and me did,' he said. 'Do you know what food costs?' I asked him, and he said to me, 'You're doing all right. Everyone likes your children. Their mother keeps them clean and neat for school and they all get their lessons. You should be proud of your family and not complain!' he said to me. And it's the truth, of course, but a man cannot get any extras when it's all he can do to pay for what must be bought."

"Our room is going to sing hillbilly songs in the May Day," said Allan. "We'll all wear old-fashioned clothes, like overalls with bright patches sewed onto them, and we'll sing Little Brown Jug and She'll be Comin' Round the Mountain. We practiced too."

(Continued on Page 83)

JOHN TALLY WAS LICKED FROM THE START—AS IS ANY MAN WHO TRIES TO COME BETWEEN A WOMAN AND HER DREAM.

ILLUSTRATED BY MICHAEL

Gem of a coat, pattern 408; sizes 12 to 20; emerald green goes over blue suit, black dress; blue, black or toast-tan accessories.

Jewel of a black dress, 409; sizes 12 to 42; for afternoon with flower hat; less dressy with straw sailor shown with suit.

The Journal's LITTLE GEM of a wardrobe are a great many women who love the idea of having a few really good clothes that they can wear everywhere. They like the simplicity of a basic dress or suit, and the fact that it will be in fashion for several years. They love to "do things" to it with color accessories. And they believe, as we do, that this is a better way dress well than to have a lot of one-season, hit-or-miss clothes.

It sounds easy. It isn't quite so easy as it sounds. That is ason the JOURNAL has decided to put such a little wardrobe into a form that any of you can follow—with your own personal tions. Three costumes will do it: a jewel of a black crepe dress; a suit in a dark or neutral shade; a coat in color that goes over The dress can be changed endlessly—with everything from a string pearls or gold jewelry to flowers, gilets, sashes, peplums or apron overskirts. The suit with blouses, vestees, scarfs, belts and s. At least one hat and bag should go with both suit and ress. All hats, bags and gloves should go with the coat.

of the best ways to get exactly what you want in style, color nd fabric is to make the three costumes yourself. The colors gest are fashion trends of this spring, and show you the variety that is possible. You can always substitute your own favorites. t, suit and dress from Hollywood Patterns.

BY RUTH MARY PACKARD

DRAWINGS BY DILYS WATT

© HOLLYWOOD

Wardrobe handbag in toast-tan leather; colorful scarf and geranium boutonniere for suit, dress or coat.

Basic suit, 410; sizes 12 to 20; worn with furs, simple [illegible] pique dickey; changed with plaid bow-blouse, small hat and veil.

See page 76 for Other Views and Prices of Hollywood Patterns.

Rosie's In

EVERY HOME NEEDS WHAT THIS HOME DIDN'T HAVE ★ BY VAL TEAL

"THERE is only one thing missing," father said. He stood in front of the fireplace of our new house and he turned around slowly. He looked out south to the snowy street. He looked out through the windows at the fields and meadows beyond us to the west. He turned north and looked through the Dutch door into the north room, where it was all paneled and books and a game table, and out through the windows to the big trees of the ravine back of us. He spun around back to the fireplace. "Only one thing."

"Phooey," mother said.

"What is home without a mother?" father said. "I'll tell you what: It's a home with animals."

Mother sprinkled some magic crystals on the fire. They color the flames all kinds of colors. "Isn't it pretty?" she said. "All my life I've wanted a fireplace." Mother sometimes pretends father has not spoken at all.

"Yes," father said. "Very pretty." Father always answers what mother says. "All my life I have wanted a dog," he said.

"Me too!" Pud said.

Father laughed. Pud's life has not been so very long. Six years.

Mother threw a big handful of magic crystals on the fire. The flames shot up blue and green and crimson. "It's like a magic fire," she said.

"We can wish, then," I said. "I wish for a dog."

"Me too!" Pud said.

"We need a dog," father said.

"And I," mother said, "wish the house would always stay just this clean. Dogs," she said, "are dirty."

"What," father said, "does mother have against the animal kingdom? I can't think. She belongs to it."

"What," mother said, noticing father at last, "does the animal kingdom have against me? That is the question. I do not attack the animal kingdom. It attacks me."

"Indeed!" father said. "Wolves?"

Mother shrugged. "Wolves," she said. "Dogs," she said. "It's all the same thing. Spiders attack me. Mice attack me. Cats attack me. But mostly dogs attack me. If we were prehistoric and lived in caves, I am one of the women who would be chased by mammoths."

"I resent that," father said. "I weighed myself this morning. A hundred and ninety is not a mammoth."

Mother was not noticing father again. "I understand it, of course," she said. "It is unfortunate that I belong to the animal kingdom. Yes, I belong to the animal kingdom, but only just. Evolution is taking place. Individuals are rising, ever rising. Any day now, any century, two thousand, five thousand, ten thousand years from today a new, a superior species evolves. I am evolving. I am teetering on the edge. The animals know it. They resent it."

"Naturally," father said. "I resent it. I want to evolve too. A daisy wants to evolve. A dandelion wants to evolve. It resents me because I have evolved beyond it. Do I hate it for that reason? Do I bar it from my domain for that reason?"

"You try to," mother said. "The dandelion."

"Let's stick to the daisy, please," father said. "No, I don't hate the daisy because I have evolved beyond it. I love it. I appreciate it. I am glad that it stayed back at being a daisy. I enjoy it. It's the same thing with dogs."

"Do I hate dogs?" mother said. "I do not. I appreciate them. Good grief, think if they had evolved into men with their personalities! But I realize they are trying to hold me back. They hate me. They would destroy me if they could because I am going beyond them. Just like the dandelion would destroy you if it could because you are going beyond it."

"Thank you," father said. "How far beyond a dandelion would you say I had evolved?"

Mother kept still.

"Forget it," father said. "I don't want a dog. We don't want a dog, do we, boys? Nah, we don't want a dog."

"I do," Pud said.

"Let's make popcorn," father said. "It's a perfect night for popcorn."

We ate the popcorn in front of the fireplace.

"My dog would eat a whole bowlful," Pud said, "if he was here. He'd gobble it up and not make any mess."

"I declare," mother said. "It's a mania. What's the matter? Don't you people get enough love? Do you feel a lack of some kind?"

"We need the love of the animal kingdom," father said. "The love of superior evolvements doesn't quite reach us."

Mother bought us some goldfish the next day. Swell goldfish. We liked them. Goldfish are beautiful when the sun is shining on them. They're pretty on dark days, too, because they look like sun. They're cute when they get to trust you and come up to be fed. It only takes a couple of days. Then it's over. You just feed them. You try not to forget to feed them.

"If I had a dog I'd make it wipe its feet," Pud said one night.

"Humph," mother said. "Animals are dumb. You'd never be able to teach it anything. You've got a pet. Now keep still."

"I can't pet it," Pud said.

THE snow was melting and running great guns down the street. Pud and I built a dam of snow and made a big lake in front of our house. It was fun to watch the water. It was just like mice when you catch them. The water was caught and it just had to get away. It went first one way and then another, looking here and looking there for a place to get through and finally finding a way out and away! Down the street!

This little dog came up and looked to see what was going on. A dog with reddish-whitish fur, kind of curly. It would try to play with us and knock us over and then it would look at the lake, too, and smell. He got up on the edge of the dam and the snow crumbled away and he went splash into the lake. Pud laughed till he was silly. And when the dog got up he did it again. He was soaking wet. It was getting colder. The water wasn't running so fast and the dog's hair was getting stiff.

"He's freezing," Pud said. He sure was! Freezing stiff!

We went up to the front door and rang the bell.

"The door's open," mother called. "But wipe your feet. You should go round to the back."

"Come here," I yelled.

Mother came to the door. "What is it?" she said. "I'm busy getting dinner ready."

"Isn't that a cute little dog?" I said.

"Yes," mother said. "Go round to the back door, you're dripping."

(Continued on Page 152)

★ It was as if those eyes were continually rapping at a door of a heart that refused to open to him.

Can a Woman be sure of her husband until he is sure of himself?

Lib Wrenn is back in Town

BY NAOMI A. HINTZE

ILLUSTRATED BY [illegible]

FOR the first ten minutes of church on that Sun[illegible] usually aware of her blessings. This feeling of all being exactly right with her world lasted from the time she stood up beside Lincoln, her husband, to sing, "Praise God from Whom all blessings flow," to the middle of the first verse of the second hymn.

It was summer at last, her favorite season, and really hot. Fans with Maxfield Parrish reproductions on one side and advertisements for Wickard's Furniture Store on the other moved gently over the congregation. Outside the tilted stained-glass windows bees made the sibilant sounds of summer. Occasional light breezes brought the cool smell of honeysuckle that grew outside the east windows, and the hot sweet smell of wild roses that grew in a field not far away. Lib breathed deeply. I love summer best, she thought.

Her new print dress, gray with small pink flowers, a low neck outlined by a crisp white frill, was perfect for this sort of weather. It was cool, comfortable and, as the clerk had promised it would be, concealing. The small hat she was wearing was left over from last season, but she liked it better than any other hat she had ever owned. She felt that it made her look worldly—a feat always difficult of accomplishment, encumbered as she was by wide and rather guileless-looking gray eyes.

Another factor contributing to her feeling of serenity on this Sunday morning was the pot roast simmering in the thrift cooker at home—Lincoln loved a big Sunday dinner—and also the fact that when she had left Susan and Nancy, aged four and two and a half, in the church nursery they had not screamed as they usually did. Susan had discovered the satisfying noise chalk could make on a blackboard, and Nancy, with her usual directness and angelic smile, had taken the Noah's ark away from a child twice her size. Hastily Lib had come away. Surely the child-psychology majors home from college for the summer could cope with her children for one hour a week.

The young minister read the announcements in the [illegible] awe of here in Wrenn, Illinois, and a little proud of too. The choir sang one of its best numbers from the Easter cantata, and Miss Mitty at the organ, wearing another splendid new hat with back interest—she said she always chose her hats for the way they looked from the back—played showily and well, with an abandon that was interesting, if somewhat distracting, to watch.

Lincoln reached over and squeezed Lib's white-gloved hand. She smiled up at him. She had never stopped being thankful that Lincoln Jones, big, with rough-featured good looks and hair as dark as her own, had married her. A small-town lawyer—it was, he admitted, all he ever wanted to be. He was frequently to be seen behind the plate glass of his first-floor office on Main Street with his feet up on the desk. He might never be rich, but there was a certain lazy brilliance about the way he presented his cases in court that was bringing him more work than he could handle. It had been reported to Lib that he had said he did not care if this next baby was another girl, which, since it was such a great lie, endeared him to her more than ever.

High, too, on that list of blessings, had she actually been making one, must have been the sore throat Lincoln had developed last week. It had kept him at home for most of the week, and had been providentially timed so that they had been unable to attend the dinner given at the country club for Dale MacLaren.

SHE remembered now how depressed she had felt last Tuesday afternoon when she had stood at the ironing board pressing the old blue-jersey evening dress. It had never been a favorite, but it was the only one she could get into, and the budget this month did not run to a new maternity evening gown even to compete with the beautiful beautiful Dale MacLaren. That was the way Lib always had heard Dale described. Saying beautiful twice. Unnecessarily rubbing it in, Lib felt, since she had only a common garden variety of prettiness.

And even that, when she was between permanents, as she was now, she often seriously questioned.

It would be impossible for anyone to be jealous of Dale; Lib had been assured that many times. Women liked her just as much as men did. She was good. She was clever. Had she not, immediately after jilting Lincoln, gone to New York and secured a job on a fashion magazine, the glossiest-paged, most ultra of them all?

NONE of her informants had ever been able to throw any light on the angle that interested Lib most: why Dale had jilted Lincoln. All of a sudden she had just said she didn't want to live in Wrenn. Linc had already bought that property out in the country. ("Where you are living now, dear.") The whole town had been shocked. Those two had just seemed made for each other. ("Not that you and Lincoln aren't the ideal couple, of course.")

Three months after Dale had left for New York—Lib knew this much for sure—Lincoln had proposed to her and been promptly accepted.

Rebound? Well, Lib had known that was what everybody in Wrenn thought when Lincoln brought her back as his bride. Probably it was true, but it didn't matter. She would love him so much, she vowed, be such a good wife to him, and give him so nearly exactly the sort of life he wanted, that he would forget the beautiful beautiful Dale MacLaren.

But he had never forgotten. There were little ways in which Lib knew. He never mentioned her, for one thing, and his face, when Dale's name was mentioned, took on a look that Lib could put no name to. Very few of their friends ever mentioned Dale's name in his presence, which tact only served to crystallize her fears.

Sometimes when she forgot to be sensible, fear of Dale MacLaren could balloon in her heart and squeeze out all the certainty of Linc's love. It was nonsense. She knew, didn't she, that the dreams they'd shared, the work they'd done together, the two girls they had and the boy they longed for, were more important than any look a man got on his face at the mention of an old girl's name? And yet, nonsense or not, she had become so conditioned to the sound of Dale's name (Continued on Page 216)

"I'VE WORRIED ABOUT THAT WOMAN FOR FIVE YEARS," THOUGHT LIB. "AND NOW I KNOW W

319

Would You Vote for a Woman President?

MAN, who's been running the world for centuries, has made a fair mess of it—if you judge him by the wars, waste and want he brings about.

It's none too certain woman wouldn't do a far better job of things, all of which makes the talk of a feminine U.S. President, as a starter, something worth thinking about nowadays.

Of course no one can predict whether a lady at the helm would make for better—or worse. But lots of people have ideas on the subject, well worth noting.

When we asked these 30 masterminds how they felt about voting a lady into the White House, here's what they answered.

Maybe you won't agree. But when a feminine candidate does toss her hat into the presidential ring, here's a preview of the comments which are sure to start flying—thick and fast.

And it may be sooner than you think.

BY JUDITH CHASE CHURCHILL

● "I would, most certainly, vote for a woman for President of the United States.

"It is not that I am particularly biased in favor of my own sex. But my work as a writer brings me in contact with men and women in all the professions, and all walks of life. Grade for grade, class for class, I have discovered, women reveal a greater intelligence, shrewdness, logic and common sense than their male counterparts. Contrary to general opinion, women are not so sentimental as men, but are much more hardheaded. They are not so querulous, and usually have a finer sense of proportion. Moreover, they, in general, enjoy better health and have a stronger physical stamina. I doubt very much that they are as susceptible to bribes as men, and certainly they are more honest. In any event, a matriarchy could do no worse with the world than men have done so far. And it might do a whole lot better." —Taylor Caldwell.

● "I think the question of voting for a woman as President of the United States is entirely determined by the question 'Which woman?'

"Some could do an excellent job and some could not. Broadly speaking I feel that men, by nature and by inheritance and tradition, are better suited by temperament to executive and administrative posts. Fundamentally, they are more objective and less likely to be swept by emotional reactions than women. Nevertheless, it would be unwise to overlook the great gifts and ability of such a woman as Queen Elizabeth. She is, however, one of the very few good women executives, administrators or rulers in history. The bad or incapable ones are by far the rule.

"The whole question is necessarily complicated by the fact that many men and women, while physically belonging to one sex, share many of the characteristics, virtues, faults and quirks of the opposite sex, as well as the temperamental failings usually attributed to the opposite sex."

—Louis Bromfield.

● "Yes, if I were convinced that she was the best qualified of all the available candidates. She might not be as good as our best Presidents, but she certainly could not be as bad as our worst.

"A man-made world has decreed that women should not hold important positions, but they have done so just the same, while the man-made world is now a complete and apparently permanent mess. A woman in the White House might accomplish something toward removing the leading falsehood of history, which is that arguments between individuals, organizations, factions or nations can be settled by fighting. Force of arms has never yet settled anything and never will. It is man's tacit admission that he is not much better than the so-called 'lower animals,' who have no reasoning power whatever. The supposed inferiority of women is another expression of the same animal complex."

—Sigmund Spaeth.

● "Who do we think has been running things all along?" —Milt Gross.

● "Gallantry alone would keep me from voting for one. I have no objection to murdering a lady—cleanly, neatly, with a big club—but my soul shrinks from condemning her to four years of nerve-racking torture to the brickbats, the back-stabbing, the crushing pressures of our presidency. It would destroy my sleep, which I value second only to the gentle dignity of the sex.

"Nor could I bear to put other world leaders, amateurs all, under the disadvantage of dealing with a professional argument winner. It wouldn't be nice, much less fair. Picture a woman President standing up at Yalta, or perhaps Ashby De La Zooch, protesting Russian grabs; it would cramp Uncle Joe's style: he might feel he had to be chivalrous—and we wouldn't want to put him in that position.

"Then, too, it might embarrass those nations that still believe a woman's place is in the harem. American man has been enlightened, but that was a purely domestic affair. Fatima's enlightenment might be thought of in other terms, such as fomenting revolutions abroad; then there'd be ugly little notes on the wires, and we'd get hauled before U.N. for interfering with the internal affairs of other nations.

"No, no, it wouldn't do. We're embarrassed now by possessing the atom bomb. Let's not develop even more destructive weapons."

—Josiah E. Greene.

BROWN BROS. CULVER

How modern is the idea of a woman President? In the nineteenth century two women were nominated for the presidency of the United States. In 1872, Victoria Claflin Woodhull Martin (left) was the candidate of the Equal Rights Party; in 1884 and 1888, Belva Lockwood (right) was the nominee of the Equal Rights Party of the Pacific Coast. Neither candidate could cast a ballot herself!

● "I see no reason why in the long run the President need be a man rather than a woman. But just now I feel that woman's political experience has been short and that people are not ready for a woman President. This is no reflection upon woman's intelligence or ability in an executive position. But the President of the United States needs and ought to have the backing of a very large majority of the United States citizens, and I feel that, now, a woman President would have an undesirable handicap in that she might not have as full support as a man would have in the same position."

—Mignon G. Eberhart.

● "Yes. If I can talk with her first."

—David McCord.

● "No. It has been my experience that whenever a woman has become the head of an organization, the men gradually drop out, the best men first. I think then that it would be difficult for a woman President to secure a good Cabinet, unless one entirely of women.

"But anyway, no woman could ever be elected President for the simple reason that women wouldn't vote for her." —Gelett Burgess.

● "I see no reason why a woman should not be President of the United States if her qualifications equal or exceed those of her opponent. In fact, it might be wise to try a woman for a change. I believe that women would restore conscience to politics, which is today utterly devoid of sincerity and conviction. I also believe that they would be more sincerely interested in establishing permanent peace than men, because the average woman suffers from war more than men.

"I have found that throughout the nation women are intensely patriotic and would not tolerate some of the subversive activities that are carried on under the guise of liberalism and democracy."

—Martin Dies.

● "I would vote for a woman for President of the United States because the position of Chief Executive requires qualities of courage and selflessness. Any woman who would admit to the required age—and pose in those cowboy hats and Indian headdresses—has both qualities."

—Helmut Dantine.

● "I'm not a KKK man. I don't mean Ku Klux Klan. I mean Kinder, Kirche, Küche—children, church and kitchen, which Hitler decided were women's field of activity and all else out of bounds.

"I'm not prepared to say that Mrs. Roosevelt would have been as good as or better or worse than F.D.R. I don't know as to the relative merits of Mrs. Truman versus Mr. Truman. I'd rather have Mr. Luce than Mrs. Luce, but God forfend! And I'm positive Mrs. Gerald L. K. Smith would be no improvement on Mr. Gerald L. K. Smith.

(Continued on Page 145)

IF YOU ASK ME

By Eleanor Roosevelt

Lately, everyone seems to be criticizing women for bad manners. Do you think women have worse manners than men?

I have never tried to compare the two, but I should think, on the whole, that women have better manners than men because good manners arise from thoughtfulness for others. The very nature of their job in life makes women think about others around them more than men usually have to do.

During the war, everything possible was done by Government, labor and management to speed business and resident housing. Now, when the need is just as urgent, why can't the same teamwork be brought to bear on the desperate housing conditions?

It could, if people as a whole had been willing to stick to the same self-sacrifices they accepted during the war period. All of them wanted, however, to get back to normal conditions; businessmen wanted to do business as usual—they did not want to think about housing when they wanted to increase their business opportunities. People who had lived in small houses wanted bigger ones and they wanted them immediately. People who wanted to start small, new businesses did not want to wait for materials while necessary low-cost houses were being built.

Low-cost housing does not bring in as high profits and people are not anxious to go into this field, so a man who had his heart in it, like Mr. Wilson Wyatt, resigned because he could not even get the other people in the Government to cooperate with him, and we find ourselves the victims of a perfectly normal but selfish side of human nature.

We have to hide some of the magazines from our adolescent children because of the references to liquor. What can we do about it?

I cannot imagine why you should hide magazines from your adolescent children because they have references to liquor. Do you think your children can live in this world and not know that liquor exists, or that the use of it is condemned when it is used to excess, but that it is a commodity on the market? I am afraid our adolescent children are not dependent for their information on the magazines which they find in their own homes, and the effort to hide them will be of little use. I should be inclined to tell them whatever you want them to know. They have to live in the world, so you have to trust them in the end.

Do you not think that rheumatic fever warrants a campaign such as the one for the March of Dimes? Is there anything that we or you could do to start such a campaign?

I do think rheumatic fever does warrant a campaign such as the one for the March of Dimes. There is nothing, however, that I could possibly do to start such a campaign. It could, of course, be started by any organization that had the machinery and the interest to do so.

Many people have favorite proverbs, the philosophy of which they try to live, such as "Do unto others. . . . " What is yours?

I am afraid I haven't got one. I was brought up by my grandmother with constant admonitions and allusions to the old proverbs, and the one I remember well is "A stitch in time saves nine," but I cannot say that it was a favorite. "People who live in glass houses should not throw stones" was another one I heard frequently.

Letters should be addressed to Mrs. Roosevelt, care of Ladies' Home Journal. It should be understood that Mrs. Roosevelt's answers reflect only her own opinion, and are not necessarily the opinions of the Editors of the Journal.

With national and world affairs being what they are today, I would like to make my opinions count. Is there any way other than writing to my congressman in which to do this?

Yes, the most potent way of talking to your neighbors and friends and creating public opinion. Whether we live in a large or a small city, or in a village, it is what we and our neighbors think which really influences our representatives in the states and in the nation.

Will you perhaps suggest a half dozen or so books that you might call required reading on the American scene for those like myself who have come to this country as the wives of American servicemen? I came here from a small village in England and there is so much I have to learn of this country I now call "home."

If you can get Dorothy Canfield's Hillsboro People and Edith Wharton's Ethan Frome, you will get a fair picture of New England. Carl Carmer's books will give you the background of New York State. To get the foundations of the wild and woolly west, you might read Bret Harte's The Luck of Roaring Camp. There are [illegible] With the Wind will give you experience of the Civil War and its aftermath. If you will read Whittier's poems, and Walt Whitman's, and in addition [illegible] Washington, Jefferson, Lincoln by Carl Sandburg, you will get the flavor of the men whose ideals have built this country.

Would you please tell me what you think of the opening of radio programs for atheist propaganda?

I do not know what you mean, since I have never heard a radio program which touched on this subject. We all know that there are people who hold atheist theories, but it just happens I have never heard them on the radio. I cannot imagine how a program for this purpose which would create much public interest could be organized.

I am a girl, fifteen years of age, and in my sophomore year in high school. I'm invited to go to the movies and parties with boys who drive their own cars. My mother does not approve and I, having read your column, suggested writing to you. She agreed and we both will abide by your decisions.

I am rather an old lady to advise on this question, but I think my daughter felt the way your mother does, and I do not think she allowed her daughter, when she was fifteen, to go to movies and parties where boys who were not much older did the driving of the car. I think she felt that a little later on there would be more judgment which could not be expected at your age. In some states, boys are not allowed to drive until they reach eighteen, and then they cannot have a full license, except under certain conditions. That is because, in the nature of things, young people have less experience and less judgment. Put that down as one of the advantages that come with age!

How can the ordinary layman exert influence so that the democratic ideal may be substituted for the Nazi gods—so that the spiritual vacuum about which I. A. R. Wylie writes may be filled with goals of value as we who believe in democracy see it?

I imagine we will have to get over our complacency and stop thinking that democracy is something which we have achieved and therefore we no longer have to work for it. We are still living a crusade, but the spirit of the crusade has gone out of us. We have become satisfied before we have achieved our goal. Our largest minority in this country, 13,000,000 people or more, can say quite truthfully that in more than a hundred and fifty years they have attained no democracy. To have attained political democracy without having attained spiritual and economic democracy is not the achievement of the goal for which our forefathers worked and hoped. Unless we carry on our crusade in the spirit of the early days of the founding of our country, we cannot expect to fill a spiritual vacuum, nor to prevent the economic chaos which threatens us at the present time.

To some people, love is near-passion: to some, a quiet understanding: to others, a more complex concoction. Will you give me a definition with your own list of ingredients?

Love can have all the things you mention and a good many more. One could write books on the subject, but I think it is perhaps easier to read those already written. Certainly there is no lack of definitions far better than I could give. Why not start off with the Sonnets from the Portuguese, by Elizabeth Barrett Browning, and then go on through almost all the poets? You will find that from the earliest days down to the present, love has been an unending theme.

REPRINTED COURTESY COLLIER'S

"And I love you, dear!"

Marriage is so Complicated

By Ware Terrey Budlong

LIBBY WANTED LOVE, BUT NOT AS A SOMETIME THING

LIBBY considered [illegible] all about love. The trouble was, she didn't know anything about marriage. Something alien happened to the girls she knew, when they married. They had a new queer confidence, that even the possession of a man and a ring and a house didn't explain. As if overnight they laid hold on a complicated kind of wisdom that had been handed down for generations, married daughter to married daughter. All this sharpened Libby's realization of her own ignorance.

Either Amos or Steve would have been only too glad to give her a personal demonstration. They both spoke about this frequently, and Steve, who covered a lot of country in his work, proposed regularly by long-distance phone. But, until this evening, he hadn't happened to phone while Amos was calling on her.

"Hello," she said. "Oh, hello, Steve."

She clutched the phone a little tighter and glanced nervously at Amos. Sitting three feet away, he could hardly help noting her end of the conversation, at least.

Amos lit a cigarette, gazed politely at the far wall, and obviously prepared to listen. He had a most irritating face. It was good-looking enough, with wide-set dark eyes, a thoroughly squared chin and aggressive cheekbones. The irritating part was that his face was under complete control; his mouth was never surprised into smiling, and when he wished to look blank he succeeded. He was looking blank now. Libby felt he should at least show annoyance, if not jealousy.

"Yes, Steve," she said. Watching Amos, she gentled her voice a little. "Yes, I've thought a lot about what you said. Once in the middle of the night."

Steve's voice crackled over the wire, with little thrusts of intensity. It was clearly audible in the quiet living room. "Don't waste time thinking in the middle of the night," Steve said. "Marry me instead."

"I never heard of a formal wedding in the middle of the night," Libby said hastily.

"Don't be ingenuous," said Steve. "Look, Libby, I forgot something."

"What?" she asked incautiously.

"I love you," Steve said promptly and with carrying power. "I love you, love you, love ——"

"Stop!" said Libby. She looked at Amos. Amos knocked the ash very carefully from his cigarette to the floor, and changed the direction of his gaze from a water color of the sea to a spot on the ceiling.

Steve was protesting in her ear: "Libby—what's the matter with you? You don't sound natural."

"Call me again, Steve. Call me tomorrow night."

"I'll see you, instead," he returned. "Let's get engaged tomorrow night. There's no moon."

"Wait," said Libby, "I can't—I don't ——"

"You will," said Steve. "Good night, darling."

She put the phone down. Amos stopped looking at the ceiling.

"Well?" he said.

"Well what?"

"Are you going to get engaged to him tomorrow night?" Amos inquired, in a tone of quiet interest.

LIBBY frothed with indignation. Steve did too much pursuing, and Amos didn't do enough.

"What about it?" she said irritably.

"If you get engaged to Steve," Amos pointed out, "you'll be less likely to marry me."

Libby looked at him. He might be strong, but he definitely wasn't silent. Only he didn't say the right things.

"That shouldn't worry you much," she told him. "You don't campaign me, you don't try to sell me. Why—you don't even make love to me."

"You've been running around with college boys," Amos said tranquilly. "This is marriage I'm talking about—not 'making love.'"

There it was again. Libby leaned back in her chair. She was weary of her ignorance about marriage. She wished she had spent more time observing her parents, when she had the chance.

Amos stood up. He looked down at her intently. "I'm not interested in arguing you into marrying me," he said. "I'm not interested in getting you so dizzy with emotion that you spin into marriage. I'm not interested ——"

"Don't tell me," she interrupted him. "You're no help at all."

He grinned then, unexpectedly. "Don't worry. You'll get your sales talk from Steve, tomorrow night."

"Oh, go away. How you win any cases, I don't know. You probably tell the other attorney that you aren't interested in law."

"Good night," Amos said.

His hand slipped under her elbow, and she was standing. He kissed her, and the dark curtain, that always screened her feeling for him, slipped a little. She saw a brightness, and then it was gone again. She wondered what he saw.

Amos stood away from her. "Did you forget about that?" he said. "Don't look so surprised, Libby — that's part of it. I don't want to marry you just because you can cook."

"Oh," said Libby, off base.

"Good night," said Amos. "Say 'no,' tomorrow night." He went out, and left her standing there, considerably mixed up. But that, she reminded herself, was no novelty these days.

Moodily, she tidied up her two-room apartment, showered and went to bed. She turned out the light, and was instantly wide awake.

IT was all Amos' fault, she decided. Here she was faithfully trying to decide between Steve and Amos, and then Amos wouldn't co-operate. He stood off at a distance and calmly waited while she made up her mind. No wonder she couldn't sleep that night.

This had been going on for some time. Six months ago, when she was just nineteen, her parents had moved to California; and Libby had decided to be on her own. She liked her job at the laboratory, she'd had two years away at college to make her feel independent, and she rented the space over the gift shop and moved in.

At first she'd gone around with the boys and girls she had known at school, and of course Amos. Then Steve had come to town, and pretty soon he and Amos were dividing her free time between them. Only Amos never got jealous, she reflected indignantly. How could she decide between them, when Amos acted this way?

She thumped her pillow into a firmer wad under her head, relaxed into a restful sleeping position, and was still more wide awake. The main trouble was that she couldn't decide which one she was really in love with. She couldn't marry Amos while she was so definitely attracted by Steve. And she couldn't marry Steve while she knew perfectly well there was an unknown quantity of emotion she could feel about Amos, if he'd only pull the proper electric switch.

"Marriage is more trouble than it's worth," she said defiantly. And added more quietly, "You're lying in your teeth."

This brief conversation with herself seemed calming, and she finally went to sleep. But she went on with her problem the next day, and when she saw Doris at noon she brought the matter up.

Doris was the only person she could talk to about such things. They had known each other since the days when they'd sat on the grass in the little town park, making miniature layer cakes out of rose petals and sugar. Now they sat on a bench in the same park, but Doris was unfamiliar. Doris was married now. It even showed in the way she sat there; her pointed face serene, her shoulders relaxed, her fingers still.

"You can't decide what man you want to marry, like picking a book in a library," Doris objected. "You were in love with that red-haired boy in college. You must know if you're in love with Amos or Steve."

(Continued on Page 204)

told me that I never [illegible] to you," he said. "Yes," she said.

Look

MENU

Pink-Grapefruit Cocktail

Salmon-and-Sole Loaf

Almond-and-Olive Sauce

Sliced Cucumbers

Celery Curls

Watermelon Pickle

Potato Croquettes Peas

Fruit Sherbet

Rolls Coffee

THE table looked just lovely. The whole thing done with roses. Roses were everywhere and each of us had little rose bouquets—corsages, they called them—to pin on with tiny rose-headed pins. The salts and peppers were little china roses, and right in the center of the table were two of the most beautiful china ladies with flounced skirts with bustles and lace and tight bodices—it made me think of an old photograph album. You know, sort of before the slacks-and-sweater days. And the bustles had little containers in them to hold flowers. Did you ever? Of course these bustles had roses in them and they were just too sweet for words. My, I wish you could have been there. But I know you'll want to know what we ate, and get the receipts.

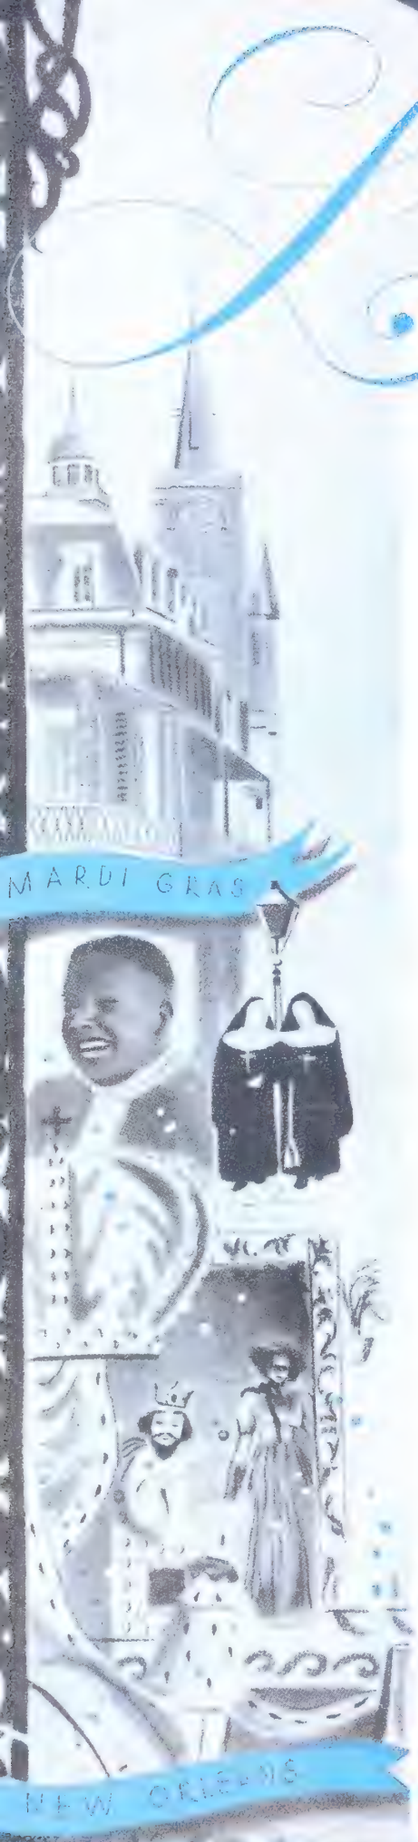
The starting point. One thing Texas has to brag about—and how right they are—is the rare, delicate, sun-ripened, gorgeous, subtly flavored, and more subtly tinted, pink grapefruit. No grenadine or coloring needed here to produce that rosy glow. Only a secret formula that Madame Nature keeps in her intimate reticule can tinge that elegant fruit. And so our first course is architected of the lovely pink segments, jeweled with pale-green seedless grapes. A symphony of tourmaline and pale aqua. And as delicious to eat as to look at. That's saying plenty.

(Continued on Page 192)

Your Prettiest

BY ANN BATCHELDER

Fine Fare



1 OPEN HOUSES IN NEW ENGLAND is the new Chamberlain picture book. For grownups only. But save it for the coming generation. They'll thank you when the time comes.

2 Don't ask me for receipts for two items: homemade pâté de foie gras—you can't stuff a goose liver hereabouts; and there's no such thing as Vermont "election" cake. "Republican" is the word.

3 Orange-cranberry marmalade and apricot-cranberry mix: for turnovers, toasted sweet sandwiches or just as a jam—for whatever you do with jam. Very special, and cranberries just adore their new alliances.

4 Probably you've done it—Christmas being past. But anyway, sometime try a chestnut purée. Slit the flat side of two cups or so of nuts. Plunge them into hot water or heat in the oven until they can be peeled—outers and inners. Now cook them until soft in chicken broth. Drain and put through a ricer or a fine sieve. Season with salt and pepper, a good piece of butter or margarine, and moisten with the broth. Beat very hard. Serve very hot, with chicken or turkey or duck.

5 Chicken to be grilled after steaming may be "deviled" in the simplest way. Before dipping the pieces in egg and crumbs, egg and crumbs again, dust the chicken with dry mustard—very lightly. It's the "divil" of a fine dish. And so you'll say.

6 Mushrooms de luxe: Make some rich pastry shells. Cook the mushrooms—small, very white ones—in cream, butter or margarine and lemon juice. Season with salt and pepper. Arrange in the heated shells, or encase in small turnovers. Serve with steak or poultry.

7 The Italians have a lot on the beam. Take a certain potato croquette, for example. Add a split second of cinnamon to the mashed potatoes, salt and pepper, with a good bit of butter or margarine and cream and beat in an egg for each two good big spuds. Trick is to beat. Make into little-finger croquettes, fry.

8 Do you ever notice that eight out of ten receipts ask for pepper? Salt is routine. But pepper—with a capital P! And don't neglect the salt in anything chocolate.

9 Grilled mushrooms stuffed with highly seasoned chopped chicken livers

BY ANN BATCHELDER

are starring on the best hors d'oeuvre trays. (Ever have any trouble with spelling?)

10 Take some baby carrots—young ones that haven't grown up to taste like a piece off an old overcoat. Slice the babies thin. Cover them with a real cream sauce, sprinkle with fine crumbs and grated cheese and bake. (Cook the carrots first, or go for the canned ones.)

11 Herb note: Flavoring meat balls or dressings, using the dried herbs, as you must. Soak them awhile in stock or milk before you add the liquids to the mixture. Draws out the flavor and makes everything better and better.

12 Two things I can't wait a minute to tell you. First is—"potatoes en robe de chambre" is a potato in a nightgown. Second is—"Terminate your pie with a crust." How I study—and how I learn.

13 I wonder if I've told you of "Fritto-Mixto"? This mixed dish is made with any small fish such as whitebait, flowerets of cauliflower, artichoke bottoms, sweetbreads, rice croquettes, hard bread softened in flavored milk—and so on—dipped in batter and fried in deep fat. Most elegant.

14 You read of Sauce Diable—for lobster and such. An expensive what not. Wait a minute. Put a little meat sauce in a spider. Add some prepared mustard and lemon juice, salt, paprika, salad oil. Beat 'er up. Wonderful on lobster and sardines or shad roe. And it's Sauce Diable all right.

15 Corned-beef hash is the old, old story. With a poached egg like a parasol on each patty. Well, hard cook enough eggs, plant one in each portion, mask with hollandaise sauce and see how the boys like that.

16 Want to try hearts of palm? Slice the delicate translucent spikes. Marinate in French dressing. Serve on a bed of water cress. Dressed à la f.d. Very cold.

17 Dear friend grapefruit—how are you? Going to take out your center and fill it with French-dressed shrimps. Pale yellow, pale pink. Like bridesmaids. All right by you, grapefruit?

18 I have never held with latticed apple pie. Two crusts for me. But—lattice your pie with cheese crust, cut in strips and I'll accept it. (Save a piece for tomorrow, please, and I'll be there.)

19 From an old cookbook: "It is in the worst of taste to seat husband and wife together at the guest table. Better two women together than that." See enough of each other at home?

20 The expression on a fish's face as it reclines on a platter gets me down. No matter what they say, cut off the head. Fishermen dissent. Say looks aren't everything. But they count just the same.

21 Spanish onions baked in cream, filled with creamed mushrooms or condensed mushroom soup, are delicious with steak. Divine with turkey. Superb with roast pork. Take your pick.

22 Dessert de luxe: Drain halves of peaches. Fill them with chopped nuts (fine), rolled macaroons and dot all over with butter or margarine. Bake in an oven at 350° F. Add a little fruit sirup and serve with whipped cream. Oh, of course—hot.

23 Do not distrust a fish. If you do, you'll miss something. Split a fine pompano, bone it, broil it. Slather it well with butter or margarine and serve it up with whipped potatoes. Bet you the Queen of Hearts ate no better.

24 Meringues, dripping with sweetness as lilac blossoms in the spring, are a dessert to make you stop and think. Especially when put together with perfumed whipped cream, any flavor. Perfumed? Flavoring. Same thing.

25 Try some raisin corn-meal sticks one of these days. Just a cup of steamed raisins in the old corn-meal receipt. Plenty plantation pieces.

26 Cook some sweet potatoes. Slice them. Season. Sprinkle with cinnamon. Dip in egg and crumbs. Again in the same. Then fry in deep fat. And stop thinking of those pommes soufflées.

27 Consider the baking-powder biscuit as it comes from the pan. To get variety into those old stand-bys, use orange juice instead of milk and a rasping of orange rind too. Have them very short. And very hot. You'll like these.

28 February is the Limited Edition among the months. But long enough, at that. Just get it over with and you know that spring can't be far behind. Then we can start all over again—along with the crocus bulbs and early birds.

DRAWING BY R. C. ATHERTON

THE FORGOTTEN BIRD

I have no place to hide
This most conspicuous crest.
Where, where shall I abide
In the snowbound waste?
Where rest?

Bird, you are not alone.
Look for the sheltered tree;
Search for the sculptured stone;
Let these your shelter be.

It is warm where the flaming wing
Awaits the promised spr-

LOOK FOR THE RED AND WHITE LABEL

Our Latchstring's Out Again!"

"What fun to entertain once more! And how good it is to have such a marvelous soup as Campbell's Cream of Mushroom to add to the welcome! I simply never tasted such wonderful blending of mushrooms and cream.

Of course it's a 'must' in entertaining. And my husband practically commands this soup at least once a week, even when there's just the family—'because I like it', says he, giving [illegible]!"

Campbell's

CREAM OF MUSHROOM SOUP

Made from tender hothouse mushrooms and extra-heavy sweet cream . . . Have you served this luxury soup lately?

Parents - Can you answer these questions about

RHEUMATIC FEVER

Q. Why is early diagnosis so important?

A. If rheumatic fever is discovered early, prompt treatment can often prevent serious injury to a child's heart. This is especially important with this disease, for it is still a leading health hazard among children from 5 to 15. It is also responsible for much of the heart disease in early adult life.

Q. How about recurring attacks?

A. Recurrence is one great danger of rheumatic fever. In only about one third of the cases do children escape with a single attack. Proper care during the first attack and periodic examinations after it help to avoid further trouble. Your physician will also advise you how to build up your child's general health in guarding against sore throat, tonsillitis, streptococcus infection, and other illnesses which may precede rheumatic fever.

Q. What are the signs of rheumatic fever?

A. The most common are: persistent low fever, loss of weight and appetite, pains in joints or muscles, frequent nosebleeds, and chorea (St. Vitus' dance). These are not sure signs of rheumatic fever. They are warnings to consult your doctor. Sometimes rheumatic fever shows no symptoms, and its effects will be discovered only if the child has periodic physical examinations.

Medical science often limits the effects of rheumatic fever

Although there is still no specific cure for rheumatic fever, modern medical science is making so many advances that parents can be hopeful that the effects of this disease can often be limited. Through their doctor, they should take advantage of every aid offered by increased medical knowledge. Parents also should work to keep the child-patient cheerful, especially during convalescence, which may be prolonged.

The majority of children who get rheumatic fever will be able to lead normal lives. Many whose hearts are weakened will still remain free from any serious handicap in later life. To learn more about this disease, send for Metropolitan's free booklet, 27-J, "Rheumatic Fever."

Metropolitan Life Insurance Company

(A MUTUAL COMPANY)

Frederick H. Ecker,
CHAIRMAN OF THE BOARD

Leroy A. Lincoln,
PRESIDENT

1 MADISON AVENUE, NEW YORK 10, N.Y.

Metropolitan Life Insurance Company
1 Madison Avenue, New York 10, N. Y.

Please send me a copy of your booklet 27-J entitled "Rheumatic Fever."

Name _____

Street _____

City _____ State _____

TO VETERANS—IF YOU HAVE NATIONAL SERVICE LIFE INSURANCE—KEEP IT!

(Continued from Page 23)

dull for Ferdinand Walsh. I think he was bored with the people he met here. We don't know enough celebrities."

"That's nonsense," said Nelson. "If the people who come here are good enough for us, they're good enough for him."

"Darling," she said, in her gayest tones, "I assure you, his friends are very grand. He dines with duchesses and cabinet ministers." She threw Nelson a warning look which stopped further discussion.

When they were in her room that evening she said to him, "Darling, you were very tactless. Ferdinand Walsh doesn't come here any more because of Mary. He's an honorable man, I suppose, and she let him see, rather too plainly—well, I don't have to dot all the i's and cross all the t's, do I? I'm extremely sorry about it, but you remember I told you it would all come to nothing."

"He's always very friendly when I see him anywhere," Nelson said.

"But why not? Of course he is. I do wish someone could teach Mary how to make herself more attractive to men."

"Poor child. She seems to have lost interest in everything since this illness. I wish she'd go on a cruise."

"She doesn't seem to want to do anything," Letty said.

Mary knew now that her hatred of Letty had become an obsession. It shut out every other emotion. It even at times gave her a dangerous and morbid pleasure. As she reached the hotel, she was thinking once more, Suppose I were to tell Maud Cotter the whole story. What would she think?

She knew that she couldn't possibly tell Maud, that she couldn't tell anyone. She saw too plainly now what at first she had ignored: how her father was involved, how the relationship between them had been altered. No, she could never speak of it.

As she went to the reception desk she was hesitating, more than half inclined to run away, when Maud came into the lobby and saw her. She said in her genial way:

"My dear, I'm very glad to see you. You're looking better than you looked the other evening. Lowell's just coming down."

SHE talked with easy naturalness—she might have been seeing Mary daily—and the girl sat listening, wondering what sort of picture this friend of Letty's had of her, trying to see herself through Maud's eyes.

"Who do you look like?" Maud asked. "You're not like your father at all. Do you look like your mother?"

"I've never been told whether I look like my mother or not," Mary said. "I've seen some photographs, though, and I suppose there is a resemblance."

"You made a sweet little bridesmaid at Letty's wedding," Maud said. "I remember you perfectly." Then she waved in the direction of the lift and said, "Here's Lowell. You remember him, don't you?"

The delicate man came toward them, walking deliberately and not smiling, as if he were thinking of other, more important matters. Mary thought he looked fragile, and as if ill health had aged him before his time, but his face and expression were not old; they were young, almost immature.

He took her hand and said, "You've grown up since I saw you last. Here you are, almost one of us now."

MARY wondered if she would ever be as settled in the world, as definite in character as these two. And suddenly she was reliving the dream of the night before, the dream of lost, unenjoyed spring. She shivered.

Later, at lunch, Maud and Lowell argued about the merits of a play they had seen the evening before; there was a tartness in some of their remarks that made Mary laugh.

"We know each other too well," Maud said. "Politeness has long ago gone by the board. We say what we think."

"That must be very pleasant," Mary said.

Lowell turned to her and asked, "Do you say what you think, or what you imagine people would like you to say?"

She considered for a moment, wishing to answer truthfully. "Neither," she replied. "I say what I feel certain won't commit me to anything or give me away."

"Well, when you get to our age," he said, "you'll want to give yourself away. You'll want people to know, while there's still time, what you're really like. Now you imagine you've got all the time there is."

"I've got too much time," she said, with sudden recklessness, "and it's no use to me."

Poor child, Maud thought, she really meant it. What's brought her to this pass? Letty or the accident? Probably both.

"I thought that once," Lowell told her. "It's only a phase—don't let it get you down." He had taken a liking to the girl. He glanced at Maud and she saw something in his expression that made her wonder what he was going to say next. "While we've been sitting here," he said, "I've had a bright idea. Why don't you come over to Paris with us? Don't you think she ought to, Maudie? I need someone to keep me company while you're prowling around the art galleries."

"Now isn't that a queer coincidence?" she exclaimed with a quick glance at Lowell. "I was just going to make the same suggestion. Yes, do come with us, Mary."

Mary looked from one to the other with undisguised amazement. "But do you really mean it? You know what I'm like. Letty's told you, hasn't she? I'm always getting ill. I'd only be a nuisance."

"Now look," said Maud, "there are doctors in Paris; good ones. It'll be spring over there. We'll have a grand time. Get your passport and leave the rest to us."

"She can't face it," said Lowell. "She can't face Paris in the spring with a couple of old bores like us."

Mary looked at him as if she had not even heard. "But I don't see why you want me. I can't think why you even suggested it."

(Continued on Page 58)

♥ ♥ ♥ ♥ ♥ ♥ ♥ ♥

Oh, There Shall Come a Day

By Eunice Mildred Lonfoske

Oh, there shall come a day when April will Dance through a greening
meadow once again,
And other eyes than mine shall watch spring spill
Wild buds and blossoms over hill and plain.

And there shall come a day when all this brief
Sublimity shall for a moment bear
A shimmering tide of flower and of leaf . . .
And never cause my dreaming
heart to care;

And never cause my dreaming
heart to wake,
To follow through a drift of apple snow.
I shall have then forgotten all heartbreak,
For spring shall call and I shall never know!

♥ ♥ ♥ ♥ ♥ ♥ ♥ ♥

New! Blush-cleanse your face—for that Engaged-lovely look

See it give your skin:

—an instant clean, refreshed look

—an instant softer, silkier feel

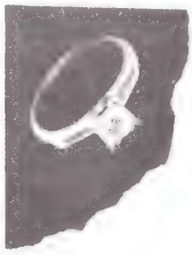
—a lovely blush of color

YOU'LL SEE RESULTS TONIGHT—with the new blush-cleansing with Pond's Cold Cream. It cream-cleanses and cream-rinses your face to a new loveliness.

YOU BLUSH-CLEANSE—Rouge your face with warm water. Dip deep into soft, smooth Pond's Cold Cream. Swirl it on your receptively moist, warm skin in little creamy "engagement ring" circles up over your face and throat. Tissue off.

YOU BLUSH-RINSE—Cream again with more snowy-soft Pond's Cold Cream. Swirl about 25 more creamy circlets over your face. Tissue well. Tingle with cold water. Blot dry.

EXTRA CLEAN, SOFT, GLOWING—that's the way your face will look! Pond's cream-and-cream action has softened and loosened dry, gritty make-up—helped free your skin! Every night this complete Pond's cleansing, every morning for a fresh make-up, one quick over: blush-cleansing with Pond's!



BARBARA'S RING, a stunning diamond set with utmost simplicity.

BARBARA CHIPMAN says—"I just love this blush-cleanse with Pond's Cold Cream"

She's Engaged!

She's Lovely!

She uses Pond's!

BARBARA CHIPMAN is the delightful daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Charles Chipman of New York and Easton, Pennsylvania, where the family's beautiful country house is located. She is engaged to Barrie McDowell, of New York, who served two years overseas, in the Army.

Barbara has a special talent for writing poetry. Her beauty is poetic, too—and memorable—her hair like a shining cap of gold, her brown-amber eyes, the warm peaches-and-dew look of her soft, young complexion.

She finds blush-cleansing with Pond's Cold Cream is delightfully cleansing and softening. "I love the glowy clean-smooth feeling my face has after it," she says.

Have the Pond's blush-cleansed look! Get a luxurious big jar of Pond's Cold Cream today. The bountiful 6-ounce-size jar is extra convenient to use.

Diamonds and Pond's [illegible] exquisite diamonds valued at $20,000—declined for [illegible] Bachelet engaged girl

Among the beautiful women of Society who use Ponds

H. H. PRINCESS PRISCILLA BIBESCO

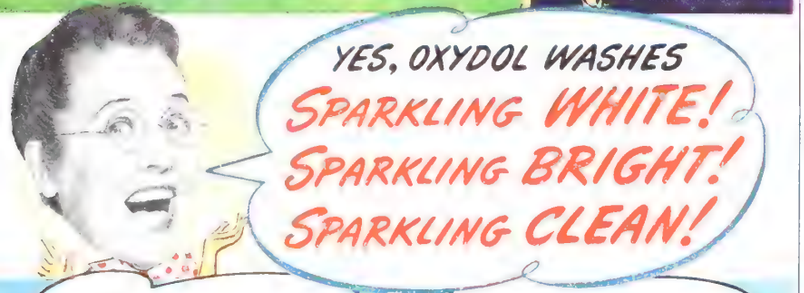
MRS. HENRY L. ROOSEVELT, JR. THE DUCHESS DE RICHELIEU

THE LADY VICTORIA MONTAGU-DOUGLAS-SCOTT

MRS. RICHARD C. DU PONT MRS. ANTHONY J. DREXEL, III

MRS. FRANCIS GROVER CLEVELAND

MRS. DAVID McCORMICK



OXYDOL BEATS OTHER-TYPE SOAPS in preventing formation of dingy washwater particles . . . so all your linens and wash colors keep sparkling, week after week!

YOU GET THE CLEANEST WASH POSSIBLE from any soap—with Oxydol in your tub or machine! Linens are so sparkling clean they're white without bleaching!

NO HARD RUBBING—NO LONG WASHER RUNS with Oxydol's active "Hustle-Bubble" suds on the job. So, give your next wash "That Oxydol Sparkle"!

(Continued from Page 56)

"We happen to think it would be nice to have you," Lowell said. "Why not just leave it at that?"

She blinked rapidly, as if she had suddenly come out into the sunlight. "All right, I'll come."

"Good!" exclaimed Maud. "And if Letty or your father raises any objections, let me deal with them."

"They'll warn you," Mary said. "They'll warn you about me."

"She's got me on her hands," said Lowell. "She might as well have you too."

But as they left the dining room, Mary's honesty got the better of her. Maud was Letty's friend, and she hated Letty. She asked Maud if she might speak to her alone. Lowell, whose ears were sharp, overheard and said he had a letter to write, and that they'd find him in the writing room.

Going up in the lift, Mary tried to put into words what she should say. But when they were in Maud's bedroom she went to the window and stood opening and shutting the catch of her bag till Maud came to her and, putting a hand on her shoulder, said:

"Listen, child, you can say anything to me. It's about Letty, I suppose. Do you two get on so very badly? Frankly, I don't think I'd like Letty for a stepmother."

Mary turned to her, her face suddenly distorted, her brows drawn together as though a string had been tightly pulled. "I hate her! I hate her! How can I accept anything from you? You're her friend."

"Well, well, what of that?" Maud asked calmly. "You've accepted lunch and it didn't choke you." She smiled. "All right. You hate Letty. It makes no difference to me. Don't imagine I can't see her faults I'm asking you to come to Paris with us because you're Mary Hallam, not because you're Letty's stepdaughter."

"But when I say I hate her," the girl insisted fiercely, "I mean it."

"I can see you do. But it doesn't make an atom of difference. We won't even go into it. I'm sorry you hate Letty, because hating's such a painful business, that's all. Now let's tell Lowell that it's all settled. That letter writing of his was a sham; he never writes letters. We're going to the National Gallery this afternoon. Why don't you come with us?"

Mary said the doctor had ordered her to rest for an hour after lunch, and after saying good-by and promising to be ready on Friday next, she went back to Hyde Park Square. As she climbed the stairs to her room she knew, as though she had been allowed to look through a small window into a portion of her future, that she was never coming back. She didn't know what was going to happen to her or what the alternative might be. She was simply not coming back.

DRIVING to the National Gallery in a taxi, Maud said to Lowell, "In six weeks that girl will be a different creature."

"I don't know why. I shouldn't think a few weeks in Paris with you and me is going to look so hot to a young girl. Do we know anybody under fifty?"

"Not much under," Maud agreed.

"Well, then?"

"Oh, don't worry. You're always anticipating the worst."

"Yes," he agreed. "It's a sort of insurance against its happening. I've always done it, and on the whole it's worked very well."

The taxi had reached their destination and had stopped. Lowell, as he opened the door, said, "Maudie, I'm very happy. I'm just going to live in the present. If I look ahead, it will be for one day only. One step enough for me."

"All right. That suits me too."

"If we'd been married all these years," he said, as they went up the steps, "it wouldn't have been so very different, would it?"

She hesitated a bare second. "Well, I suppose not so very different. But why bring that up?"

"I don't know. I just said I was happy, and then realized how entirely my happiness depended on you. I'm never happy except when I'm with you. As I look back, all my past happiness has depended on you."

"Well," she said gaily, "that's quite a testimonial. If we'd been married all these years, you'd never have said it."

HE paused for a moment on the way up to get his breath, and then said, "You know, Maudie, it's worried me a lot that I was the cause of your never having married. I've often thought I ought to have died."

"Don't be an old idiot," was all she found to say, but she said it lovingly.

"All right," he said, with his charming and youthful smile, "if that's how you feel about it. Now don't you run me off my legs. I'll look at ten pictures and no more."

Nelson and Letty were going to a charity ball in aid of a hospital and Mary did not see them until just before dinner. Letty was in white, and in her hair, which was dressed high, was a red silk rose. As Mary came into the library she heard her father say, "Isn't that rose just a little ——"

Letty turned. "A little what, darling? Young? Frivolous?"

"A little provocative?" he suggested.

"I'll take it out if you like, darling. But it means I'll have to do my hair over again. Just as you say."

"No," he said unwillingly, "leave it if you like it."

"Well, I do like it. Thank you, my sweet." She went to him and kissed him prettily. "I'm hoping it will help me through the evening."

"I've no doubt it will," he said with mild irony.

She laughed and said to Mary, "How did you get on with Maud and Lowell?"

Mary said she had enjoyed the lunch very much. Each word that she spoke to Letty was uttered under compulsion, and the tone carefully guarded, polite, level, expressionless. Having answered her question, she said to her father, "They've asked me to go to Paris with them, father, on Friday. Do you see any reason why I shouldn't accept?"

He played his part well, as did Letty. "Have they really? How very nice."

"Isn't Maud sweet?" cried Letty melodiously. "She's such a dear. Does she want you to go as her guest? I expect she does."

"I don't know," said Mary, and added, "It was Mr. Pierce who suggested it first."

"I see no reason at all why you shouldn't go," said her father. "But of course you must pay your own expenses." Then, as if fearing to show too much readiness, he added, "Are you sure you feel strong enough? It would be a bore if you were taken ill."

"I'll have to risk that," said Mary.

"You'll have to get your passport seen to tomorrow. There isn't too much time. How much money do you think you'll need? A hundred pounds?"

"It seems an awful lot," said Mary.

Letty laughed. "It wouldn't last me very long in Paris." When she spoke the word "Paris," her lips formed it lovingly, her nostrils dilated as if she smelled some entrancing smell.

Nelson looked away from her. "If you need more you can send for it."

Letty could not let the subject of Paris rest. It seemed that the thought of Mary there amused and diverted her. "Well, I hope you find yourself a young man there," she said. "It won't be any fun being with

Letter from Thomas Henry Huxley, biologist, to Matthew Arnold, poet:

My dear Arnold: Look at Bishop Wilson on the sin of covetousness and then inspect your umbrella stand. You will there see a beautiful brown smooth-handled umbrella which is not your property. Think of what the excellent prelate would have advised and bring it with you next time you come to the club. The porter will take care of it for me.

Ever yours faithfully,
T. H. Huxley.

—LIFE AND LETTERS OF T. H. HUXLEY (Macmillan Company)

I'm sick and tired of 'em!

You know I complain very little, but worms make me sick and tired! Why, some mornings I haven't even felt like wagging my tail—and you know what that means!

The boys down at the corner tell me that Sergeant's SURE SHOT Capsules clean out the worms—safely, dependably, and fast. How about giving them a try?

Sergeant's also takes care of worm difficulties for pups and small dogs, weighing less than ten pounds, with Puppy Capsules. Nineteen tested, reliable dog care products are made by Sergeant's. They are available at most drug and pet stores.

• Check up on the symptoms for worms and other ailments with Sergeant's new, FREE Dog Book. It's yours for the asking at your local drug or pet store. Or write direct to Sergeant's, Richmond 20, Va.

Sergeant's

DOG CARE PRODUCTS

rough on roaches!

PESTROY DDT

TRADE MARK REG.

KILLS: ROACHES, BEDBUGS, MOTHS, FLEAS, LICE, SILVERFISH, GNATS, TICKS, WASPS, CRICKETS, ANTS, FLIES, MOSQUITOES, MANY OTHER INSECTS

SAFE, SURE!

69¢ PINT Liquid Coating

39¢ 3 OZ. Activated Powder

LONG LASTING!

PRODUCTS OF SHERWIN-WILLIAMS RESEARCH

NAME

ADDRESS

CITY

Maud and Lowell all the time. She'd take the romance out of anything."

Mary, looking back at her silently, thought, What happiness it will be not to hear that voice any longer, never again to hear talk of "romance" from someone who is as hard as the diamond on her hand.

"But get a rich one," Letty went on. "A poor one is no good in Paris. Best of all, try and find a rich, old one. Every girl ought to have a rich old adorer before she marries, a real homme du monde."

Nelson interrupted, and there was a slight harshness in his voice. "I'm afraid I never gave you that opportunity, unless you were more precocious than I think you were."

"No, darling, you came too soon," said Letty. She looked at him sweetly, rounding her lips, and added, "But I was lucky. I got an homme du monde and everything else I wanted besides."

Mary spoke to hide her unease, her embarrassment. "Maud says we might go to the coast of Brittany for a few days."

"Good," said Nelson, as Shaw came in to announce dinner, "though I'm afraid it will be too cold to bathe."

"Make her take you to Dinard," said Letty as she got up. "Do you remember, darling, we nearly went there on our honeymoon?"

She threw something into the word that made Mary look away from her. She conjured up moments of passion; her voice was cadenced with love. Why must she be always acting? she wondered. Is it because she has so much to hide? And then she thought, Only six more days and nights here.

AFTER dinner, while Letty was writing a letter in her boudoir, Nelson and Mary went into the library together. Father and daughter sat down a little uncomfortably. Mary was seldom alone with him and did not know what to talk about when she was.

After a little silence he said, "I'm glad you've decided to go to Paris with Maud Cotter. Have as good a time as you can."

"I sometimes wonder," Mary said, "if I know how. I don't believe I do."

He looked at her with a puzzled frown. "What do you mean?"

"Well," she said, "what is a good time? How does one go about getting it? I really don't think I know."

With a slight irritation he said, "What I mean is, I hope you won't have a dull time."

"Oh," she said, "I'm sure it won't be dull. It would be my own fault if it was."

"I have a very high opinion of Maud Cotter," he said. "I hardly know Pierce, of course. He seems to me quite ineffectual."

"He's rather like me," said Mary.

Before he could reply Letty came downstairs and into the room. "Darling," she said, "I've had such a good idea. Why shouldn't you and I go to Paris while Maud's there? Just from Thursday to Tuesday, say. Couldn't we, darling? If there's a war, it may be our last chance."

"I don't know," he said. "I'm very busy just now. I don't see how it's possible."

"I don't mean just now. I mean a little later."

"Well, we'll see."

Mary guessed that he would do what Letty asked. In their different ways and for their different purposes, they knew how to gain concessions from each other. The fear that was forever at the back of Nelson's mind, a fear that Mary had only recently guessed at, since suffering had sharpened her eyes, would incline him to give Letty her way in this, as in other things.

Then, she thought, I must do what I have to do before they come, and felt a little hurried, a little breathless and pressed for time. Her French, thanks to Mlle. Drieux and the years in Switzerland, was excellent. She might become a music teacher in some provincial town, or a teacher of English; or she might be a companion. Her aims were modest: work to do, a place to sleep, money enough to enable her to live, however frugally. Why want anything more? To want more was to court disappointment. She would know how to keep her wants in check now, down to the minimum.

"I made the bride mad... but"

"Out, little pip squeak! I may be a bride, but I'm a good housekeeper ...and you've got some nerve to say I've got sewer germs in my sink drain!"

"But, Kay—it's true! We learned it in home economics class. Sewer germs* breed in every sink drain, just 2 inches from where you wash food!"

*Survey Molnar Laboratories

"Scrubbing can't drive off sewer germs. It takes Drāno!

"That's why I brought you some! Drāno boils the filthy things out. Makes your sink really sanitary—and safe."

AND Drāno OPENS CLOGGED DRAINS, TOO!

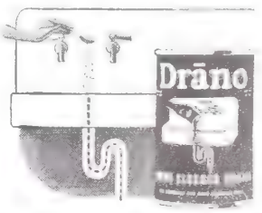
Don't take health chances! Don't let your drains clog up or breed sewer germs. Use Drāno regularly. Keep drains free-running—sanitary.

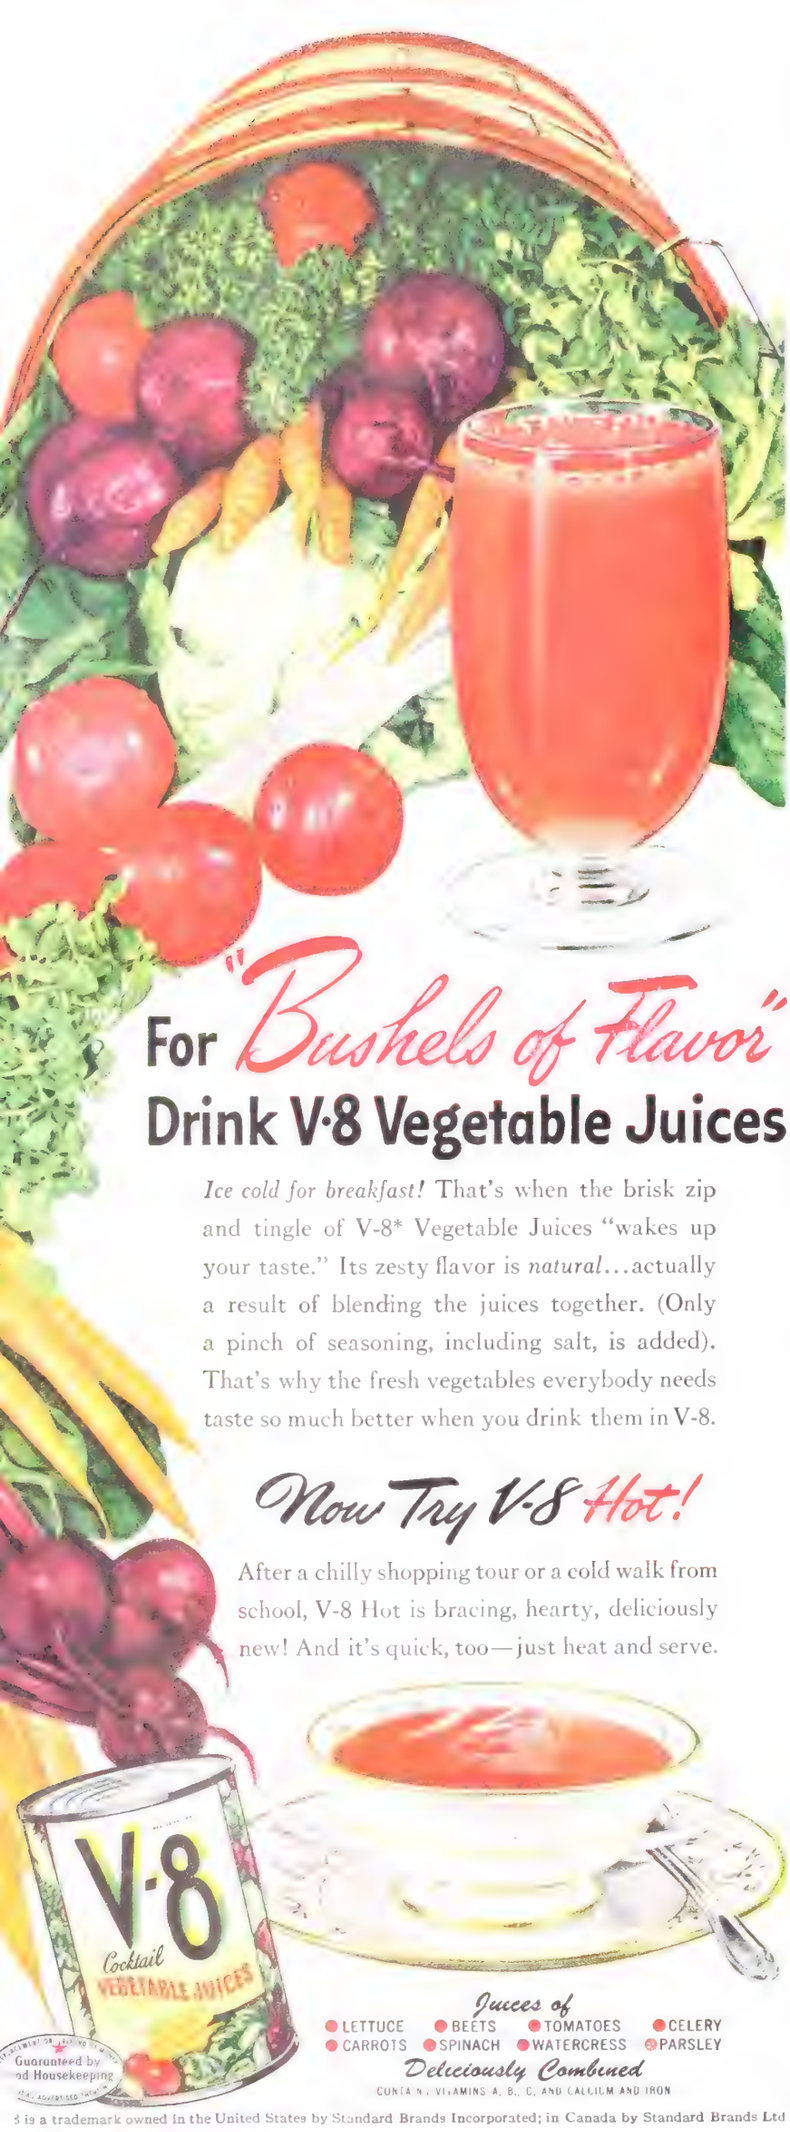
Never over 25¢ at grocery, drug, and hardware stores.

Drāno

T. M. Reg. U. S. Pat. Off. by The Drackett Co.



Drāno MAKES SEPTIC TANKS WORK BETTER—CUTS DOWN ODORS



For "Bushels of Flavor"
Drink V-8 Vegetable Juices

Ice cold for breakfast! That's when the brisk zip and tingle of V-8* Vegetable Juices "wakes up your taste." Its zesty flavor is natural...actually a result of blending the juices together. (Only a pinch of seasoning, including salt, is added). That's why the fresh vegetables everybody needs taste so much better when you drink them in V-8.

Now Try V-8 Hot!

After a chilly shopping tour or a cold walk from school, V-8 Hot is bracing, hearty, deliciously new! And it's quick, too—just heat and serve.

Juices of
LETTUCE · BEETS · TOMATOES · CELERY
CARROTS · SPINACH · WATERCRESS · PARSLEY
Deliciously Combined
CONTAINS VITAMINS A, B, C, AND CALCIUM AND IRON

* is a trademark owned in the United States by Standard Brands Incorporated; in Canada by Standard Brands Ltd

The dinner party for Maud and Lowell was like all Letty's dinner parties. The food, drink, service, flower decorations were lavish, and of the best quality. Letty told Lowell, as they stood by the fireplace in the drawing room, waiting for other guests to arrive, that she had asked only people whose hospitality she was obliged to repay.

"They're all low-brows," she said, with her disarming little air of defiance and pride, "so don't expect anything else. We don't know any high-brows. Nelson wouldn't like them and I wouldn't know what to talk to them about."

"My own brow," Lowell said, "has been getting gradually lower and lower, till I sometimes wonder where it's going to end. I just don't want to talk to anybody who makes demands on my intelligence. I want to be amused, soothed and comforted."

"Well, thank God I put you next to Selma, then. She can do all those things for you, and carry on a flirtation with some man across the room at the same time. Her husband's one of the richest men in Sweden."

"Is she beautiful, or is she clever?" Lowell asked. He wondered how early he and Maud would be able to get away.

"She's certainly beautiful. You'll know better than I would whether she's clever."

He asked who else was coming.

"Lord and Lady Cuxhaven. Over sixty and desperately dull, but their son's just become one of Nelson's partners." She gave her pretty, fierce little laugh. "It cost them a lot too. Then there's Sir Godfrey Widdemer. He's the man who wants Nelson to go into Parliament. His wife's very deaf. However, I'll see that you don't have to talk to her. Then there are two people who are about to get a divorce, and she says this will be their last meal together. They're the Hammersleys, the Gideon Hammersleys. There's a young man from the office for Mary. Quite harmless, and useful as a fill-in." She looked toward the door with a little frown. "Where on earth is she? She's always late. Thank God she isn't my daughter." She added warmly, "It's so good of you and Maud to take her to Paris with you. I can't tell you how grateful we are."

"We like her," said Lowell.

"It's just like Maud, she's such an angel, and she knows perfectly well how difficult Mary is. I don't know how long you want her to stay, but Nelson and I will probably be coming over to Paris in a few weeks, and we can take her off your hands then."

"I don't know what arrangements Maudie's made," he said, "but I guess Mary can stay with us as long as she likes."

"Well, you're perfect angels," she said. "Both of you."

"Tell me some more about the Hammersleys," he asked hopefully. "There seems to be a good story there."

But before she could reply they were announced: a tall, sleek, horsy-looking pair who seemed to Lowell so perfectly matched that he wondered how they could hope to find more suitable partners. Splendidly null, he thought, and if they were a foretaste of what was to come he heartily wished himself comfortably in bed with a novel. As the other guests arrived he made the discovery that none of them appeared to be at all interested in any of the others. They were there to eat a good dinner—possibly to avoid the greater boredom of dining at home. This was all there was or would be: nullity.

Even the arrival of the Swedish couple failed to improve matters. She was certainly lovely, but she, too, was merely walking through a dull part that she had played too many times before, and at dinner she chiefly quoted her husband's views about the international situation.

He watched Letty, and was mildly entertained by her somewhat exaggerated charm. Every inch of her a hostess, he thought. And behind that pretty, affected manner she's bored crazy with the whole thing. The only real people here are Mary, Maudie, the deaf woman, and my humble self. Maybe Nelson's real, but I have my doubts. Poor Mary, what a home to grow up in!

After dinner he went straight to the deaf woman, Lady Widdemer, and she smiled at him and placed her little amplifying box on the table between them. He found her very good company, and when Letty came and proposed that he should go and talk to Mrs. Hammersley he said, "My dear Letty, I'm going to stay right where I am. I'm old enough to do as I please."

He had a few words with Mary just as they were leaving.

"Are you all packed and ready?" he asked.

Her face, which had shown little animation during the evening, lit up at once. "I'm so ready," she said, "that I could go tonight—this minute, in fact."

He patted her shoulder. "Have a good night's sleep."

When they had all gone Letty suddenly discovered that she was in a temper. It came on her just as the door closed on the last guest. It had been a ghastly evening, she said. She'd caught Maud yawning twice, and she didn't blame her. As for Mary, she said, turning upon the tired girl, she'd behaved like an unwilling guest instead of the daughter of the house. Mary stood mutely, having nothing to say in her own defense.

"Never mind, never mind," said Nelson, putting out his cigar. "It went as well as most of these things do, I suppose. I don't see what Mary could have done."

"She might open her mouth now and again," snapped Letty. She had observed Mary's pallor, but it only irritated her still further. "I suppose the truth is," she said, "that I'm bored to death myself. I'm bored with living in London. We ought to travel more."

Nelson was silent, with a heavy, portentous silence. Then he turned to Mary. "You'd better go to bed, Mary. You have to make an early start tomorrow."

Mary felt a sudden impulse of pity for the big, solid man with the too black hair. "I'll see you at breakfast, won't I?" she asked. He said that she would.

"I definitely shall not come down," said Letty. "Shaw will get you a taxi and see you off. I hope you'll have a good time. We'll probably see you over there. Good night." She turned her cheek toward Mary, and Mary, after a second's agonized hesitation, touched it with her own cheek.

When she had gone, Letty said, "Well, thank God she'll be out of the house for a few weeks. I've stood about all I can stand. She's as nearly rude to me as she dares to be most of the time."

"I've never noticed any rudeness," Nelson said. "You imagine it. And listen to me, Letty. I will not have you saying you're bored either when we're alone, or in front of other people. You have everything in the world you want: a fine house, plenty of servants, plenty of pretty clothes, plenty of money. Don't let me hear you speak like that again."

She saw that he was really angry and deeply hurt, and was annoyed with herself for letting the situation get so far out of hand. She said contritely, "I'm sorry, darling. I didn't mean what I said. Forgive me." She went toward him with her hands held out and her head tilted supplicatingly.

"You did mean it," he said, and turned his head away from her.

She halted and looked reproachful. "Darling, I swear I didn't. Sometimes I wish we knew more amusing people, but I expect that's my fault."

"Certainly it is," he said. "That's up to you, that's your affair. We're ordinary, well-to-do, middle-class people, and I personally don't want to be anything else."

(Continued on Page 63)

> I like people who can do things. When Edward and I struggled in vain to drag our big calf into the barn, the Irish girl put her finger into the calf's mouth, and led her in directly.
>
> From The Heart of Emerson's Journals: Edited by Bliss Perry (Houghton Mifflin Company).

What's for dinner, Duchess?

Prediction: The new wives of 1947 are going to have more fun in the kitchen.

Previous cooking experience is desirable, perhaps, but not essential. There are so many new easy-to-use foods, so many new ways to prepare foods, so many interesting ways to serve foods, cooking will be a novel and exciting adventure.

Further prediction: Cheese dishes will be featured more often on their menus. They'll know that cheese gives tastiness and variety to meals. And cheese, like milk (nature's most nearly perfect food), is rich in protein, calcium, phosphorus, in vitamins A and G.

Yes, we have a personal interest in cheese. For Kraft, pioneer in cheese, is a unit of National Dairy. And what we've said about housewives using more cheese is entirely true.

It's also true that they're learning more about the whys and wherefores of food each year – just as the scientists in our laboratories are learning more about better ways to process, improve and supply it.

These men are backed by the resources of a great organization. They explore every field of dairy products, discover new ones. And the health of America benefits constantly by this National Dairy research.

Dedicated to the wider use and better understanding of dairy products as human food . . . as a base for the development of new products and materials . . . as a source of health and enduring progress on the farms and in the towns and cities of America.

Kraft · Sealtest · Breyers

NATIONAL DAIRY
PRODUCTS CORPORATION
AND AFFILIATED COMPANIES

Pledged to peerless quality

FOR OVER 50 YEARS

Top buttered, toasted English muffins with creamed, hard-cooked eggs. Serve with Swift's Premium Bacon and jelly.

A SWIFT QUALITY FOOD

Only Swift's Premium Bacon gives you that famous sweet smoke taste, that unvarying perfection. Look for the name on the package; ask for Swift's Premium Bacon.

Traditional, in the making of Swift's nium Bacon, is the pledge to maintain quality. No matter what the temptation, standards are never lowered . . . Swift's Premium always the finest of the fine. This refusal to compromise with quality has won a gh reward. No other bacon approaches Swift's Premium in popularity. r after year, still more millions say they like it better than any other kind.

Swift's Premium Bacon

WITH THE SWEET SMOKE TASTE

(Continued from Page 31)

"Well, don't make it sound so fantastically dull!" she pleaded.

He looked up angrily. "Now look here, Letty, I've had about enough of this nonsense. If you want a different sort of life you'll have to go elsewhere for it. You won't get it with me."

"Sweetheart," she protested gaily, "I'm not thinking of leaving you. I only said, 'Don't make it sound so dull.' I'm not conscious of belonging to any particular class, lower, middle or upper. I'm just Letty Hallam, and I like being Letty Hallam." She broke off to say, in a low, prettily modulated voice, "Quite honestly, darling, between you and me, I shall be happier when you've gone into politics."

"I may not stand," he said. "And if I do stand I may not get in. Elections are tricky."

"I'm quite sure you'll get in," she said. "I'm really rather thrilled about it."

His face was still dark, gloomy. "I thought you were sufficiently fond of me to like being my wife, no matter what career I chose. I suppose you'll like me better as a Conservative M.P. than as a mere businessman."

"Darling, there's nothing mere about you," she said, with a laugh. "That's just absurd."

He got up from the chair and put his arms around her. "Letty, you do worry me. Sometimes I wonder if you love me at all. No one else seems to matter—not even the children—compared with you."

"But, sweetheart, I feel the same way. We must never quarrel. It's so silly. I do love you, you know, in my own undemonstrative fashion. I wish I were different, for your sake, but there it is; I'm not."

"I like you as you are," he said, and added, with a smile that was almost a grimace, "or as I think you are."

She rubbed her cheek against his. "Well, if you don't know me by now, darling, you never will."

He kissed her. "You'll be happier with Mary out of the house for a bit. I know you and she haven't much in common. I do wish she'd marry."

"Perhaps she'll pick up someone in Paris You never know."

They went slowly up the stairs.

Paris was being swept by wind and rain when they arrived, and Mary was glad. The dripping trees, the flapping awnings, the scurrying crowds, clinging to their umbrellas, suited her mood. They reached the hotel wet from the brief crossing of the pavement from cab to doorway.

Their rooms were all on the same floor, and it was not long before Maud discovered that book- had taken up a large amount of space in Mary's luggage. She had arranged a row of them on her mantelpiece and another row on a table. The majority, she noted, were books of poetry: Blake, Donne, Milton, Gerald Manley Hopkins, Housman. Well, she thought, I know more about her than I did before. But why did she bring so many books, as if she were going to a desert island!

Maud spent the day after their arriva getting in touch with friends and making ap pointments with art dealers. Her engage ment book soon showed many entries.

On the third day she said to Mary, "Com and help me buy a hat. You'd better bu one too. You'll need one of those amusin little affairs made up of flowers and a bit tulle. And I've got my eye on an afternoo dress for you, as well."

The girl made no objections. To be told t buy clothes by Maud was not the same as be ing told by Letty. She went with her an even allowed Lowell to make her a few sma presents—a new handbag, some bits of cos tume jewelry, a scarf or two. Maud an Lowell made acquiescence easy, and Mar took pleasure in the relationship betwee them, in their friendship and in their bante

Among Maud's acquaintances was a cer tain French Jewess named Mme. Levy Legasse. She lived in the Place des Vosges, i a large apartment overflowing with furnitur and pictures. She was an ugly old woma now, covered with loose, pendulous flesh, an her great coffee-colored eyes were made trag by the semicircular bags that hung beneat them. Her collection of pictures was famou

They're still Hungry!

GREEK War Relief Association provides warm noonday meals for more than a million children in war-ravaged Greece. The lives of these children depend on this meal—often their only meal of the day. But to continue feeding these children, Greek War Relief must raise $12,000,000. The funds will also enable relief workers to care for the 375,000 war orphans who are completely without food, clothing or shelter, and to take primary health measures needed to ward off epidemics among an ill-fed, ill-clothed, ill-housed population. Contributions to Greek War Relief should be sent to 221 West 57th Street, New York 19, New York.

ed Lotion

-in-1

KURY LANOLIN

ds tells you oftening and helps "glove"

ness, redness,
r cold, daily
ter cleansing.

h. Creamy.
fter elbows,
50c. Or try onfident we

Free! MAIL COUPON for purse-size gift bottle. Let the lovely things Woodbury Lotion does for your hands convince you there has never before been a lotion like it.

Box 45, Cincinnati 14, Ohio, Dept. 500

Woodbury Beauty-Blended Lotion sounds exciting. I'd love to try it. Please send me a FREE purse-size gift bottle.

Name_____

Street_____

City_____ State_____

(Print name and address plainly . . . Sorry, offer good in U.S.A. only.)
Paste on penny postcard if you wish.

SOAP AND OTHER WOODBURY AIDS TO LOVELINESS

I like any Color as long as it's Green

Feast your eyes on these jade beauties and see what Dundee has to offer in your favorite color. The newest, smartest variations of that happy shade in patterns tailored or decorative—to make your bath your sort of room in the color you like best . . . DUNDEE MILLS, Inc., Griffin, Ga.

Showrooms: 40 Worth Street, N. Y. C.

No. 1 in Dundee's "Cotton Ball" Fashion Show of Favored Colors

Dundee

THE NAME TO REMEMBER WHEN BUYING TOWELS — At Better Stores Everywhere

(Continued from Page 64)

"Well, then," she said.

"Because I like you better than anyone in the world and always will, it doesn't mean that I wouldn't like a gossip with Mrs. Brewster about Bill Warrinder and Cathy."

"All right," she said, and turned to the door again. "Go right ahead, both of you. I can always move to another hotel."

"You're crazy," he said.

"Well, we'll leave it at that." She opened the door and then shut it softly behind her. She heard him call out, "Maudie!" but she didn't go back. She went on down to dinner. Her heart was beating as if it were a tightly stretched drum with an erratic drummer inside it. Blast Janet Brewster, she said to herself. Why can't I be indifferent to her? She was always there. Why can't I come to terms with my conscience about her? I don't even know that I ever did her any harm.

M. Karsky continued to show them attentions. To Maud he frankly admitted his interest in her young friend, and asked a great many questions about her. He had never met, he said, a young woman in the least like her: so undeveloped, with so much potential yet unrealized charm.

"She needs to be given confidence," he said. "Confidence in herself as a woman. She requires to be given a picture of herself that is not displeasing to her. Only we others can do that. After all, it is what we live by, this picture that others make for us."

MAUD wished him twenty-five years younger, for she thought it might be a long time before Mary found another such understanding admirer. At the same time, she fulfilled her duties as chaperon conscientiously, for she guessed that he was a man of many amorous affairs.

"I suppose you know what you're doing," Lowell grumbled to her one day, "letting him see so much of Mary. He's got an eye for the girls."

"What makes you think Mary would stand any nonsense from him?"

"She just wouldn't know."

He also thought it advisable to drop a hint to Mary. "I wish you knew some young people here," he said. "It can't be fun for you, seeing so much of a man Karsky's age."

"Oh," she said, "I like him. He knows such a lot and I can just sit and listen to him."

"Well," he said dubiously, "I suppose he's all right, and not just a rich old libertine."

She gave him a quick, surprised look. "What makes you say that?"

"He might be, mightn't he?"

"I don't know. He's awfully kind. I can't think why he goes to all this trouble."

"Don't be so darned humble. How do you know it isn't just to please himself?"

She shook her head. "You can't make me believe he has any special interest in me."

"Look," he said, "what's wrong with you? You're young, aren't you? And you get better-looking every day."

She gave a little laugh. "I'm afraid it isn't much use trying to build up my self-esteem."

"You're crazy. Don't you ever look in the glass?"

"Yes. And I see a sick-looking girl who isn't any good to herself or anyone else."

"You're getting morbid," he protested.

"No," she said, "I don't think I'm morbid. It's just that I can't deceive myself."

Before he could make any comment, Maud arrived and said, "Come along or we'll be late for lunch." And as they drove out to the Bois to meet M. Karsky, Lowell thought, I wish she'd snap out of it. I suppose Karsky's good for her, so I'd better not say any more. But he felt uneasy.

As usual, at lunch Karsky overflowed with talk, plans, suggestions and good stories. Afterward he took them for a walk in the Bois, where the beauty of the day, and the gay children who ran about under the trees, delighted Mary. But her delight was mixed with self-reproaches. What was she doing here? Where did this lead? Nowhere that she could see. Why was she undecided, making no plans, her future as unresolved as ever it had been, and what plans could she make? She would have liked to question M. Karsky, but she was never alone with him

'Round-the-Clock Comfort

"Individually Yours" by Dutchess

Whether it's golf in the morning ... afternoon shopping ... or cocktails and the theater at night... Dutchess rayon-knit Tites solve that "what-lingerie-to-wear?" problem. Under slacks, dresses, or the sheerest evening gowns ... they're light, sleek, comfortable as nothing at all. Available in two lengths ... to fit every figure ... every activity.

At leading stores

DUTCHESS UNDERWEAR CORP.
Empire State Bldg., New York 1, N. Y.

Dutchess TITES

Need a new hair do?

You'll find beauty shops

OR

umbrellas

...or grocers

...or bakers

...taxicabs and

just about everything

you might need...

quickly and easily when you...

Use the YELLOW PAGES of your Telephone Directory make such an opportunity.

Then there came upon the little party two events, and on the same evening. Maud was asked to a large soiree given by a famous picture dealer. Lowell declined to accompany her. He had recently been to a new heart specialist who had examined him carefully and said that there was a fairly rapid deterioration and hardening of the left ventricle and that he must take great care to put no undue strain on the heart. Plenty of sleep, plenty of rest; these were imperatives. Maud must go alone, he was going to have dinner in bed.

Maud's engagement and Lowell's decision to spend the evening in bed interfered with M. Karsky's plans. His elder daughter and her husband were dining with him that night at a very special restaurant known, he said, to few foreigners, where there was the best chef in Europe, and he wanted Maud, Mary and Lowell to join them. On hearing that only Mary was available he asked if she might be permitted to come. Mary asked Maud's advice and Maud said, "I don't see why you shouldn't go. I believe the elder daughter is very nice." Mary hesitated, half inclined to stay at home and read. In the end she decided to go.

M. Karsky called for her in his car. His broad, healthy Slavic face with its smiling lines looked more than usually fresh. He smelled of lavender water. In the car he looked at her and swept his mustache upward, to the left and the right. She was wearing a printed silk afternoon dress that Maud had persuaded her to buy. With it she wore new long suède gloves, and she had put some perfume that Lowell had given her on her handkerchief. She was not wearing a hat, and her hair, which had been washed and set that day, framed her face in dark and glossy abundance. She had put a little rouge on her cheeks and a little red on her lips.

> Winter is what you think isn't so bad in the summer, and vice versa. —RICHARD ARMOUR.

"My dear child," he said, "you look charming this evening. You should really take more trouble with yourself, for when you do the effect is ravishing."

She smiled. "You mustn't flatter me. I'm not used to it and it goes to my head."

"Please," he said, and his rather prominent blue eyes had reproach in them, "do not use that word. I have not spoken to you one insincere word. With you, I can be myself. I hope that with me you will feel that you can be yourself. That is the true basis of friendship."

They presently reached the restaurant and went in.

M. Karsky pointed out some pictures to her in the entrance hall. "These will amuse you," he said. They were clever caricatures of famous persons, and her eye was drawn to one of Edward VII alighting from a carriage, resplendent in white waistcoat and gray topper, with a flower in his buttonhole.

While she was looking at it, M. Karsky sent for the headwaiter, who hurried out to greet them with expressions of esteem and delight. He believed that the dinner would exceed anything M. Karsky had ever had there before. It had received his earnest attention and his highest endeavors. M. Karsky turned to Mary and said, "Come, my dear," and she followed him, with the headwaiter in the lead, up a red-carpeted staircase and along a corridor where a door was thrown open for them. Mary, a little wonderingly, saw that it was a small room with a table in it set for four.

"You will of course wish to wait for monsieur and madame," the headwaiter said. "As soon as they arrive, dinner will be served. Is there anything monsieur would like in the meanwhile?"

M. Karsky waved away any suggestion of cocktails, of which he strongly disapproved, and the headwaiter left them.

(Continued on Page 69)

The biggest news in bathrooms since Grandma put in a tub...

fabulously lovely Krene plastic shower curtains!

"STRIPES AND FLOWERS" shown here, in four fast colors against white. Trim, printed of fine mull. Shower curtain and ready-to-use curtains

SO GORGEOUS you'll wish you could wear them! "Krene" shower curtains are almost too beautiful for plain old-fashioned bathing... you'll want to fly them out the front window ...make your friends purr with envy. Choose from dazzling colors – there's a perfect "Krene" brand curtain for your bathroom.

SO QUICK-DRYING you won't believe Junior even bathed! No more soggy curtains flapping about like a large wet bird. "Krene" waterproof shower curtains absorb no moisture!

SO RUGGED—Junior can swing on them. "Krene" shower curtain fabric can support the full weight of a grown man. The welded seams are stronger than the fabric itself!

SO SPOT-RESISTANT, a quick wipe cleans most spots easily. To launder (seldom needed), simply swish in warm suds. No ironing.

• Won't rot, crack, peel, mildew, or stick together!

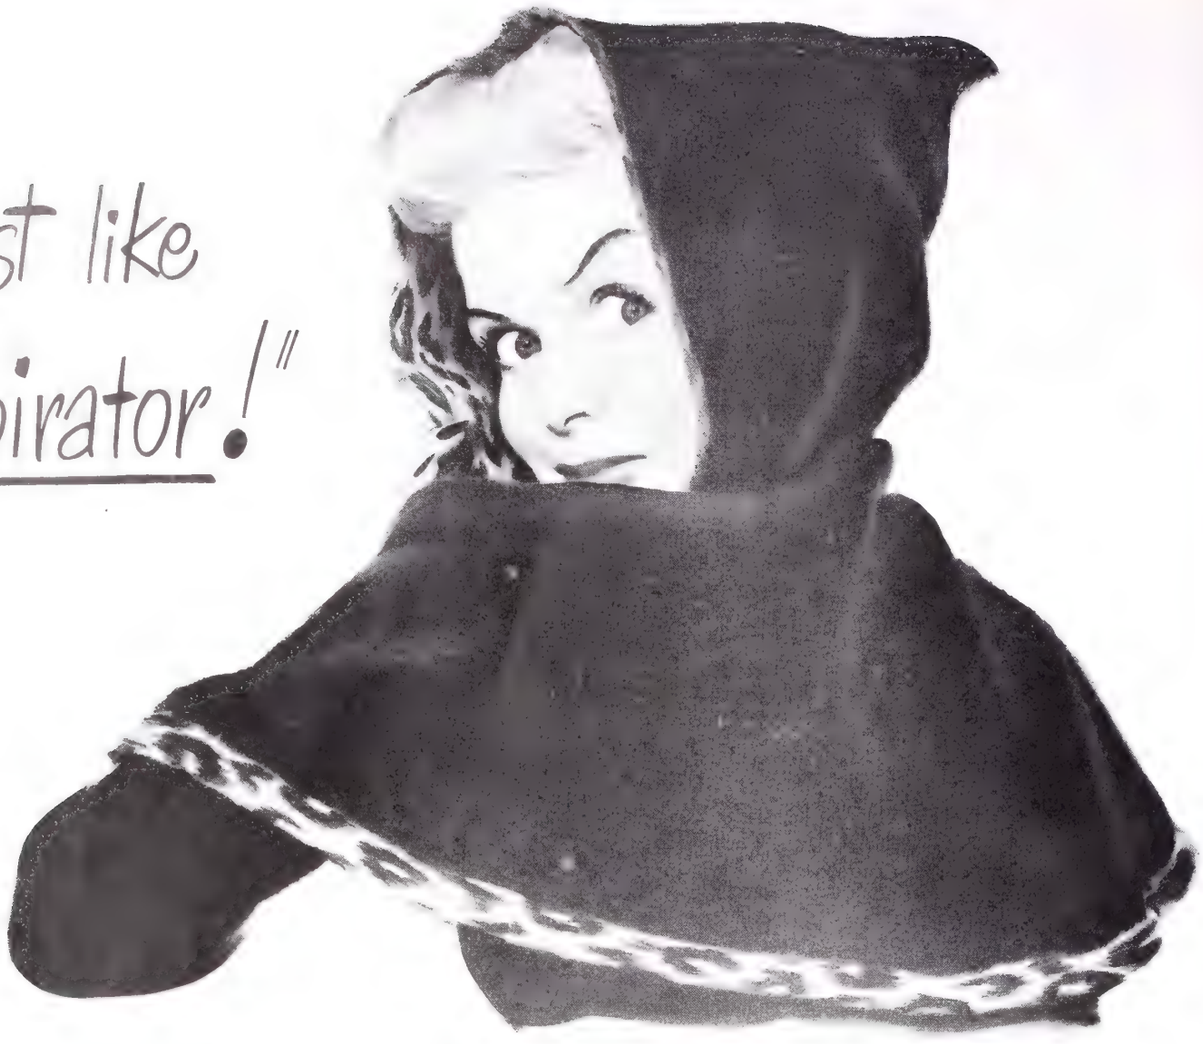
IN PLASTIC PRODUCTS "Krene" is Queen!

"Krene" is a registered trade-mark of
NATIONAL CARBON COMPANY, INC.
30 East 42nd St., New York 17, N. Y.
Unit of Union Carbide and Carbon Corp.
UCC

In Canada—Canadian National Carbon Co., Ltd.

"I felt just like a conspirator!"



1.

Living under the same roof with Sue, my sister-in-law, made it hard to stage the surprise party I'd planned for her second (or Cotton) anniversary. I had to use my best conspirator tactics: low-voiced phone calls to guests; subtle conversation aimed at finding out what she'd like for a gift!

2.

When my best efforts drew no clue, I buttonholed my brother. "Well," he said, "Sue's mentioned that she wished we could afford swell sheets like yours. . . ." "Ha!" I broke in. "Those, pet, are Cannon Percale Sheets. And you'd be surprised—they cost just a bit more than best-grade muslins. That's my present!"

3.

I lured Sue for a walk while guests gathered, then led her in. Surprised? Oh, my! "How'd you know I've had a longing eye on your lovely Cannon Percale Sheets?" she marvelled. "Who wouldn't!" I said. "Every gal with a luxury-loving soul adores Cannon Percales!"

4.

When the party broke up, I helped Sue make the beds with her new Cannon Percale Sheets. "Aren't they light weight!" she exclaimed. "The easier to wash," I said. "They're so finely woven they've got 25% more threads than best-grade muslins. And later," I finished, "you'll thank me for the way they wear!"

TRADE MARK
CANNON

Cannon Percale Sheets

Cannon Towels • Stockings • Blankets ★ CANNON MILLS, INC., NEW YORK 13, N. Y.

Copr. 1947, Cannon Mills, Inc.

P. S. Another real Cannon value: Cannon Muslin Sheets. Woven of sturdy American cotton; well-made, long-wearing!

(Continued from Page 67)

"Whenever I dine here," M. Karsky explained to Mary, "I dine like this. Below in the restaurant it is hot and crowded. This is what I like: privacy and quiet, and a perfect meal perfectly served." He glanced at his watch. "They should be here very soon. Let me take your gloves and bag."

He took them from her and laid them on the sofa, a handsome piece of Empire furniture with curved ends, and covered in worn red silk. There was a large gilt mirror on one of the walls, and nothing else in the room except the dining table and the four chairs.

"Sit here, my child," he said, and drew out a chair for her, seating himself opposite. "I hope you will like my daughter, Antoinette. My son-in-law, André, as you will presently see, is enormously stout, but the best-natured fellow in the world."

"You're so kind to me," Mary said. "I shall be really sorry to leave Paris."

"But you must not talk of leaving Paris." She said, wishing that she could tell him the truth, "My father and stepmother will be coming soon and they will want to take me home with them."

"They must let you stay longer," he said. "Or they should take you to the sea for a few days, to Normandy or Brittany perhaps. When my daughters were children, my wife and I took a villa each summer on the Normandy coast. I would enjoy showing you that part of France." He looked intently at her, then consulted his watch. "Our companions are late. That is not like my Antoinette. She is never late."

He had hardly spoken when a waiter came in and said, "A telephone message has just come from Mme. la Marquise, monsieur. She wishes me to tell you that it will be impossible for her or M. le Marquis to dine with you tonight. M. le Marquis is feeling very unwell, with an attack of asthma, and the doctor has been sent for. She wishes me to convey to you her apologies and regrets."

"What a pity!" M. Karsky cried. "What a great pity! That poor André! It happens too often that he has these attacks. It is because he takes no exercise." He said to the waiter, "Now there is no one to wait for. You may serve dinner at once."

MARY murmured some words of regret, but inwardly felt that they would get on quite well without the daughter and son-in-law, whose arrival she had been anticipating with some dread. She wondered what Maud would say to her dining alone with M. Karsky. But the dinner, M. Karsky's charm and bonhomie and the wines, to which she was unaccustomed, soon wiped out this apprehension. She was inclined, she thought, to be prudish; she must not be so silly as to see a pitfall where none was intended.

A sole with a superb sauce followed the pâté, and he persuaded her to drink a good deal of the light, dry white wine that was served with it, though she said she thought she had better wait for the Burgundy. "One does not refuse the spring," he said gaily, filling up her glass. "because the summer is coming." Then came a duck, marvelously cooked, and the bottle of Burgundy. "It will do you no harm," he told her. "It is a magnificent wine."

HE had been telling her some anecdotes about the buying of his famous porcelains. He told stories well, without too much detail, with the right amount of exaggeration, and with a good deal of humor. She was not bored, and she guessed that he was pleased to find her such a willing listener.

At the end of one of his tales he suddenly took up her right hand and raised it to his lips. "That poor little hand," he murmured. "It is what first attracted me to you. Tell me, child, how good a pianist were you?"

Very conscious of the touch of his lips and mustache, she dropped her hand in her lap and said, "If my health had allowed me to continue, I think I could have become a fairly successful concert pianist. That is what my teacher believed."

"And you would not have married?"

"I don't know. I didn't think about it in those days. I was too much occupied with my music."

"And now?"

"Even now I don't think about it. There's no one I want to marry."

He moved his chair a little nearer hers. "But now tell me; you say you are nearly twenty-four. Surely you cannot have reached this great age without meeting someone you felt you could love. That would be most unusual; almost, I would say, abnormal. And I am sure you are not in any way abnormal."

She said quickly, before she could rehearse and then suppress the answer, "I did love someone once, but he didn't love me."

"Ah," he said. "That is better. I am happy to hear it. As for him, if he did not love you, he was not the right man for you. Forget him, and remember only the pleasure of loving."

"The pleasure was so brief," she said, "and now it seems to have been all pain."

He made a gesture. "The pain will go. It is natural to youth. You are the better for it; the better as a woman."

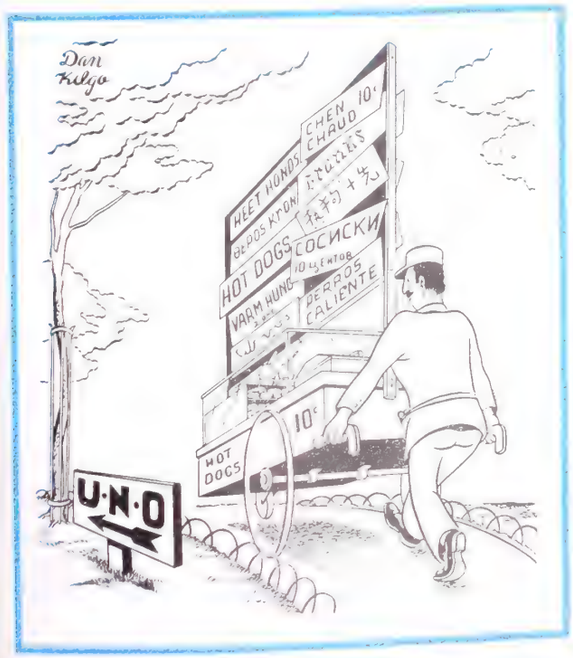
As he spoke she felt the pressure of his knee against hers. A sharp distress and dread broke in upon her, and she contrived to change her position a little. Could he be that sort of man? The kiss on her hand, the touch of his knee—could it mean that? What should she do? She must ignore it, pretend it hadn't happened, go on talking as if everything were as it had been. But it was he who went on talking. He talked about the happiness to be derived from loving and being loved. There was no joy in the world equal to it, he told her.

Then once again she felt the pressure of his knee, and her fear giving her courage, she moved her chair a little. He turned and looked at her with gaiety in his face.

"Come, my dear child, I shall not pursue you round the table. It is more agreeable to sit side by side than to sit facing each other. When you like someone very much, it is an added pleasure to be near them. Don't you agree? And I think you do like me?"

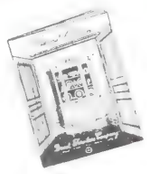
She murmured, confused, "You know I do," and longed to add, "but not when

(Continued on Page 71)



Pieces from the New Drexel Guild Group

Styled for Smarter Use of Smaller Space



Here's just the furniture for today's smart home-makers in smaller homes! Here's all the graciousness . . . all the charm . . . and all the lasting beauty you could hope for—designed especially to harmonize with cozy interiors. The smartly styled corner china illustrated here is a typical example of this friendly space-saving charm.

The companion pieces, too—the graceful table... the lyre-back chairs...the trim, handsome credenza all blend charmingly with today's smaller sized homes. There is a hutch china in this ensemble which is a china cabinet, a bookcase—and a desk, all in one!

Ask to see this and other beautiful Drexel ensembles at the leading department or furniture store in your city. All are priced right . . . styled right. Look for the Drexel brand mark.

Write today for booklets "Traditional" and "Touraine". Send 10c for each to 272 Huffman Road, Drexel, North Carolina.

by Drexel

Drexel

FURNITURE COMPANY

DREXEL • NORTH CAROLINA

Better your home... better your Living

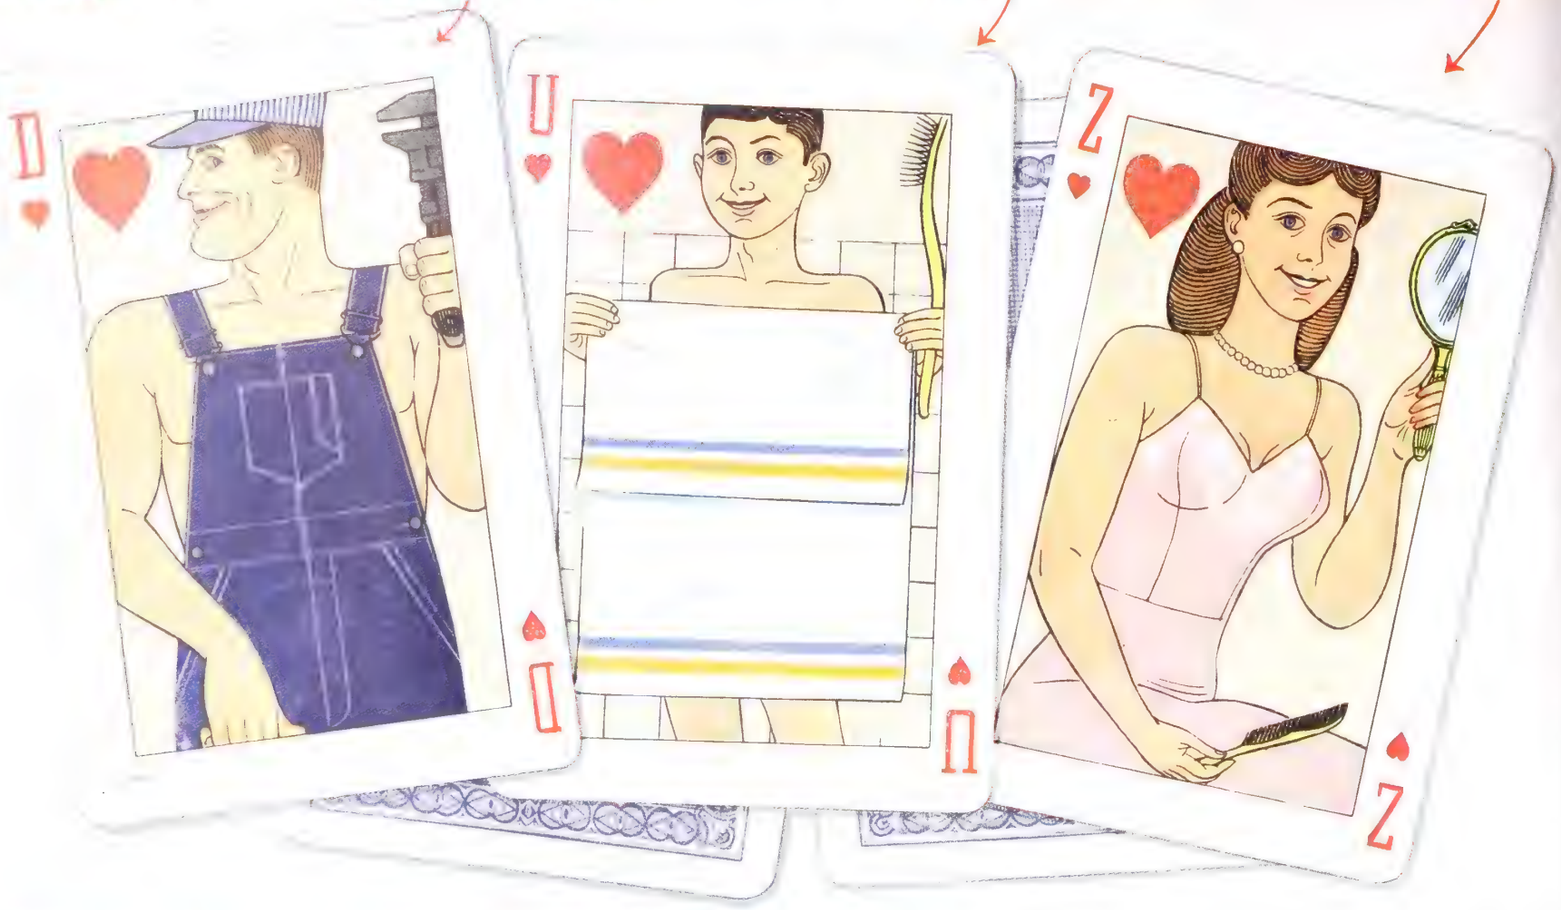
AMERICA'S LARGEST MANUFACTURER OF QUALITY BEDROOM AND DINING ROOM FURNITURE

OVERALLS – DUZ does 'em CLEAN, TOWELS – DUZ does 'em WHITE, UNDIES – DUZ does 'em SAFER



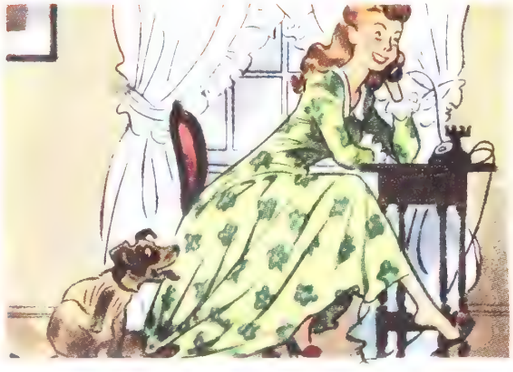
"Don't be a dummy, DUZ...you've got more than 3 tricks"

WRITES MRS. ALICE FANUCCI OF ARCHBALD, PA.

"Why talk about just towels, overalls and undies all the time? You've plenty more tricks up your sleeve! Why, everybody's wise to how Duz gets towels white as snowdrifts. And how grime comes out of dirty work clothes in a jiffy with Duz. Even the prettiest colored undies are safer with Duz than any other 'big-name' package soap you use for washday. Now, why not tell people what Duz does for all your washables?

"Isn't there a trick to washing shirts?

"Sure, there is, Duz. Specially when the collars and cuffs are grimy. But Duz eases tough grime out of the dirtiest shirts in no time. Gets them clean as a whistle.



"Haven't you heard about housecoats?

"Their gay prints are so becoming. And Duz cleans pretty housecoats—oh, so gently! Leaves all the bright washable colors alone. Lots of women would like to hear about that, Duz.

"How about DUZ-zing the bird bath?

"Ours was filled with mud and rubbish but we cleaned it with Duz. Now, it shines like new money.

"So, come on, Duz. Open up that bag of tricks and let everybody know what a real winner Duz is on washday. It just can't be beat by any other leading washday soap—for cleaning quick and washing safe!"

DUZ does Everything

—and I mean Everything!

(Continued from Page 69)

are like this," but heard the words in ind and rejected them for their crudity.
ould do nothing except sit, hoping that e ignored what she feared, it would sh. And for the first time it crossed her that perhaps the daughter and son-in-ad been put off purposely.

can't tell you," he was saying, "how y it makes me to hear you say that. For ieve you mean it. To be here with you this gives me great pleasure. Of all the ionships possible between men and en, that between a young girl and an r man seems to me the most harmonious perfect. Tell me you agree."

e said, stammering a little, that she had r thought about it; that she supposed it d be like that.

Yes," he said, "it is undoubtedly the t delightful. That between a young man an older woman can be charming, too, there is apt to be an element of doubt, of d on the woman's side. She cannot comely live in the present; she also lives in t future time when she will suffer from want of him. But with two people like selves—what is re I cannot do for
? And that rends me." He ghed almost shyly, brought out of pocket a little rocco case which put before her,
ing, "Open it, my r; I chose it with ch thought and
e."

Mary looked at the le case in a flutof fear, of self-sement, at having things reach this
s. "Oh, no!" she naged to protest.
lo, please, I don't nt to be given press. I can't possitake it."

"But open it," he isted. "You don't n know what it
" But as she shook head, "You are shy? Well then,
me. See, my dear,
is only a pretty
le. Of course, if vention did not bid, I would like give you some-ng really lovely,
lly valuable. But s pretty toy"—he de a gesture with his hand, as though it re utterly unworthy of her—"this you y accept without a thought."

was a small cluster of two flowers, with ves and a bud, the petals done in small ies, the leaves in emeralds, and all set in delicate design of platinum. She pushed e case from her, looking at him with wide, ploring eyes.

"I can't possibly, not possibly. It's ely, but I can't take it. I'm sorry. I wish u hadn't!"

"Don't distress yourself, my child." He ok up the brooch, turning it this way and at. "As I say, it is only a trifle. I picked it in a shop where I often buy things for my ughters; who would never dare" and he iled—"to treat my gifts as you have."

The waiter came in then bearing a pale, lden-brown soufflé standing high in its
sh. He flourished it forward for M. Kar-y's approval.

"Magnificent!" cried M. Karsky, rubbing s hands. "Tell M. Charles he has never ne better." And as the waiter bowed and ft them he said, turning to Mary, "Taste
, my dear. Tell me what you think of it."

She tasted it and said, "It's wonderful."

The brooch remained on the table, igored. M. Karsky began to talk again as if ere were nothing amiss, and she began to feel reassured. The coffee came, and then liqueurs, and she wondered how soon she might say that it was time to go. But Mr. Karsky picked up the brooch again, holding it to the light.

"What colors! Lovely! Come, my dear, let me see how it looks pinned into the neck of your dress. Let me fasten it there."

She felt as a bird under a net must feel, its heart beating wildly with the longing to escape. She pushed his hands away, dreading the touch of them. "No, no, please! I meant what I said. I don't want it. I won't take it."

"My dear child," he said reproachfully, gravely, as he put the brooch back in its case, "do you imagine I would ask you to do anything I thought you shouldn't do? You mustn't take so seriously what is merely the desire of a friend to show his friendship. I wish I could teach you to laugh and be happy."

He's right, she thought. I don't laugh enough. Now he's made me feel a fool. She said aloud, "Perhaps I'll learn someday. I'm dull and gauche and inexperienced. I know it. You oughtn't to trouble yourself about me." She gave him a fleeting smile that had a hint of tears in it. "I must go now. Miss Cotter will be waiting for me."

"It's early yet. She will hardly be back from her soiree. Stay a little longer."

"No," she said, "I'm sure I ought to go." She pushed back her chair, but he put an arm quickly behind her, across her shoulders.

"Tell me first that you have enjoyed the evening as much as I have. Don't shrink from me, my child." He pulled her to him so that her face touched his and she smelled the lavender water he was so fond of using. Then both his arms went round her and he drew her up out of her chair, murmuring, "You are my love, my little love. Don't you know that?"

Her mind was all darkness and confusion. She thought, It's come to this. I've let it come to this, and there seemed no way of turning back; only acquiescence.

He drew her toward the sofa, whispering, "Let us sit here, close to each other. Let me teach you to love me as I love you." She felt his kisses on hair and cheek and ear, soft, devouring little kisses.

In spite of the unaccustomed wine and her sense of being lost, hopelessly lost, some impulse remained alive in her to fight, to struggle back. She broke away from him, shamed, appalled that a man could be two men, one a kind friend, the other a marauder, snatched up her bag and darted to the door like a terrified cat.

It was not locked and she flung it wide open and raced along the corridor and down the stairs. Then through the lobby where a few people stood talking and did not look at her and out into the street. She ran until her breath gave out and she could run no more. Then, seeing a couple get out of a taxi, she hailed it and got in. And it was there, driving back to the hotel, huddled in a corner, that she made a vow to escape forever from a creature as futile, as utterly to be despised, as Mary Hallam.

Lowell ordered a small dinner to be sent up to his bedroom, then went into the writing room to see if he could find a copy of

After Snow

By ELIZABETH-ELLEN LONG

From nothing more than faded sky,
No more than grassless ground,
Have come these sudden miracles
Performed without a sound,

From nothing more than fence posts,
A score of leafless trees,
Poles strung with wire, a sagging barn,
Bare hills in twos and threes,

Have come pagodas, crystal-roofed,
Alabaster towers,
Marble columns in a row
Carved with shadow flowers,

Strange pallid mountains of the moon
Swept smooth by wind's quick wing,
And fairy forests where no bird
As yet has dared to sing.

Pearl-Wick Hampers are Self-Ventilating!

They are woven, with thousands of tiny air-vents that let fresh air circulate through soiled clothes—keeping them free of foul odors, dampness, mildew.

That's why Pearl-Wick Self-Ventilating Hampers are wanted by modern housekeepers . . . why they grace more homes than any other hamper ever made!

Be sure the hampers you buy are handsome, self-ventilating Pearl-Wick!

• DECORATOR-DESIGNED
Beautiful plastic Pearl tops. Lovely pastel colors to match bedrooms, baths, nursery, kitchen.

• FROM $5.50 TO $9.95
Upright and bench models. Hand-painted decorations. Some styles with dual inner compartments!

PEARL-WICK
SELF-VENTILATING hampers

Can you tell... which is the expensive blouse
?

Both are charming . . . both were laundered with LINIT* starch to keep them fresh, crisp, dainty.

But one cost $39.75 . . . the other $7.85. (Look below and see if you guess right.)

The point is, whether your budget is small or unlimited, anything starchable looks its best—when you use LINIT, the starch that gives the perfect finish to all fabrics. Easy directions are on every package.

It's the blouse at the top that cost $39.75

LINIT
PERFECT LAUNDRY STARCH
MAKES COTTON LOOK AND FEEL LIKE LINEN

. . . ADDS THE
"finishing touch"

LINIT is the smooth, penetrating starch that makes cotton look and feel luxurious as linen. By restoring the original finish, LINIT resists muss and soil. And irons fly—with LINIT!

The Times. There was no one in the room except a woman who was sitting at one of the writing desks. She presently finished her letter, collected her belongings and got up. Conscious of her movements, he lowered his paper and they looked at each other. He saw that it was Mrs. Brewster and that she had every intention of speaking to him.

She came nearer, a hand outstretched, and said, "It's Lowell Pierce, isn't it? I thought I couldn't be mistaken. I nearly spoke to you the other day."

"I was pretty sure you were Mrs. Brewster," he said, "although it's a long time since we met."

"Well," she said, with a sort of brittle graciousness, "I couldn't pass by a fellow Bostonian without speaking."

He drew up another chair and they sat down, both pleased by the encounter. She had a large, flat crocodile-skin bag under her arm and carried a letter in her hand. She was very plainly dressed in brown and her dark hair was streaked with gray and pinned into a small knot at the back of her neck.

"How long have you been in Paris?" she asked.

He told her they had been there nearly a month. She, it appeared, had been there longer.

"My daughter Felicity is studying French drama," she said. "She's very much interested in the Little Theater movement at home. Of course I let her choose her career. All my daughters, I'm glad to say, decided to have careers. Evelyn, you may remember, was quite successful as a painter until she married. Now she's entirely taken up with a home and a husband."

"You sound disapproving," he said, smiling.

"I'm afraid I am. Nowadays marriages are often short-lived affairs, even in Boston. Then, unless the wife has an occupation of some sort, she's apt to rush into a foolish second marriage."

"There may be something in it," he agreed. "All the same, it still seems natural and right to me that a young woman should put her home and husband first."

"Of course," she told him, coldly and brightly, "you take the masculine view."

"Well, I don't know. Perhaps I'm just old-fashioned. By the way, is it true that Cathy and Bill are going to part? I've heard rumors."

"I'm afraid it's only too true," she said, "unless they can be persuaded to change their minds. Why don't you write to them? I wish you would."

He shook his head. "I never give advice in these matters unless I'm asked, and not always then."

"Well," she said, "really I don't know what's wrong with people today. Marriage is becoming a farce. We might as well have free love and be done with it." She spoke with a bitter twist of the lips.

HE said with a rueful little laugh, "Can you think of anything that hasn't changed in our lifetime? I can't."

"Birth and death," she said, with tight lips. "That's all." She tapped her letter on the arm of her chair. "What we need is a religious revival. Nothing else will save the world."

"Do you see it coming?" he wanted to know.

"No. I don't see anything coming but war and upheavals."

"Well," he said with a sigh, "that's what I keep telling Maudie. This may be our last trip to Europe." He caught her look of inquiry. "Maud Cotter, you know. We came over at the same time."

She looked at him with a new and vivid interest. "I'd quite forgotten that you and she were old friends."

He gave a comfortable little laugh. "I can't remember a time when Maudie and I weren't old friends. It goes back a long, long way."

She seemed to come closer to him. "Then," she said, "you must know all about her—and a good deal about me."

"About you?" he asked, puzzled. "She told me you'd scarcely spoken to each other. It was after I'd said I'd seen you in the lobby."

"That's quite true," she said, and he felt vaguely, the presence of something dangerous. "But if you've known her so long and so well you must know her past history."

"I don't know just what you're referring to," he managed to say, and then added almost indignantly, "Of course I know all about her."

She gave a cold, unamused little laugh. "You're being dreadfully discreet, aren't you? But I see you do know."

He made an effort, then, to carry the thing farther; he smiled and said as if he were speaking to a child who needed to be both teased and coaxed, "You tell me what you're referring to and then I'll tell you what I know about it."

SHE looked at him and said, "You know quite well I'm referring to the affair between Maud Cotter and my husband. The miracle is that the whole of Boston didn't know. I shall never understand how they managed to keep it so secret."

A wave of pain and nausea spread all through his body, extending itself outward from his anguished and stricken heart. O God, he prayed, in his extremity, let me hide what I feel! Let me hide it. Then I'll die if I must. He gripped the arms of his chair, his body rigid, and then said out of a silence that had seemed to him full of the sound of things falling and crumbling, "How did you find it out?"

She didn't notice anything; she wasn't even looking at him now. "My husband told me himself before he died. He'd asked me to look through some of his papers, and I found a letter from her that had gotten among them by mistake. So I asked him about it. It was a love letter, the letter of a woman very much in love. He told me he was equally in love with her, that they'd been lovers for nearly eleven years." She paused. "Of course," she went on, "I'd never interfered in any way in his life. We went our own ways. But there are some things one can't forgive. An affair with some light woman, yes, perhaps, men being what they are. But this—with a woman like Maud Cotter—and the deceit and secrecy of it all —— However, they got away with it most successfully, didn't they?" She gave a bitter little laugh. "Thanks to that old harridan, Madame Montez. She was no better than an old procuress, in my opinion."

Lowell's hands still gripped the arms of his chair. He dared not relax a muscle. "She was a good singer," he managed to say. Not to let this woman know that what she had just told him had poisoned his whole existence became all his aim.

"I wonder," she said, "what Maud Cotter's family would think if they knew. By the way, I've never spoken of this to a single soul till now."

"You don't gain anything by broadcasting these things," he said. "As for Mrs. Cotter, I doubt if the news would upset her as much as you think. In her eyes, Maudie can do no wrong."

"Nor in yours, I gather."

"Oh, well," he said, and the sweat was cold on his forehead, "tout comprendre c'est tout pardonner, you know."

"I wish the Frenchman who coined that phrase had never been born," she retorted acidly.

"Forgive me for saying anything so trite."

"I can forgive the triteness," she told him. "It's the sentiment I object to." She looked toward the door and said, "I think I saw Felicity just getting into the elevator. I must go." She got up and he tried to get up,

(Continued on Page 74)

"You're a real danger to pedestrians," decided the judge. "I must revoke your license."

"But, your honor," protested the defendant, "my living depends on my driving my car."

"So does the living of the pedestrian," replied the judge.

Candle-bright White...lighted with Lace

Now—Textron lights up your life with white, beautifully tailored blouses of purest rayon crepe. Neatly tapered at the waist . . . softly glowing with inserts of luxurious lace! Like all Textron* quality-controlled creations, these lovely blouses are Textron-woven, Textron designed. Twice as many stitches! Fuller seams! In frosted Snow White, sizes 32 to 38. About $7.00 at leading stores throughout the country!

TEXTRON INC., Textron Building, 401 Fifth Avenue, New York 16, N. Y.

TEXTRON

* REG. U.S. PAT. OFF.

HOME FASHIONS • HOSTESS COATS • MENSWEAR • BLOUSES

"Spring Spring Spring
—time to wake a sleepy skin"

Put that winter-worn skin in order with Dorothy Gray basic skin care.
Banish that shut-in look with these carefully teamed-up creams and lotions.
They just seem to polish dust and time off your face. Actually, your skin isn't a second younger.
But it looks it. So who cares?

Dorothy Gray

TO: CLEANSE, STIMULATE, LUBRICATE

Dry Skin: Dry-Skin Cleanser (Cream 683)
Orange Flower Skin Lotion
Special Dry-Skin Mixture

Normal Skin: Salon Cold Cream
Orange Flower Skin Lotion
Special Dry-Skin Mixture

Oily Skin: Liquefying Cleansing Cream
Texture Lotion, Suppling Cream

(Continued from Page 72)

too, but she waved him back into his chair. "Please don't move. I'm so glad to have seen you and to have had this talk about Bill and Cathy. Do write to Bill. He's only making a fool of himself. An utter fool."

"I'll think about it," he said. "I won't promise."

"Broad-mindedness," she said. "It'll be the undoing of us, I'm afraid. Well, good night. I shall avoid speaking to Maud Cotter if I can. I'm sure she'd understand." She went toward the door, half turned, and said, over her shoulder, "Though what does it all matter now?"

He repeated, with stiff lips, "Yes, what does it all matter now?"

He watched her go through the door and out into the lobby, a thin, neat, uncompromising figure; as definite in outline as a knife. Then he leaned back in his chair with a long sigh and closed his eyes. He had been bereaved in those few moments of what he loved best in the world. Maudie, Maudie had done this thing to him. All these years he had been seeing her constantly, and never once had he heard her speak of Martin Brewster. He had been fooled all along the line. The stupid, meaningless words kept repeating themselves in his brain: All along the line.

And when he tried to picture Maud with a lover he failed completely. He knew that there must be another Maud, whom he did not know at all. The Maud he knew was always reasonable, companionable; always ready to laugh at herself; full of zest, good humor, always, as he put it to himself, on an even keel. She must have been—how old?—when it began. Twenty-five? Twenty-six? Twenty-seven? He couldn't work it out, his brain refused the mathematics of it. Well, she had fooled him.

AND no one had suspected. That was the frightening thing. The frightening thing was that she'd never changed, that no one had detected the least difference in her. Not he, not her mother nor her many friends. And then, after years of intimacy, her lover had died, and again no one had noticed the smallest change in her. That, too, was frightening. She'd never stopped being in love with Martin Brewster; he knew that. Maudie was the most consistent woman he'd ever known. Oh, Maudie, Maudie!

I can't see her again, he said to himself, rocking his body from side to side. I can't speak to her again. I don't ever want to lay eyes on her again. Every hour of every day during all these years she's deceived me. She's let me think what wasn't true. She's let me say—oh, how many times?—"Maudie, I blame myself for your never having married." Only as recently as the day before yesterday she'd let him say it. The words seemed to fly back at him and strike him just above his laboring heart, and he put his hands over it to protect it and bowed his head.

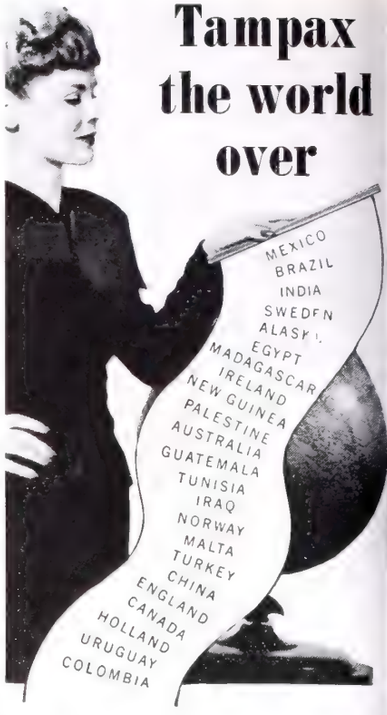
After a while, Lowell drew his feet under him and slowly and shakily got out of his chair and went to the lift, walking like an old man, one hand pressed against his side. Up in his room, he locked the door and then, very slowly, he got into bed. He wished he might never have to leave it again.

Mary lay awake all night, keeping her reading lamp on because the light made her visions less monstrous. In the morning when the hotel began to stir and the lifts to travel up and down, she got up and dressed herself. Now that daylight had come, she thought she would go to Maud, tell her of the events of the night before, and confess that she had made a solemn vow to kill herself. She did not reason this out. But if Maud could not convince her that life was not utterly hateful and she herself not utterly despicable, then no one could.

She knew Maud never got up until half past eight, and that it was now only seven, but she could not wait. She had to unburden herself of her load of misery, and if it involved telling the truth about Letty and Ferdinand Walsh, well, she would tell that too.

Maud's room was exactly opposite her own. Mary, driven by her desperate need,

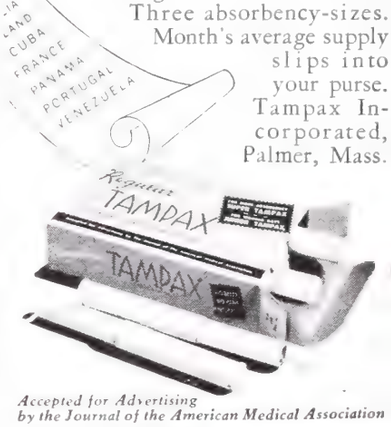
Tampax the world over



Women in many lands are "going modern" and adopting Tampax for monthly sanitary protection. As shown by the records, Tampax is in demand in more than 75 countries, widely varying in climatic conditions, density of population and mode of life . . . Tampax is so compact that it is easily transported and stored. It occupies about one-eighth the space as compared with the older forms of sanitary protection.

Tampax is especially popular among college students, secretaries, vacationers, nurses and housewives who must keep continually active. Invented by a doctor, Tampax is worn internally and thus requires no belts, pins or external pads. Made of pure surgical cotton, it comes to you in dainty patented applicators, so your hands need never touch the Tampax. No chafing. No odor. Quick changing—easy disposal.

No need to remove the Tampax in tub or shower. And in a snug swim suit there's nothing to "show through" and make a line or bulge. . . . Sold at drug and notion counters. Three absorbency-sizes. Month's average supply slips into your purse. Tampax Incorporated, Palmer, Mass.



Accepted for Advertising by the Journal of the American Medical Association

TAMPAX INCORPORATED LHJ-27-B
Palmer, Mass.

Please send me in plain wrapper a trial package of Tampax. I enclose 10c (stamps or silver) to cover cost of mailing. Size is checked below.

( ) REGULAR ( ) SUPER ( ) JUNIOR

Name_____

Address_____

City_____ State_____

So clever of you!

to make it with

EAR BRAND

quality-tested

YARNS

l the smartest new fashion dens are easy to make with versa-e Bear Brand yarns. Their tex-re, pliancy and quality insure rfect fit and a smartly finished
ok. And Bear Brand Yarn is fams for wearing and washing super-
r. Available in a striking wardbe of colors. See this new design d many others in the Bear Brand shion Book. Vol. 330. Send 35c to ar Brand Yarns, 230 Fifth Ave.
w York 1, N. Y. Dept. JY-27.

There was no reply. She knocked more loudly, and still there was no reply. Puzzled, she continued along the corridor, passing Lowell's door. From behind it she could distinctly hear voices, Maud's and Lowell's.

Her own problems still uppermost in her mind, she went nearer and, with no thought of eavesdropping, listened. The corridor was empty and silent, and the two inside the room were speaking as people will when they are so absorbed in their own emotions that they do not care whether they can be overheard or not. To her utter amazement Maud was crying; there could be no mistake about it—she was crying, arguing, protesting all at once. But she was constantly interrupted by Lowell's voice, so unlike his usual voice that it was hard to believe it was his: harsh, toneless, reiterative.

Mary stood there, shocked and frightened into complete immobility. Lowell was accusing Maud of deceiving him, of having a lover, of having ruined his life and his happiness. "You deceived me," he kept saying, and Maud would break in with, "But, Lowell, this concerned only me and him; how could I tell anyone? How could I?" And relentlessly he would talk her down in harsh, level, monotonous tones, "You deceived me, you deceived me. I don't want you. You deceived me. I'm going home alone." Then Maud, "No, I'll go with you. We can send Mary back to London. I'll go with you." Then Lowell, "I don't want you. I never want to see you again."

Mary pressed the back of her hand against her mouth. Her face looked stricken. She turned slowly away and went to her own room. For a long time she stood in the middle of it, staring in front of her, then she turned to her bureau, pulled out its contents and threw everything on the bed. She flung clothes and books into her suitcases. Her one longing was to get away, to make her escape. While she waited for the porter, she took up her pen and scribbled a note:

Conceit is just as natural a thing to the human mind as a center is to a circle. —OLIVER WENDELL HOLMES.

Dear Maud: Thank you for all the kindness you have shown me. You know I have been unhappy, and in spite of these pleasant weeks with you and Lowell things have got worse rather than better. I have made up my mind never to go back to Letty and my father. I am going to a small town somewhere in France, and I will find work. Please don't worry about me, and tell father not to worry. I will probably write to him later. I only want to be left to myself. If they try to find me I won't promise not to do something desperate. My grateful thanks to you and Lowell. MARY.

She took this with her and gave it to the clerk at the desk, asking at the same time for the bill. She said she was obliged to go away suddenly and that if she decided to return, Miss Cotter would let them know. On the desk were some folders advertising seaside and other resorts and, while the clerk was making out the bill, she looked at one entitled La Belle Bretagne. It contained a map of the Brittany coast and she selected at random a small place called Callac le Petit. No one could stop her now; no one. For the first time she was in control of her own destiny. In this certainty and in no other did she find comfort.

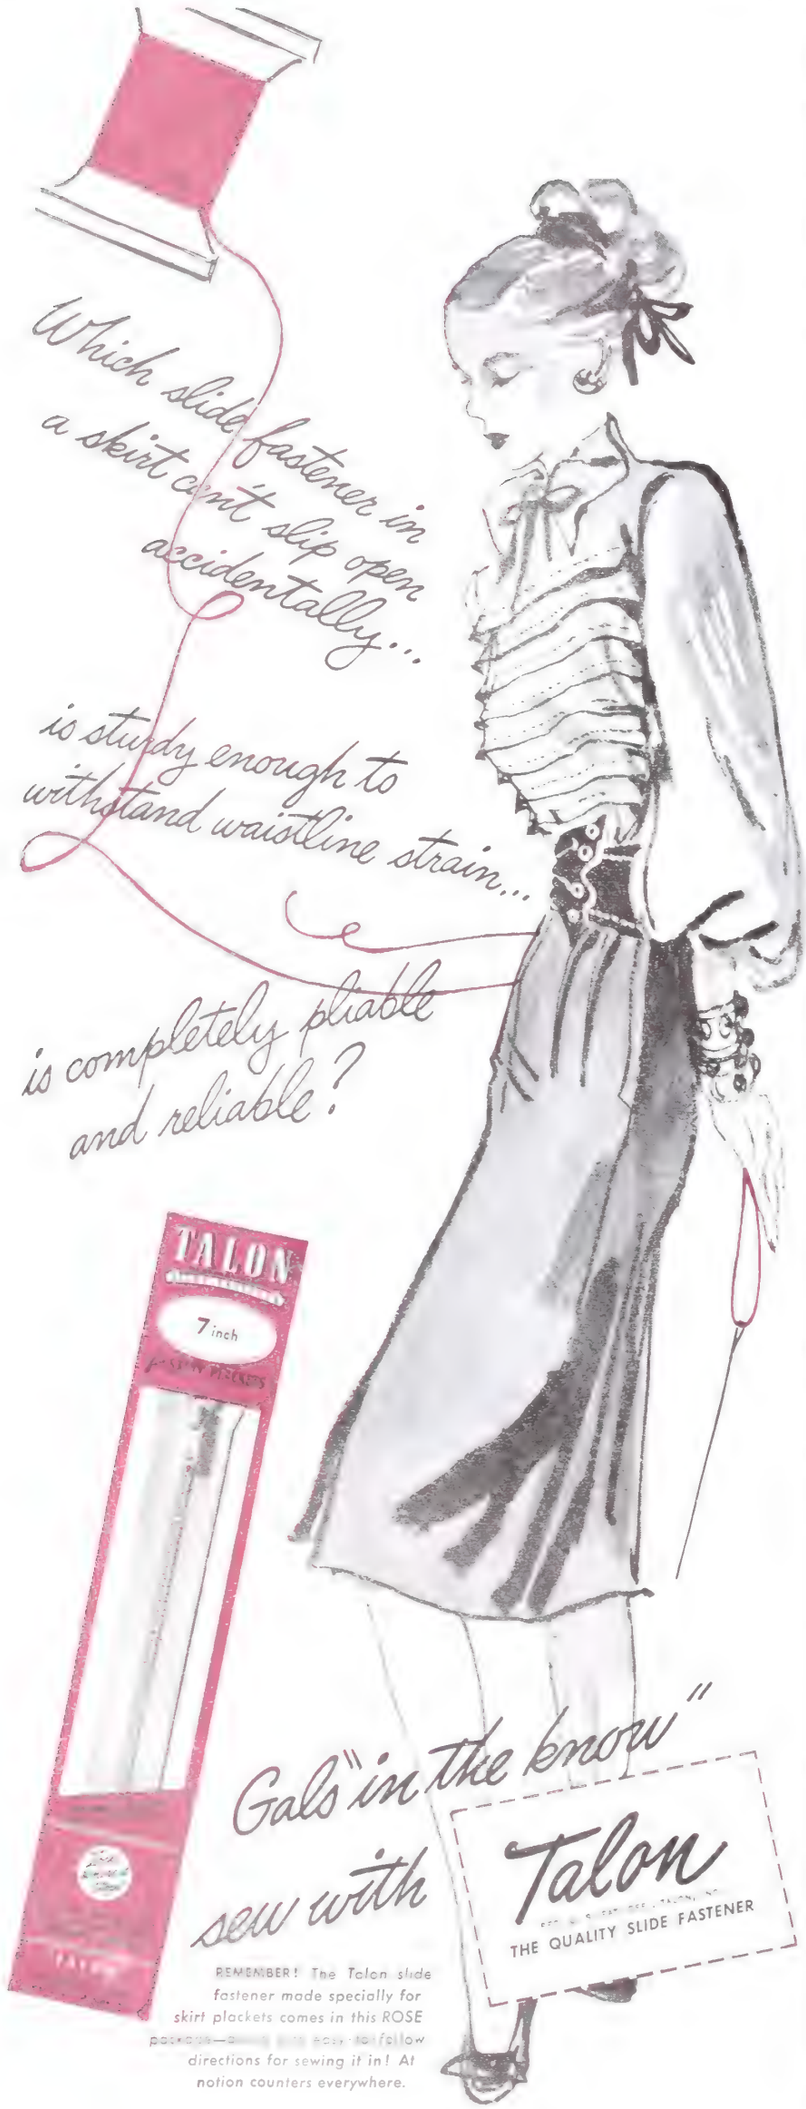
The Hôtel des Dunes, on the outskirts of Callac le Petit and at the very end of the promenade, had few English visitors. Its sanitation was crude and malodorous, the water in its one bathtub ran out even more slowly than it ran in. The inclusive terms were from thirty-five to fifty-five francs per day, and the room occupied by Mary Hallam, the English girl who had so nearly been drowned, was thirty-five.

This accident, which might easily have been fatal, was the talk of the hotel for days. Everyone had commented unfavorably on

Nelly Don — Just try one on

Pearl String plaid sheer rayon; Navy, Spring Olive, Black, Oyster Gray. Sizes 14-40, about $10.00. For name of store nearest you, write Donnelly Garment Sales Co., Kansas City 8, Missouri.

Photo . . . Rawlings



Which slide fastener in a skirt can't slip open accidentally... is sturdy enough to withstand waistline strain...
is completely pliable and reliable?
TALON
7 inch
Gals "in the know" sew with Talon
THE QUALITY SLIDE FASTENER
REMEMBER! The Talon slide fastener made specially for skirt plackets comes in this ROSE package—with easy-to-follow directions for sewing it in! At notion counters everywhere.

the folly and recklessness of the young woman whose habit it had been to bathe, quite alone, from a lonely part of the beach. That she had not lost her life was no fault of her own. It had chanced that a young couple from the town, newly engaged, had been increasing their knowledge of each other behind a sand dune that morning. Peering over the top of it unseen, they had watched the young English girl drop her raincoat on the beach and, wearing a bright blue bathing suit and a white cap, wade out until she reached deep water, swim perhaps thirty strokes and then disappear.

The young man, a baker, was an exceptionally good swimmer. Pulling off his sand shoes, he raced away and struck out for the place where he had last seen the white cap. The girl was well below the surface when he found her and was unconscious. The baker's fiancée ran down to the water's edge and together they laid the limp body face downward on the sand and worked to restore respiration. For a long time there was no sign of returning life, but the young man persisted and at last his efforts were rewarded; the water was pressed out of the lungs and the breath drawn into them. Then they carried her to the nearest house, which was the Hôtel des Dunes, and were relieved to find that she was living there.

In giving a name to a child, one must think of the woman who shall have, someday, to pronounce it.

—JULES d'AUREVILLY: quoted in The Golden Treasury of the World's Wit and Wisdom, Edited by Norman Lockridge (Biltmore Publishing Company).

Mme. Lepage, the proprietress, sent for the doctor. The doctor said the girl's condition was undoubtedly serious. The pulse was alarmingly faint. He prescribed spoonfuls of brandy and milk at frequent intervals and said he would call again the next day. When he did so, she was still in a semi-coma, and the doctor, a sympathetic and serious man, was worried. Had she no friends, no relations? Had no letters come for her, had she had no visitors? The answer to every question was no, none. Were there no English in the hotel to whom she might be induced to speak?

Mme. Lepage said there were none at all. There was, however, a young Englishman arriving in two days for a brief stay. He had been there once before, some years ago, and had asked for space in the garage in which to keep a motorcycle.

The doctor urged her to be patient and continued his daily visits. On the day of the young Englishman's arrival he called late in the afternoon, hoping to find him there. He saw a figure in dirty khaki shorts, squatting beside a dust-covered motorcycle in the shade of the hotel. He had an oilcan and an oily rag in his hands.

The doctor said, "Pardon, monsieur, I think you are English."

The young man looked over his shoulder with a pair of slightly bloodshot blue eyes and then stood upright. "I am English said and then added defensively, "I s French very little."

Instead of bursting into rapid talk a sound of a few words in his own lang the doctor pointed to himself and said slowly and clearly, "I am doctor. Doc

The young man nodded and waited.

"In the hotel," and the doctor po toward the annex, "young English lad you understand? Ill."

"Ill. Yes, I understand."

"Alone. Quite alone." Painstaki determined to make himself clearly u stood, the doctor proceeded. His lis nodded, and from time to time repeate words after him. "Then," the doctor after some minutes of this, "you wi her?"

The young man seemed to commune himself, as though he were putting to self a series of questions. At last he "Yes. When?"

"This afternoon, tomorrow, wher please," the doctor told him. "But s

The young man cated his motorcycle ter," he said. And th asked, "The name?"

"Mees Allom," th tor answered. "Mees Allom."

"Allom," the youn repeated. "O.K."

The doctor smile satisfaction. "I con morrow. I look for Ten o'clock."

The young Englishman indicated th would be somewhere about and the went to the little side road where he ha his car and drove away. The young m turned to his work. He did not hurr cleaned and oiled the machine with oughness, wheeled it into the garag padlocked it. Then he went into the ho wash. Half an hour later he was looki Mme. Lepage, but was told by the old that she had gone to town.

The young man took him by the ar said, "English lady, Miss Allom. room?"

Without replying, the waiter sl away and he followed him upstairs and a creaking, flimsily built passage t annex. He knocked on a door and a voice called out, "Entrez." He opene door. It opened directly on the sma bed in which Mary was lying.

At the sight of a stranger, fear leape her eyes and she lay tense, with half- head. "Who is it?" she cried.

The waiter looked from one to the moved his shoulders and went off dow corridor again. The young man stood doorway and the two stared at each with unwinking intentness. Then he

CONTINUED ON PAGE 78

Other views, sizes and prices of Hollywood Patterns on Pages 42 and 408. Coat, sizes 12 to 20. 25c.

409. One-piece dress: Sew-Simple design, sizes 12 to 42. 25c.
410. Two-piece suit (not including the blouse), sizes 12 to 20. 25c.
1523. Blouse, sizes 12 to 20. 25c. This blouse is not the one illustrated on page 43, but is similar to it.

1523

1523

Buy Hollywood Patterns at the store which sells them in your city. Or order by mail, postage prepaid, from Hollywood Pattern Service, Putnam Avenue, Greenwich, Conn.; or in Canada from 2 Duke Street, Toronto, Ontario, Canada. 408, 409 and 410 are 35c each in Canada.

Lastex for poise

Reg. U. S. Pat. Off.

Lastex...the Miracle Yarn that makes things fit

Dresses • Foundations • Hosiery • Shoes • Lingerie

UNITED STATES RUBBER COMPANY

Serving Through Science

"Clever me
having 3 times as many undies
AT NO EXTRA COST!"

IMAGINE—these beautiful slips were Luxed and ironed 30 times before this picture was taken! Many tests proved Lux care keeps lingerie color-fresh, lovely 3 times as long!

Here's my easy Lux-way...

"Instead of replacing old-looking, faded undies all the time, now I can afford extra ones—3 times as many! What a break for the budget—this easy Lux way to keep lingerie lovely 3 times as long!"

Fact—tests prove that wrong washing methods fade undies, leave them shabby too soon, while gentle Lux care keeps them lovely 3 times as long!

DON'T WASTE SCARCE MATERIALS—DON'T WASTE IT!

(Continued from Page 76)

"You don't know me and I don't know you, but the doctor asked me to come. It seems I'm the only other English person in the hotel. If you don't want to see me, say so, and I'll go."

He came no farther into the room. It seemed as if he dreaded crossing the sill; he hung back, disliking his errand. She noticed his sunburn and the hint of sullenness in his level regard, like that of a child who does a gracious act unwillingly. Her fear receded. He had not come to hunt her out; he was just an ordinary, decent young man on a holiday, doing what he had been asked to do.

"You can come in," she said, and added, "if you like. There's only one chair."

It was the chair the doctor had been sitting in and was close beside the bed. He drew it back a little a .d sat on the edge of it, his hands on his bare knees.

"I'd better tell you my name, I suppose. I'm Alan Garstin. I came from Havre on my motor bike, all along the coast of Normandy and Brittany."

"Yes," she said and looked at him as if to ask what this had to do with her.

He went on, "The doctor said your name was Allom. Is that right?"

With the faintest of smiles she corrected him. "It's Hallam. They have trouble with the h."

"Well," he said, "I have trouble with the whole language. Are you on a holiday?"

"I suppose you might call it that."

"The doctor said you'd had some sort of accident."

"I very nearly drowned."

"How did that happen?"

Faintly she said, "I wanted it to happen."

He sat upstraighter and looked at her with a sharper interest. "You had a pretty good nerve, didn't you?"

"Why do you say that?"

"It takes a bit of doing, I should think. If I thought I was better dead, and that's most unlikely, I'd shoot myself."

"I hadn't a revolver," she said.

"I suppose not. What are you going to do next?"

"I don't know."

"Going to try again?"

"I've got to decide that," she told him, "between now and Sunday. My money will only last till Sunday or Monday. I can't even pay the doctor."

"Why can't you get more? Wouldn't your family send you money if you asked for some?"

"I expect they would," she said, in an exhausted voice, "but I won't ask."

"Rather die?"

"Much rather. It's the only thing I do want."

"All right," he said. "You've admitted to me that you tried to commit suicide. If I told the police, they'd charge you with attempting to commit a crime."

She lay very still, eyes averted, then she looked at him and said, "If it hadn't been for that man behind the sand dune it would have been all over now. I knew what I was doing. I wanted to die. But go and tell the police if you like. Nothing matters now."

"A month or two in the lockup might teach you to value what you've got," he told her.

"I haven't got anything."

He shifted in his chair, looked out the window and then back at her again. "We're getting nowhere fast, aren't we?" he said. "Why don't you ask me about myself? Isn't that what well-brought-up girls are supposed to do?"

"You'd better go now," she said, and closed her eyes.

"Well, if you won't ask," he said, "I'll tell you. I'm an electrical engineer. I was born in Yorkshire, but we came south when I was a kid. We live in Wiltshire."

She said, not opening her eyes, "You and your wife?"

"I'm not married. No time for that. I'm only twenty-four."

"How did you happen to come here?"

"I was here six years ago, with another chap. How did you happen to come?"

"I looked for a small place by the sea on a map of Brittany, and I saw this."

He bent over in a sudden laugh. "That's funny," he said, and laughed again.

"What's funny?"

"You, looking for a place to drown yourself. Choosing it on a map."

There was no answering smile on her face. She said wearily, "Hadn't you better go now?"

"All right," he said, and got up. "I'll come along tomorrow, if you like, after the doctor's seen you. And look, don't worry. Just remember I'm here in the hotel if you feel lonely or want anything."

When the doctor came the next morning he found his patient better, though still unresponsive and unwilling to talk. But just as he was about to leave, she said, "Doctor Bertrand, please don't come any more. You've been very kind, but I've no money to pay you."

He looked at her and smiled. "I had no intention, mademoiselle, of sending you a bill. It was an accident, and when one is on holiday, one does not make preparations in advance for the payment of doctor's bills. Mademoiselle, my reward will be to see you well again. Try to give me that pleasure." He took and patted her hand. "I will come again tomorrow, and after I have been here, you may perhaps get up. We will see."

Tears came into her eyes. "I don't know how to thank you."

"I have told you," he said. "Get well."

Outside the hotel he looked about him and saw Garstin coming in from a bathe, a towel about his shoulders. He called to him and went to meet him.

"The young lady is better," said the doctor, slowly and carefully. "Much better. Please see her again today. Yes? You understand? Talk to her again."

Garstin nodded. "Yes," he said.

"She needs a friend," the doctor said.

"Yes," Garstin said. "Perhaps."

The doctor said, "I know."

They parted and Garstin went to his room to dress. Twenty minutes later he was knocking at Mary's door. She knew who it was, for she called out, "Come in." She had done her hair and put on a blue silk bed jacket.

"You look a lot better," he told her.

"The doctor wants me to get up tomorrow. What is there to get up for?"

"You can lie on the beach in the sun," he told her.

She gave a broken little laugh. "And then what?"

"Aren't you going to ask me to sit down?"

"Yes," she said, "if you like."

This time he did not draw the chair back. "Are you going to write home?"

"No."

"Then what?"

She was silent.

"Well," he said, "you don't make sense, to me. What are you running away from?"

(Continued on Page 80)

BULLER'S THUMB

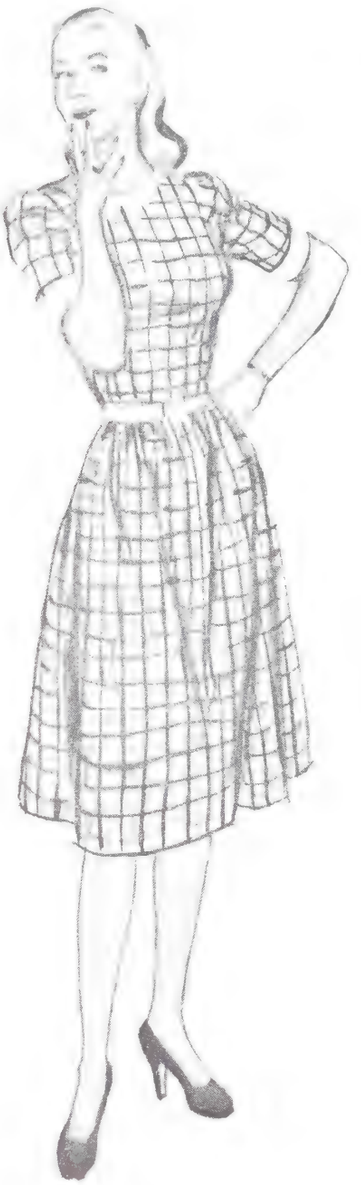
Until about 1850 English law permitted a husband to beat his wife for any offense that required that kind of getting to the seat of her understanding. There was one interesting requirement set down by legal interpretation, as is evidenced by a decision handed down on the matter by one Mr. Justice Buller. This learned judge maintained that the husband could beat his wife, but the instrument he used, if he used other than his hand, was to be a stick not thicker than a man's thumb. This instrument of chastisement came to have the name, "Buller's Thumb."

—DAVID T. ARMSTRONG.

Forgive Her, she's only a woman

"Why didn't my husband tell me?" Don't blame him! Everybody—even women—ought to know by now that the Shrinkage Problem is solved very simply. In dresses, just as in shirts, you demand a "Sanforized" Label. It's the one sure way to keep a dress in size, in style, in use!

"It seemed such a sensible idea!" Sensible? Wake up, lady! That idea of buying a dress too big, to allow for shrinkage . . . why, nobody's using it now! Match your pretty figure, inch for inch, with a pretty dress tagged "Sanforized." The perfect fit stays perfect through countless trips to the tub.



"Well, some of us learn our lessons!" Now don't be smug, my girl, just 'cause you're smart. If your last year's cotton still fits like a dream, thank the tag that said "Sanforized." That "Sanforized" tag keeps company with $2 dresses as well as with $20 ones. Never buy a cotton dress without it, no matter what you pay.

•SANFORIZED•

REG. U.S. PAT. OFF.

Fabric Shrinkage less than 1% by the Government's Standard Test

Look for this label as the sure way to avoid shrinkage.

"Sanforized"... the checked standard of shrinkage. The "Sanforized" trade-mark is used on compressive pre-shrunk fabrics only when tests for residual shrinkage are regularly checked, through the service of the owners of the trade-mark, to insure maintenance of its established standard by users of the mark.

Cluett, Peabody & Co., Inc.

Spread a treat at breakfast!

Spread your favorite coffee-cake with Durkee's fine-flavored Margarine. Enjoy it on biscuits, waffles and bread, too! It's a grand spread—so mild, so sweet, so country-fresh in flavor. So thrifty your family can use it liberally. You'll find Durkee's Margarine ideal for cooking and baking because it is smooth and perfectly-blended. Durkee's, you see, is made by a scientific process that churns the pure, nutritious vegetable oils right in with the fresh, pasteurized skim milk. An energy food—enriched with Vitamin A.

Try Margie's Coffee-Cake
Use your favorite recipe for baking powder biscuits. Spread dough with cup Durkee's Margarine softened
½ cup firmly packed brown sugar
1 teaspoon Durkee's cinnamon
½ cup chopped almonds or raisins
Prepare enough dough for 12 biscuits. Roll ¼ inch thick, spread with Durkee's Margarine and sprinkle with mixture of sugar, cinnamon and almonds (or raisins). Roll length wise, place on greased baking sheet and join ends to form a ring. With scissors cut ¾ inch slices almost to center, turning each slice over on flat side to show filling. Bake in hot oven (425 F.) about 25 minutes.
SO MILD... SO SWEET... SO COUNTRY-FRESH IN FLAVOR!
Durkee's
VEGETABLE OLEOMARGARINE
ENRICHED WITH VITAMIN A
DURKEE FAMOUS FOODS

Durkee Famous Foods . . . Division of the Glidden Company

Other Durkee Favorites: Durkee's Famous Dressing . . . Spices . . . Cocoanut . . . Worcestershire Sauce

(Continued from Page 78)

"Myself."

"What's wrong with you?"

"Everything."

He looked at her coolly, critically. "I can't see that myself. You're young and you wouldn't be bad-looking if you'd put on some fat. You've got some brains, too, I suppose."

"I haven't got health. I get headaches that drive me nearly mad, and I faint, and I'm just no good." She held up her right hand, looked at it and dropped it again.

"What happened to that?"

She told him and he said, "That's too bad."

"When I first came here," she said, "I thought I'd give myself another chance. I got a job taking care of some French children, but they were too much for me, and I had to give up. After that I couldn't find anything at all, and my money was coming to an end. So I—well, you know the rest."

"You'd better get back to England. There's going to be a war."

"I haven't read the papers. But if that's true, it's just another reason for getting out of this world."

"Now listen to me," he said. "As I see it, you've got three courses open to you. You can write to your father for money, you can have another try at drowning yourself, or you can come back to England with me on the back of the motor bike. Which is it to be?"

He sat forward on the edge of the chair, looking intently at her from under his thick eyebrows. She saw that she would have to take one of these courses and take it soon. And she wondered which of the three courses he would choose for her himself.

After a pause she said, "I'll decide between now and Saturday."

"No," he told her, "you'll decide now. And I want to tell you this. If you come back to England I can give you a job. It's respectable and it'll mean three meals a day and a roof over your head. It might turn out to be too tough for you, but at least you could give it a try."

"I'd like to know more about it."

His face took on a look of stubborn, even sullen reserve. "If you don't feel you can trust me, you'd better choose one of the other two. I don't care which."

She gave a weary sigh. "All right. I'll come with you."

He frowned, looked out the window and then back at her again. "Unless you feel you can trust me, you're a fool to say you'll come."

"Yes," she said listlessly. "I am a fool, I know it. But I do trust you." He gave a sudden laugh and she said, "I didn't mean it quite the way it sounded. I do trust you, and I don't know why you bother about me." Tears came into her eyes and he said quickly:

"I'll tell you this much. You'll be helping me out of a tight spot if you take that job. If there's a war, I want to join up."

With a puzzled look she said, "Then you want me to look after your house or whatever it is while you're away?"

"That's part of it. Can you cook?"

"No."

"Do housework?"

"I've never done any."

"Is that the way girls like you are brought up?"

"I told you," she said, "I intended to be a pianist."

"Allright," he said, "we won't argue the point. I suppose you can learn." He was silent, staring at the floor. Then he raised his head and said, "No, I'm not being fair. You said you trusted me, and I'll have to trust you. I'll have to tell you a few facts, and then you can make up your mind." He clasped his hands together and fixed his eyes on them.

She wanted to hear what he had to say and at the same time felt that it was going to be hard for him to say it. She wished that she could go back to England with him without being in any way involved in his life. But she knew she was in no position to bargain.

Suddenly, out of the silence, he spoke. "My father killed a man," he said, looking at his clasped hands. "He killed him in anger and in hot blood. Never mind why. He spent six years in jail and died there. My mother loved him. We all loved him. He went to prison about the time my kid brother was born. After that she began to do and say queer things. They did what they could for her, but she's never going to get any better. My mother and my kid brother live with me. I won't let them send her to a home. We live in the country and I go to work every day on my motor bike. My brother goes to school. There's an old woman who looks after the house and my mother, but she's got arthritis so badly she can't work any more. My mother wouldn't hurt a fly. She just lives in a world of her own, and imagines what she wants to imagine. It's a small house, five rooms and a garden. We haven't got any neighbors, except a farmer or two. The nearest village is two miles."

She did not know what to say. She could only think, How terrible! Then her hand went up to her cheek in a nervous gesture and she said, "But I'm frightened of people who aren't sane."

He got up. "Well, that's that. I've told you she wouldn't hurt a fly, but if you're afraid, it's no good." He went to the door.

"Wait a minute," she pleaded, and there was a note of dread in her voice. "Does that mean you don't want to take me back to England with you?"

Casually he answered, "Oh, I'll take you if you want to go. But what'll you do when you get there?"

"I don't know."

"Well," he said, "I'll be leaving here on Monday."

He was already out of the door when she called him back. "Mr. Garstin!"

"My name's Alan."

"I just wanted to say," she told him, making a visible effort, "that I've changed my mind."

"Going to write to your father?"

"No, I'll go to your home."

(To be Concluded)

"I'll give you the go-ahead, madam, as soon as there's any sign of the diaper shortage ending."

Finest way to turn Your Young Man's Fancy

Finest

RECIPE FOR SURPRISE STUFFING

2 cans Stokely's Finest Whole Grain Corn	1½ cups minced onion
3 cups soft bread crumbs	¼ cup butter or margarine
½ cup Stokely's Finest Tomato Juice	2¼ teasp. salt
2 eggs, beaten	1½ teasp. poultry seasoning
	4-lb. roasting chicken

Combine drained corn, crumbs, juice and eggs; mix well. Let stand 10 min. Lightly brown onion in butter or margarine; add salt, seasoning; add to corn mixture. Stuff chicken with ½ stuffing; roast. Form remaining stuffing in heart-shaped patties; ½-hour before chicken is done, place patties on rack in roasting pan. The delightful surprise in every helping is those sunny corn kernels, brimful of newly-picked flavor. From all the rich corn harvests of the country, only the most perfect ears are selected for nothing but the finest . . . Stokely's Finest.

Finest

RECIPE FOR SAVORY LIMA BEANS

1 can Stokely's Finest Lima Beans	1 cup sliced, canned mushrooms
2 bacon strips	½ teasp. sugar
¼ cup minced onion	Few grains salt, pepper

Drain lima beans. Sauté bacon strips; remove bacon. Add onion and mushrooms to fat; lightly brown. Add sugar, salt, pepper. Dice bacon; add with onion mixture to limas. Heat. Serves 6. Notice how your guests linger over these baby limas, thoroughly relishing each delectable forkful. Every one of these finest limas is so mild, so quick to melt in the mouth. Because as the pedigreed seed is transformed into thriving, bean-laden plants, experts in the fields check daily on their growth and health. And this extra scientific control is your promise of nothing but the finest in Stokely's Finest. Remember . . . there are more recipes on the back of every Stokely's Finest label.

Stokely's Finest

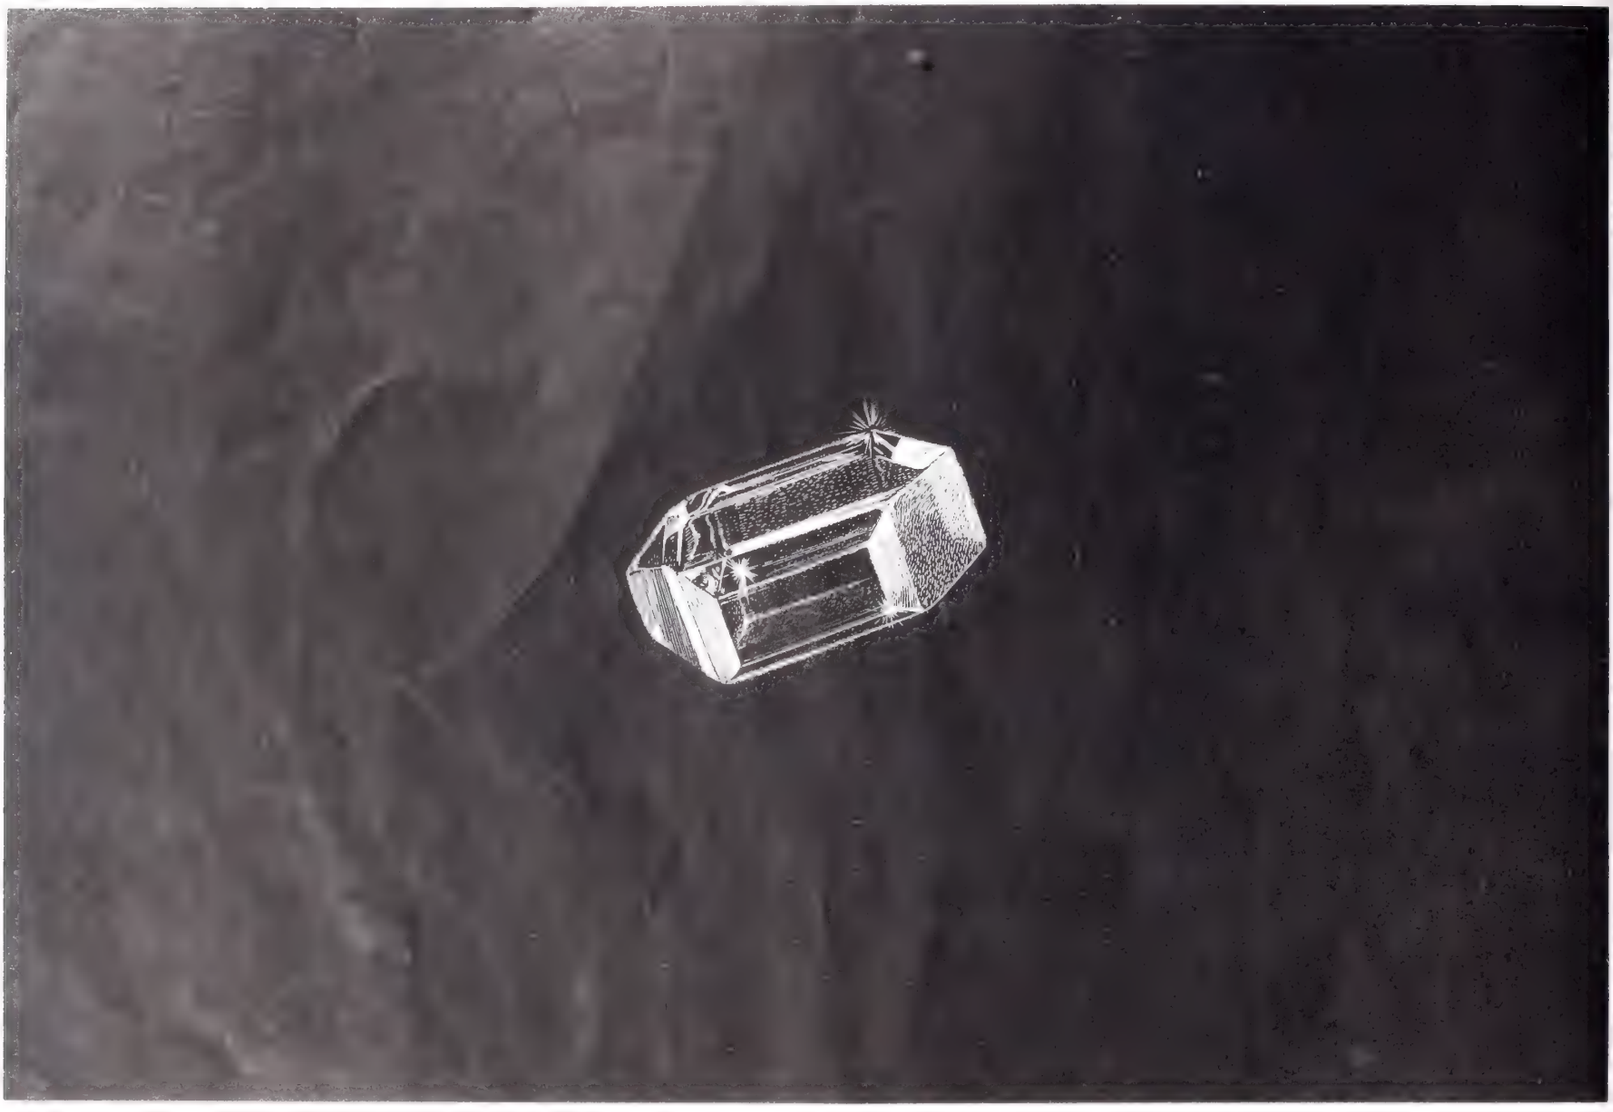
THE "Diamond" THAT'S GOOD TO EAT!



HERE IS THE JEWEL of your dining table . . . a gem among foods. Magnified many times, this is a crystal of sugar—a basic food of nature.

Sugar is utilized as pure energy—an important food in itself, and a standard ingredient in cooking, baking, canning and preserving—and in hundreds of manufactured food products. And yet day by day science is learning many uncommon things about this common food.

For sugar is yielding, one by one, its many secrets—secrets that should benefit man incalculably.

To promote the welfare of science and the scientific study of sugar, the Sugar Research Foundation is sponsoring research projects at dozens of universities and colleges, hospitals and clinics in the United States and Canada.

Its purpose: greater knowledge, better health, better living.

SUGAR RESEARCH FOUNDATION

Box 137, New York 5, N. Y.

MAY DAY MADNESS

(Continued from Page 10)

can think of nothing better for the grade than a few patches, if the rest of are like you," said John Tally, and the en all laughed.

once the older ones began to tell of part in the great day, the May Day.
's room was to have a covered wagon ing pioneer songs, and Douglas was to ttle flowering bush in Sherwood Forest the big boys like Robert played Robin
. Green crepe paper for a cape and a uet of flowers would suffice Peter. But etta was to be one of the Queen's at-nts, and nothing could compare with
She was the only take it calmly.
n Tally worked
e local motion-e theater. He d handbills, he e janitor work, placed the show
in their glass
, he took up
s in a pinch,
hat he was told
by Mr. Alvin, manager. This e best job John ver had, and he
eld it for a longer than any other
He liked work-ound the thea-nd it was true
the family all asses. The chilwere proud of father's connecith the brightest most colorful in town, and he d their pride.
Mrs. Tally was it to keep them eat and clean"
hool and keep fed and warm n's pay. That d it at all was er demonstra-mind over mat-ometimes it al-seemed as n she took it out self, what didn't out of the pay.
ew thinner and er, lighter in
, more concen-
—or consecra-ll the time. She ld beyond her and patient be-human need.
she loved her brood with an soning and un-devotion.
was not, she that John was when they struggled over what should be with the last half dollar of his pay. He othing for himself at all. The suit he to church he had been wearing to n for years. He had no car, not even by. He had only one great fear, and was of debt. If they could keep out t, they could manage, said John. He near" with his money on that account—
, with what money he had.

now John was talking into the wind
he recited his conversation with Mr.
After supper when he took out his —for it was payday—and laid on the the money for the week's food, and the llars for the water bill, and such other exact sums as must be paid out, his ood with her hands under her apron oked at the money lying there. John sturbed.
nd don't go buying May Day dresses," d her.

She looked at him. Her blue eyes burned like fire and she said, "And why not? Do you think Lennie is not going to be in the May Day?"

"How can she?" he asked. "[illegible] woman."

Mrs. Tally counted [illegible] the money and put it in her battered purse. When the dishes were done and the younger children put to bed she got her old hat and coat out and put them on.

"Where are you going?" he asked.

"To see Miss Plunket, the music teacher," answered Mrs. Tally, and she went out.

John caught up his hat and followed her, but at the gate she turned on him.

"Don't come with me!" she said in a determined voice. "I want to go by myself. This is women's business."

"Why are you being so stubborn?" he asked her. "What's got into you?"

"You know what's got into me," she answered. "Don't play innocent with me, John Tally. You know's well as I do where I'm a-goin' and why. Stay here with the children!"

John opened his mouth and then closed it again. He was trying to remember when it was that she had looked like this before. If he could recall that, it would make it easier to reason with her.

"None would like to see Lennie sprinkling flowers better than me," he said. "But the boys must have things too."

"The boys!" she said, as though she had never heard of them before, and she turned and walked away.

She came back home in about an hour and sat down by the dining-room table with her hat and coat still on and just sat there. John had to speak to her three times to get her to rouse and go to bed. He gave up trying to say more to her for the night. It was no use talking to the woman. He had to go to the theater at nine o'clock and stay until the last patron left, till the lights were all out and the place locked up. He went off to his work in an agitated state of mind.

John usually slept in the mornings until the children were all off to school, for it was midnight and after when he got home. But the next morning he wakened in a quiet house and came downstairs to find everyone gone. His breakfast was on the table, cold as a stone, and a cold pot of coffee was on the stove. John ate the cold food. No one came in and he finally went to his work.

He was just about through vacuuming the carpet in the theater lobby when Mrs. Tally came in from the street with Danny in the old buggy and David walking beside him, holding the buggy handle in his fat hand. She had something clutched under her arm. John spoke to his sons cheerfully.

★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★

The Stranger

BY KATE BRACKETT

My father is as brave as the Lone Ranger;
I bet no Germans would have dared come here!
No, Joey, we don't worry about danger
When Big Joe's near.
He knows just what to do. And oh, he's funny!
His words slide slowly down inside you, honey,
And tickle there all day like jumping beans.

And in the picture he has pretty eyes!
Yes, and remember, he is very wise . . .
Funny and wise and dear . . .
Write him and say we need him around here!
Is he like Superman? Well, if that means
He's big enough to love us both together . . .

And when he grins, it comes like summer weather,
So slow and sweet and wide and lingering,
You wouldn't want to do another thing
All your life long but make it come again.
When will they let Big Joe come back here? When?
Joey, he's home. Where, mummy?
I don't see.
He's home the only way that he can be.

★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★

Tasty Treats 2 ways wonderful

[illegible] Nabisco 100% Bran [illegible] helps to [illegible] the body [illegible] It contains [illegible]

NABISCO BRAN RAISIN MUFFINS

1 cup Nabisco 100% Bran
1 cup milk
2 tbsp. shortening
3 tbsp. sugar
1 egg, well-beaten
½ cup seedless raisins
1 cup sifted flour
3 tsp. baking powder
¼ tsp. salt

[illegible] greased muffin pans ⅔ full. Bake in [illegible] about 12 "treat" muffins with NABISCO 100% BRAN FINER MILLED

NABISCO 100% BRAN
TO WHICH HAS BEEN ADDED SUGAR, SALT, MALT EXTRACT AND PRUNE JUICE FINER MILLED
READY TO EAT
CONSTIPATION DUE TO INSUFFICIENT BULK
NATIONAL BISCUIT COMPANY
One of the many fine foods baked by Nabisco
National Biscuit Company

SPRING CLEANING

Avoid the Rush

Send CURTAINS...DRAPES... SLIPCOVERS

for Cleaning the Week of FEB. 17th*

"This better

Sanitone Dry Cleaning

certainly brightens our home!"

This year get an early start with house cleaning. Your Sanitone Dry Cleaner is ready to help you. Only he offers all these advantages:

☆ ALL SOILS REMOVED ☆ COLORS BRIGHTENED

☆ FIT AND DRAPE RETAINED

* Watch for your SANITONE CLEANER'S announcement in your local newspaper the week of February 17th.

The display of this seal is your promise of better dry cleaning plus quality workmanship in every detail. Look for it.

SANITONE

See how your local Sanitone Dry Cleaner rejuvenates Draperies, Curtains, Slip Covers, Bedspreads, Blankets and Comforters.

EMERY INDUSTRIES, INC. • CINCINNATI 2, OHIO

"Where you been?" he asked them all.

Mrs. Tally showed him the paper pattern she carried. It was the pattern for a child's long dress, in size six. The child in the picture wore a crown of flowers, carried a basket. The picture was of a dress made of thin dotted material over colored silk.

"This is it!" she said dramatically. "I'm to take a pattern off and take it back to the domestic-science teacher for the other mothers to borrow. It takes three yards, and the stuff, slip and all, costs nine dollars—and I want the money, John Tally!"

"You're mad!" he said to her. "Nine dollars is a third of my pay. A third of a week's pay! It's almost a week's grocery money. If they want her for May Queen flower spreader, let them put a crepe-paper costume on her, like the crepe paper Douglas will wear."

"She's chosen," said Lennie's mother, like the voice of fate. "It cannot be changed. Her heart would be broken. She's the prettiest child in the whole school and she can sing like an angel. She's going to be in the May Day and nothing can stop her!"

"I haven't got nine dollars," said John calmly. "That will stop her!"

They stood looking at each other—no longer young, both shabby and bent with work, but their looks were bright and hot.

"You've lost your mind," he told her sternly. "And so has the school. Robert goes into high school next year and he can begin to work, and that will help a little. But nine dollars, now, for a foolish dress is something we cannot afford—and we cannot afford it, for Lennie or any other, so come to your senses, and be quick about it!"

She did not answer. Her lips were pressed together—she was standing straight, with bright red spots in her cheeks again and the look of a stranger about her. No, not a stranger, for the troublesome look had been there before.

"Come now, old girl," he cajoled her, "you've always been a meek good woman. Don't get notions in your old age."

"I been meek long enough!" she cried at him. "I'll be meek no more!"

Little David began to cry, hearing his mother's voice so strange and more loud, and without a word she went out of the empty lobby of the theater with the two little ones.

John was too angry to go home for lunch. He spent a quarter on a sandwich and a cup of coffee. The woman would have to get over this. May Day was not far off, and it would soon be over and forgotten and there would be peace in the household again. He went about his work, began to feel more cheerful when he thought that he could stick it out a few days and she would subside. For now his blood was up and he intended to be master in his own house! He would not let his family go uncontrolled and out of their minds.

Iris Delaney had brought this grief upon them. He heard her father in the theater that evening, complaining that it would cost as much for Iris to be May Queen as it would to marry her off.

Brag! Brag! thought John. It would not hurt Delaney to buy Iris a fine white dress, but he wanted everyone to know how much it would cost, and to know that Iris was Queen of the May.

When John got home for his supper the next night, the house was empty. There was a note on the table for him.

"We've gone to Maggie's for supper," it read. "Get yourself a bite or go on downtown."

He looked in the icebox and there wasn't much there. He ate some cold beans and a piece of yesterday's molasses pie and drank what milk was left in the bottle. Maggie was Mrs. Tally's sister. He wondered at her having them all for supper. She was a woman that liked a clean house better than company.

John went out before they came in, and when he came home again the family was all in bed and Mrs. Tally's eyes were closed so firmly that he knew she was not asleep, but he was glad to have no more words with her.

Monkey SEE- Monkey DO

Sonny seems to know already wha Mother's known for years. He's get ting the toilet bowl clean the quick easy, sanitary way—with Sani-Flush A clean toilet bowl simply can't hav an odor. Sani-Flush removes stain and film that harbor germs and caus odors. It disinfects—works chemi cally. Just sprinkle Sani-Flush.

Good in hard or soft water. Won't hurt septic tank action. Sold every where. Two economical sizes.

Sani-Flush

EVERY HOME NEEDS IT

Guaranteed by Good Housekeeping

IF YOU HAVE A SEPTIC TANK-

You'll be interested in a free, scientific re port that proves Sani-Flush will not injur septic tanks or hinder their action when use to clean toilet bowls. Address The Hygien Products Co., Dept. 201, Canton 2, Ohi

REPAIR SPLIT SALAD BOWL with Plastic Wo

EASY! No skill quired. Hand like putty . . . hardens into wo

DOZENS OF OTHER USES

PLASTIC WOOD

A CELLULOSE FIBRE FIL

New MIRACLE WAI CLEAN

QUICK EASY Saves Costly Redeco AMAZING INVENTION. Bani sty.e housecleaning mess and r rags—no sticky "dough"—no red, swollen hi more dangerous stepladders. Literally erases magic from Wallpaper, Painted Walls, Ceilings, Shades. Take orders from friends! Earn money!

SAMPLES FOR TRIAL Sample of mediately t send name at once. A penny postal will do. SEND NO M just your name. KRISTEE CO., 1354 Bar Street, AKRO

FREE SAMPLES • 100% VIRGIN W KNITTING YAR

Selected yarns for your ever direct from mill at money prices. Write for free samples

FRIENDSHIP HOUSE, Dept. 158, WINCHESTER, IN

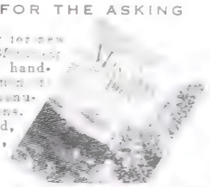
When
the family gathers

. . . to choose a monument, and they turn to you for guidance, will you be able to advise them wisely about the kind of stone—the appropriate design—the strongest guarantees of quality and workmanship?

You'll find the counsel you need at Monument Headquarters in your town—your Barre Guild dealer. When you see the Barre Guild Seal on display and etched inconspicuously in a Guild-approved monument itself, you know you are assured a monument of highest quality, design and craftsmanship. For monuments bearing the approval of the Guild are made only of Select Barre Granite and guaranteed by the Guild's coveted Certificate of Quality—the strongest guarantee in the monument industry.

YOURS FOR THE ASKING

Send today for new booklet, "Memorial Ideas"—a handpicked selection of inspiring monument designs. Barre Guild, Desk L-8, Barre, Vt.



FREE TO CANARY OWNERS

Send 3¢ and dealer's name for GENEROUS SAMPLES of GEISLER'S BALANCED DIET AND FAMOUS GEISLER BIRD BOOK

This book, by one of the world's foremost bird authorities, tells you how to keep your canary healthy and improve its song. Geisler Foods are of the finest quality—used on millions of canaries for over 60 years.

"Since using your [illegible] my canary is in fine feather and sings [illegible]" Mrs. J. V. Ames, Toledo, Ohio.

Own a Geisler "Living Music Box" Canary guaranteed melodic singers. Write for prices to-day.

MAX GEISLER BIRD CO.
Est. 1888
53 Cooper Sq., N. Y. • 116 N. 16 St. Omaha, Neb.

ON SALE in [illegible] & yellow packages at [illegible] ET, DRUG, DEP'T., AND [illegible] STORES

Climbing ROSES

PINK, WHITE AND RED EXHIBITION FAVORITES 3 for $1

Favorites with flower lovers everywhere—hardy, superb long flowering 2-year field grown plants. Choose from red, pink, white.

FREE COMPLETE GARDEN CATALOG

SPRING HILL NURSERIES DEPT. M-34 TIPP CITY, OHIO

LEARN MILLINERY AT HOME

Design and make [illegible] personal direction of one of America's noted designers. Complete materials, blocks, etc., furnished. Every step illustrated. You make [illegible] start. We teach you how to start a profitable business in spare time. Low cost and easy [illegible] demand. Free National Placement Dept. Send for free catalog.

LOUIE MILLER SCHOOL OF MILLINERY
25 N. Wabash Ave., Dept. [illegible] Chicago 2, Ill.

make her feel a little easier about not getting the child's dress.

"I'll be busy today," she told him when she rose in the morning. "I'm going over to ma's to help her stretch curtains. Can you eat your lunch downtown again?"

"Do you think that I'm a banker?" he asked.

"Do I think you're a banker?" She laughed shortly. "Indeed, John Tally, I never thought such a thing of you," and she was off from the small room with the sloping ceiling. He could hear her getting the children dressed and off for school. "Come to grandma's for lunch," she said. "I'll be there."

Soon the house was quiet and John slept again. When he got up to go out, he counted his money. He had very little to eat on downtown that day, but he could get some hot bean soup at the truck stop, and a big piece of pie to go with it. He would fare. She had to go help her old lady once in a while, he knew. But he was really cross when he came home and found the house empty. There were, tonight, not even cold beans and leftover pie in the icebox. There was nothing. He went across town to fetch his family home and found the children eating supper with their grandmother in her kitchen.

"Milly went to Maggie's a while ago," the old lady said. "She said for you to eat a bite, then fetch the young ones home. Sit down, John. It's roast pork and sugared sweet potatoes and fresh chocolate cake. I thought we might as well have something fine."

"Yes, indeed," said John. "Though I had a bite uptown."

This wasn't true, but he was too polite to Stranger, pause with bated breath,

Never heard so sudden a death—
Led the old mare out to drink
She kicked and killed him
Quicker'n a wink.

From a stone in an old cemetery in Gilsum, N. H.

be greedy. He sat at the table and ate slowly and with restraint. He did not like to think what the supper must have cost the old lady. But he was satisfied when he had eaten and he felt more cheerful. Grandmother wrapped the leftover pork in waxed bread paper and gave them a great loaf of bread besides.

"For sandwiches," she said. "I can never eat that much meat, here alone. Milly said the children might take their lunches to school tomorrow. They've got to practice for May Day."

She handed Robert the packages of meat and bread to carry, with a nice feeling for John's pride. John resolved to come soon and spade her garden. He always did it for her, but usually only after his wife got mad at him. He told her he'd come on Saturday morning and turn it all over with the fork for her.

"Thanks, John," she said. "You're always good to me."

The next morning Milly gave John a lunch bucket with thick pork sandwiches and a jar of canned peaches. He ate a good lunch, sitting in the lobby of the theater, reading one of Mr. Alvin's trade magazines. He was just finishing his work that afternoon when Robert came by and said they had all been asked to Uncle Rob's for supper and pa was to come there.

This was too much! Uncle Rob was John's own brother and they had not been friends or eaten in each other's house for a long time. Uncle Rob had a nice six-room house, free from debt. He had a small car, all paid for. He worked at the gristmill and made good wages, and he and his wife had no children. The difficulty between them was all on John's side, and John knew it. The least criticism from his more prosperous brother galled him and put up his back, as

Continued on Page 47

"My eyes popped when I saw that word"

IT WAS SPRING, 1946 . . . a high point of the great sheet shortage.

In Kenmore, N. Y., Mrs. A. I. Grimmer was scanning the paper . . . when suddenly her roving eye popped at the last little word in this modest little ad:

FOR SALE: Contents of flat, including furniture, kitchen utensils, sheets.

Sheets! Mrs. Grimmer had tried for months to buy sheets . . . in vain. She leapt out of her chair and dashed madly to the scene of the sale.

Was she in time? Thank goodness, yes, she writes . . . and in wonderful luck, too. For what did she find but "eight oh-so-white Pequots," looking soft and smooth and good-as-new.

Her letter goes on:

"I snapped those sheets up pronto. I'd rather have even a second-hand Pequot than any ordinary brand. With my growing family I need sturdy sheets that stand up."

The demand for "oh-so-white" Pequots is bigger than ever these days. It seems women all over the country are as conscious as Mrs. Grimmer of the long-wearing qualities of these close-woven muslin sheets.

We're doing our best to supply stores, so that all who want them may have America's most popular sheets.

Pequot Mills, Salem, Massachusetts.

PEQUOT SHEETS

so good-looking PEQUOT so long-wearing

"PEE-KWAT"

BE YOUNG WITH YOUR YOU

ENJOY HOME GET-TOGETHERS BE A "FRESH UP" FAMILY!

Friendly, crystal-clear 7-Up is a perfect partner to American family fun. That's b cause 7-Up with its sparkle, goodness and cheerful, fresh flavor is exactly suited to happy home. It's the drink the whole fa enjoys . . . grownups and youngsters alik

Be a "fresh up" family! And as you work and play together, "fresh up" wit 7-Up . . . America's home drink. Order your supply wherever you see those bright 7-Up signs.

Picture window, overlooking the garden, with draw curtains replaces old sink. Cabinet for extras adds serving space, cuts off no light, leaves family room open.

The small high window, low awkward sink of the old kitchen. Wasted space under the sink, exposed garbage and trash cans make more work and look unattractive. Kitchen utensils hang on odd hooks, gather dust, add to confusion.

Old kitchen has range, refrigerator and cupboards badly placed, with sink across room. Refrigerator is around corner in back pantry far from work space. Stove awkward in corner of wall, hard to get at. Space under it is wasted.

No longer a necessity after a more modern heating system had been installed, the old fireplace, inadequately screened and unused because it faced the sink and kitchen cabinet, became a catchall and a possible fire hazard.

Units compactly assembled in position to make work easy. Nice to serve from range to counter to table. Refrigerator near sink and work surface. Plenty of cabinet space, good lighting from new door. No waste space now, everything easy to clean in this kitchen.

YOU LIKE

BY GLADYS TABER

IN the early days, the great kitchen fireplace was the heart of the house. The fire burned day and night, all winter long. Iron kettles swung on the heavy crane, sending out the rich savor of venison stew. In the Dutch oven, the loaves of bread baked golden and crusty, and at the front of the hearth the frozen mince pies thawed. Thrifty housewives baked mince, apple and pumpkin pies and froze them when the long cold set in. Then they were brought out to be heated whenever there was need.

If the men were chopping wood all day, there was a kettle of mulled cider hot on the hearth, too, with a loggerhead to thrust in and make it steam. Loggerheads were long iron-tipped implements that grew red hot in the coals and then sent hissing fragrant steam when they were plunged into the hot drink.

The spinning went on near the fire, the wheel turning softly, with a pleasant murmur. In the evenings, before the candles were lit to guide folk off to bed, there was good talk around the hearth. A certain silversmith named Paul Revere had done a thing to tell of. Or maybe they spoke of Arnold at Ticonderoga, or the French coming down the valley in satin-and-gold uniforms.

Now, in these later days, some of the old houses still have the great fireplace, with wide hearth and stone chimney. Usually the old kitchen has become the living room with the passing of time, but now and then the old fireplace is still standing in the room where the modern housewife bakes and brews.

In one little house, hidden away in the New England hills, the lady of today was in a dreadful quandary. She couldn't bring herself to close up the lovely old fireplace and hide it behind the streamlined cabinets and counters she longed for, and yet the kitchen was almost impossible to work in, and she did have a modern, hungry husband.

How to keep the character of the past and have the modern advantages, too all in one very small space, was a problem that challenged everyone. As for me, my heart sank as I saw the kitchen in the before stage. I saw it in the autumn, when the hills were scarlet and gold and the frost was in the garden. The little house caught the sun on its sloping roof, and a drift of leaves came down the wind to the open door. Here it had stood, since the early 1700's, secure against storm, comfortable in the deepest snow, offering a warm welcome to travelers.

Time had mellowed it, and as I went up the steps I thought surely this house deserved the best loving care anyone could give it. Inside were pleasant low-ceilinged rooms, open fireplaces, old furniture, warm-colored fabrics. It was a happy house, complete even to ironstone soap dishes for cigarettes, instead of modern boxes.

But the kitchen was the room visitors did not usually see! It was dark as a stack of cats, as mamma used to say, and so badly

PHOTOS BY STUART STEBENSON

Used and enjoyed under the new arrangement, the fireplace again becomes the center of the family room, with table, bench and comfortable chairs near. Its added warmth is often welcome on winter days. Chest for informal linen and silver replaces old kitchen cabinet.

BE YOUNG WITH YOUR YOUNGSTERS

ENJOY HOME GET-TOGETHERS
BE A "FRESH UP" FAMILY!

Friendly, crystal-clear 7-Up is a perfect partner to American family fun. That's because 7-Up with its sparkle, goodness and cheerful, fresh flavor is exactly suited to a happy home. It's the drink the whole family enjoys . . . grownups and youngsters alike.

Be a "fresh up" family! And as you work and play together, "fresh up" with 7-Up . . . America's home drink. Order your supply wherever you see those bright 7-Up signs.

"fresh up" WITH Seven-Up!

COPYRIGHT 1947 BY THE SEVEN-UP COMPANY

YOU LIKE IT - - - IT LIKES YOU!

(Continued from Page 85)

aid himself. And now they were to eat at le Rob's!
Tell your mother I'll have my supper ny own home and nowhere else!" he distantly.
When he got home no one was there. He d in the house, angry and almost a little htened, not knowing what to do, and he
, on the floor at his feet, a shred of someg bright. He stooped and picked it up.
was—there was no doubt about it—a little ist of bright pink silk!
ohn stood with it in his hand. She had ght the dress! She was sewing on it, at sister Maggie's sewing machine, while relations fed the children! He heard her at the door and he put the silk in his
ket. She came in and he looked at her,
d. Yes, the fever was still on her. She had that flushed, glassy-eyed look she'd n wearing now for days.
I'm sorry you couldn't come to Rob's to
," she said. "Rob came by this morning sk us. He saw in the paper about Lennie l he wanted to know about it. So he said all of us to come over."
She gave him a bowl of steaming corn-meal sh with brown sugar and top milk for his per, with a fresh cup of coffee to finish with. She opened some of her home-ed and home-canned black raspberries him and he ate them for dessert. He de no comment on the meal at all. She ked to him almost as if he were company, bright and strange. He didn't know what say to her, so he said nothing.

HE week ended and it was time to give money for another week. They had eaten four times, and they had carried out one ch from grandma's pork. They had one per of potato soup, and one of blackberry bler and top milk, and another supper of n-meal mush. Three times there had been thing for breakfast but steaming bowls of tmeal. No meat had been on his table ce the last time they had pork cooked th greens. The children didn't seem to nd, filling their stomachs with what their ther set before them. John gave her the ek's money and said nothing. In truth he dn't know what to say. All the children ked about was May Day. John never let . Let her think he didn't know what she s doing. He had a deep instinct to save face.
May Day was coming on fast. The groceries re still slim at home, but not quite so serely stringent.
Mrs. Tally said, "I wrote to Bessie about ay Day and she's coming on the bus for e day, and stay over Sunday with us, hn."

"I'll be glad to see her," he answered politely.
"Are you going to see the children
asked.
He said, "I work of afternoons, Mrs.
Tally!"
She made no answer. No one spoke at all
John was [illegible] has his pride! If she did not care to tell him he would not deign to ask her.

MRS. Tally sat on the front row of the bleachers in the school gymnasium, with the two little boys and Bessie beside her. Bessie had brought the white slippers and the white silk socks for Lennie as her mother had urged her to, by letter. They had all gone to the schoolhouse at twelve o'clock to get good seats. And when the beautiful tall young May Queen walked down the long floor in her flowing white dress and long veil and her court behind her, with Lennie and Betty, like veritable spring blossoms, running before her, with their long bright dresses and their crowned fair heads, scattering baskets of petals, the whole thing was blurred in a shimmering haze of delight that made it unearthly in its beauty. None was fairer, no head shone brighter, no face was more beautiful than Lennie's. When they all sang,
"Welcome, Queen of the May," the mother's delicate ear separated Lennie's high thin little voice from the others, and she listened in transport.
But she was just. Glancing now and then to reassure herself, at her shining little daughter, in the May Queen's Court, Mrs Tally watched her boys; one a flowering shrub, one in hillbilly rags and patches, one with a longbow, one following a covered wagon. She took good care of the smallest ones and got them and Bessie safely home.
They had a fine supper that night, ham hocks and cabbage and big mealy potatoes, and cherry pie. Everyone was tired, but radiant and satisfied. Bessie helped her mother to wash the dishes, to get the children to bed. Then she went out to see her own friends.
They sat at the table together and John said, not looking up from the paper he read,
"The little one looked nice. Nicest of them—all, I thought."
She looked at him. "You were there?"
she asked.
"Oh, I had some work in the school neighborhood and I thought I might's well look in," he said. "I saw you with Bessie and the babies. I stood over by the door. Yes, thought Lennie looked very pretty. If yo made the dress yourself, I must say you di well, Milly."
There was a little silence. Her look fastene on him so that he must lift his eyes to answe
it. Slowly the re spread in her cheek and her smile wa soft and young an tender again. He r membered now
When Bessie cam
their first baby, sh
Milly, wanted a fi
reed baby buggy th
cost seventy-five d lars! And she got too, and had raised whole family of ch
dren in it—eight them, in that san buggy! This was t way she had looke then. Must be som thing about a woma
and her girls
She was lookin very pretty now. Sh was a pretty woma
An old compulsio came upon him. I rose and kissed he
Her thin work-wo
hand lay on his nec
a moment.
"Thank yo John," she sai meekly and all w
well with him.

"This is to carry the things I need. I never can find anything in the big bag."

BY GLADYS TABER

the heart of the
ng. [illegible]
savor of venison
ked golden and ce pies thawed.
pies and froze out to be heated kettle of mulled ust in and make ents that grew am when they

ning softly, with dles were lit to earth. A certain ll of. Or maybe
oming down the

I have the great ally the old kit-ne, but now and then the old fireplace is still standing in the room where the modern housewife bakes and brews.

In one little house, hidden away in the New England hills, the lady of today was in a dreadful quandary. She couldn't bring herself to close up the lovely old fireplace and hide it behind the streamlined cabinets and counters she longed for, and yet the kitchen was almost impossible to work in, and she did have a modern, hungry husband.

How to keep the character of the past and have the modern advantages, too, all in one very small space, was a problem that challenged everyone. As for me, my heart sank as I saw the kitchen in the before stage. I saw it in the autumn, when the hills were scarlet and gold and the frost was in the garden. The little house caught the sun on its sloping roof, and a drift of leaves came down the wind to the open door. Here it had stood, since the early 1700's, secure against storm, comfortable in the deepest snow, offering a warm welcome to travelers.

Time had mellowed it, and as I went up the steps I thought surely this house deserved the best loving care anyone could give it. Inside were pleasant low-ceilinged rooms, open fireplaces, old furniture, warm-colored fabrics. It was a happy house, complete even to ironstone soap dishes for cigarettes, instead of modern boxes.

But the kitchen was the room visitors did not usually see! It was dark as a stack of cats, as mamma used to say, and so badly

NEW
- IN BEAUTY
- IN SIMPLICITY
- IN DESIGN

The REVERE WARE PRESSURE COOKER

The Revere Ware Pressure Cooker is just as great an advance over the products on the market now as Revere copper-clad stainless steel ware was over all other previous cooking utensils. It is the only one that brings you the advantages of stainless steel and copper—ultra-cleanness; resistance to pitting, staining and rusting; ease of cleaning; a new perfection of results in pressure cooking.

It is really the most beautiful cooking utensil you've ever seen. It is startlingly simple to use—closes or opens with one motion of one hand. It is absolutely unique in design. You'll particularly like the readable gauge which takes the guess out of pressure cooking and which is hinged to the lid so that you can't drop or lose it.

And remember, because it is stainless steel, copper-clad, the Revere Ware Pressure Cooker is practically indestructible. It will give you a lifetime of cooking pleasure. Look for the trade mark on the thick copper bottom.

REVERE COPPER AND BRASS INCORPORATED

Rome Manufacturing Company Division, Rome, New York

PHOTO BY STUART-STEPHENSON

On three sides of a space only 8′ x 8′—a complete modern kitchen for a woman who thinks cooking is fun if everything is within reach.

arranged that in spite of its being such a small room, the housewife had many miles to fare in getting a meal. The refrigerator was behind a partition around the corner from the stove, and the old-fashioned kitchen cabinet at the other end of the room. The low sink with the high back was opposite the magnificent old fireplace, and looked like a derelict rowboat in the stream of traffic. The tea wagon was wedged helplessly in the corner, and over it were the canisters you had to use when cooking on the range!

So far as I could see, one would have to do most of the mixing and stirring on the floor, because the sole and only work surface was the slice of cabinet on which you would have to measure the flour and eggs.

The storage space was inadequate, and to assemble supplies required more traveling than a marathon race. The sink was back-breakingly low, the shelves too high, the register was in the middle of the floor, and the plumbing extended two feet down into one end of the room from the upper floor, a feature necessary to keep the pipes from freezing during the long New England winter. A very low ceiling hung over the room. It added to the effect of darkness.

It all looked pretty hopeless, and the charming lady who had presided over it for many dinners and breakfasts and luncheons and parties said she really didn't think there was much to do but close the door and forget it as much as possible. I myself thought that if it were mine, I should give up the rest of it and cook over the fireplace, and carry water from the well forever.

But Journal Workshop planning transformed this Cinderella room into a beautiful, easy-to-work-in unit, keeping all the charm of the old and adding the efficiency of the new age. The basic principle of this remodeling was to remove the partial partitions and create a compact modern kitchen unit at one end of the room, leaving a space for the family room separated only by a low dividing cabinet from the kitchen itself. The fireplace then, instead of being a liability as far as use was concerned, suddenly took the center of the stage as a gracious and lovely focus of living. Once again, with the turn of the wheel of time, it was to come into its own, with a setting to enhance it.

Where the old sink was, and the small windows, a big wide window was installed overlooking the charming garden and the sunny slope where the red-cedar lounging chairs are placed. The plumbing was moved upward, nearer the ceiling behind what appears as a soffit over the sink which can be lifted to let heat in to the pipes on a cold winter night. Also, plumbing connections are easily accessible. The register was moved to the wall on the kitchen side of the low dividing cabinet. No more crumbs can fall down it, nor dust settle in.

When the wallboard was removed from the entire ceiling and the old sturdy beams uncovered. In one end they were like the old beams in the rest of the house, and in the other they were uneven and gaunt. The ugly ones were covered with wallboard, the good ones left exposed.

On one old beam was a fragment of the original wallpaper, a beautiful stencil design which sent me into rapture. I could almost see the slim young bride who picked it out, delicate and gentle and softly colored as it was. I felt sad that the rest of it was gone, but my spirits revived on my next visit when I saw that the wallpaper selected for the family-room end of the kitchen was a copy of an old stencil that looked almost the same.

Into the kitchen end of the room, which measures only 7′ 9″ by 8′, went a modern dishwasher sink, connected with plumbing already in the wall, a 7-cubic-foot refrigerator, a full-size electric range, cabinets to provide 19 square feet of counter space and 57 square feet of shelf space for storage! The woman who had struggled with the inconveniences of her old kitchen, but was loath to give up her fireplace, had said that she wanted a kitchen where she could stand in the middle and reach everything. Planning gave her just about that, and she doesn't have to stand over the register either.

A ventilating fan was installed in the wall above the range. This, with the dishwasher, does much to remove the objection of "mess and smell" from this modern family-room kitchen. The fan has an outside shutter which automatically closes when the fan motor is turned off, so there are no unwanted drafts. The telephone extension was moved to the beam near by where the lady of the house can answer calls while she is either at the table or working at the range.

The old back door was removed and a new door built with the upper half glass, to provide extra light. The screen door has just add WATER MIX-

and bake the BEST WAFFLES you ever tasted !

No complicated recipe to follow when you use Duff's Waffle Mix. It's fully-prepared . . . and the rich, golden-brown goodness of every waffle is proof of fine ingredients. Serve waffles often . . . they're grand for breakfast, lunch or dinner. For perfect results, always use DUFF'S!

Guaranteed by Good Housekeeping

A PRODUCT OF AMERICAN HOME FOODS

Brookema

CHOCOLATE FLAVORED PUDDING

As delicious and nutritious as the fa- BROOKEMA'S Dutch Process Cocoa

KEMA COCOA CO., OAK PARK, ILLINOIS

*A·1 SAUCE

Men have been known to kiss the cook for using A·1 sauce to flavor gravies, soups, stews and casseroles

Write for "Cooking for a Man" Heublein & Bro., Inc. Hartford, Conn.

The DASH that makes the DISH

Ceilings were low and uneven; with only a 6′ 8″ height on two walls, distance between upper and lower cabinets had to be cut to a minimum. On the sink wall no cabinets were possible, as a clearance of 22″ had to be provided for lifting the dishwasher cover. Painted and stenciled, this wall becomes a feature of the room made practical by attaching a strip of plain glass to the wall over the sink to prevent splashing the paint. A row of tubular lights installed behind the soffit illuminates the whole wall. Controlled by a switch, this provides much general illumination. Tubular lights under and in all cabinets and on the range make all working space pleasantly and adequately lighted.

Fortunately, the floor was of good hardwood, providing an excellent base for laying linoleum, but it had a decided slope! When it came to leveling sink, range and cabinets, considerable adjustment had to be made in the toe space underneath. But this is camouflaged by coving the linoleum up to meet the cabinets, which also makes for easier cleaning.

But what really made me catch my breath and utter exclamations of wonder when I saw the room finished was the perfect harmony between the old and the new in this remodeled kitchen. I would never have believed the old fireplace could be at home with the electric range, the crane with the toaster, the old andirons with the dishwasher. But a feeling for both eras provided the magic touch that made the union possible.

> If we are to get the utmost good and the keenest pleasure out of our association with animals, we must give them the right to share our working hours as well as our leisure, to occupy our house and room as well as to accompany us in our walks. Thus they will learn from us lessons mainly tending to elevate a carpet into a position of inviolable sanctity, and we shall be taught by them how easy it is (for a dog) to be loyal and friendly and faithful, and (for a cat) to be proud without ostentation and affectionate without servility.
>
> —R. C. LEHMANN:
> A Spark Divine (E. P. Dutton & Co.)

The modern sterile look of glistening white enamel in the kitchen end of the room has been softened and the room given a feeling of spaciousness by painting the walls and ceiling a soft aqua color to match that in the design of the wallpaper in the opposite end of the room. The two generations of this room have also been brought together by the use of a stencil cut from the design of the wallpaper and copied in frosty white on the wall and ceiling and on the window shade for the door. The counters were covered in rich terra-cotta linoleum, the same tone as the curtains at the big window. And the floor was covered with a good country-brown linoleum which blends with the warm wood tones of tables, chairs and chests and is also very practical, as it doesn't show tracks. The colors of ceiling, walls and counters are repeated and echoed in the hooked rug for the family-room end, and the terra-cotta draperies at the big window are of a cotton fabric that actually looks hand-loomed. Before the window, a drop-leaf table and two comfortable armchairs make a perfect setting for intimate meals. On a cold February night, the warmth of the fire is heartening and the diners are really eating by the fireplace, which is my idea of almost the only place to eat, except under an apple tree in full bloom. In spring, the morning daffodils can be watched while the shirred eggs are eaten. A garden on one side, a fireplace on the other and a modern kitchen within reach—what else could a woman want?

The lady of the house, like those others of a bygone day, may sit by the fire or the garden window and read or mend or knit and

Easy to prepare RICH IN FLAVOR

VAN CAMP'S CHILI CON CARNE is ready to heat and eat.

VAN CAMP'S TENDERONI cooks up light and fluffy in only 7 minutes.

Together — a delicious dish of rich and satisfying flavor and nourishment.

VAN CAMP'S FOODS — Products of Stokely-Van Camp, Inc., Indianapolis, Ind.
FAMOUS SINCE 1861

How do you stand?

"What a cleaner! The best for glassware!"

says MRS. D. LILLIS of Brattleboro, Vt.

"Glassware gleams no streaking with new Ethyl Cleaner suds. Fine for windows and mirrors, too." (Non-abrasive. Kind to hands.)

"Hm-m! I say Ethyl Cleaner's the best for pots and pans!"

says MRS. CHARLES HERMAN of South Bend, Ind.

"No more messy scrubbing of pots and pans. The quick-acting suds whisk away grease." Grand for dishes, too!

"You're both right! It's also best for cars!"

says MR. PHILLIP LEWIS of Scranton, Pa.

"Ethyl Cleaner suds float grime and dirt from finish, glass and upholstery!" (Economical, too! Try it!)

EVERYONE AGREES...
New Ethyl Cleaner is best for so many things!

Guaranteed by Good Housekeeping

Available at leading stores and automobile service stations still keep an eye on the progress of her dinner. There was much to be said for the friendly family feeling of those old-time kitchens. And I like to think how happy the old house is with the best of the new fitted into it and the atmosphere of the old unspoiled. Surely the bride who chose that first stencil paper would be pleased if ever she slipped back down the years on shadowy feet to see what had happened to her little house.

Snow was falling as I took a last look at the kitchen. Color and warmth, friendly atmosphere and beauty were all there under the stanch old beams. As I drove away, I began to think of all the other kitchens in the country, and to wonder what this kitchen could mean to other women. This was a special problem, I said to Honey, who had her head on my lap and was dreaming cocker dreams. And yet there are many houses not so old that are, as their discouraged owners say, "as big as a barn." Equipment is scattered hit or miss in a put-it-there fashion. In any of these too-big kitchens the same idea could be used. And for those who own an old house with a fireplace, this solution is ideal. No need of trying to get scarce materials to build on a new room for a kitchen, when the room is already there if it is planned to accommodate the kitchen units. Then, in any kitchen, grouping the service units makes for efficiency and less work. This kitchen proved to me again how small a space is necessary for the complete "works" of a kitchen, leaving the rest of whatever space is available for extra storage and extra serving, thus making a room that is open and spacious and has no dark corners.

And after all, I told Honey as the lights of the town grew through the mist of falling flakes; after all, what is better than a lovely kitchen?

"A good chicken dinner cooked in it," said Honey.

WHO HAS SEEN THE WIND?

(Continued from Page 18)

startling against the blue. It stretched to the prairie's rim. As he stared, the gray underside carded out, and through the cloud's softness was revealed a blue well shot with sunlight. Almost as soon as it had cleared, a whisking of cloud stole over it.

For one moment no wind stirred. A butterfly went pelting past. God, Brian decided, must like the boy's prairie.

The clock in the O'Connal living room ticked on in the silence as Sean O'Connal sat uncomfortably in the presence of Brian's grandmother. He was a large man in blue overalls and work smock with flat, brass buttons, his solid hands resting upon great knees. "When do you figger he'll be back?" he asked.

The grandmother looked up from her sewing. "He should be home any minute now. Ye could phone the store if ye like."

"I'll wait," said Sean. From a pants pocket he pulled out his pipe. Relaxing with the first puff, he said, "And what would you be makin'?"

Mrs. MacMurray bent her head to her work and bit off a thread. "A middy."

"I like to see a kid in overalls."

The grandmother wound thread deftly around her finger tip and into a knot. She began to sew again.

Sean cleared his throat loudly. "Where's Maggie?"

"Upstairs. She's steaming Bobbie."

"How is he?"

"He's a sick baby. Doctor Svarich was here to see him yesterday and he thinks there's the possibility of pneumonia."

Brian entered the room. "Hello, Uncle Sean."

Sean greeted the boy and turned back to the grandmother. "Anything I can do to help at all?"

"I don't think so," she said; then, "Thanks."

"Got any wheat, Uncle Sean?"

"Why, sure." Sean put his hand into his pocket and brought out a few grains. "Chew it up good, and it'll make wheat gum for you."

Brian began dutifully to chew. His grandmother called him to her chair to try on the middy.

Sean watched, then suggested, "Little full under the armpits, ain't it?"

The grandmother ignored the remark.

"Ain't them cuffs tight fer the widtha the sleeves?"

"I think I have an idea what the pattern calls for," she said. "Don't wriggle."

"I'm not," said Brian.

"All right," said Sean. "I just thought it looked kinda funny the way she hung down like a puhtatuh sack from under his ——"

"That's not the sort of language to be using before your own nephew!"

"What's wrong with my language?"

"It belongs to the barroom," said the grandmother, stung by Sean's criticism of her handiwork.

"It does not!"

"But it does, Mr. O'Connal."

"Oh." Sean's voice dropped to crooning level. With a magnificent effort at restraint he relaxed into his chair. "I will not argue it with you. I'm not like some that have to always be havin' the last word."

"I do not!"

Sean fixed his eye upon the grandmother with a significant nod of his head. His face reddened in the punishing silence as she worked over the middy upon the patient Brian. Without a word the grandmother left the room.

Brian looked up to his uncle's face with plain worship in his eyes. "I was out on the prairie today," he said.

"Were you now?" said Sean.

"Yes, and I saw a woman."

"On the prairie?" Sean took him up on his broad knee.

"No. She was at the house. I'm going tomorrow. It didn't make any gum, Uncle Sean. It swallowed." He opened his mouth to show Sean. His uncle gave him more wheat.

Sean looked up as the hallway door opened and Gerald O'Connal entered. Like Sean, Gerald was well over six feet, but there the similarity ended. Gerald's hair was a dark auburn; his face was clean-shaven, his blue eyes having the lashless look about them that often goes with red hair. Whereas Sean was the possessor of a volatile temper, Gerald was a quiet, slow-smiling and almost shy individual.

There was fifteen years' difference in their ages, a difference which gave to the rough Sean a feeling of protectiveness for his younger brother; at the same time, he stood in awe of Gerald with his university education, his fine business and his fine home.

"And how's the baby?" said Sean, letting Brian off his knee.

"Not so good," said Brian's father. "Svarich was around to see him yesterday. I hope he pulls through it all right!"

"He will," boomed Sean. He stood up. One broad, freckled hand gripped his brother's shoulder. "I—if there's anything I can do—Gerald."

"Thanks, Sean. Will you stay for supper?"

"No," said Sean. "And there's reasons fer that. The old—Mrs. MacMurray ain't—I'll be gettin' out to the farm."

"How's it going?" asked Gerald.

The concern that had been in Sean's eyes was replaced by a sudden intense light. In the course of the drought years Sean had changed from a bewildered man, watching dry winds lick up the topsoil from his land, to a man with a message. Now he launched into one of his evangelistic denunciations.

"Awful! She's plumb awful, Gerald! Stupid!" he cried. "They never hearda strip farmin' an' they don't wanta hear! 'Plant yer crops,' I tell 'em, 'in strips acrosst the prevailin' winds—fight the wind an' fight the driftin'—stop clawin' her plumb back fer wheat or oats or barley or flax! Farm her with yer hearts an' brains. Fergit yer little red tractors an' yer yella-wheeled cars an' yer trips to Washington an' Oregon an' California! Jist look at her—creased an' pocked an' cracked—no grass to hold the topsoil down! That's what happens when you crop her out an' away fer the winter—then back again in the spring to scratch at her agin—on agin, off agin an' away agin!"

Brian watched his uncle, open-mouthed. Then he turned to see his grandmother in the

(Continued on Page 95)

"I got those forty winks in, like you said, doctor, and I feel much better!"

Which spoon would you choose?

The one with these

. . . or the one without?

Come now! . . . nothing to it if you're a bright young modern Miss. You'll peek at the back of the spoon. If you see the mark INLAID you'll say, "that's the silverplate for me."

Because you'll know it's Holmes & Edwards silverplate . . . the kind that's invisibly INLAID with two blocks of sterling silver, and not just reinforced or extra-plated.

What stays lovelier longer? Holmes & Edwards Silverplate does! Each of the spoons and forks you use most often is invisibly Sterling Inlaid with two blocks of Sterling silver at the backs of the bowls and handles. Like this!

IMPORTANT: Here is one of the few products in America that has not raised its price since the war! Fifty two piece service, eight place settings. . . only $68.50 with chest (Tax Free). Choose from three favorite patterns now on display at most jewelry and silverware counters.

HOLMES & EDWARDS
STERLING INLAID°
SILVERPLATE

HERE AND HERE
It's Sterling Inlaid

LOVELY LADY DANISH PRINCESS (MADE IN U.S.A.)

Copyright 1947, The International Silver Company, Holmes & Edwards Div., Meriden, Conn. Sold in Canada by: The T. Eaton Co., Ltd., °Reg. U. S. Pat. Off.

..."and it's no TRICK to make 'em"

GLAZED HAM ROLLS

1 cup grated raw tart apple
½ cup dry bread crumbs
¼ teaspoon salt
⅛ teaspoon pepper
1 teaspoon dry mustard
½ teaspoon ginger
1 teaspoon sugar
2 tablespoons melted butter
6 slices boiled ham, ⅛ inch thick

Thoroughly mix ingredients for stuffing. Spread spoonful of mixture on each ham slice; roll as for jelly roll. Place in shallow baking dish. Pour KARO Glaze over ham rolls. Bake in hot oven (400° F.) 30 minutes, basting frequently. If desired, garnish with whole canned apricots studded with cloves.

KARO GLAZE: Combine ¾ cup KARO Syrup, Blue Label, 3 tablespoons water, ¼ cup vinegar, 6 whole cloves and 2-inch piece stick cinnamon. Simmer 5 minutes. Add 1 teaspoon grated orange rind. Makes enough Glaze for 6 Ham Rolls.

THEY LOOK FANCY... they taste delicious! But they're sure-fire and easy. No practice needed... no sleight-of-hand. The first time you try these new recipes you'll do 'em quick—and right. Just be sure to have on hand some wonderful KARO* Syrup. It does lots more than sweeten. It adds food-energy value—and the finest flavor you ever struck!

Such "dressed-up" plain food disappears like magic, when the family gets a taste. How about trying the recipes tomorrow?

THE KARO KID

PARTY BAKED APPLES

½ cup KARO Syrup, Blue Label
½ cup water
¼ teaspoon cinnamon
1 teaspoon grated lemon rind
1 tablespoon butter
2 tablespoons sugar
4 baking apples
1 egg white
2 tablespoons sugar
14 almonds, blanched, shredded
4 maraschino cherries, chopped

Combine first six ingredients. Bring to a boil. Remove from heat. Core apples; pare upper half. Place in shallow baking dish. Pour syrup mixture over apples. Bake in moderate oven (350° F.) about 1 hour or until tender, basting frequently. Remove from oven. Beat egg white until foamy; gradually beat in 2 tablespoons sugar. Top with meringue and insert almonds and cherries. Return to oven and bake 15 minutes or until delicately browned. Makes 4 servings.

*KARO is a registered trade mark of Corn Products Refining Company, New York, N.Y.

© C. P. R Co., 1947

(Continued from Page 92)

ki en doorway, her mouth down-curving in bitter disapproval. "Come into the ki en! Yer bread an' milk's ready!"

ian moved slowly toward her, still half da d and hypnotized by the spell of his ur 's words.

ian had to knock twice at the brown ho e by the church. A man opened the door, an Brian's eyes went immediately to the pi e-nez glasses with their black cord loop- in down his vest.

Yes?"

I'm visiting God today."

Oh," the man said, and smiled a slow sm e. "I'm at breakfast right now, but I th k we could make it after another piece of to t. Whose boy are you?"

My dad's. I'm B n."

Brian who?"

Brian Sean Mac- M ray O'Connal. W at's your name?"

John Hewlett H op," said the m ister, "B.A., B.D. C ne inside."

Mrs. Hislop was s ing at the kitchen t le. Brian waited i patiently while the m ister ate another p e of toast. He a it noisily, as B an's father always d.

By the time he was f shed, Brian could h dly contain him- s . He ran down f house steps and t those of the c urch. Mr. Hislop l ked through the k s on the ring. ey crossed a short l way and entered e church.

Through the ined-glass window morning sunshine eamed, a fluted r of light shear- g the church dusk. ifting motes trav- d from outer dark- ss, across the light d into nothingness ain.

Their footsteps opped echoing rough the empty urch. Brian looked to the window's ue-and-ruby glow.

"How do you like it?" Mr. Hislop's voice emed to bounce off the quiet.

"Is God busy right now?"

"Yes. He's busy. Just what did you have mind?"

"Where—where is He? That's just His icture—all grapes and bloody."

"Lemon-colored, too," pointed out Mr. lislop. "Why do you want to see ——"

"What are those—with things to their acks—wings?"

"Angels."

"And wherever they go they fly there—ll the time up in the sky, and there's sunhine, and it's blue, and heaven's where God s. He's in heaven—that's just like a picture f Him—isn't it?"

The minister nodded.

"He has lots of fun." Brian turned. "He as lots of fun up there."

"He looks after things."

"Does He? What things?"

"Flowers—birds—people—things. He makes meadow larks sing. If an ant climbs a grass blade, a—a grasshopper spits tobacco uice, that's God."

"Trees—trees—does He do trees?"

"He makes leaves from buds—men from boys. He hands out the colors and the sounds and tastes and feels. He makes hunger—loving—sleeping—waking ——"

"Everything?"

Mr. Hislop nodded.

Brian was silent a moment. "What are their wings made out of?"

"Feathers," said the minister. "I think."

"Are there any little boy angels like I am?"

"There are some. When a little boy dies, he becomes a boy angel."

"Oh," said Brian.

Outside, the sunlight was bright in Brian's eyes; he stood on the church steps a moment, thanked Mr. Hislop. Then he started home.

Mr. Hislop watched Brian as far as the corner; he turned to the house, then through to the back where the lawn mower waited. As he pushed it ahead of him over the back lawn, he thought of the boy. Something had been proved, he supposed. He bent down to extricate a piece of twine that had wound itself up in a mower wheel.

He sat down in the grass and stared out over the untidy yard. No two ways about it; it was messy, with its litter of papers, its grass growing rank along the edges, its old bones that dogs had left. It had offended Mrs. Abercrombie to the point of her mentioning it to his wife as she left church last Sunday. That old girl had her knife into him all right.

At MacTaggart's Corner, several blocks away from the Presbyterian manse, Brian and Forbsie Hoffman sat on the top rail of the fence.

"I wish I knew where we could get some feathers from," Brian was saying.

"I busted a pillow once."

"We could start from the garage and get there quick."

"Get there—get there," said Forbsie, "quick there—quick there—quick."

"We could bounce on the clouds."

"Pillows' stummicks is full of feathers," said Forbsie.

Brian got down from the fence. "With string we could make them."

Forbsie jumped down, his fat cheeks jouncing as he landed. "They snowed all over my room."

"We'll tie them together," explained Brian with excitement, "and that'll be wings for us. You can have wings too—string-and-feather wings. How do you get their feathers out?"

"Paring knife."

"Wait here," Brian told him. "I'm going into the house. You wait here."

His grandmother was ironing in the breakfast room; he saw only her erect back as he went silently through the smell of newly ironed clothes and into the living room. From the couch he took a pillow, then went out the front door and around to the back where Forbsie waited.

He made two more trips into the house without his grandmother's knowing it, once for the paring knife, again for string.

The feathers, as Forbsie had told him, were very tiny, hundreds of them spreading themselves over the sand, stirring to the slightest breeze, lifting and drifting over the yard.

"What yuh doin'?"

Arthur Sherry, a six-year-old cynic in overall pants and sleeveless, faded blue shirt

NEXT MONTH

LEONARD looked down at Anne. There should be something wrong with her: her ankles should be thick, her nose stub, or her eyes too far apart. Maybe the real flaw in the picture was his being with her in the first place. He couldn't shake the feeling that they were heading for some kind of disaster. He knew now that it was marriage or nothing with Anne. Her principles were not many, nor were they very conspicuous, but, like a sunken boulder, they were immovable.

So Leonard married her. There was only one way to hold Anne. One way to gentle a creature so wild and undisciplined.

He did it so quietly that Anne never realized how captive she was until she saw the man she might have married. Not until she stood so close to the girl who had stolen Fred from her that she could see the fear and shame in the other's face, did Anne discover what Leonard had done to her heart.

THE HELLER

By William Henning

condensed from the novel soon to be published by Charles Scribner's Sons, complete in the March JOURNAL.

try it and you'll never be without a McKEE RANGE-TEC SKILLET

From the world's most complete line of glass cooking utensils.

Every kitchen needs at least one Range-tec Skillet. Two sizes, at leading dealers everywhere.

Much less frying smoke—because no old grease can permeate the non-porous surface of glass.

So easy to clean! Washes as brightly and quickly as your dinner glassware.

The handle always stays cool! Protects you from the hazards of painful burns.

McKEE GLASS COMPANY
Jeannette, Pa.
QUALITY GLASSWARE SINCE 1853

ALWAYS LOOK FOR AND INSIST ON

McKEE RANGE-TEC TOP OF STOVE WARE

McKEE GLASBAKE OVEN WARE

PUBLIC LIBRARY

Here's a swell new one!

SMO-KAY... WITH THE TANTALIZING FLAVORS OF HICKORY SMOKE AND GOLDEN CHEDDAR! IT'S THE 8TH VARIETY IN THE FAMOUS LINE OF KRAFT CHEESE SPREADS. TRY THEM ALL!

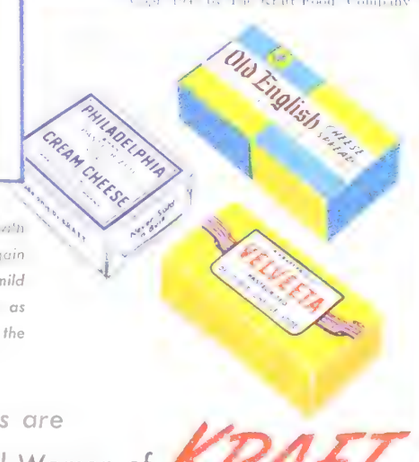
Whether your snacks are to be simple or fancy, Kraft Cheese Spreads give you a tantalizing assortment fast.

Here we have open-face and rolled sandwiches using quick spreading Kraft Pimento and Olive-Pimento Spreads. The new Smo-kay, zestful Roka and Kraft Relish Spreads would be grand, too.

And for hearty sandwiches, don't forget Old English, Kraft Limburger Spread, and (the children's favorite) Kraft Pineapple Spread.

That's eight kinds in all, each one wholesome, nutritious, so tempting—in other words, Kraft-ready!

Copyright 1946 by The Kraft Food Company



READY NOW. Golden Old English Spread with the sizzling cheese flavor is now again in half-pound packages. Also get rich, mild Velveeta, the cheese food that's digestible as milk. And genuine "Philadelphia" Brand, the cream cheese that's guaranteed fresh.

The World's Favorite Cheeses are made by the Men and Women of KRAFT looked down at them through thick-lensed glasses.

"Making wings," Brian told him. "We're going to fly."

A sound of disgust issued from Arthur's lips. "Anybody knows you can't make wings to fly."

"Yes, we can," said Brian. "We can if we want to."

"Maybe they won't work," said Forbsie.

"Yes, they will," Brian said with fervor. "They will so work." Even as he said it he was aware of a sinking feeling in his stomach, a sudden and very physical loss.

Arthur made a snorting noise. "Just with airplanes—that's all."

"And wings! Angels got wings! They fly too!"

"Not made outa string—with pillow feather. They grow 'em."

Brian was silent. He had not thought of that.

Arthur went on: "Outa their shoulders. They always had 'em—like a sparrow—not outa chicken feathers tied with string. Store string," he added disgustedly.

Brian faced Arthur. "Well, I'm going to heaven!"

"Artie—dinner!" called Mrs. Sherry.

Arthur looked back over his shoulder and saw that his mother had gone back into the house. He pushed Brian in the chest with both hands so that he sat down. "No, you ain't. Not with string an' feathers."

And Brian, staring down at the pitifully few feathers they had tied, knew that Arthur was perfectly right.

MaggieO'Connal had been one of the prettiest things to come to the town after she married Gerald O'Connal in the early twenties. She met him in the Ontario town where he came for his apprenticeship after a pharmacy course at the university and three years overseas in the war.

Maggie O'Connal was still pretty; slight and small-boned, she had the same dignity of posture that was both Brian's and her mother's. From her Brian had inherited his dark eyes and hair, and learned his careful enunciation.

At the dinner table that evening, Brian bowed his head, palms together against his breastbone, as his father said grace:

"For what we are about to receive at this time, O Lord, make us truly thankful. Amen."

Tonight was the baby's first meal with them, and he sat in his high chair between his grandmother and his father. His illness had given his usually pale face a waxen quality. He looked far from fragile, however. Orange-red hair was like froth on the top of his head, and his blue eyes were almost wild with devilishness.

"Ye need not give me any of the carrots, thank ye, Maggie," said Brian's grandmother. "We're a wee bit short on material—ye should have read what the pattern called for." She had been working on another suit for Brian.

"You'll need all the cloth before you're through," said Brian's mother. "Put your plate down, Brian."

"You needn't give me any of the carrots, mother."

"Carrots are good for you, son," she said as she heaped his plate.

"They make ye grow," his grandmother said. "I'm fond of them myself ——"

"You can have mine."

"—— but they disagree with me."

"Eat your carrots," said Brian's mother. Brian picked up his fork.

"Isn't he the comical one, though!" exclaimed the grandmother.

Butter and jam were smeared around the baby's mouth and on the tip of his nose. He wore an oilcloth bib decorated with kittens and a great deal of the egg he'd had for his dinner. He was holding out what had once been bread and butter to his grandmother.

"Dere—brea'."

He had very bad manners, decided Brian.

Foolish eaters are to be found all over the world, but natives on the Gold Coast of West Africa prepare a main dish of a potato-pumpkin. They smash this up and cook it in a big pot, sprinkling in a lot of salt. When pronounced done, the whole family surround the pot and eat the filthy-looking sludgelike mixture by the handful. They gorge themselves and, directly they begin to suffer pains in their "inner man," send off to the near-by store for a quantity of pills and salts. "White man's magic," they call these purges.
—NEW HEALTH.

The puppy's feet were spraddled out, the grass brushing his fat stomach. He was red and white. He was Brian's.

"He's the jeezliest thing."

"What's that?" Brian asked.

"I dunno," said Forbsie. "I just made it up."

"His ears flop," pointed out Artie Sherry.

"But they will stick up," Brian assured him. "He'll get older. He's a fox terrier. He's a fox-terrier pup."

"I like his belly," said Forbsie.

"He has a very pretty inside to his mouth," Brian said. "Freckles—black ones. Look." The puppy tried to get away from him, but he managed to hold its jaws apart for the other boys to see. "There's tiny, tiny waves," he explained to them. "They're hard ones. You stick your finger in and you'll feel them. I'll let you feel."

Forbsie and Artie felt.

"He's got a candy tongue," said Forbsie as he wiped his fingers on the grass. "Where did you get him?"

"My dad brought him home."

The puppy's attention was taken by a white butterfly that went scattering past him; he galloped awkwardly after it.

"He don't seem so bright," Artie said. "Is he housebroke?"

"He doesn't do on rugs. Just on bare floors."

"Do you rub his nose into it?" asked Artie.

"Uh-uh!"

"You're sposed to."

"I don't care! Nobody's rubbing my dog's nose into anything! I'll fix her!"

"Your maw?" asked Forbsie.

"Gramma. He gets under her feet all the time. He chewed up a lot of squares she was saving for a log-cabin quilt. He coughed them all up in her room. She says he's yappy."

The puppy was yapping shrilly now—at Artie's boot. He stopped to look under his stub tail. He sat up. He yawned. He turned his head over his shoulder, saw Brian, ran to him with his stern wiggling, and climbed up into his lap. Brian tried to hold his head out of reach, but the puppy licked at his nose and tried to get his ear to chew.

It was a shame that he liked to chew things. It was a shame that the grandmother's dresses were so close to the floor and that they rustled. Several times the puppy had got his teeth into the hem and had leaned back tugging.

Three weeks after Brian got his dog, the grandmother's patience almost reached the breaking point. She was crotchety one day at lunchtime when she was unable to find the pillow she usually sat on.

"I've not used it all morning," she said. "I left it on my chair right here in the breakfast room. It is not here now."

"Well," said Brian, "the pup didn't get it."

"I did not say that he did. But if he did not, has it grown legs and walked away?"

"Perhaps it's on your rocker, mother, in your room."

"It is not there, I tell you."

"I'll just take a look," said Mr. O'Connal.

When Brian's father had brought the pillow downstairs from her room, she did not tell Brian she was sorry. Throughout the meal she complained of the dog. She had never known a smellier dog; as she said this she lifted her head and sniffed loudly. Brian's mother asked him to leave the table and wash his hands.

(Continued on Page 98)

ve any course a new lease on flavor!

Starters, salads, desserts — they all com easy with Del Monte Brand Fruit Cocktail

1-We put extra care here

Extra care where? In the "case history" we keep on every lot of pears for Del Monte Fruit Cocktail.

Pears aren't like other fruits. To develop perfect flavor, texture and aroma, they must be brought to perfect ripeness off the tree. Then how do we tell when they're ready for canning?

Experts, with years of experience, judge by color and fragrance. But even this is not enough. With each lot of Del Monte Pears goes a complete "clinical record"—a history of when picked and where—plus a whole series of "pressure testings" to show exactly the speed with which texture is changing.

Why go to such lengths for just one ingredient in a five-fruit combination? Because flavor is our responsibility—to you and to our brand. We know that every bit of extra care we take means greater enjoyment for you.

Extra flavor? Sure—Del Monte always puts flavor first

2-You get extra flavor here

Take one good look at those festive colors—one good taste of those five perfectly blended, rich-ripe fruits—and you'll know Del Monte Fruit Cocktail is going to solve a lot of menu problems for you! Best of all, no work for you—no peeling, dicing, mixing! There's no end of ways to serve it—these three will just give you an idea:

BASKET SALAD: (Center) Hollow out grapefruit; set scooped-out fruit aside for breakfast. Line shells with endive; fill with drained Del Monte Fruit Cocktail and serve with this

Nut-Date Dressing

- ¼ cup syrup from the Del Monte Fruit Cocktail
- 2 tbsps. cornstarch
- ¼ tsp. salt
- 1 tbsp. vinegar
- ½ cup finely chopped dates
- ¾ cup cream or top milk, whipped
- ½ cup chopped walnuts

Mix together the syrup, cornstarch, salt and vinegar. Cook [illegible] constantly, until mixture is thick and clear. Continue cooking [illegible] 4 minutes longer. Cool slightly, stir in dates and nuts. Fold in the cream, whipped light but not stiff. Makes about 2 cups dressing.

ORCHARD APPETIZER: (Right, above) Chill can or jar of Del Monte Fruit Cocktail, open, serve in frosty glasses—it's easy as that!

HURRY-UP DESSERT: (Left, above) Frill grated coconut around the edge of dishes of chilled Del Monte Fruit Cocktail. What could be simpler? And so lavish in luscious fruit flavor!

Del Monte FRUIT COCKTAIL

MOM! I'M FRANTIC!

THAT DARNED HUSBAND OF MINE THINKS HE DOESN'T LIKE FISH!

STOP WORRYING, SUE!

YOUR FATHER WAS LIKE THAT UNTIL I SERVED HIM HE-MAN TUNA DISHES!

There are lots of ways of serving tuna . . . both hot and cold . . . that men like. That important "He" in your life will go for Tuna Cutlets in a big way. Or, Curried Tuna. And in hot weather, a great big Tuna Salad. But, be sure to "introduce" him to tuna at its best . . . insist upon these famous brands of QUALITY tuna.

VAN CAMP SEA FOOD CO., INC.
Terminal Island, California

THE BRANDS

THAT MADE

TUNA famous!

Buy EITHER Brand...the quality is the same

(Continued from Page 96)

Just as dessert was brought to the table, the grandmother's stomach rumbled distantly. "'Tis my nervous indigestion," she excused herself. "The dog has done it."

"Has the pup been chewing that too?" asked Brian's father jokingly.

The grandmother chose to be hurt. "Go ahead. Poke fun at an old woman while ye still have time for it."

Mr. O'Connal apologized immediately, but the harm had been done. To mollify her mother's feelings, Mrs. O'Connal announced that from now on the dog was not to enter the house; he was to sleep outside—in the garage.

That night, with Brian's help, Mr. O'Connal tied the puppy with a length of binder twine in one corner of the garage. The puppy bit vainly at it, jumped from it again and again. Then he sat and cried pitiful, squeaking cries.

Brian could hear the puppy long after he had gone to bed. After his father and mother had left to visit the Abercrombies, he took two blankets from his bed, sneaked down the two flights of stairs and out of the house. He had difficulty in getting the wide garage doors open, and as he struggled he could hear the dog scratching frantically on the other side. One of the doors came open suddenly, and the puppy was jumping up on him. It had chewed through the twine.

It took the dog some time to quiet down; for a while it wriggled ecstatically on Brian's stomach, then curled up in the curve of his elbow. Finally it laid its chin over his shoulder, took one deep breath, nudged Brian's neck with its cold nose, and went to sleep.

It was nice, thought Brian, that his parents had gone to the Abercrombies'. The dog's stomach rumbled twice. Brian put his arms around its neck. He went to sleep too.

Mr. Abercrombie dealt the cards with deft little flicks that sent them round the table to drop in piles as accurate as the man himself. His hands, thought Mrs. O'Connal, were bank-manager hands, square in their palms and finger tips, the knuckles sharply angled.

To Mrs. O'Connal's right, Mrs. Abercrombie was having some difficulty in concealing the irritation she felt at seeing Mr. O'Connal absent-mindedly picking up one by one the cards her husband dealt.

Gerald O'Connal's mind was not on bridge. It was in the office of Doctor Svarich, where he had spent part of that afternoon. As he had linked up his sleeves, Peter Svarich, a thin-faced man with an air of discontent, had watched him, one leg over the corner of the table.

"Bit of gastritis, I'd say."

"Serious?" Mr. O'Connal had asked.

"No—not yet. Might bloom into an ulcer. You could try relaxing a bit. Stay away from liquor—pastries—fried stuff; take a quart or two of warm cocoa to the store with you—drink it in the middle of the morning and the afternoon. That'll put out the fire."

The sound of Abercrombie's flat voice brought Mr. O'Connal back to the room. "The trouble with the West," Abercrombie was saying, "has been threefold." He paused in dealing the cards. "A—too much credit in the beginning—an unhealthy amount of it through the twenties. B—farmers are not a thrifty lot. C—the wealth of the country doesn't come from sufficiently diversified sources." The cards took up their snickering again.

"We need an up-and-coming man in the church," said Mrs. Abercrombie. "Just look at the condition of that yard. There's no rhyme or reason to his calls."

She's on poor Hislop again, thought Mrs. O'Connal wearily.

Mrs. Abercrombie was as shapeless as her husband was angular. Strange that so large a woman was so energetic; she was active in church work, the Red Cross, Daughters of the Empire, the Eastern Star, the library board, the local relief committee for the unfortunates of the dried-out area. By virtue of her rings, the dignity of her husband's work, a trip they had taken to Europe six years before, and a certain insensitivity to what others thought, her social position in the town was unassailable.

Jake Harris, the town garbage collector, fireman and policeman, stood in the O'Connal garage with a flashlight turned on Brian and the dog asleep on the floor. He had been summoned from his room on the second floor of the town hall. Mrs. O'Connal's usually contained voice had been frantic.

"So this is where you got to."

Brian concerned himself with getting sleep from his eyes.

"You've give yer maw an' paw quite a start."

"I just thought I'd sleep with my pup," Brian said.

The puppy was awake; he stood for a moment with his feet apart, then went to smell the bottoms of Jake's pants. He wagged his tail. He liked the bottoms of Jake Harris' pants.

"Nice-lookin' pup. Better git in the house an' let your maw know you're all right."

From the darkness of the front veranda, Brian's mother came out to meet him; her arms around him were convulsively tight.

Within the house, his grandmother embraced him; but his father, when he had returned from downtown where he had been looking for Brian, was not quite so effusive.

"Why did you ever do a thing like that? Why did you go out to the garage to sleep?"

"I wanted to sleep with my pup," said Brian.

"I don't suppose it occurred to you that we might worry about you?"

"I just wanted to be with my pup, that's all."

His father looked at him seriously. "Look, spalpeen, I got that puppy against your mother's wishes. Now there's been nothing but trouble ever since that dog came to the house; if I hear of any more, there isn't going to be any puppy around the house. Understand?"

Brian nodded.

Mr. Hislop laid the letter down on the desk in his study. It was a protesting letter. It had been written by the Ladies' Auxiliary and was signed by Mrs. Abercrombie. The candlelight service of the Canadian Girls in Training had not found favor with the Ladies' Auxiliary. The letter had come as a shock to Hislop, who had assumed that everyone in the congregation had been as pleased as he with the service, with the white middies, blue skirts and blue ties of the C.G.I.T. girls. They had filed down both aisles of the church, each carrying a candle, their young voices lifted in Follow the Gleam. To Hislop it had been a moving ceremony.

Now, he felt rather sick. He had not thought that any members of his congregation would consider the candle ceremony an indication that Knox Presbyterian church was turning Roman Catholic.

But he might have known, he thought bitterly. Mrs. Abercrombie's intolerance was an evil force in the town; he had known it very soon after taking over the church, when he had been indiscreet enough to play tennis with Father Cochran, and later when she had bucked combining services in the summer with the Baptist church. He got up and went to the study window; there he stood looking out to the hedge and the street beyond. Perhaps he should call a meeting of the elders tonight. He could use the assurance of their confidence in him.

Brian O'Connal, his puppy in his arms, walked down Sixth Street in the direction of MacTaggart's Corner. It had not been the dog's fault; the chain his father had got for it should not have been long enough to reach the washing; the clothesline should have been stronger too.

But last night, his father had said to him, "Remember what I told you, spalpeen?"

"Yes. I remember."

"There was some trouble this morning."

"He just pulled the clothesline down."

"I have to do something about it."

"Send him away?"

That adds International Flavor to SPAGHETTI • MEATS • STEWS • SOUPS • SEA FOODS

Magic Mexene is the all-purpose seasoning with which to make your own Mexican foods and to add new life and zest to favorite American dishes. If your grocer does not have Mexene, send us his name, address, and 10c; we'll mail you postpaid a regular can of Mexene and recipes for making Mexican foods and seasoning American dishes. Walker's Austex Chili Co., Dept. J-71, Austin, Texas.

WALKER'S AUSTEX CHILI COMPANY

TAMALES • BEEF STEW SPAGHETTI and MEAT BALLS

Fisher's Instant Whole Wheat Cereal

Fisher's Quality Foods ..... Seattle, U.S.A.

BE WISE SELL INDIVIDUAL 5¢ AND 1 GREETING CARDS

COST YOU 2½¢ UP

Extra money quick. Up to 100% profit. Extra bonus. Large variety Birthday, Gift Wrappings, Correspondence Notes assortments. Send at once for FREE catalog of wonderful year 'round money-making line super value assortments and FREE samples name imprinted stationery. Request special tea $1.00 All Occasion assortment on approval.

19 NE 194

$1.00 & 6 ASSORTMEN

30¢ EA

Special Offe

FREE SAMPLES 50 for $1.00 PERSONAL STATIONERY

NEW ENGLAND ART PUBLISHE BOX A, NORTH ABINGTON, MA.

KNITTING YARNS Prompt Mail Servi

Send for FREE Samples

COLONIAL YARN HOUSE, 1231-R Cherry St., Phila. 7,

1—I've had a talk with Forbsie's Hoffmans haven't a grandmother with them, you know."
ow."
uppy wouldn't cause such a rumpus se where there wasn't a grandmother. at that if we were to send the puppy ntil it wasn't so much of a pup, it e a good idea."
all the time?"
"
for a long time," Brian had said, hat his eyes were stinging.
for a long time," his father assured until he has grown up. Mr. Hoffman t they'd look after him for us."
—couldn't—send gramma away till— ——" ther had reached into his hip pocket ded him a handkerchief.
after his father had left, Brian had im in their bedroom below; he had a lot like Uncle Sean.
ie was standing at MacTaggart's he had evidently been told of the ment made for the dog. Brian said: aking my pup over to stay with ot very long. It's not for good."
t's dandy," said his fat face shin- Our pigeon's got gs now."
s only staying gets bigger."
eggs are in a d I'm going to our pup to play d ——" got to feed him ing and noon and on and at night ve him milk."
ight," said Forb- an I carry him "
Don't feed him an what I say. et fat. His legs funny."
ight. There's go- e baby pigeons t of those eggs. carry him for a w?"
s kind of heavy." doesn't look I could carry right."
"
Hoffman, when had taken the nto the house, promised him that it e allowed to sleep by the stove in the It would not have to sleep alone he barn.
orning Brian played with the puppy. ernoon he played with the puppy. inner he missed the dog badly. He wn to the coal room in the cellar and chunk of wood there. When he was , he went up to bed.

days that followed, Brian O'Connal accept his dog's exile, after he found could see him daily. He spent his nornings and afternoons over at the ns'. It was a week later that he and first saw the baby pigeons.
hay in the Hoffmans' loft was piled ne end; the sunlight, slanting down window high in the peak, was almost ith dust. Forbsie and Brian gazed e top of the hay hill and into the one of the two-by-fours between the all studding.
e nest were open mouths, eager and ly upon wormlike necks.
ey came out of the eggs," Forbsie said proprietary ring in his voice.
ll their mother sit on them like she the eggs?"
wonder how they got in there in the ace?" said Forbsie. "There weren't les for them to crawl into that I could ow did they do it?"
ask my dad."
n did not climb through the hole in t floor when Forbsie left. He watched the baby pigeons for a long time. He was still there when Forbsie [illegible] out the [illegible] tion of their origin. He was still considering it as he walked home to lunch.

Brian met his father returning from work. "Dad," he said as he walked by his side, "I want to ask you about some pigeons. How did they get in there?"

"Where, spalpeen?"

"Those eggs. How did they get in there in the first place?"

"The father pigeon put them there."

"How?"

"Well, at first there wasn't any egg. Then the mother pigeon put the egg around it."

"She built it?"

"Yes, she built it."

"I guess that's right," said Brian. "I'm going to tell Forbsie."

In the Presbyterian manse study, Mr. Hislop said to Digby, "There's nothing else I can do. I couldn't get up each Sunday and preach to them, knowing they that they all felt as she did."

"The trouble with you," said Digby, "is that you're too thin-skinned. You're tender. That's no good if you're a minister or a schoolteacher. You've got to be tough good and tough. I'm tough. You're not."

"And my elders I never thought for a minute they'd take the stand they did. I'll have to resign."

"Fight 'em," said Digby. "Get up there and give it to them."

"If it only hadn't happened," said Hislop. "It makes me feel like a fool—stupid blind—gullible fool! I knew they thought I was impractical—you can always expect a certain amused patronizing from your congregation—but ——"

Digby got up from his chair; he went over to Hislop and put his arm over the minister's shoulder. The two stood silently side by side looking out at the rain.

On Hoffman's barn roof the rain was loud; the hayloft was dim. Brian had not called in at Forbsie's house. No one knew that he was up here. In the dusk of the loft he could just see the heads of the baby pigeons. They were partly feathered, their eyes opened. The mother pigeon had left the nest, slapping her wings frantically at Brian's approach. She walked back and forth now, cooing anxiously on a rafter at the other end of the loft.

Brian reached out and touched the head of one of the baby pigeons; it was blood-warm. He stroked the weaving head with his finger. He slid his hand under the pigeon and took it from the nest, cheeping loudly. He held it to his chest, his head bent over it. He put it inside his shirt, then buttoned up his coat. A baby pigeon was almost as good as a pup.

The rain had stopped, and the air had a fresh and sparkling quality; eaves dripped steadily into rain barrels overflowing. In the running gutters could be seen the reflection of the sun, now a clean, whole disk, now a broken, quicksilver thing that joined, then broke again into rippling bars.

Rain still streaked the windows of the O'Connal back porch where Brian O'Connal sat on the floor, staring down at the baby pigeon in his hand. His father stood tall above him. The bird's skin lids were closed over its eyes; the bald head, with its tiny plowshare beak edged with yellow, hung down. The little body was not warm.

"It's dead, spalpeen," Brian's father said gently.

Fortuneteller

BY ETHEL JACOBSON

The gypsy, the gypsy
With magic-tinged art
Said two would come wooing
To sue for my heart,
Slender and supple
With eyes darkly blue—
And one would be false
As the other was true.

She told me, she told me
That one would bring song
And one fill with sorrow
My whole life long.
But there was an end
To her clairvoyant art:
She didn't say how
I could tell them apart!

"Bake this better tasting Cake and hear 'em yell for more!"

says Aunt Jenny

Lighter, more delicious cake—so easy with Spry and its One-Bowl Method!

"I CAN'T begin to tell you how heavenly-light and luscious this Valentine white cake is. You just bake it for company and they'll tell you how scrumptious it is.

"Spry has a magic cake-making secret you don't get in any other type of shortening. And Spry's One-Bowl Cake Method is a miracle of speed and ease. You can thank Spry for grand new cake success."

Sweetheart Valentine Cake

2 cups sifted cake flour
1½ cups sugar
3½ teaspoons baking powder (or 4 teaspoons if low-sodium type)
1 teaspoon salt
½ cup Spry
1 cup milk
1 teaspoon vanilla
¾ teaspoon almond extract
½ teaspoon orange extract
3 egg whites, unbeaten

Sift flour, sugar, baking powder and salt into mixing bowl. Drop in Spry and creaming needed. Add ¾ of milk, then flavorings. Beat 150 strokes. Scrape [illegible] throughout entire mixing. Add egg whites; beat 250 strokes. Add [illegible] strokes. Notice what an easy-to-beat, easy-to-pour batter you get with Spry. Only one bowl to wash!

Bake in two deep 8-inch Spry-coated layer [illegible] Spread Valentine Frosting between layers and on top and sides. Mark a large heart on top of cake; fill in with sugar tinted red. Sprinkle one cup coconut over sides and top around heart.

Valentine Frosting

Use one-half your regular recipe for 7-Minute Frosting. Flavor with ¾ teaspoon vanilla, ½ teaspoon almond extract and ¼ teaspoon orange extract.

Feast on Compliments

Get Spry's grand help with all your cooking if you want more compliments. Make sure of flaky, tender pie crust with creamy, easy-to-blend Spry.

Fry with pure, all-vegetable Spry and serve crisp, golden-brown, fresh-tasting fried foods—so digestible even the youngsters can have all they want!

Spry is a product of Lever Brothers Company

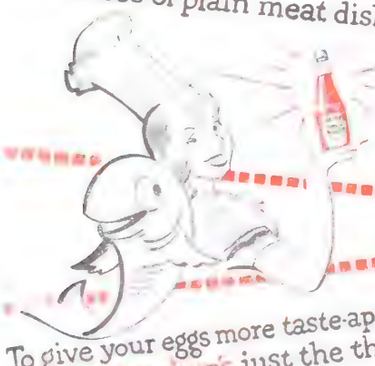
Kitchen Tricks

Every Good Cook Should Know

Transform plain dishes into food folks talk about! Use Heinz Tomato Ketchup ...the mingled richness of prize tomatoes, Heinz Vinegar and rare spices!

Gravies lose their pallid look -
Take on a racy savor -
Stews taste better, too, when blessed
With grand Heinz Ketchup flavor

The makings of delicious sauce
For seafoods and for fishes,
Heinz Ketchup also lends new zest
To scores of plain meat dishes



To give your eggs more taste-appeal
Heinz Ketchup's just the thing -
A dash or so of this thick sauce
Will make an omelet sing

HEINZ KETCHUP

Made from Heinz "Aristocrat" tomatoes, rare spices and fine vinegar!

"It happens to things."

"Why does it happen to things?" He turned up his face to his father, cheeks stained with drying tears.

"That's the way they end up."

Brian looked down again at the baby pigeon in his hand. "It was in an egg. Now it's stopped."

"Yes, spalpeen, it's stopped."

"I want my pup."

"All right. We'll bring him back."

"Why did it ——"

"Let me have it, spalpeen."

"What are you going to do?"

"I'll bury it for you."

"Where will you do it?"

"Where do you want me to? The back garden?"

"I guess so." He looked down at the baby pigeon's limp body again; it was just like dirt, he thought, like prairie dirt that wasn't alive at all. He looked up to his father again. "I know where. The prairie—dig a hole for it in the prairie."

"All right."

"Where the boy is," said Brian. "There is where—not with houses." He was aware of a sudden relief; the sadness over the death of the baby pigeon lifted from him.

"After dinner, then, spalpeen," his father promised.

The late-evening sun lay dilute on the flat fronts of the houses along Sixth Street as Brian and his father walked out to the prairie. By a pile of field stone just outside the town's edge, the father turned to the boy. The son lifted his arm with the bird's neck lank from his small fist. The father knelt, placed the dead pigeon on the sod beside him, and began to dig with the small, green garden trowel he had brought out.

He stood up, brushed the dirt from his hands, looked into his son's face. As he did, he caught a flicker of movement in a clump of buckbrush to the left. He walked toward it, his son behind him. He bent down and carefully parted the bushes. Crouched there, looking up, was the boy that Brian had met out on the prairie earlier in the summer. The father let the branches go back together.

"He was watching," said the son as they walked back to the town. "He does that all the time."

"Do you know him?"

"Yes. It's his."

"What is, spalpeen?"

"The prairie is."

"How is it his?"

"I don't know. It just is. What's his name?"

The father looked down at his son, a puzzled look upon his face. "That's the Young Ben."

Father and son began to walk home.

II

ALTHOUGH two years of wind had piled the black dust even higher against the fences and farm buildings, the fall of 1932 still brought the excitement of harvest with it. It was an urgent time of the year for the town, whose livelihood depended upon the prairie.

On the morning of the first day of September, the bright noise of sparrows woke Brian. The curtains in his room breathed in and out with the fall breeze as he lay still beside his brother; he could see his clothes folded over the foot of the white-enameled iron bed. His mother had put them there the night before. Today was to be his first day in school.

From under the bed came a frantic scrabbling of sound; the red-and-white fox terrier jumped up. His one red ear gave to his head an archly tilted look.

"Down, Jappy." Brian pushed him from the bed; he flung back the covers.

With the dog trotting after him, he went to the open window. He would not have to say that next year he was going to sch thought Brian—he was going today. was old enough now. He would find out about things.

"You up?" Bobbie was a chunky b four now. "I wish I was going to school."

"You will when you get old enoug Brian began to dress.

DOWNSTAIRS Maggie O'Connal stood the stove in the kitchen; she prepared family breakfast with quick, birdlike mo ments. Brian said good morning to trying his best to hide the excitement t was in him.

"Off to school, spalpeen?" Brian felt a r of emotion, as he always did when his fat spoke to him. Gerald O'Connal ruffled son's hair as he passed Brian; he sat dow the opposite end of the table. "You—u do as they tell you, Brian."

"I still think I should go with him —

"No, Maggie," Brian's father interrup her.

"You don't have to go," said Br "Forbsie's starting, too, and his mot isn't going with him."

The look upon Maggie O'Connal's sm face tightened; it was not a happy one.

As he broke up stale bread and poured m over it for his dog, Brian wished that pare wouldn't act as they were doing. straightened up from the dog's dish.

"It's not time yet," said his mother.

"I know. I'm going upstairs a minu

> One may be discouraged about the Administration, about Congress, about the Supreme Court, about the racketeering of labor leadership, about political corruption, about many ominous tendencies in American life, but he cannot be discouraged about the way the common man seems to be understanding and correctly appraising, on the average, the American situation as reflected by the Gallup polls.
>
> —DR. ROBERT A. MILLIKAN: Science, War & Human Progress.

In his room he pic up the pistol that on the table by the b it was a water pi with a rubber bulb a handle. He carrie with him always was not truly dres without it. He w downstairs again.

"He's so young," heard his mother ing.

"She says you're ful young to go alo said Bobbie.

"No, I'm not. W time is it?"

His father looked at his watch. "Half eight."

"I better be going."

His mother went over to him quickly bent down. When he straightened up felt that his cheek was damp, he was in tient with her.

He left the kitchen after instructing B bie to hold the dog until he'd got away f the house. Dogs did not go to school.

Forbsie's fat face shone. "Do we hav line up?" he said to Artie.

"Everybody does," Artie answered, face contorting at the offending glasses. " girls go in the girls' door an' the boys g the boys' door."

Ahead of them and behind them s groups of children made their way to school on the eastern edge of the town.

"There's the China Kids," said Artie.

Brian saw them: the Wongs, Tang Vooie. It was Vooie's first day at school, his sister, Tang, with the protectivenes an older sister, had the collar of his clenched tight in her hand. Brian had the Wong children often, for they had gr up on that section of gray cement that before their father's Bluebird Café. that the mother, a small amber woman, died, the father had left Vooie to his sist care. He cooked meals for the children, that was all. Brian knew Wong, too, a sm stooped Chinese with a white mustache, wore summer and winter a rooster-comb toque.

Brian's confidence ebbed as they ne the schoolyard and as Artie regaled the o boys with stories of the terrible Miss M Donald. She was cranky; she hated kid was she, he told Forbsie and Brian, would be their teacher.

When the bell rang the children for into two lines at the doors; those left out the lines were the beginners, forlorn l

(Continued on Page 107)

You're right in liking MEAT

Simmer or Bake it —it's MEAT

Broil or Braise it —it's MEAT too when proud hands serve up the meat.

But meat, whether it's broiled or braised, simmered or baked, has far more than flavor to offer. All meat generously supplies complete protein—the kind of protein children need for growth—we all need for life itself.

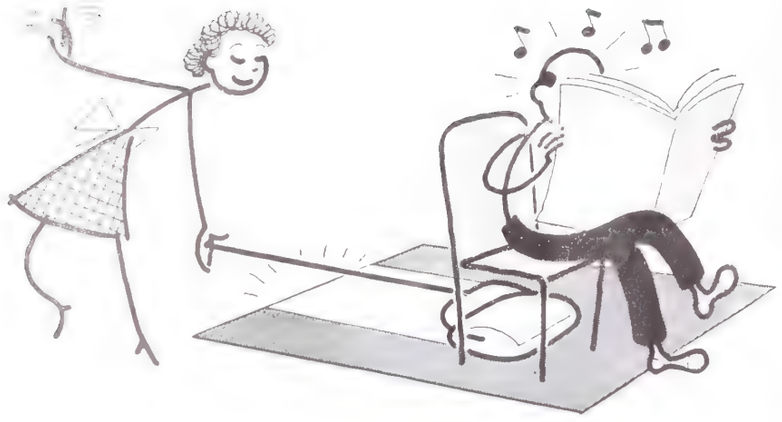
ACCEPTED AMERICAN MEDICAL ASSN.

AMERICAN MEAT INSTITUTE

Headquarters, Chicago
Members throughout the United States



NEW BISSELLS* NEED NO HANDLE PRESSURE!

New "Bisco-matic"* Brush Action adjusts automatically to any rug—thick or thin!

Sweeps clean with one easy swoop, even under beds and chairs! Actually, the pick-up is so perfect you never have to press on the handle at all!

Available now in limited quantities at Bissell dealers only—complete with exclusive "Sta-up" Handle and the new, easier "Flip-O" Empty.

NEW BISSELL SWEEPERS

with patented "Bisco-matic" Brush Action

*REG. U. S. PATENT OFF. BISSELL CARPET SWEEPER CO., GRAND RAPIDS 2, MICH.

Give your house a fresh start

• For the bathroom . . . and all through the house, Sergeant's Disinfectant is your all-around house-cleaning aid. Cleans thoroughly. Easy to use.

Leaves a fresh pine aroma.

Makes bathtubs, tiles, floors sparkling clean.

Removes dirt, deodorizes.

Chases germs in sink drains, toilets, and garbage cans.

Easy on your hands.

It's economical, too—at drug stores.

It's fragrant of PINE

In all the wanted colors -LUMINALL PAINT
Brighten your rooms at modest cost... Redecorate with Luminall. There's a dealer near you.
Luminall Paints, Chicago 9
LUMINALL
ONE COAT
LAN' SAKES! THESE NEW CONTRAPTIONS WORK GOOD WITH 3-IN-ONE!
GRAN'MA....
1 or 3 Oz. Cans
Guaranteed by Good Housekeeping
3-IN-ONE OIL YARN
100% PURE VIRGIN WOOL
Knitting Worsted, Baby Yarn, Floss, sport Yarn, Cords and Gimps, and their sizes. YE WORTHWHILE SAYINGS FREE. COLOR CARD.
PETER PAN YARNS
363 Grand Street, N. Y. City, Dept. 20, Established 1920

(Continued from Page 100)

souls whom Miss MacDonald came out to shepherd into the school. She assigned them their seats in the lower-grades room, at the head of the stairs, told them to sit quietly and play with the colored plasticine Mariel Abercrombie had passed out. Then she turned to hand out the readers to the Grade Threes, of which Artie Sherry was a member.

The first excitement over, Brian began to find school a rather disappointing affair. Forbsie sat two seats ahead of him, Artie two rows over. He would go over and see Artie for a while, Brian decided; he got up and started down the aisle.

Miss MacDonald, at the board, turned and saw him. "Sit down, Brian."

"I'm just going over to see Artie."

"You'll have to sit down." She turned back to the board.

Brian continued on his journey to Artie. She wasn't his mother; he wasn't hurting anything; he wasn't doing anything wrong.

"I said to sit down!"

He stopped at the end of the aisle. "I just want to see Artie for a minute."

"You must put up your hand if you want something. Then I'll give you permission to see Artie."

He continued to stand.

Miss MacDonald's thin face reddened slightly. She bit her lip. "Sit down!"

Brian stood. Utter classroom quiet had descended. Miss MacDonald began to walk down the aisle in which Brian was standing. He reached into his hip pocket and felt the comfort of the water pistol there.

Miss MacDonald stopped three seats ahead of him. "Will you sit down!"

Wordlessly he drew the pistol out, being careful not to squeeze the butt. He held it behind his back. Miss MacDonald reached out her hand to guide him back to his seat. It paused in mid-air as Brian brought the water pistol to view. Her mouth flew open. She stared at the pistol and at the slight drip of water from the small hand holding it.

"I filled it," Brian assured her, "out of the fountain."

Her face flamed. "Give me that pistol!"

He made no move to hand it to her.

Her hand darted out to the water pistol. Startled, Brian squeezed. The pistol squirted. Miss MacDonald, with her dripping hand, jerked the pistol from his grasp. She propelled him from the room.

As he walked ahead of her to the end of the hall where the principal's office was, Brian's heart pounded. The front of her dress dripping, Miss MacDonald knocked on the principal's door. It opened, and Mr. Digby, a questioning look upon his rough face, stood there.

The legend that the wren is the king of all birds is preserved in the name given it in almost every European language. The story is that, the birds having agreed that the bird who could fly highest should be elected king, the wren hid himself in the eagle's feathers. The eagle, having outdistanced even the lark, and ceasing to soar, the wren flew out and flew above him, and flying higher than all, was declared king.

R. L. GALES: Dwellers in Arcady (The Sheldon Press).

With emotion poorly concealed, Miss MacDonald told him what had happened. When she had finished, Digby said:

"You'd better let your classes go. Miss Spencer has, hers. I'll attend to Brian."

The door closed on Miss MacDonald's outraged back.

Mr. Digby walked to the desk, sat down; he leaned forward with his elbows on the top. "Well, Brian?"

The boy stared at him.

"Little trouble?"

With his dark gaze deliberately unflinching, Brian continued to stare.

Mr. Digby's long fingers began to drum the desk top. "Don't—won't you talk to me?"

Unchanged, Brian's face looked up to the principal; no expression was there, certainly no inclination to talk was indicated.

Mr. Digby rose from his chair. The thing was to get the child to talk—without frightening it out of him. "Miss MacDonald is your teacher now. You must do as she says. It's—it's like ——" He cast about for something to say, any wedge to slip under the barrier between them. What would the boy understand? "Have you a dog, Brian?"

There was a flicker of the boy's eyes. That was it.

"He does what you tell him. You expect him to do what you want him to. A dog isn't much good if he won't do what he's told." He looked for a moment at the boy with his erect back, his legs slightly apart. "Does he do any tricks?"

"He can jump over ——" The words spilled out, then stopped.

"Over your arms if you hold them out?"

"Over a stick," Brian corrected him.

"Oh." The teacher was silent because he knew it was the right moment to say nothing.

"Tricks aren't any good. He's going to catch gophers. That isn't a trick."

The principal nodded.

"They're for catching gophers."

"That's right."

"Fox terriers. He's a fox terrier. I don't like her."

"Don't you?"

"She tried to make me sit down. I didn't feel like sitting down. I wasn't hurting anything."

"What if everyone in the room wanted to stand up? She couldn't teach very well then could she?"

Brian considered a moment. "She stands."

"That's because she's the teacher."

"Does she have to stand up to teach people things?"

Digby nodded.

"Maybe I have to stand up to learn things."

"You could learn anyway," suggested Digby, "couldn't you?"

"Yes, I could. But I don't think I'll learn from her. I better have another teacher."

"I don't think that could be arranged. You see, she's the only one we have for Grade One. You want to go to school, don't you?"

"Oh, yes, I'm going to find out about things."

"Then you'd better try to get along with Miss MacDonald." There was a note of firmness in Digby's voice.

Brian was silent.

Digby reached into his desk drawer; he drew out the water pistol and handed it to Brian. "She'd like you to have this back," he said, knowing that it was the farthest thing from Miss MacDonald's desires.

"Thank you. It doesn't work very good anyway."

"All right. No more school today—this afternoon. Think about what I said."

For some time after Brian had left, Digby sat at his desk. With a feeling of helplessness that couldn't come quite into focus, he thought of his perennial problem—the Young Ben. As at the beginning of every term the Young Ben had attended school, he had not shown up for registration.

The feeling of helplessness flooded over him as he thought of the Ben, the boy's father: the drunken, irresponsible and utterly mindless Ben, always at odds with some rule, law, or convention; shooting prairie chicken out of season or without a license, running his still, completely unaware of the demands of family or community. The Ben was seldom sober; he knew only two stages of drunkenness, the dramatic and the unconscious. Digby got up. He'd have to call on the Bens after lunch.

On the second day of school, the Young Ben showed up and was given the seat across from Brian. Ten years old, a child all elbows, shoulder blades and knees, he lifted his blond head high above the children in seats around him.

He could not read; he did not write. He sat always with his narrow, gray eyes distant

(Continued on Page 105)

There was a young woman named Cope
Who washed dishes with a bar soap
Kind to hands it is true
But so slow she was blue—
So she'd stay in the kitchen, and mope!

NATURALLY, no woman likes slow-poke dishwashing! That bar soap was mild—easy on hands—BUT too slow-sudsing for dishes!

There was a young woman named Head
Doing dishes made her hands red
Her soap was too strong
And so—before long
Mr. Head had to do them instead!

NATURALLY, no woman likes red hands. Too bad Mrs. Head used her regular washday soap for dishes. Granulated for speed, but oh, so strong!

There was a young woman named Neal
Her soap had a double appeal!
"It's as kind as can be,
And so speedy," said she,
"This Ivory Snow is ideal!"

NATURALLY, Ivory Snow is ideal for dishes! It's the only soap that's both Ivory-mild for snow-white hands and made in granulated "snowdrops" for speedy sudsing! Tops in safety! Convenient! Leaves dishes sparkling—leaves lovely hands soft and smooth!

NO OTHER SOAP LIKE IT!

ere's one soap that gives both

Kindness to Hands!
Speed in the Dishpan!

for Mildness!
for Speed!

HEAR KENNY BAKER on Glamour Manor! New high in daytime radio! All-star cast! Fun! Music! Monday through Friday, 12 noon EST.

new

Genius-Color

Face Powder

by

Revlon

Throw away

your old face powder ideas!

Creators of world-famous originals

in Nail Enamel and Lipstick

Madly beautiful new "Ultra Violet" face powder color will transfigure your face. Every one of Revlon's "Genius Colors" proves face powder can do much more than you ever dreamed possible. It's a secret process—color-within-color! The subtle underlying color comes to life on your skin, awakening radiance never known before! It's the new idea in face powder!

"Ultra Violet" and twelve other "Genius Colors," including "Pink Lightning," "Bachelor's Carnation," "Fatal Apple."

JEWELS FROM JOHN RUBEL

COPYRIGHT 1946, REVLON PRODUCTS C

Miss MacDonald had looked secretly at Brian several times, and once she had wished that she could think of an excuse to let him sit down. But seeing him stand there, a seeming stoic, she had hardened. She was an efficient woman who looked for results; a strapping was fruitless, she felt, unless a child broke down and stood red and sodden-eyed before her.

Brian's arms were heavy. The muscles under them were painful. Over the tops of his shoulders they were almost unendurable. His chest ached. The classroom was hot. To Brian, wishing that he could get away from his own arms, that they were not part of him, the room seemed to be lifting and drifting. The faces in the front row were suddenly clearer. The faces in the front row receded. The Lord's anger must be a fearful thing.

"You may sit down, Brian."

He began to walk to his seat, then remembered his upraised arms; he looked questioningly to Miss MacDonald; she nodded; he let them drop to his sides. They fell heavily and hung leaden with pins and needles in them, as though he had slept on them for a long time. His knees trembled as he went slowly down the aisle. Just before his seat, he felt them melt under him; he dropped to the floor.

With panic in her face, Miss MacDonald rose from her desk. By the time she reached the aisle, the Young Ben had leaped from his seat. He picked up Brian, stood a moment with him in his arms, then placed him gently in his seat. He turned to face Miss MacDonald, and as he did, his hand dropped to the knife on the top of his desk. Miss MacDonald reached out her hand to Brian with his head back over the seat. She saw the ugliness in the Young Ben's eyes; she saw the knife in his brown hand; she did the most sensible thing she had done in her life—asked Charles Funder to get water, then turned back.

Brian spent recess in the boys' toilet, hidden in one of the cubicles; when the end-of-recess bell rang, he wiped his face of sweat and tears; he avoided Artie and Forbsie as he hurried up the stairs.

He waited in his seat till the rest had left at noon. As he walked home he was still faint and weak, and when he felt an arm slide around his waist, he welcomed it. The Young Ben walked the rest of the way to Brian's house with him. He left Brian as silently as he had come.

Brian was unable to eat his dinner that night, and when his mother gently asked him what was wrong, he burst into tears. He could not bring himself to tell her about the lie.

He listened to a rising wind that night as he lay in bed with Bobbie. Brian lay wide-eyed, filled with awful guilt, and—much worse than that—with the fear of promised punishment.

He felt a gathering Presence in his room as the wind lifted high. Fearful, avenging was the gathering wrath about to strike down Brian Sean MacMurray O'Connal, the terror-stricken Brian O'Connal, who had lied about his hands. He dared not move. He dared not lie still. He dared not cry out. He dared not stay silent.

Nearer and nearer the Presence drew. The house moved. A giant hand began to shake the bed. Brian cried out, and once he had done that, the screams came again and again and again: Bobbie, wakened, added his shrill voice to Brian's.

Light flooded the room. Maggie O'Connal stood above her sons. She looked into Brian's wild eyes. She left Bobbie for his father to calm down, and carried Brian from the room.

After he had told her of what had happened at school, and after he had fallen asleep in her arms, she lay awake with her eyes against the dark for a long time.

Maggie O'Connal sat sideways on one of the front seats in Miss MacDonald's room. Upon her dark face there was a puzzled look.

"You don't—there's no reason that Brian should dislike my son, is there, Miss MacDonald?"

"Why—no—there isn't." Miss MacDonald was slightly embarrassed. Brian's mother had just told her why Brian had been to school for the past two days.

"He is just a child," Maggie O'Connal said. "He's only six." Her brown eyes looked at Miss MacDonald steadily, searching. "I'm still unable to understand what you ——"

"He lied to me," said Miss MacDonald simply. "The boy had not washed his hands ——"

"Yes, I know," said Brian's mother. "Of course you didn't know why he—just what made him do it—but—do you like children, Miss MacDonald?"

"Yes—of—course—I like them." There was a slight note of irritation in the teacher's voice.

"To be a teacher—a person should think it would help a lot." Maggie O'Connal was silent, and Miss MacDonald had the feeling that she was expected to say something. She was not sure what she was expected to say. "I—I don't see why you should threaten him with God's punishment."

"He lied to me," Miss MacDonald again.

"I suppose you did realize what it involved."

"I didn't think that would hurt his health."

"It hasn't. We have him pretty well calmed down now, but I still don't understand ——"

"He had it coming to him." Miss MacDonald was beginning to regret the interview. "I don't think I can be held responsible for—if your child is high-strung—nervous he had it coming ——"

"But not that," Mrs. O'Connal. "Not has that ——"

"I feel that I was quite right," said Miss MacDonald positively.

Maggie O'Connal got up. "You've never been wrong, have you, Miss MacDonald?"

"Why—certainly—I ——"

"No. . . . You must be an unhappy woman."

"I ——"

"I am a woman of some restraint. Scotch—you will appreciate that it's difficult for me to say what I'm going to say. I have few friends or acquaintances—instead I have my husband and two sons. Brian is mine. I bore him. Perhaps," she said quietly and with a look almost of compassion in her dark eyes, "if you were to have a child you might be a happier and a better teacher."

Miss MacDonald's mouth opened as though she were about to blurt something. It closed and opened again foolishly. A stricken look appeared in her eyes.

"I-I'm sorry, Miss MacDonald." Maggie O'Connal left the room.

For years I was distressed by the incessant and diversified troubles of a client of mine: she was always in a crisis. One day, sprinkling the azaleas with aluminum sulphate, the revelation broke over me. Both the plant and the lady required acid soil—they would perish in sweet soil! She needed tragedy and couldn't thrive without it. Ever since that discovery I have taken acid-loving people calmly.

—From Lanterns on the Levee, Recollections of a Planter's Son, by William Alexander Percy (Alfred A. Knopf, Inc.).

The Ben was an artist in one respect hiding of his still. For years he had been tent to follow the usual technique of h the thing in a cave some distance fror shack and covering it with squares of pi sod and brush. Determined this spring more than a blind technician, the Be creted his still in his well. A month lat April, the mash boiled over and inebria Dominicker hen, two Barred-Rock roo and a mostly Holstein cow. He knew that he had to move his still again—n cause he feared chronic alcoholism a the inhabitants of the barnyard, but be a staggering cow or a weaving rooster a the existence of a still.

That spring Barney Hepworth, jani the Presbyterian church, refused to Doctor Svarich's advice and go to bec

(Continued on Page 108)

"Johnny Mint" says . . .

There's no other dental cream like SQUIBB DENTAL CREAM. Your mouth feels fresh and clean with refresh-mint

And no other brush is like the SQUIBB ANGLE TOOTHBRUSH— bent like a dentist's mirror to reach more places

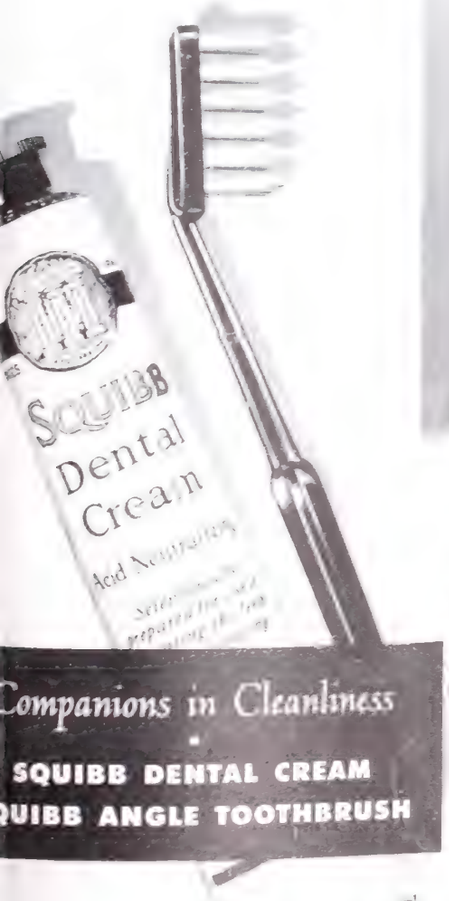
You need both to do the best cleaning job



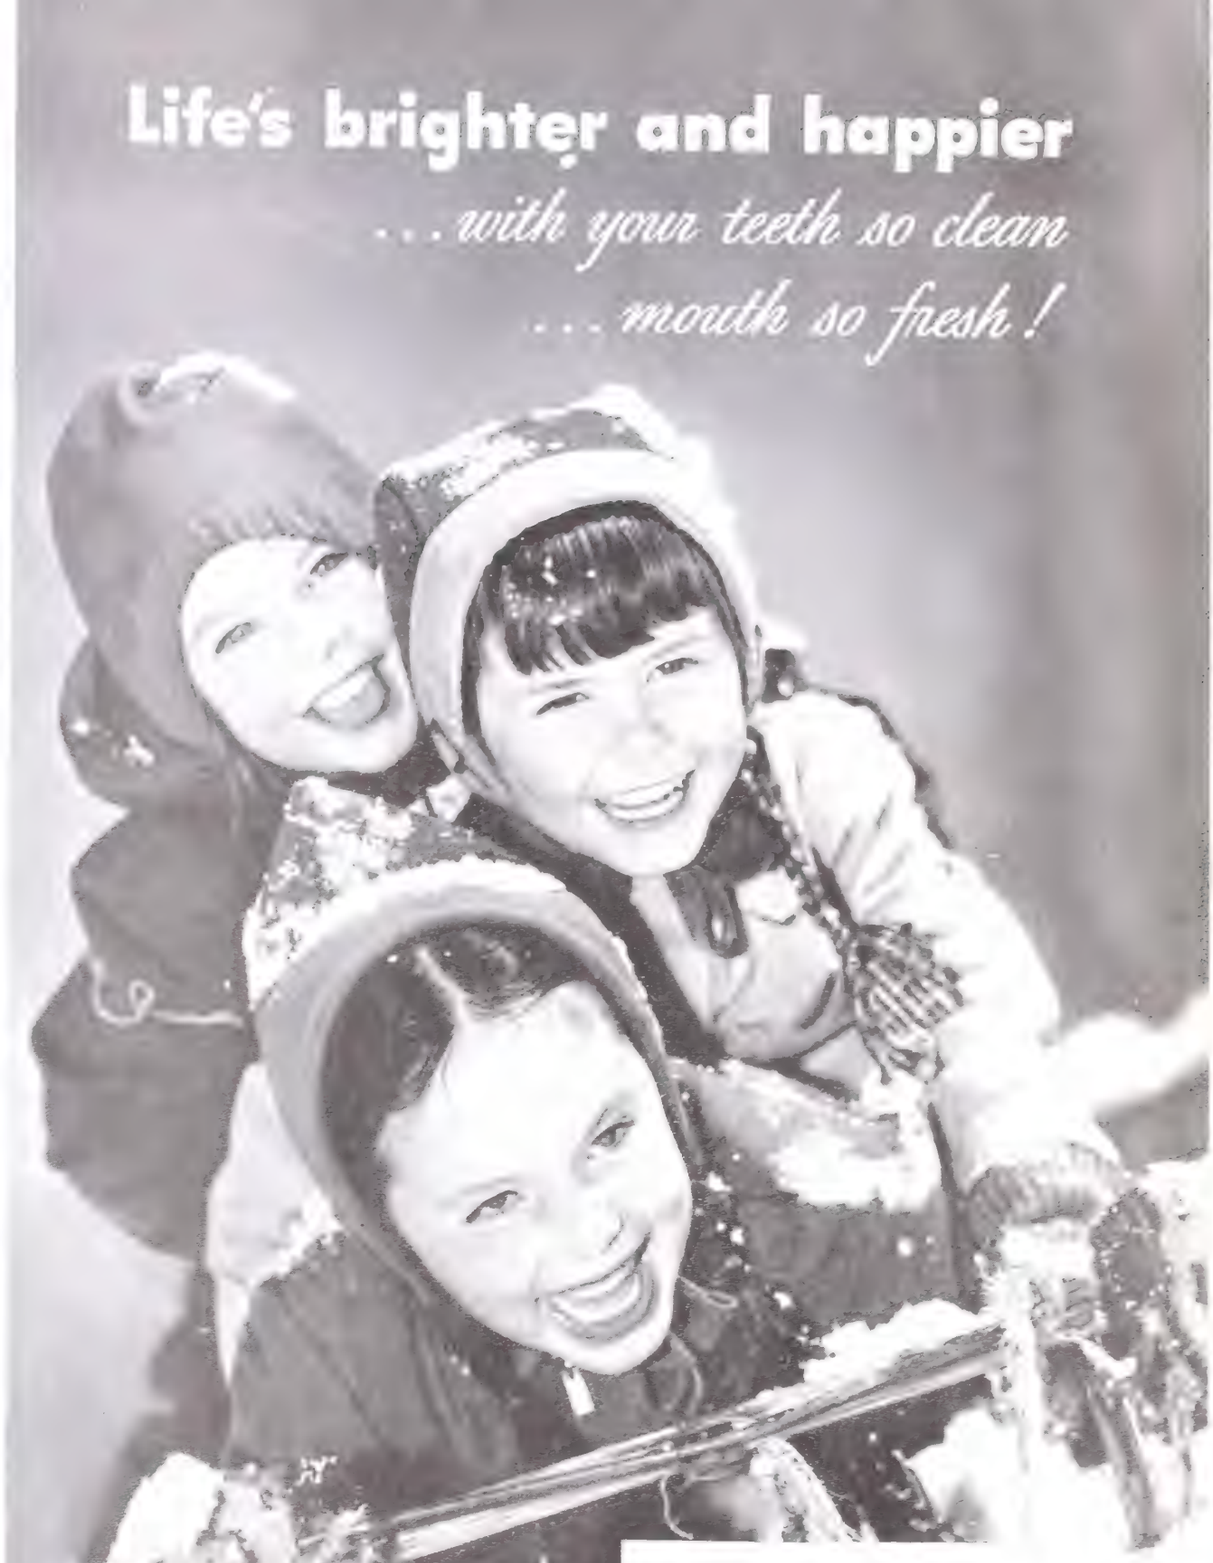
Companions in Cleanliness

SQUIBB DENTAL CREAM

QUIBB ANGLE TOOTHBRUSH

Life's brighter and happier

. . . with your teeth so clean . . . mouth so fresh!



Cleaning your teeth becomes a pleasure with Squibb Dental Cream—the cream that leaves your whole mouth tingling with refresh-mint.

And the cream does its best when teamed with the Squibb Angle Brush—bent like a dentist's mirror to reach more places.

Use both. Together they make mouth care a treat instead of a chore.

SQUIBB

A name you can trust

EARLY AMERICAN Old Spice
*
BATH SALTS

Step Into a
Bath of Roses and Spice

Relax in a bath fragrant with the gay loveliness of crushed roses and spice ——step out refreshed. Choose your Old Spice bath salts in Stiegel-type bottle, in bath sticks for guest or travel use, or in old-fashioned salt box with scoop. Each 1.00 plus tax

*Reg. U. S. Pat. Off.

SHULTON
Rockefeller Center, New York

Individual Achievement Made America Great—Let's Keep It That Way

(Continued from Page 106)

what he was sure was only a spring cold; he died of pneumonia. The Ben went straightway to Mr. Powelly, the Presbyterian minister who had taken Hislop's place, and acquainted him with a moving desire to make personal confession of a newly discovered faith. It was in the midst of the revival campaign and Mr. Powelly welcomed the offer of the Ben's soul; later it suddenly occurred to him that the Ben would be just the man to fill the position of janitor.

The date of the Ben's reception into the congregation was set for the third Sunday in May. He began his janitorial duties immediately. A week later he moved his still into the basement of the church. It was an ideal hiding place; no one but the Ben ever entered the coal room, where the still and its kerosene burner rested on a dark shelf of earth just inside the building foundation; the telltale fumes of the mash were quickly absorbed by the manure pile thrown up behind Mr. Thorborn's dray and livery barn. Without fear of detection, Ben could visit the still, fill the burner with kerosene, the coil bed with ice, the pot with mash, and himself with brew.

Brian's dog was not, in a social sense, a good dog. Jappy was a tramp—he was away from the O'Connal home frequently for days at a time.

Between the dog and the boy there was an easy comradeship and mutual respect, with now and then sudden flashes of downright love on Brian's part, for if Jappy was not a model dog in many ways, he was ideal in one: he was death on gophers. At the mouth of a hole when a drowned gopher poked out its head he was quick and sure. And he always knew when a gopher-hunting expedition was under way.

There had been the day, well on in summer, that Brian and Forbsie Hoffman, now called "Fat," and Artie Sherry, known as "Ike," had gone out drowning gophers.

Down Sixth Street toward the spreading prairie they walked, Brian and Fat carrying between them Ike's mother's washtub. Each carried in addition a red lard pail. Once upon the prairie, they turned east toward Haggerty's Coulee, where they had heard there were many gophers. White, Fat's dog, and Jappy ran ahead; the boys wandered in leisurely fashion, their conversation rambling as it usually did, until it arrived at the question of what a gopher did when he was being drowned out.

"Sometimes," Fat said, "you get three washtubs down their hole, and the water stays there quite a while, and you think he ain't ever comin' up, and then all of a sudden she goes down."

"They back into the hole an' plug her up," Ike explained. "When he unplugs, then the water comes down."

"You take the end of the washtub now," Brian said to Ike.

"Not yet. I'll carry after Haggerty's Coulee."

"You never carry," Brian accused him.

"I do so," said Ike.

"LOOK!" Fat cried and pointed to the dogs in scurrying chase over the prairie ahead. "They found one!"

"Where?" yelled Ike.

"There it is!" Brian caught a glimpse of a brown back rolling in frantic gallop, saw the flirt of a tail as the gopher, inches from Jappy's eager nose, was swallowed down a hole. "He's down the hole!"

Both dogs were at the opening. Jappy ecstatically threw the dirt behind him—stopped to insert his nose right to the eyes—took it out—began to dig again. Fat's dog circled anxiously.

"You an' Fat fill the tub!" directed Ike. "I'll watch."

Brian and Fat brought back two tubs of water, tipped them carefully down the hole, after each one, watched eagerly for the gopher to come out. Jappy sat with his ears cocked, his head solicitously on one side; he made anxious sounds in the back of his throat.

One great bubble burst itself on the surface of the water filling the hole; it was followed by many little ones wobbling to the top. "He's comin' up now!" shouted Ike. "Git ready!"

THE gopher's flat head broke the surface of the water; just out of reach in the throat of his burrow, he crouched with his head barely above water, his almond eyes looking up at the boys and the dogs.

"More water!" shrieked Ike. "All he wants is more water!"

Ike rushed to the tub himself, tilted it over the lard pail, ran back, and soused the contents down on the waiting gopher. It came out in a lunging rush, its fawn hair, dark with water, plastered wet against its skin. The dogs darted for it. Jappy got it by the scruff of the neck, shook his head, and threw it over his back. The gopher hurtled through the air to land near Ike; it lay still upon the prairie.

Ike ran to it. He picked up the wet, tan body and it began to kick. "He's still alive!"

"He'll bite," said Fat fearfully. "They kin bite!"

"No, he won't. I got him round the belly. He isn't biting anybody. All he kin do is squeak."

It was squeaking now; the thin and frantic sound threaded from Ike's closed hand. Brian looked away. He saw with a start that the Young Ben was standing there; he had come upon them without a sound, and was staring at them with his pale, gray eyes under hair the color of the prairie itself.

"I'm gonna take the tail offa him," said Ike, with the gopher still struggling and squeaking in his hand. "Their tails grow back on if you let 'em go." Ike had taken the gopher by the tip of its tail and was holding it head down by his thumb and forefinger. He raised his arm above his head and began to swing the gopher in a large circle. "Hold yer dogs back!" he cried. He snapped his arm. The tail remained in his hand.

Now to one side, now to the other, the gopher ran in squeaking, erratic course, both dogs after it. The Young Ben leaped. He passed the dogs, threw himself full length upon the tailless gopher. He lay there with the squeaking under him. While the boy watched openmouthed, he reached under himself. With one merciful squeeze he choked the life from the animal. As he stood up he dropped it, galvanic, to the ground. He began to walk toward Ike.

Fierce exultation gripped Brian as he realized what was about to happen. Face twitching nervously, Ike backed away. He knew that something was wrong. Just as he had thrown himself upon the gopher, the Young Ben leaped at Ike, who fell backward under his attacker's weight. The Young Ben fought as the boys had never seen anyone fight before. He was a clawing, wild thing on top of Ike. He gouged Ike's eyes, from which the glasses had fallen; blood sprang in long tracks as he drew his crooked fingers again and again down Ike's face. He pounded his about the head, the throat, the ribs. He stood up and kicked Ike rolling helpless on the prairie. When he stopped, one felt that he had done so simply because he was exhausted. He looked at the terror on Fat's face, then for long and level moments at Brian.

(Continued on Page 110)

★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★

Heartbeat

By Mary Norton Gordon

A little while after
A little while after
There will be laughter.

There will be sunshine
Following rain.
There will be wine
To ease this pain.

There will be laughter
There will be laughter
A little while after.

★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★

"Who are you?" he asked. "I'm Pierrette," was all she'd tell him. But he'd never forget the touch of those soft hands.

Six months later—Mr. and Mrs. now. "Pots and pans come before antiques," she says—"and Jergens Lotion to keep my hands smooth and soft as when we met."

Mardi Gras. In the Old French Quarter, there was dancing in the streets. Again and again the Pirate danced with Pierrette.

Modern Love in Old New Orleans

SHE wouldn't tell him her name. Tonight was Mardi Gras and she was just Pierrette. But—"I'll find you," he said, "wherever you go. I'll always know these soft hands."

Chances are strong—such memorably soft hands are Jergens cared-for. Even softer, smoother hands—even longer protection against roughness—are possible for you now. Jergens Lotion is more effective than ever, because of wartime studies.

Two ingredients in Jergens have such value for skin-smoothing that many doctors use them.

A "must" in your home, too, this finer-than-ever Jergens that makes you surer of darling hands. Still 10¢ to $1.00 (plus tax). No oiliness; no stickiness.

By far the favorite hand care with lovely women

Hollywood Stars use Jergens Lotion, 7 to 1.
New York models use Jergens, nearly 5 to 1.

Big preferences for Jergens among other groups of charming women.

For the Softest, Adorable Hands, use

Jergens Lotion

FREE! YOUR CHANCE to see that Jergens Lotion is now finer than ever

Mail coupon today for gift bottle.
(Paste on penny postcard if you wish.)
Mail to: Box 27, Dept. 62, Cincinnati 14, Ohio

Name _____
(PLEASE PRINT NAME, ADDRESS PLAINLY)

Street _____

City _____ State _____

(Sorry, offer good in U.S.A. only)

You can catch a cold shoulder in mink, Pet!

YOU should be a heart-throb in mink, Honey. But that dreamy coat can leave you out in the cold if . . .

If you forget that even in winter there's a heat wave under your arms. For odor can form without any noticeable moisture. And heavy furs . . . warm woolen clothes . . . increase your chance of offending.

So always . . . after your bath washes away past perspiration . . . guard against future underarm odor. Use Mum.

Mum better because it's Safe

1. Safe for skin. No irritating crystals. Snow-white Mum is gentle, harmless to skin.

2. Safe for clothes. No harsh ingredients in Mum to rot or discolor fine fabrics.

3. Safe for charm. Mum gives sure protection against underarm odor all day or all evening.

• • •

Mum is economical, too. Doesn't dry out in the jar—stays smooth and creamy. Quick, easy to use even after you're dressed.

For Sanitary Napkins—Mum is gentle, safe, dependable . . . ideal for this use, too.

(Continued from Page 108)

Brian returned his gaze and watched him wheel and begin to run in the direction of Haggerty's Coulee. In his heart Brian ran with Young Ben—running with an easy lope, each step of which smoothed into the other like the ripples of a broad stream flowing. When he had ceased watching the Young Ben, he saw that Fat had gone to get a lard pail of water from the river. He made no move to help as Fat soaked his shirt, and washed the blood and dirt from Ike's face. His clothes unbelievably ripped, Ike had a dazed look upon his sharp face, the look that one expects to see upon the face of a man whose home has just been leveled by a prairie tornado.

"I didn't do anything to him," he said tearfully over and over again.

And Brian, quite without any desire to alleviate Ike's suffering, was filled with a sense of the justness, the rightness, the completeness of what the Young Ben had done—what he himself would like to have done.

Ike had to be led home like a blind boy; he was unable to see a foot in front of himself without his thick glasses.

The Bens no longer sat in the second row of Knox church; any ties that might have bound them were rudely severed three weeks after the Ben's formal reception into the fold. "The Lost Sheep," that Sunday's delicately balanced sermon pointing out the church's newest member, had been followed the next Sunday by a sermon built around "The Parable of the Lost Penny," and the one after that by "The Prodigal's Return." The next Sunday the Ben's still in the church basement blew up.

Ignited by the yellow, moth-wing flame of the kerosene burner, which the Ben had left turned too high, it exploded between the announcing of the Ladies' Auxiliary chicken dinner to be held the following Tuesday at the home of Mrs. Abercrombie, and the passing of the collection plate. It detonated with a thud that was felt rather than heard by every member of the congregation.

The Ben sprang from his seat and hurried from the church. Seeing him go, and thinking that whatever was the matter could be attended to by the Ben, Mr. Powelly went on with his sermon.

The church was heated by a system of hot-air vents placed conveniently along its sides, and leading to the furnace room where the accident had occurred. From these, soon after, there stole a yeasty breath that blossomed into sweet fumes of ferment hanging oppressively.

Meanwhile, the Ben below feverishly collected parts of his still from far corners, the copper coil which was still in one piece and such bits of the granite pot as had not been imbedded in the rafters of the Sunday-school room or various chairs there.

Summoned tardily the next day, Jake Harris told Mr. Powelly that there was not enough evidence to prosecute the Ben. The minister was aware of an undying, Old Testament thirst for revenge—a thirst, he resolved fiercely, which should have its full slaking one day.

FALL held a pleasant surprise for Brian—a new teacher. Several weeks before school opened, the children had known that Miss MacDonald was not coming back. Ike had told them; his father was a member of the school board now, Mr. Thorborn still its chairman.

Just before fall registration, Mr. Digby made an appointment to meet Miss Thompson, the new teacher, and to go over with her the plans for the term work. He met a young woman with quick and definite features. Her bluing-black hair, cut short, seemed even blacker against her very white skin. She had the sort of dark eyes that seem all pupil, so deep is the brownness of the iris. When Digby said that he hoped she would like her new school, she assured him that she would, the sudden expressiveness of her face, the girlish quality of excitement in her, attracted him immediately.

"And you were at Westward," he said, referring to her last school.

"Three years. Before that, Azure."

"Azure," mused Digby. "Seems to me—Oh, yes—Svarich; didn't Peter Svarich have a practice in Azure before he came here?"

"Yes," said Miss Thompson quickly. "Doctor Svarich was in Azure."

Digby looked at her sharply. Something wrong; her mobile features were quite free of expression—deliberately so, he thought. "I—I suppose you know each other?"

"We do," said Miss Thompson.

ALSO determined, decided Digby, for a the cameo quality of her pale, small face. "How long were you there?" As he asked the question he felt a twinge of annoyance with himself; it was none of his business.

"Five years. It was my first school—one room."

Probably attended normal school at eighteen; if she had taught eight years, that made her twenty six or seven. Twenty-six-seven—from thirty-eight, he calculated—twelve. With a slight frown on his rock features, he got up from the desk. "Let's take a look at your room, shall we?" Most women would be attracted to Svarich, he thought, as he held her office door open for her. He wished that he had changed his shirt this morning.

> The famous musician Rubinstein was once spending a few days with a friend in England, who took him to a church on Sunday where he listened to a little sermon on a little theme. The next Sunday the friend invited the musician to go again to church. "I will," said Rubinstein, "but on one condition: you must take me to hear a man who will tempt me to do the impossible."

When he had shown her around, and had given her the forms she must fill out for the first of the term, he said, "I'm going down town. Perhaps I can show you some of it, if you're headed that way."

He pointed out the powerhouse to the south and east of the school, and explained to her that the river and the railroad ran past to cross First Street. They stopped before the lilac and honeysuckle bushes on either side of the Times building.

He looked down at Miss Thompson. "I guess I leave you here. I—I hope you like it. It's a good town."

"Oh, I'm sure I will," said Miss Thompson, and Digby again felt the inner lift that the clear, young quality of her voice had given him before. He began to walk back down First Street in the direction they had come.

Miss Thompson crossed the railroad tracks, looked down them to the seven grain elevators, then began to cross the wooden bridge that spanned the river. So her cottage was on the wrong side of town; it must be, if the sprawl of tar-papered shacks was Germantown. Fierce-mustached men lived there, men with black-burning roll-your-own cigarettes permanently in the corner of the mouth, necessary men—the laborers of the C.P.R., on highway maintenance, and on sewer work for the town: Polish, Austrian, Bohemian, Ruthenian, Hungarian, Galician, not-yet-Canadian.

She stopped at the end of the bridge and looked down at the slow flow of the tiny creek. Peter's people. Digby had pointed out Doctor Svarich's office; there had been no need of that; she had seen his sign, PETER R. SVARICH, PHYSICIAN AND SURGEON. She looked at the woman bent over a washtub in one of the back yards, and her mental picture of Peter's mother was renewed—a nut-brown woman with unbelievably lined face, a dark kerchief over her head. Unlike Peter's clever hands, his mother's had been fat-muscled, with blunt finger tips. She knew now what she could not have been expected to know earlier—that Peter was ashamed of his foreign birth. As she turned from the end of the bridge

(Continued on Page 112)

An English Complexion

It's young... it's fresh... it's natural

The secret has passed from charming mothers to gay young daughters for generations on end . . . this simple, daily skin-care with fragrant Yardley Creams.

YARDLEY

YARDLEY DRY SKIN [illegible] with its beneficial softening ingredients, restores a radiant freshness . . . and

[illegible] brightens oily skins without [illegible]

YARDLEY NIGHT CREAM is an extra-rich, gratifying skin treat that smooths, lubricates, and softens . . . while

YARDLEY COMPLEXION MILK, a liquid cream, is a versatile lotion you'll use to encourage natural elasticity and as a protective powder base.

YARDLEY [illegible] is the traditional one-step to youthful loveliness, a snowy, feather-light cream that softens, cleanses, and tones.

In sizes at $1 and $2 (COMPLEXION MILK, $1 and $1.50)
plus tax

Yardley products for America are created in England and finished in the U. S. A. from the original English formulae, combining imported and domestic ingredients. Yardley of London, Inc., 620 Fifth Avenue, N.Y.C.

Glamour FOR WINTER—
This New Evening Sweater with a
SWEETHEART SOAP Complexion

Look lovelier and help prevent Chapping with SWEETHEART SOAP'S
1-2-3 Extra Lather BEAUTY CARE!

● Now Fashion adds the gay glitter of sequins to the eternal lure of a sweater. Result: an enchanting style for the season's parties! But don't spoil the glamorous picture with winter-roughened skin. Thousands of women say SweetHeart Soap helps prevent chapping.

And here's another beauty advantage! SweetHeart gives up to twice as much lather as the average beauty soap. This richer, creamier lather forms a gentle cushion for more thorough massage.

HERE'S ALL YOU DO: Massage your face for one minute, night and morning, with SweetHeart's extra lather. Rinse with warm—then icy cold water. This (1) cleanses (2) stimulates (3) brightens. Your skin's a glow with velvety freshness!

Insist on SweetHeart Soap to get "twice the lather for twice as thorough care." See how quickly it may reveal greater loveliness. And rejoice in the way SweetHeart Soap helps you avoid chapping all winter. Get this wonderful beauty soap today.

The soap that AGREES with your skin

(Continued from Page 110)

she felt a ripple of contrition pass through her. She began to walk swiftly toward her new home.

Miss Thompson's children found her refreshing after Miss MacDonald. She seemed to have a faculty for infecting them with enthusiasm in their work.

Though she gave the children more freedom than they had enjoyed before, Miss Thompson expected a great deal of them. Except toward the China Kids, she showed no favoritism; with Tang and Vooie she seemed to have an extra brightness in her voice; in games the Chinese children were selected for coveted positions a little more often. No one resented this, except perhaps Mariel Abercrombie. In the years they had attended school, Tang and Vooie had been subjected to periodic ostracism, a mild form of persecution usually started by Mariel, a full-faced little sadist of ten years. It was she who started the whispering that rippled along the rows, like wrinkles spreading over a pond, breaking into tight and hurried little excitements that spilled into recesses—when the girls would walk one another off with arms about one another's waists, while Mi Tang was left to sit stolidly at her desk, unwhispered-to, unwalked-off-with.

In her first fall, Miss Thompson was startled several times by Vooie, who was in Brian's class. During a Grade Two reading lesson the second month of the fall term she had waited for Vooie to read the chalk legend, "The man has a dog. The dog runs."

"Your turn, Vooie," she had said.

He sat stanchly enthroned in his seat.

"Vooie."

His eyes were fixed carefully on the corner of her desk.

"Don't you want to read, Vooie?"

The broad nostrils of his snub nose flattened imperceptibly more.

"If you don't try, you won't be able to read like Tang."

Now she could see only the top of his glinting, black head.

"Don't you want to read like Tang?"

His head came back up; his hands were pushed up his sleeves to the wrists. "No."

"You—you don't! You don't want to have a blue star in your reader?"

The flat, tan lids flickered down to show her momentarily the cameo clarity of their edges. Then: "He don't wanna little blue star for the little book. He want no money—heaven beyond his power."

It was one of the many proverbs with which Old Wong spoke to his children, and in itself it explained the decline of the Bluebird Café after the death of his wife. Since that event, he had turned to a Stoicism that told him the world was upsetting and could take from him; he had retired to the tranquillity of his dark kitchen to sit for long, lonely periods of time, his red toque a bright spot in the shadows. His business had suffered; tables stood bare. The café itself became indescribably dirty. Children and parents alike often told one another with the same delicious thrill that Old Wong was an opium eater.

NEAR the end of October, Miss Thompson noticed a listlessness in the China Kids, so she sent them down to Doctor Svarich; then with the resolution of one who knows that some things are inevitable and that putting them off simply increases their awkwardness, she went down to the doctor's office herself.

Svarich's office building stood next to Funder's Meat Market, the only new building on the business street. Miss Thompson hesitated a moment, then opened the door. Except for an overalled man with a bandage around his head and one ear, the waiting room was empty.

The door with frosted glass opened at the back, and Peter Svarich stood there. He glanced impersonally at Miss Thompson, then beckoned to the bandaged man with a nod of his head. The man got up; the door closed behind him. Miss Thompson sat down.

She had wondered what it would be like to see him again. Now she had. He had changed little in appearance; his face still had its satyrlike conformation, the V peak of crisp black hair salted slightly with gray; the deep creases bracketing his long mouth had deepened. And in her heart, she was asking herself, hadn't there been a hint of the familiar flutter, a suggestion of the breathlessness that had always possessed her when she was about to see him?

THE bandaged man emerged from the door. Peter Svarich gave Miss Thompson exactly the same nod he had given the patient who was leaving. The teacher entered the office.

"Peter—I—I ——" She found it difficult to express what she was feeling as she looked at the discontent in the lines at his mouth. "You must understand that I didn't know you were here when I came—when I applied ——"

"I believe you," Svarich said. "About these children ——"

"Oh, Peter—is there any reason that we have to be unkind to each ——"

"They're suffering from malnutrition," he said in his dry voice. "What do you care?"

Miss Thompson, in spite of herself, felt a stir of the old resentment. "I care," she said in a voice that matched the impersonality of his. "They're my children."

"Not yours. You didn't conceive them—bear them." If he had thought to shock her, he was disappointed.

"I said they were my children. They are Chinese, and they are my children." She looked at him steadily with her eyes large in her pale face. "They would be mine if they were Ukrainian."

The lines of bitterness almost forgot themselves on Svarich's face. "I believe they would," he said softly. "I believe they would—and they might have been."

A faint flush colored Miss Thompson's face. "It would have been a bad bargain for both of us. You know ——"

"I suppose," he said; "and as you say, there's no point in being unkind. I'm sorry. Now—about these children—they're not getting enough to eat. If you're interested, I'd advise you to go and see their father. See what the situation is." He looked at Miss Thompson a moment. "Same face," he observed; "same heart. I—I'm glad to see you again, Ruth."

Ruth Thompson held out her hand. Svarich took it with the look of a man about to do something that he knows perfectly well is not good for him.

Miss Thompson walked quickly from the office to the Bluebird Café, and as she walked she wondered why most people were fooled by Peter Svarich, why they went no farther than his outer defense of irony, assuming that there was no farther to go.

Brittle—that had been Peter, unable to adapt. The course of love had not run smoothly; there had been too much of emotion, of irritation growing into sarcasm calling out recrimination, and that in turn bringing flaming anger. She had told him finally that they could not have a smooth marriage out of it—not possibly. He had listened to her almost as though he had expected it all along; that had sent her off the deep end again. They had not been able even to end it with restraint.

She found Wong in the back of the café. He had been feeding the children mush three times a day. He had just enough oatmeal left for one more day. Miss Thompson left the café and walked swiftly till she came to the sign that said, "Your Tonsorial Requirements Looked After." She walked in without hesitation.

"Mr. Neally."

(Continued on Page 114)

If in the last few years you haven't discarded a major opinion or acquired a new one, investigate and see if you're not growing senile.

—GELETT BURGESS:
Look Eleven Years Younger.
(Simon & Schuster, Inc.)

College girls learn something NOT IN THE BOOKS!

IN TESTS AMONG COLLEGE GIRLS— 99 OUT OF 131 REPORT NO CHAFING WITH NEW FREE-STRIDE MODESS

College girls from coast to coast recently learned something not in the books. Something that will make happy reading for every girl who chafes.

Here's the story . . .

Interviewers asked college girls who had suffered chafe with their regular napkin to try out a new, improved napkin—Free-Stride Modess.

Naturally, the girls weren't told the name or brand. They were simply asked to try this new napkin—to see if it gave them freedom from chafe.

At the end of the test, 99 out of 131 girls reported no chafing with Free-Stride Modess.

The secret of the chafe-free comfort so many college students found in Free-Stride Modess lies in the clever fashioning of the napkin edges!

Free-Stride Modess has extra cotton on its edges—extra softness—right where the cause of chafe begins.

The extra cotton also acts to direct and retain moisture inside the napkin, keeping the edges dry and smooth longer. And dry, smooth edges don't chafe!

So safe too! Every Free-Stride Modess has a triple safety shield to guard against accidents. A fine, sealed-in deodorant to help keep you flower-fresh, too! And never a tell-tale outline—Modess is silhouette-proof!

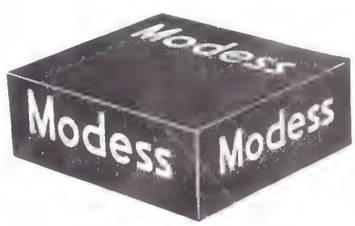
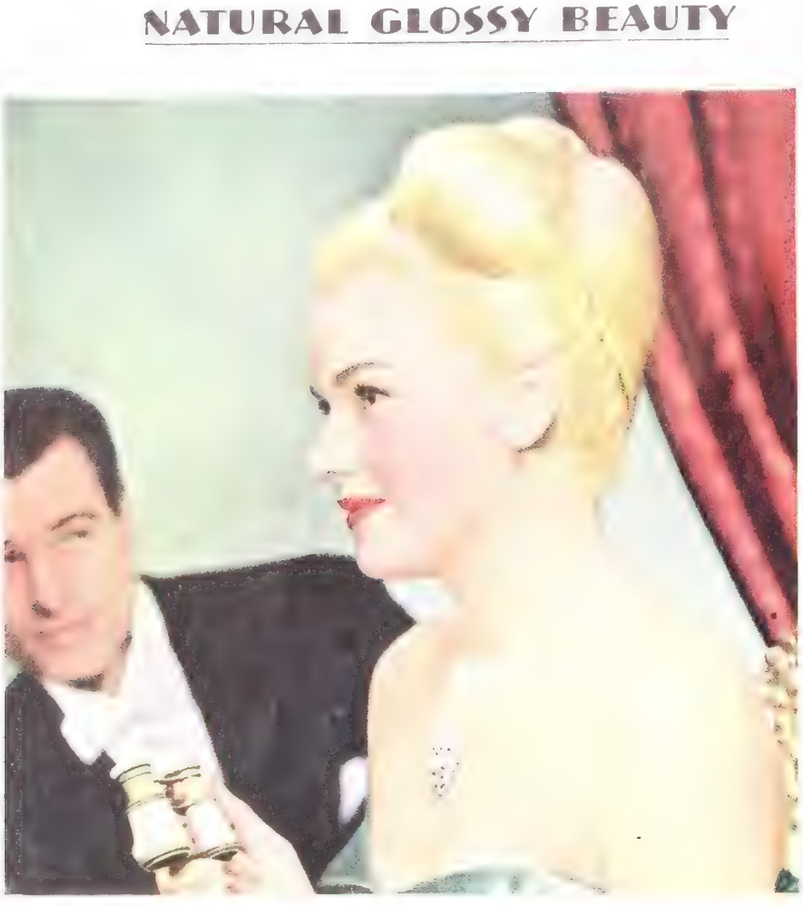
Try this luxury-comfortable, luxury-safe napkin now. New, improved Free-Stride Modess is on sale everywhere. Product of Personal Products Corporation.



Walk with comfort!
Move with freedom!
Try the new Free-Stride Modess!

HOW Powers Models KEEP THEIR HAIR SHINING FOR DAYS WITH NATURAL GLOSSY BEAUTY



Miss Nancy Palomino, beautiful Powers Girl well on the road to Hollywood Stardom, washes her hair with glorifying Kreml Shampoo

Why not give your hair a "beauty-treat" with this famous hard-water shampoo!

Leave it to the beauty-wise Powers Models to discover a way to make their hair look even more beautiful. They use Kreml Shampoo to wash their hair.

This famous shampoo is especially developed not only to thoroughly cleanse hair and scalp of dirt, grease and dandruff flakes—it ALSO actually 'unlocks' all the hair's natural brilliant highlights and leaves it shimmering with its glorious silken-sheen lustre that lasts for days.

Works like magic even in the hardest water

Use Kreml Shampoo plentifully. It rinses out so easily and never leaves any excess soapy residue. It positively contains no harsh caustics or chemicals to dry the hair.

Instead, Kreml Shampoo has a beneficial oil base which helps keep the hair from becoming dry or brittle.

Amazing results even after the first shampoo

Even after the first time you use Kreml Shampoo—notice how much softer and silkier your hair is—how much easier it is to arrange in a stunning new hair-do. Just notice how your hair glows with lovely highlights and radiance you didn't dream possible.

Buy a bottle of Kreml Shampoo at any drug, department, or 10¢ store and 'glamour-bathe' each tiny strand of your hair to its natural sparkling lustre!

THE LARGEST-SELLING SHAMPOO WITH A BENEFICIAL OIL BASE

KREML Shampoo

A product of R. B. Semler, Inc.

FOR SILKEN-SHEEN HAIR—EASIER TO ARRANGE

MADE BY THE MAKERS OF THE FAMOUS KREML HAIR TONIC

Guaranteed by Good Housekeeping

(Continued from Page 112)

His Worship, the Mayor, owner of the town's two-chair barbershop, turned to her. "An' how's the demigong today?" he said heartily. Mr. Neally always said everything heartily.

"I've just come from Wong's."

"Anythin' I kin do fer you?"

"Yes, there is. Those children are not doing very well."

"Ain't they?" With his forefinger he tilted up the nose of the shavee and bent over.

"What has the council done about those—about seeing that those children get food?"

Mr. Neally wiped the razor on a square of paper. "We're considerin' the matter."

"But—this must have been going on for some time; is anything going to be done about it?"

When he answered her the jovial quality of his voice was a bit strained; this was a political matter. "I'm jist the mayor, you know—ain't the ee-lectors; an' them Chinese ain't the only ones needin' relief. Them folks got their own way to take care of the indigement. They got tongs, ain't they?"

Miss Thompson did not answer him; she had left the shop.

That evening Miss Thompson called upon Digby at his boardinghouse. She told him about the China Kids and her visit to Mr. Neally's barbershop; she asked him if he couldn't get some action. He assured her that he would do his best and insisted upon sharing half the Wong grocery bill with her.

At the end of the month, Digby and Miss Thompson found that Peter Svarich had taken care of the Wongs' grocery account at Blaine's Store.

THE China Kids were not the only unfortunates who benefited by Miss Thompson's active sense of justice and her understanding. Very soon after she had come to the school she had surprised upon the Young Ben's face a look that returned to her again and again in the days that followed, a look haunting in its intensity and disturbing in its strange appeal. She found herself, during classes, looking over to the boy, where he sat beside Brian O'Connal and the other Grade Two pupils, whom he dwarfed. She tried to name the expression that was in his triangular face, and suddenly knew: it was the look that lies in the eyes of a caught thing. She changed his seat to a back one among the Grade Four students, there he sat uneasily, lifting his thin shoulders almost a foot above the younger children.

It was the best that Miss Thompson could do.

She sought to ease the boy's tension by assigning him numerous tasks: she asked the Young Ben often to post letters for her; if she wanted a window opened, she let the Young Ben do it. Mr. Digby noted all this; he blessed the chance that had sent Miss Thompson to his school.

Digby had changed. In November he bought a new suit at Blaine's; a rough, herringbone tweed, coarse and wiry,—a cloth that stubbornly resisted Mrs. Geddes' repeated attempts with an iron to put a crease in the trousers, which had as much personality as gunny sacking. In spite of his morning and noon efforts, the sandy lock of hair continued to spring down ove his forehead. He no longer wore the blac knitted ties he had before, but instead brightly striped and crosshatched cravat equaled in brilliance only by his socks.

The Ben had not changed. He had n worries now that his still was secreted be neath three feet of manure in the cow barn The cave there had a square, well-like li filled with the stuff and fitting perfectly int place.

Since the Ben's brief career as janitor, Mr Powelly had nursed scalding bitterness in hi heart. Deliberately he had arranged persona encounters with Jake Harris, bidding him d his duty. He made passionate exhortation to the police department at town-counc meetings; as time went on without the Ben being brought to justice, he delivered pointe sermons criticizing the garbage department It was of no avail.

IN the O'Connal family, Christmas bega as a rule early in December, when the boy started to decide what presents they woul like. In Brian's second year of school, Christ mas was called earlier to the parents' atten tion because with the beginning of winte Brian asked for skates.

Maggie's first response was unbelief; i was difficult for her to think that one of he boys was old enough to want skates. Sh reminded him that he was just past seve and that Forbsie Hoffman did not hav skates yet. Brian replied that Ike Sherr had them. Ike, who was a year and a ha older than Brian, had inherited a pair fro an older sister.

Skates became a frequent topic of conver sation at meals. At length the grandmothe said she was sick of hearing about them Maggie forbade Brian to mention skates a the table again.

The day that he saw the new tube skate in the hardware-store window, Brian calle on his father at work.

"Why can't I have them, dad?"

"Because your mother says you're to young for them."

"But I'm not—I'm ——"

"Seven's pretty young for skates."

"I'll be older at Christmas. That's a lon ways away. May I have them for Christ mas?"

"I don't think so, spalpeen."

(Continued on Page 117)

"Gee, to look at him now you'd never think your dad was a Class-A lover at one time!"

(Continued from Page 114)

fter Brian had left, Gerald felt a pang of orse. That night he had a talk with ggie.

Perhaps by Christmastime?" he asked. "He'll be almost seven and a half then."

His wife looked at him a long time before wering him. "You know—I love him, too, ald. I hate to deny them things as much ou. It's just that he seems so—do you k he's old enough? Do you—honestly?"

I think so, Maggie."

It isn't because he wants them so ly?"

Well—he's old enough—let him skate."

fter a decent interval Brian was told that might possibly get skates, and the night ore Christmas he was almost sick with tement and anticipation. He closed his s tightly. If only he could get to sleep, time would pass more quickly. When one t it was nothing—swift as a person on tes—swift as the wind. . . .

He came, Brian! He came!" Bobbie was ping on the bed, his hair bright in the ter sunshine that filled the room.

Brian jumped from bed. "C'mon!"

Their stockings, lumpy with oranges, each n a colored cardboard clown protruding n its top, hung from the mantel of the blace. Bobbie's sled that could be red was before the tree. Bobbie threw nself upon the cels.

Wait a minute!" d Brian. "They're all yours—just n your name!"

He began to sort out presents upon which ggie, the night be-, had printed in the ge block letters that an could easily read. Anxiously Brian ched the growing of parcels beside . He opened a deep to find it full of ored cars and an en-, in little compart-nts. He opened another—a mechanical ir which, when wound, caused two long ck men to dance galvanically, all the le turning around. Slippers were in one mising-looking parcel. As he opened the of his parcels he was filled with the hor-e conviction that something was wrong. Then he saw a parcel behind the Christmas e. His name was on it. He opened it. ey were not tube skates; they were bob tes, double-runnered affairs with curving cleats and a half-bucket arrangement to ch the heel of the shoe.

For a swift moment Brian's heart was ed with mixed feeling; disappointment ter and blinding was there, but with it a f-dazed feeling of inner release and relief t he had got skates at all.

Throughout dinner he spoke only when ken to. When his father and uncle were ted in the living room with lighted cigars, d his mother and grandmother were in the chen washing the dinner dishes, he went noticed to the hallway, put on his coat and que, and with the bob skates went out.

NCE on the ice, he stood for a moment on mbling legs. He pushed with one foot; it dded sideways; the other went suddenly m under him, and he came down with a mp that snatched his breath. He got care-ly up and stood uncertainly. He pushed a ntative skate ahead, then another. He od still with knees half bent. He gave a sh with one skate preparatory to swoop-g over the ice. He fell flat on his face. He t up.

He began a slow forward sliding across the e—painfully—noncommittal steps of a oke victim just risen from bed. He was t skating, he was walking with an over-elming feeling of frustration that reminded m of dreams in which he ran with all his ght, but stayed only in one spot. He fell ain, and felt his elbow go numb. He sat the ice, looking at his own feet ahead of m.

He began to cry.

Brian's parents, his grandmother and his uncle were seated in the living room when he got back to the house. He was carrying the bob skates as he came out of the hallway.

"Been skatin'?" asked Sean.

Brian did not answer him.

"Uncle Sean asked you a question, son," said Maggie.

Sean's big, freckled hand reached out to take one of the bob skates. "Damn fool question," said Sean. "Fella doesn't skate with bob skates. Had somebody pullin' you, did you?"

Brian shook his head.

"What's wrong, spalpeen?" Brian's father was looking at his tear-stained face.

BRIAN rushed from the room.

"What do you mean?" Maggie turned to Sean. "What's wrong with his skates?"

"They call 'em skates," said Sean. "Can't skate with 'em. Just teaches kids a healthy respect for ice, that's all. Got no grip at all—skid all over."

"But—then that means that Brian—he's ——" Maggie got up and went swiftly from the room. She found Brian at the kitchen window. "Don't they work, son?"

Still looking out the window, Brian shook his head.

"Aren't they what you wanted?"

"Tubes," he got out with difficulty. "Like in Harris'."

"I'm sorry, Brian." Maggie turned his face around to her. "Don't—please don't! I'll fix it!" She went to the phone. "Mr. Harris? Have you a pair of—of tube skates left? Small size? I wonder if we—if you could come down to the store with me—my son—will you ——"

"Mother!"

I don't think anybody can ever have cared more for poetry than he (Padraic Colum) did. He read poets that I couldn't read, and he nearly always had a volume in his pocket. And everything he read he seemed straightway to know by heart, whether he had liked it or not. If he told you So-and-So was a bad poet, he would immediately quote one of his poems from memory to show how bad he was. It was a marvelous gift—more akin to an ear for music than anything else.

—FORREST REID. Private Road. (Faber & Faber).

In his seat, under the yellow chicks and white rabbits alternating around the top border of the blackboard, Fat Hoffman twirled a ruler on the point of his pencil. Seeing the look on his friend's face, Brian O'Connal wondered what had excited Fat. He must have something to tell; he had been late that morning.

The recess bell rang; Fat's ruler dropped with a clatter; Mariel Abercrombie, who had been leaning over so that her hair almost hid her face as she whispered to Eileen Gatenby, straightened up. Mariel was in the midst of another whispering campaign against the Wongs. Today was Mi Tang's birthday; there was to be a party over the Bluebird Café—just for girls. Miss Thompson had announced that she would like Mariel to stay at recess, and now as the others filed out, Mariel remained seated. Brian, looking back over his shoulder, saw her there as he took Fat by the arm in the hall.

"I got rabbits!" said Fat excitedly. "Dad came home last night. He got them in Regina—two of them!"

In the bright light of the schoolyard, Brian stared at Fat. "Live rabbits!"

"One is gray—it is the Belgium rabbit. They were hopping around the front room like anything this morning. You can help me build a pen—you use wire—old screen." Fat's full cheeks shook as he talked.

"What out of old screen?" Ike stood in front of Fat.

"I got two rabbits for Easter," Fat was explaining. "One of them has pink eyes and the other is a Belgium rabbit. He is gray."

Ike's mouth was open in his sharp face; interest was alive in the startling eyes behind his thick glasses. "What about rabbit pens?"

"You come after four—you and Brian. Nobody else though."

Miss Thompson, meanwhile, sat at her desk and looked thoughtfully at Mariel Abercrombie standing before her. She thought of what she had overheard in the cloakroom that morning just before school

(Continued on Page 119)

Which Twin has the Toni?

(And which had her permanent at a beauty shop? No one could tell the Ring twins' permanents apart—can you? See the answer below!)

Yes, you can give yourself a lovely TONI Home Permanent for your date tonight

Take a tip from the Toni Twin, Kathleene Ring of Chicago . . . give yourself a Toni Home Permanent today... and look lovelier tonight. It's this easy:

1. Roll your hair up on curlers, dabbing on Toni Creme Lotion as you go.

2. Tie a turban round your head and relax for 2 to 3 hours. (No sitting under a hot dryer.)

3. Saturate each curl with Toni Neutralizer and rinse.

With your hair set, step to the mirror and admire your new Toni Permanent. See the deep, wonderful waves. Feel the silky softness of your hair. Notice its radiant natural luster. Toni is a Creme Lotion that gently coaxes your hair into deep waves that are frizz-free and easy to manage from the start. And they last as long as a $15 permanent.

Toni works like a charm on any hair that will take a permanent—even gray, dyed, bleached or baby-fine hair. Every hour of the day another 1000 women use Toni. So ask for the Toni Home Permanent Kit. On sale at leading cosmetic, drug and notion counters.

Kathleene, the twin with the Toni Home Permanent, is on the right above. Did you guess?

Toni

HOME PERMANENT

THE CREME COLD WAVE

$1.25 plus tax

Easy as rolling your hair up in curlers—but the wave stays in

"tonight, let's take the long way—"

I couldn't bear to go straight home and waste these stars! Not tonight, when Tom and I and the Plymouth can drift together, listening to the music, while the motor purrs along . . .

Watch him take the turn into the back road without thinking—that's what you've done for us, Plymouth! A sort of second honeymoon, in which my tired business man can relax against your deep cushions and drive and talk his heart out, as he used to.

Honestly—he sounds like a kid with his first car! Forever asking if I've noticed how few bumps we feel. Or how little effort it is to shift (something to do with very special transmission gears!). Or how fast and smooth we stop, because of these new brakes.

Noticed? Who drives you, daytimes, anyway?
But a woman likes a car that puts her man at ease. And, well—look at Tom and see, Plymouth—you're for me!

PLYMOUTH

MOST LIKE THE HIGH-PRICED CARS

(Continued from Page 115)

had started. She heard again the girls' shrill voices.

"Nobody's going to her party anyway." That had been Mariel.

"I'm not going—Gracie's not going—nobody's going but you," said Helen Roberts.

"I know a riddle!" cried Mariel. "She's in Grade Three—she's got a nice blue bow in her hair—her name starts with E."

"Eileen Gatenby!" the others chorused.

"An' another: she's in Grade Four—she has black hair that isn't curly—it is straight and it is stringy and kind of greasy! She is yellow and has slanty eyes!"

"Tang!"

With an effort, Miss Thompson brought her attention back to Mariel standing stolidly before her.

"Tang is having a birthday party today," said Miss Thompson. "She has invited me."

"It's Parent-Teachers day," said Mariel.

"I think I can manage it for a minute before the meeting. Are you going to Tang's party, Mariel?"

The child looked over her shoulder at several pupils who had entered the room.

"Mariel!"

Mariel's head swung round, the hair flying out at the sides of her face. "No," she said. "Mother says not!" The answer was triumphant.

For the rest of the school day Miss Thompson's troubled mind was only partly concerned with her classes.

On her way downtown she passed Hoffman's yard, where Brian and Fat and Ike and Bobbie bent over the rabbits. Their teacher walked along the main street toward O'Connal's Drugstore. When Brian's father came out to wait on her, she bought a small, carved bottle of twenty-five-cent perfume. She also bought a "Happy Birthday" card.

She came to the orange splash of potted geraniums behind the Bluebird's dusty windows, opened the door and went in. The swinging door at the back of the café opened. Old Wong appeared.

"Where are the children?" asked Miss Thompson.

"He opstahs—he theah—he theah now." Old Wong spoke with a complete stopping and starting of each word, now and then the sudden singing of a long vowel. "You go—you see he some." He turned to push open the kitchen door again.

They were in one corner of a tilting settee, quite close together. Tang had her arm around Vooie's neck; over the top of the stove with its elbowed pipe disappearing into one wall, Miss Thompson could just see the boy's black, chrysanthemum head. She stepped around the stove.

"Happy birthday, Tang."

The tan, flat planes of their faces tilted up to her; their dark eyes stared.

"Thank you." Miss Thompson barely heard the words.

She held out the bottle of perfume and the card tied to it, and with her arm still around her brother's neck, Tang took it. 'Thank you," she whispered again. Her hand dropped to her lap.

The teacher looked down at them uncertainly. There was no doubt that they knew. As well as she could, under the gaze of the two silent children, she turned from the room. The abrupt stairs urged her forward.

At the kitchen table Old Wong sliced birthday sandwiches. Birthday cocoa had begun to steam in granite pots. Evidently he did not know yet. She hurried from the café.

In the sunlit street, the feeling of utter helplessness which had been leeching at her heart suddenly flooded her whole being. Surely the mothers could have helped! She couldn't face them at the meeting. She couldn't!

At first there had been only two rabbits in the pen by Hoffman's barn; now there were ten. The boys were elated. The Belgian hare was the mother; Brian and Fat had witnessed the actual appearance of the baby rabbits.

"Gee, Fat," Brian had said, "they look funny—they haven't got any hair!"

"They will," promised Fat. "They'll grow up and get it."

"Then they'll have rabbits," Brian predicted, "and they'll grow up."

"And have rabbits too," supplied Fat.

"And they'll grow up and have rabbits."

"We'll have lots of rabbits," concluded Fat.

"What'll we do with 'em, Fat?"

"Sell 'em. Dad paid fifty cents apiece for these. We'll sell 'em."

And so for two weeks they waited with impatience. At the end of a month, when no new rabbits had put in an appearance, Brian went to his father.

"Dad?"

"Yes, spalpeen?"

"How do rabbits get started?"

From his leather chair in the den, Gerald O'Connal stared at his son. He must be frank and honest about the thing. "You know how a plant gets started?"

"How?"

"From a seed. You plant it in the ground, and it grows into a plant."

"I know that."

"Know what?" asked Bobbie, who had entered the room.

"Something I'm explaining to Brian. With animals, it's the same."

"What is?" asked Bobbie.

"Babies," said Brian. "He's telling me."

"You remember asking me about pigeons a long time—about four years ago?"

"No," said Brian.

"I told you then that the pigeon grows inside the egg—inside—the egg is inside the mother pigeon until she lays it. All the time that she is hatching the egg, the baby pigeon is growing there. When it has grown enough, it comes out."

"They don't with rabbits," said Bobbie. "Brian saw them come right out he said he saw them."

"Rabbits are different. They don't have eggs. They simply grow inside the mother, and when it's time, they grow—they come out.

Gerald O'Connal looked down at Brian's thoughtful face. Evidently the explanation had been enough, Brian's father told himself. He picked up his Reading Leader again.

"Where does the seed come in," asked Brian.

"That—oh—that's what the baby rabbit grows from inside the mother rabbit, spalpeen."

"Is she full up with them?"

(Continued on Page 121)

★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★

Second Love

By LEONARD SNYDER

She kept his house; she shared his food and bed
And gave him two strong sons,
but always there
Were days when he was silent and apart.
Each time she told herself she must not care.

She never understood why they would come,
These days when darkness
seemed to rise inside,
Something that he could never bring to words
But only showed he was unsatisfied.

She never understood that in his heart
Green waves were locked in stormy aftermath.
She never knew that still the boy
at sea
Lived in this man who walked a prairie path.

★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★

It's the

WALDORF SERT ROOM

"MAYFAIR" $15.75*

It's the

DOBBS

Distinguished background for interesting people...that famous room with the murals only one artist in the world could have painted. There's a master touch, too, in the DOBBS hats so often seen in this setting. It's a significance of line and a feeling for color, infinite care in detailing and fitting, a talent for hats in which you are always confident of looking and being your best.

Dobbs hats—styled and sized to fit.

"FEMINA" $15.75*

DOBBS HATS

PARK AVENUE AT 53RD STREET
NEW YORK 22, N. Y.

AT FINE STORES EVERYWHERE

*Light colors slightly higher

YOUR "T-ZONE" WILL TELL YOU!

T for Taste...
T for Throat...

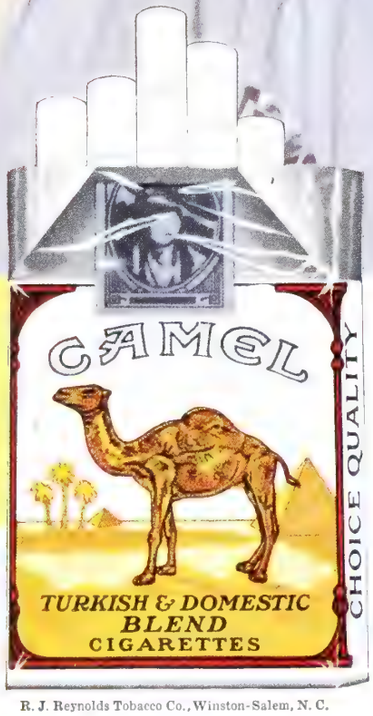
That's your own proving ground for any cigarette

YES, the "T-Zone" is your own critical laboratory for any cigarette. That's where you learn by actual smoking experience the particular cigarette that suits you best.

For your taste and your throat are individual to you. Only your taste and throat can decide which cigarette tastes best to you... and how it affects your throat.

Try Camels. See how your taste responds to the rich, full flavor of Camel's choice, properly aged tobaccos. See how your throat reacts to the delightfully cool mildness of Camels.

On the basis of the experience of many, many millions of smokers, we believe Camels will suit your "T-Zone" to a "T."



R. J. Reynolds Tobacco Co., Winston-Salem, N. C.

According to a recent Nationwide survey:

More Doctors smoke Camels than any other cigarette

Like the rest of us, doctors smoke for pleasure. They appreciate flavor and mildness just as you. When 113,597 doctors were asked by three independent research organizations to name the cigarette they smoked, more doctors named Camels than any other brand.

(Continued from Page 119)

—she—in a way."
ı can't grow anything without seeds."
d O'Connal laid down the paper. He at Bobbie. "That's right. The father plants the seeds."
ere'd he get them?"
y—they're in him."
y don't they grow up in him and come him then?" asked Brian relentlessly.
ause they don't. They have to grow nother rabbit."
ı was silent. He looked up thought-his father. "And like Ike says—that's e's doing when ——"
—that's what he's doing. He's—g."
n's intense stare was disconcerting.
a way," Mr. O'Connal finished up.

buck and the doe that Mr. Hoffman ought home came of a particularly train, the boys found out during the of the summer; they were delighted after litter made its appearance and bbit population of Hoffman's back ncreased by arithmetic progression.
rease soon became an alarming thing.
lined the sides and one end of Hoff-yard; there were old apple boxes, nd pear crates; and in them all, rab-uched and hopped and sat up. There ay rabbits, black, and white, and all rmutations and combinations of the vith bucks and does at every period of
.
e were one hundred and twenty-three
.
had done what he could; in the begineral had been sold, but it was not very l there were no
he had tried them away, but venue was no
pen—the town
ached its satupoint.
y in September,
ffman went into al's Drugstore way from the
, and engaged father in ear-nversation. His step was noticeably when he came out and started for ne, carrying as he always did the little lub bag that he took with him on train that night Joe Pivott's dray rolled offman's yard; Mr. Hoffman, Mr.

al and Joe worked swiftly and silently, ack after sack with kicking, grunting
. Mr. Hoffman spent that night in eep.
was heartbroken; he pleaded with his for another pair, and when his father
d home, the boy asked him. Mr.
an did not weaken; his hesitation was perceptible when Fat backed down to e rabbit.
n was shocked, but not emotionally at was, by the blotting out of the rabbrought another crop failure to the

; the land was dotted now with empty uses, their blank windows staring out e spreading prairie. The sash-and-door closed down; Blaine's General Store
And for the first time in years, Sean nal was almost happy; his garden-on project had worked wonderfully
He set about trying to interest other s in the district in a plan he had to dam er and irrigate larger areas of drought-land.
t fall, Brian's grandmother had a l cold that threatened to turn into onia, but she managed to draw on reof Scotch stubbornness to throw it off.
that fall, too, that Digby and Miss son and Peter Svarich finally got ac-the China Kids. After much deliberа-he town put the Chinese family on re-temporary measure until arrange-were completed for sending the chilway: Tang to an uncle in Vancouver, to a home in Winnipeg. The taxes piled up on Wong's building were ignored. Two weeks after his son and daughter had left, Wong was discovered [illegible] red toque on, [illegible] kitchen; he had managed it by using a length of clothesline, by standing on one of the kitchen chairs and kicking it over. Jake Harris found no opium among his effects.

On an afternoon early in October as Brian walked home from school, he saw Jappy run out to meet Joe Pivott's dray, passing in front of the O'Connal house, his red-and-white quicksilver body half curved so that he could look up into the faces of the horses as he ran. Brian called to him. In that split second of distraction the dog was knocked off balance by one of the horses' hoofs. The near horse veered at the scrabbling white thing under its feet, and pulled over its mate.

Brian saw his dog briefly through huge and hairy feet; he saw the metal-rimmed front wheels of the dray miss Jappy. The hind ones did not. A shrill and agonized cry arose, trembling on the fall afternoon, shearing the silence, going up and up and hanging there. As the wind carried the settling dust sideways, Brian saw Jappy lifting his shoulders and head in a vain attempt to rise, struggling, only to move in a futile circle with lifeless hindquarters for a pivot.

He ran to him. He took him in his lap. The cry went up again. It died down to a scarcely audible whimper deep in the dog's throat.

"Wasn't nothin' I could do, kid." Joe stood tall over him. "I didn't even see him."

Brian simply stared down at Jappy.

"I'm sorry, kid."

"It's all right."

"Spine busted, mebbe?" Joe's hand reached for the small of Jappy's tapering back.

"You let him alone!"

"Okay." Joe straightened up. He stood uncomfortably. "I'm sorry."

"That's all right."

"Better not set here in the middla the road."

Jappy cried out again as Brian got up. He was dead by the time they got to the garage behind the house.

Gaffer Thomas lent him a garden fork. Brian returned to the garage, where he had left Jappy lying on some gunny sacking there. As he picked up the dog's body, he noticed that the head remained rigidly turned over one shoulder; the eyes were filmed with gray mucus. He went through the caragana hedge, turned out onto the street and started toward the prairie.

Halfway down the block his brother joined him. They walked in silence.

The prairie sod resisted the garden fork. A meadow lark sang twice as he struggled. The hardpan came away in flaking lumps to show glistening, riblike marks where the fork had been.

"How did he die?" asked Bobbie.

Brian picked up the dog by the middle, still with its head turned relentlessly back over one shoulder. He placed it in the long hole with foxtails and spear grass tossing along its edges.

"How did he die, Brian? What happened to him?"

Brian eased a forkful of dirt onto the dog's body. The next were easier. He covered the head with its one red ear last.

"How did he ——"

"Go on home, will you, Bobbie?" He looked as though he were going to cry. He turned away. "I'll come later," Brian said.

He looked down at the grave, and it was hard for him to believe that Jappy was under it, that he wouldn't in a moment see the earth bulge up and the dog's head come out. Then he remembered the stiffness of the body, the turned head, the filmed eyes. He knew that a lifeless thing was under the earth. His dog was dead.

He heard a rustling in the grass and looked up to see the Young Ben with his pale hair on end in the wind and his disturbing gray eyes steady upon him. The eyes left his face to > Happiness is not to be solicited, but comes with an appearance of finality, to be juggled with offhand. It seems to be some kind of balance, as in riding a bicycle, attempted painfully a thousand times, and achieved at last without effort.

>
> —ELIZABETH BOWEN.

Precision made...

50¢

Dr. West's Miracle-Tuft

it reaches every surface of every tooth better!

Copr. 1947 by Weco Products Company

CORRECT DESIGN is the secret back of the amazing cleansing power of Dr. West's Miracle-Tuft. The brush head is curved two ways so you can reach every surface of every tooth—inside, outside and in between. Millions have discovered that no other toothbrush can do this job so thoroughly. Sealed in glass for extra protection and guaranteed for a year, one brushing will convince you that Dr. West's Miracle-Tuft is the toothbrush for you. Get one or two today!

rest on the grave, then back again. The Young Ben turned away; he came back stooping under the weight of a rock. He laid it gently on the grave, then went back for another. Brian joined him, and together they carried enough rocks to cover the heap of loose dirt.

When they had finished, the Young Ben said, "Kiyoots can't git him now."

Somewhere within Brian something was gone; ever since the accident it had been leaving him as the sand of an hourglass threads away grain by tiny grain. Now there was an emptiness that wasn't to be believed.

III

BRIAN was called "Chirp" now, because he could make the sound of baby chicks cheeping. In the two years since his dog had been run over, he had grown little taller, still retaining the quiet poise of his mother, her quickness of movement, her dark hair and skin. Almost eleven, he had passed into Mr. Digby's room; at the spring examinations he had been third in his class.

On a day in August, Brian saw the Young Ben across the street, leaning forward as he pulled a wagon piled high with washing. Brian stopped and stared across at the Young Ben; he never saw the other boy without excitement stirring within him; as ever, it was a wordless attraction strengthening with each additional and fleeting glimpse he got of the Young Ben. He felt an impulse now to cross the street and walk along with the Young Ben. But as he stood, the Young Ben turned the corner toward the downtown district; Brian walked on.

The Young Ben stood before Harris' Hardware, the empty wagon beside him as he stared into the store window. A .22 rifle leaned against a washing machine with sunlight glinting from its metal fittings. Boxes of shells were next to the gun; one of them was opened so that the shells were spilling out. The price tag said $8.95.

"Nice gun."

The Young Ben looked up to see Mr. Digby. The Young Ben turned silently away, pulling the wagon after him.

The look that had been in the Young Ben's face stayed with Digby as he walked home; there was no doubt that the Young Ben wanted the gun badly, and the yearning that the Young Ben must feel found its match in the school principal. Digby also wanted something badly. He wanted Miss Thompson.

Just the night before in his room at Mrs. Geddes' he had thought the matter out. He was a teacher, a public-school teacher. He boasted no degree and could not look ahead to a possible high-school principalship. The best that could be hoped for was perhaps an inspectorship many years in the future. Actually he could offer her very little; one could hardly build up an estate on fourteen hundred a year.

A doctor, on the other hand—there was some distinction in being a doctor's wife. Svarich had everything to offer—security; not that he himself couldn't give that—security from actual want, but not security from the nagging little worries of not quite enough money. He was afraid that he and the Young Ben were in the same boat. It was not likely that the Young Ben would get his gun.

As Digby turned into Mrs. Geddes', Brian O'Connal walked slowly down Sixth Street. He found no one in the living room, and he did not notice the usual smells of dinner cooking.

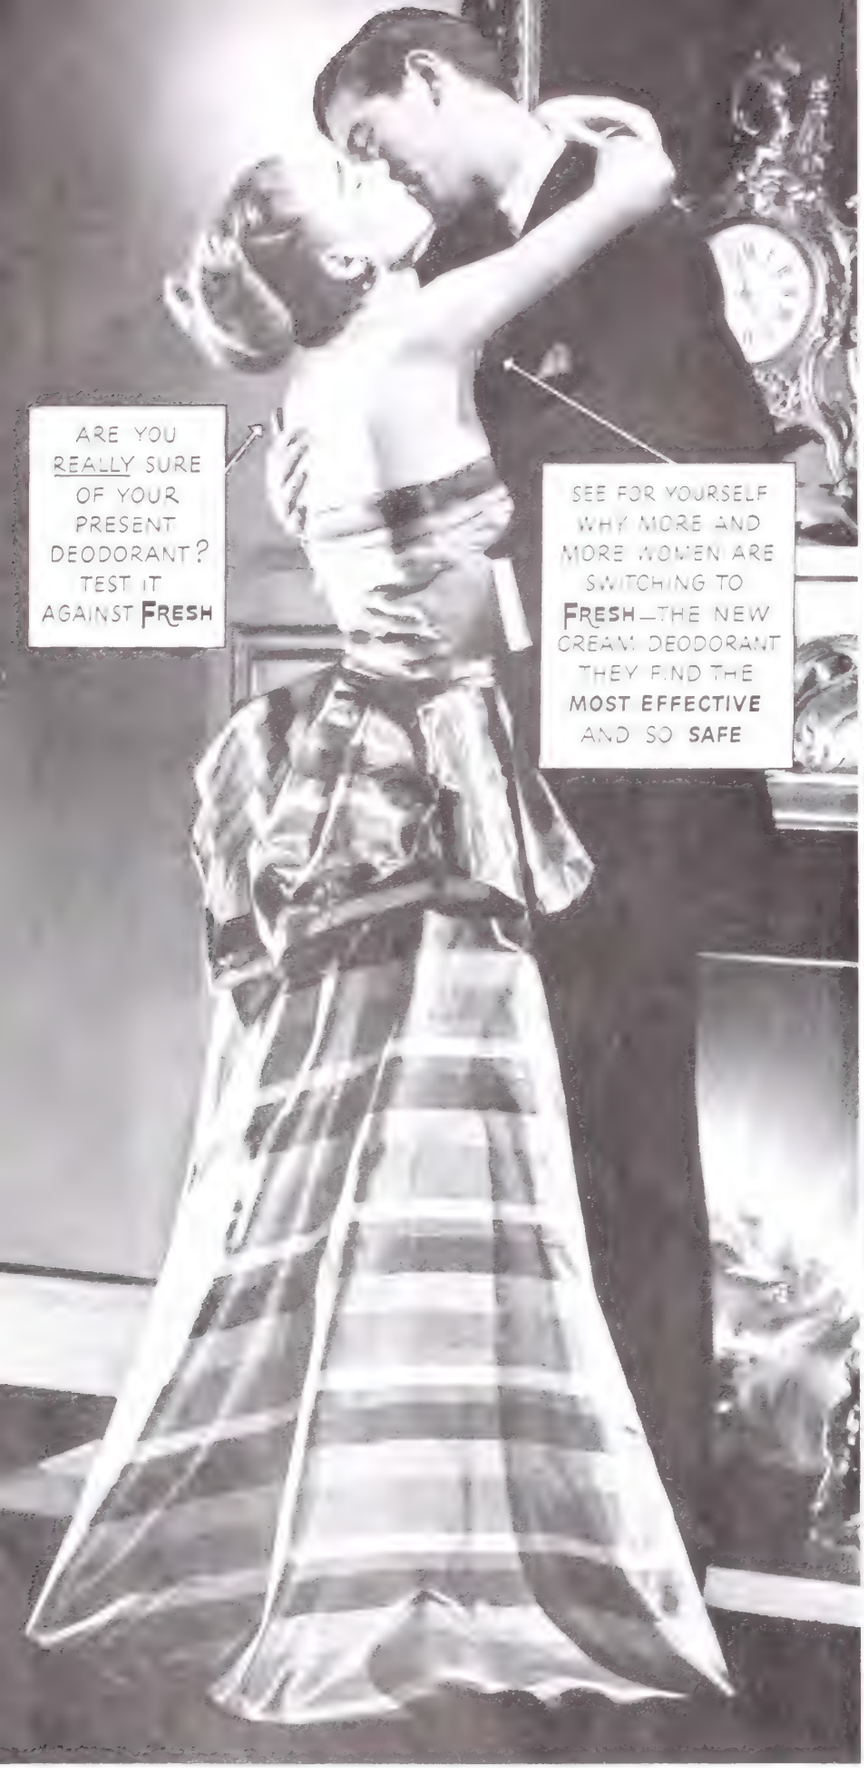
He heard movements upstairs, and as he turned by the stair banister, saw Bobbie on the landing above. His brother had been crying.

"Daddy's turned all yellow," he announced. "Doctor Svarich was here."

"Was he!"

"It's his gald bladder," Bobbie told him. "The white parts of his eyes—they are yellow, too, Brian. Brian—what's your gald bl——"

Brian started up the stairs two at a time; he met his grandmother in the hall. "Is he very sick, gramma?"



ARE YOU REALLY SURE OF YOUR PRESENT DEODORANT? TEST IT AGAINST FRESH
SEE FOR YOURSELF WHY MORE AND MORE WOMEN ARE SWITCHING TO FRESH—THE NEW CREAM DEODORANT THEY FIND THE MOST EFFECTIVE AND SO SAFE

Use FRESH and be lovelier to love

Lovely to know . . . that you can really rely on Fresh. Fresh [illegible]

Lovely to use . . . gentle Fresh stays smooth . . . never greasy, gritty or sticky . . . doesn't dry out.

And safe . . . Fresh contains a patented ingredient that makes it truly safe for skin and fabrics.

No wonder . . . more and more women are switching to Fresh.

Company coming. Head starts to ache.
Needs Alka-Seltzer. Knows what to take.
Bottle is empty, but she doesn't care.
She has an EXTRA, calls it her "spare."

Alka-Seltzer

Be wise—but no extra headache

If you've ever been caught with a pesky headache and—no Alka-Seltzer!—you'll agree that an EXTRA package on hand is a mighty comforting forethought. And that includes waking up at night with an upset stomach, or those other common ailments like muscular aches and pains and the discomforts of a cold. So be wise! On your next visit to the drug store buy TWO packages of Alka Seltzer instead of one.

New Charm for your Smile

with the triple-action tooth powder

. BRIGHTENS TEETH!

. FRESHENS MOUTH!

. SWEETENS BREATH!

made by McKesson & Robbins with years of pharmaceutical know-how

It was a mean call bladder Svanish told mother in town Brian at his Uncle Sean's being terribly in favor of the latter part of the arrangement. Like most others in the district, Sean's crop was a failure, and each time

The thought of Ab's pure and stirring ex-

Harris' Hardware to steal a .22 and five that nothing had been done since Digby had paid for shells and gun. Mr. Powell placed the feather at the head of his cell list.

The evening of the Presbyterian minister's visit was the end of a bad day in the romantic life of James Digby. He had spent the almost to disconnect them in her eyes now stood him a mile that established complete and intimate understanding.

Miss Thompson looked at him, startled.

"I always thought people went about this sort of thing differently," Digby went on.

"There is!" said Digby. He felt relief

now. "I was always under the impression

I'm startled."

YOURS FOR KEEPS [illegible] his [illegible] your hands—those ravishing, romantic hands that use the [illegible] NEW HINDS!

NEW HINDS is enriched with lanolin especially to soften your hands—instantly make them feel smoother . . . lovelier!

NEW HINDS works like magic—because [illegible] lanolin, the special softening ingredient. Is not sticky.

NEW HINDS protects longer against [illegible] roughness. Always use after hands have been in water or after outdoor exposure.

Get this amazing NEW HINDS Honey and Almond Fragrance Cream—at toilet goods counters today! Four generous sizes 10c to $1.00 plus tax.

Digby was aware of a sudden and sinking sensation in the pit of his stomach. "Well—I—at least, you know my intentions were honorable." He felt her hand cool and gentle on the back of his. The look in her eyes was one of startled hurt.

"I'm very fond of you, Jim."

"Oh." Digby swallowed. He was aware of a stiffness and dryness in his throat, and felt his face flushing. "It's—that's all right."

"It isn't, Jim!"

"I ought to have known. It was stupid of me to think that you'd even ——"

"It wasn't," she said quickly. "I'm fond of you. If it came down to a fine point—but—well, I guess next to Peter, you come next."

Digby looked down at the white tablecloth. "It's all right."

And that night as she lay in bed, Miss Thompson wondered why she had never thought of Digby in that way. With all her sympathetic heart she wished he had not asked her; and then, aware of a distinct tingling over her entire body, she wondered whether or not, if she and Peter had not finally made it up again, she would not have accepted Digby. She had thought that Digby understood, though she had told him nothing about her plans to marry Svarich when school was finished. What would she have done if Peter had not entered her life again?

And yet she could not think of Digby as "poor Jim." Somehow a person did not think of the principal with commiseration, not as with Peter. Digby could take care of himself. Peter needed her.

That was the night that Mr. Powelly visited Digby. The schoolmaster answered the door himself. He took the minister through the dark, deep hall and to the room at the back of the house.

"I've come to see you about the boy who broke into the hardware store," said Powelly as soon as he was seated.

"Yes?" said Digby in the act of filling his pipe.

"I understand that you—paid the money for the articles he stole."

"He wanted a gun."

"Do you think that with the unfortunate background he has—do you think you're doing him a favor?"

Digby looked at the minister who had come to take the place of his friend, Hislop.

"I thought a long time before I did it, Mr. Powelly. I'd welcome any help with the Young Ben that you ——"

Mr. Powelly waved a long hand. "Far be it from me to tell you your job. It's just that when I heard today of what you'd done, I felt it my duty to call—to have a talk with you. That boy should have gone to reform school."

Digby exhaled smoke slowly, took his pipe from his mouth. "Why?"

"He's a bad lot. His father's a drunken old reprobate ——"

"'The fathers have eaten sour grapes, and the children's teeth are set on edge.'"

"Eh? Oh—no—no, that isn't it at all. I might find it hard to get an unbiased viewpoint of the father, but the boy—for the good of the town ——"

"If my life depended on it, I couldn't tell you what was for that boy's good—or for the good of this town. I'd like to be able to. What do you think good for the people who live in this town, Mr. Powelly?"

"Right now my concern is for the boy who ——"

"Yes—I know. The trouble is that the Young Ben's a lone coyote, Mr. Powelly. Because he is what he is, I don't think you have any need to worry about the good of our town. He has little or nothing to do with other boys. He won't go near them. He never has."

"But—that he should steal and then get off scot free," protested the minister. "It can't help but create an unfortunate impression among other youngsters who may be so tempted."

"You overestimate the potency of the Young Ben's example. I can guarantee that his influence will be next to nothing."

"You don't intend to do anything, then, about a—about his correction?"

Sugar-pink [illegible] in Knox's famous fine fur felt: sophisticated roller in sea [illegible] other Knox hats from $8.95. Knox the Hatter, [illegible] and leading stores everywhere.

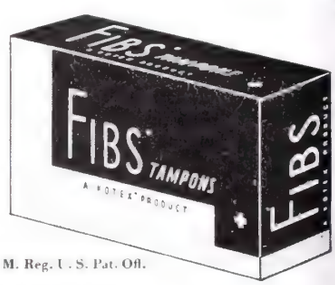
*Dark colors $22.50

Rounded end like this

One glance at the gently rounded end o Fibs and you know insertion's bound to b easy with this tampon. And your firs experience proves it's so! Next month switch to FIBS.

AND FIBS are quilted!

Only Fibs are quilted to control expansio . . . keep them from fluffing up to an un comfortable size which might cause pres sure, irritation, difficult removal. An quilting helps prevent cotton particles fror clinging to delicate internal tissues . . . FIBS safety feature women always appre ciate. For comfort, for safety in interna protection—switch to FIBS tampons.



*T. M. Reg. U. S. Pat. Off.

JOYOUS RELIEF
FOR TIRED ACHING FEET
● Don't let tired feet due to overstrain get you down, rob you of recreation hours after work. Try a MU-COL foot-bath.
MU-COL CO., Buffalo 3, N.Y.
Sample Free Use Coupon
Mu-col
Name
Address
B-247
...SOLD AT ALL DRUG STORES

beware!

Dry Skin makes you look years older

new

Woodbury Special
Dry Skin Cream

- discourages tiny dry-skin lines
- gives a fresher, younger look
- softens winter-chapped skin

TAKE CARE! Winter's harsh weather dries your skin, tends to deepen lines and cause unsightly flakiness.

Here's a cream with proven powers to combat dryness. Rich in lanolin's skin-softening benefits. Contains four more rich oils especially smoothing to dry skin. Apply overnight, or for just 5 daytime minutes.

Woodbury Special Dry Skin Cream is a "must" if you're 30-or-over . . . a wise investment for under-30's. See its beautifying benefits yourself. Send for your free sample today.

Free Sample

See beautifying results!

I want to try FREE sample of Woodbury Special Dry Skin Cream, and see its softening action on my skin. (Print name, address clearly. Paste coupon on penny postcard.) Mail to Box 45, Dept. 400, Cincinnati 14, O.

Name .....

Street .....

City .....

(Sorry, offer good only in U. S.)

"Not much I can do."

"You could say that you had changed your mind about paying for the articles. The case would be reopened."

The pencil that Digby's hand had picked up from the desk was unconsciously drawing on a piece of paper by his side. "I don't think you really meant to make that suggestion," he said slowly. "The Young Ben wanted a gun. Now he has a gun."

Mr. Powelly got up. "I thought it would do no harm to call," he said stiffly. His face was slightly flushed.

"It was nice of you to come," said Digby. "I've done what I think best."

"I'm sure you have." Mr. Powelly turned toward the door. "That's what is going to make it more difficult to do what I shall have to do."

Brian found the evenings on his uncle's farm strange. He was allowed to stay up until the flame flickered in the coal-oil lamp on the kitchen table. While Sean relaxed, big and silent in his chair, Brian amused himself by tracing horses from the harness section of the Hudson Bay catalogue. Ab would perch himself on the top of the wood box to read the Prairie Farm Review. He returned again and again to the correspondence section, in which people asked for remedies for sick animals. Ab did this with Noreen in mind. Noreen was a contrary Holstein that suffered from asthma.

Annie sat with them in the kitchen, doing needlework on flour sacking, from time to time a slow smile lifting her long, tenting cheeks so that her eyes were almost lost. One hardly noticed, then, the terrible cast in Annie's right eye.

It is bad manners to say "You are welcome to your own opinion": but it is the perfection of good fellowship to really mean it.

—GEORGE BERNARD SHAW

At first Brian found the relationship between his uncle and the hired man a strange one. Sean never spoke to Ab—directly; he addressed all requests and observations to the air in front of himself, to the floor, to the wall. Ab was expected to hear, but in no way shatter the illusion that he did not exist. Ab was the "he" in Sean's conversation.

The third evening of Brian's visit, Sean took his pipe from his mouth; he spoke to a moth fluttering in the chimney of the lamp.

"That runt pig's not doin' so well."

The moth was still a second.

"He should have taken care of it long before now."

The moth's wings were frantic for a moment, then stilled for good.

"'Twould be too much to expect him to take care of it in the mornin', I suppose." Sean got up from his chair.

It was nice of Sean and Ab to take care of the runt pig, thought Brian, as he went to bed that night under the slant ceiling of his upstairs room.

The next afternoon Brian followed Ab into the blacksmith shop; he watched him take down a hammer from the wall and began to follow him as he took up his rockering walk over the yard.

"Better go play with the cats in the barn," Ab advised.

"I'd just as soon go wherever you're going, Ab."

"Nope," said Ab.

"Why?"

"You wanta know," said Ab. "I'll tell yuh. I gotta knock that runt on the head."

"I thought you were going to take care ——"

"That's right. You ain't gonna see. Go play with ——"

"But—look, Ab, would—you wouldn't do that! You wouldn't hit him over the head—with a hammer!"

"She's gotta be did. I ain't fussy about it." He started for the pens again.

"Ab! You can't kill my runty pig!"

"I gotta," said Ab. "I'm gonna."

SHORTBACK

Foot Savers

shoes with a dual personality

the newest in fashion—Foot Savers—for the latest look, the ultimate in fashion! Crafted of treasure-leathers in Spring styles so varied and so-very-tomorrow, yet so subtly done, they go on forever.

the same flawless fit—Yes, the same fit—that oh-so-wonderful, infallible, invaluable Foot Saver fit! For these shoes, made over the special Shortback* Last, give you snug fit at heel, roomy comfort at toe. For superlative fit, Foot Savers always.

Write for name of nearest store. The Julian & Kokenge Company, 36 W. Main Street, Columbus 15, Ohio.

*Reg. U. S. Pat. Off.

Only Foot Savers are made over the Shortback Last which prevents looseness and gapping at the heel without pinching at the toe.

FOOT SAVERS ARE A PRODUCT OF PRIVATE ENTERPRISE

A New Delight— to Serve Tonight!

A World Famous Chef brings you his delicious Spaghetti Dinner... Spaghetti, Jar of Sauce, Cheese . . . all in one handy carton, ready in 12 minutes

Chef Boy-Ar-Dee Suggests—this tempting arranged platter for your weekly treat of his scrumptious Spaghetti Dinner

Chef Boy-ar-dee Spaghetti Dinner

Years ago, Hector Boiardi* ruled the kitchens of a great hotel as Chef de Cuisine. People came from miles around to enjoy his famous spaghetti cooked to order, blended with a superb sauce and crowned with zesty cheese.

One day a customer said to the Chef, "If only you'd visit my kitchen and prepare your spaghetti dinner!" That started the Chef thinking. Now all food stores have the inspired result—the handy all-in-one carton of Chef Boy-Ar-Dee Spaghetti Dinner!

It's thrifty . . . quick . . . grand for hungry appetites. Serves three or more hearty eaters for just a few pennies a portion.

Pronounced BOY-AR-DEE*

Delicious "No-Work" Meal

The handy Chef Boy-Ar-Dee carton contains:

1. [illegible] package of [illegible] spaghetti [illegible].
2. Large jar of the one-and-only Chef Boy-Ar-Dee Spaghetti Sauce. Just needs heating.
3. Canister of special Parmesan style cheese, [illegible]

Two styles, with meat in sauce or meatless with extra mushrooms. Children love it. Get a carton today.

You'll enjoy Chef Boy-Ar-Dee Ravioli, too!

PRODUCT OF AMERICAN HOME FOODS

LADY, WHAT A SAUCE!

It's the secret of the succulent goodness in Chef Boy-Ar-Dee Spaghetti Dinner. And now it can be your own secret in preparing dozens of different "out-of-this-world" dishes. For this piquant sauce can also be bought separately, in 8-ounce tins. It's like having a "chef on your shelf"—always ready to add exciting new flavor to treats such as this:

PARTY FRANKFURTERS

12 frankfurters

1 tin Chef Boy-Ar-Dee Sauce

Cut frankfurters lengthwise, but not clear through. Place split side up in shallow baking pan, and cover with Chef Boy-Ar-Dee Spaghetti Sauce. Bake in moderate oven (350°) for 20 minutes. Serve with corn niblets, rice or noodles, and pass hot extra Chef Boy-Ar-Dee Sauce in bowl. Serves 6.

Copr. 1947, Chef Boy-Ar-Dee Quality Foods, Inc.

"All right, Ab!" Brian drew a deep breath. "Go right ahead and kill that damn pig!"

Ab stopped so quickly he teetered. He turned. "As the twig is bent, so the tree groweth! I sure hate to think what's gonna happen to you if I ever hear you talkin' like that agin!"

"Hit that pig with that hammer, and you'll really hear me cuss!" Brian surprised himself with his fluency.

It surprised him that Ab could run as fast as he did with his game leg. The two covered the yard, one corner of the south pasture and part of the garden. There they stopped, one at each end of a row of raspberry bushes. Brian could see Ab trembling in the afternoon heat; the whole garden was steeping hot and still, oppressively so.

Annie came from the house with a slop pail in each hand.

"I'll give you ten to come get what you got comin'!" shrieked Ab.

"Catch me!" called Brian.

They took up the chase again. Brian realized with some surprise that he had been enjoying himself. He didn't care if they stayed in the garden all day. Perhaps they would have, if Sean had not come out. Annie had got him.

"'Bout time you took a look at this here kid!" Ab called. "Swearin' an' cursin' like a Irish thrasher."

"Don't come any closer," Brian warned his uncle, but Sean did not stop. The boy began to swear, with a slight hardness to his r's and a touch of the lilt that was in Sean's own voice.

"What coz dis trobble?" asked Annie.

"He don't want me to knock the runt on the head."

"Does he want him to die slow?" asked Sean. "It's a favor we're doin' him."

"Killin' a thing's no favor!"

"Leave him to me," said Sean.

"You get baby t'ing forbowtell," said Annie.

"I will not! I'll be good and ——"

"Oh, yes you will," contradicted Ab. "You get that there nipple so's the kid kin feed the pig hisself."

In the days that followed he spent more and more time with Annie. Brian came to know the depth of her fondness for Ab; she showed the boy the cowhide chest in her room where she had laid away pillow slips and table runners and dishcloths, all stitched bright with flowers. Annie's conversations were simple ones, consisting largely of the same question rephrased again and again: "You t'ink Ab marry sometimes?" "You t'ink Ab like to be my hoseban'?" Brian, filled with gratitude for what she had done in saving his runt pig, assured her that Ab had love in his heart.

Two weeks and five catalogue horses after the pig episode, Brian sat in the evening silence of the kitchen with his eyes on Annie bent over needlework. Ab was reading his Prairie Farm Review; Sean was puffing in his chair. Brian turned a page of the catalogue to the Optical Department ad. He looked for a minute at the clear-eyed woman in spectacles, surrounded by glasses of various styles.

Next morning he said to Annie when they were alone in the kitchen, "You got me my runty pig, Annie. I'm going to help you."

"Me—I don' need halp."

"With Ab—you got to have glasses, Annie."

"But—I can't read some."

"Not for reading—fix up your eye."

"Feex my eye?"

"Sure—all we got to do is write away to ——"

The kitchen-door screen banged as Ab entered. He greeted Annie, but not Brian, put a handful of oatmeal into the jug he carried, filled it with water, then went out.

Brian sent Annie's letter away the next day. The glasses did not come, however; Brian stood in the shelter of the windbreak and read to her the letter that came in their place. Annie must go to Regina to have her eyes tested. She told him that she could not go; Brian explained that if she told Sean she had a stomach-ache and must see a doctor, it could be arranged.

In Annie's absence, Sean himself did the cooking. He knew three dishes: fried eggs, oatmeal, and tapioca. Ab, who in his doleful way had appreciated Annie's cooking, several times called attention to the indigestibility and monotony of Sean's cooking.

With Sean and Ab, Brian went into town to meet Annie the day that she returned; he stood excitedly on the station platform, scarcely able to contain himself when he heard the train whoop far off to the prairie stillness. Ab said, "She's passin' Magnus Petersen's now." Later, "There she is—beyond the roundhouse!" His shrill whistle carried a note of excitement too.

The train stopped. Annie got down two cars away; sunlight stabbed out from her new glasses. Brian ran to her.

Ab came up. He came the closest then to swearing that he had ever done since he had stepped out of the Odd Fellows' Hall eight years before.

"Christmas!"

Annie's right eye was perfectly straight behind the powerful lens of her glasses.

> A robin redbreast, on the day of the Crucifixion, about the seventh hour, nestled upon the crown of Syrian thorns and tried to turn aside one of the cruel spikes from our Saviour's brow. The robin strove in vain, and only rent his own soft breast until blood flowed over his feathers from the wound. Then a voice from the angels promised that, from that hour, birds of his kind should wear upon their breasts the hue and banner of His blood.
>
> —ELLA FULLER MAITLAND: More Pages From the Day-Book of Bertha Hardacre (Constable & Co., Ltd.).

On the way to the farm Ab was silent, and in the days that followed he observed a strange coolness toward Annie; it was as though she had been stricken with some terrible contagious disease. Brian, who had persuaded her to go away and get the glasses, felt that he was responsible for Ab's attitude.

An evening after Annie's return, he went out to the barn. As he stepped inside he heard the singsonging of milk into the pail; then he saw Ab at Noreen.

"Ab."

"Yeah?"

"Ab, what do you think of Annie's glasses?"

The milk continued to hum, some-fun, some-fun. "Fixed her up fine," said Ab.

"You going to marry Annie?"

"I was." Fun-fun-fun, said the milk as he stripped Noreen. "I ain't now."

"Why, Ab?"

"Jist ain't. All there is to her."

"But—why, Ab?"

"I dunno," said Ab. The milk took up its drumming again.

By the back porch where the runt pig lived in its apple-box home, Brian looked down. It would always be a runt, he decided, a shivery runt. It had no twist to its tail; it never would have. The world was a funny place. He loved his runt pig that wasn't any good for anything. Ab was fussy about Noreen, the snuffiest cow in the herd, with her wheezing and sneezing and coughing. Before Annie's eyes had been straightened he had ——

Brian knew then. He ran to the house to tell Annie.

Country was much stiller than town was; the clear fall afternoons lay over the farmyard like something measured out; the sounds could not have been more distinct if they had been dropped down a deep well. A bee droomed lazily. Annie sang in her kitchen. After harvest she and Ab would be married. Sean was giving them the upstairs of the house for their own. Soon there would be eight or nine threshers to cook for.

If he were in town now, thought Brian as he stood on the back stoop, he could be playing around with Fat or Ike or Pinky, not hanging around with nothing to do.

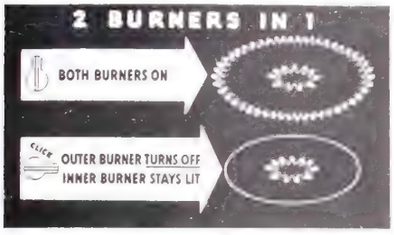
Before Buying Your
NEW RANGE

Harper Center Simmer Burners are superior to all other top burners because each Harper burner is really 2 burners in 1. As shown in diagram, the big outer burner brings foods to a quick boil. Turn handle until it "clicks" and the big burner goes out, leaving only the small, efficient inner burner lit to finish the cooking.

Only the separate Harper Center Simmer gives you the controlled low heats you need to keep foods warm for serving . . . to eliminate pot watching and boiling dry... to allow cooking with little water, which saves time and gas and keeps the average kitchen 9 degrees cooler. Only the Harper separate Center Simmer can help you so much in your cooking.

Insist on Harper Burners!

18 Leading Gas Ranges are Harper Equipped*



HARPER-WYMAN COMPANY, CHICAGO 20

Deafened People May Now Hear Clearly

Science has now made it possible for the deafened to hear faint sounds. It is a hearing device so small that it fits in the hand and enables thousands to enjoy sermons, music, friendly companionship. Accepted by the Council on Physical Medicine of the American Medical Association. This device does not require separate battery pack, battery wire, case or garment to bulge or weigh you down. The tone is clear and powerful. So made that you can adjust it yourself to suit your hearing as your hearing changes. The makers of Beltone, Beltone Bldg., Room 102-M, Chicago 8, Ill., are so proud of their achievement that they will gladly send free descriptive booklet and explain how you may get a full demonstration of this remarkable hearing device in your own home without risking a single penny. Write Beltone today—now!

Beltone ...the remarkable single-unit hearing aid

Knitting Yarns

WRITE FOR FREE SAMPLE CARD

SEE and FEEL actual samples of our Cloveden Yarns then make your choice. Fast colors, perfect for sweaters, afghans and all knitting. In the wide variety of loved, tried and true knit twists. Preferred by experts for over 35 years. We fill Gift E-1

CLIVEDEN YARNS 7TH ARCH ST., PHILA. 6, PA.

Fine Fabrics • Dishes • Woodwork
Scented ZELO Suds
Easier Washing for YOU

KVP Household PAPERS

WE WILL PAY YOU $25

Great demand for our Birthday Cards. Sell for $1—your profit 50¢; it costs you nothing to try. No investment. Write for details.

MERIT CARD CO., Dept. B, 70 William St., NEWARK 2, N. J.

He walked down the road stretching and thinning ahead of him, the spidering telephone wires reaching to the far horizon. He heard a wagon on the road behind him. It was Ab. He stopped the team and sat silently, a high and waiting grasshopper upon the wagon seat. Still holding the reins in one hand, Ab leaned forward and Brian felt the pull of him as he helped him up.

Ab did not start the horses. Upon his wry little face lay an expression as gentle as a benediction. He cleared his throat.

"Yer paw," he said. "Telegraft lady phoned us, kid. Yer paw down in Rochester he went an' died."

The house was filled with the smell of flowers, a following sweetness that grew stronger and stronger as Brian neared the back porch. There they were banked, wreath against tilting wreath, in ovals, circles, half circles, cross and harp shapes. Upon each was sheening white satin and a card with someone's name. There were lilies with their tall stamens sticky, curving out in lipped cups; blood-red carnations sending out their spice so that the house was filled with the all-pervading flower smell.

All blinds were drawn and in every room a strange half dusk had settled down. The voices of Maggie O'Connal and her mother and their visitors had a squashed quality, as though they were coming from under something.

It was seldom that Brian's mother spoke, and when she did, it was in a low, toneless voice. For the most part she sat quietly with her hands in her lap, tenseness in her small dark face and a look of unbelief in her eyes. Brian had not seen her cry.

He himself had not cried yet. His father was dead, but Brian did not feel like crying. He did not feel happy, but he did not feel like crying.

The funeral was held in the house, with Mr. Powelly standing in front of the fireplace, his fine voice dipping and soaring in deliberate strophe. He said, among other things, that Gerald O'Connal had been a fine man.

Mrs. Abercrombie sang There's a Beautiful Land on High.

Brian did not cry.

His mother and grandmother did not go out to the cemetery, nor did Brian and Bobbie.

AFTER everyone had left, he stood before the house, the inexplicable longing within him deepened by the clarity of the fall day. The smell of burning leaves came to him, and across the street he saw blue smoke threading slowly up. Leaves off the trees detached themselves to fall hesitantly. The branches showed. Wishbones, he thought, curving up like wishbone arms.

The walk was dark-and-light its entire length; blocks down, where the yellowing trees met the hedges, it tunneled to the round disk of light at its far end, the prairie end. Brian began to walk toward it.

He'd never see him any more; he was his father, and he would never see him any more. A tickling came to the end of his nose and his forehead; he brushed at it; it persisted.

He was at the end of the street. He walked on with the tall prairie grass hissing against his legs, out into the prairie's stillness and loneliness that seemed to flow around him, to meet itself behind him, ringing him and separating him from the town.

When Brian turned he could just pick out the water tower, the gumdrop dome of Lord Roberts School, the spire of the Catholic church. All around him the wind was in the grass with a million timeless whisperings. A forever-and-forever sound it had, forever and for never. Forever and forever the prairie had been, before there was a town, before he had been, or his father, or his father, or his father before him. Forever for the prairie; never for his father—never again.

People were forever born; people forever died, and never were again. Fathers died and

(Continued on Page 129)

Women choose the EKCO pressure cooker for a dozen different reasons ...all GOOD reasons!

* We turned Inquiring Reporter and asked women why they chose the Ekco Pressure Cooker in preference to others . . . and what they think of it now, after constant use. Here are their comments...you'll find they point out many exclusive features, found only in the Ekco!

Fast!
"My Ekco cooks so fast it's just unbelievable. That was the big reason I wanted a pressure cooker, and I picked the Ekco because it's so lightweight and easy to use."

Serves at the table!
"It's a joy to serve food piping hot right in the Ekco. All I do is change to the serving cover and my Ekco looks pretty as a picture on the dining room table."

Easy to Handle!
"I like the way the Ekco opens and closes with the knob on the cover. It's so simple and easy to handle."

Safe!
"I was impressed with the safety of the Ekco. Having the automatic Safety Release under the 'bridge' on the cover is such a sensible way to prevent splattering. That is if I should ever leave my cooker over high flame too long."

Simple!
"I like the way the Pressure Control on the Ekco keeps the pressure steady. It's so simple that cooking with an Ekco is as easy as using a regular pan."

the EKCO pressure cooker

A STAR IN THE KITCHEN
...SHINES AT THE TABLE

EKCO

EKCO PRODUCTS COMPANY
CHICAGO
Sold in Canada by Ekco Products Company (Canada) Ltd., Montreal

You can have the "stay-to-dinner" Ekco Pressure Cooker in either 2½ quart or 4½ quart size, both with extra serving covers.

* A [illegible] Cooker... selected at random.

Patent No. [illegible]
T. M. Reg. U. S. Pat. Off.

Real "Centerpiece" Fruits

—THAT'S THE QUALITY LIBBY USES FOR THIS DELICIOUS FRUIT COCKTAIL

Libby's

FRUIT COCKTAIL

LISTEN

to "MY TRUE STORY," [illegible] from coast to coast, 11:30 AM EST, 10:30 CST, [illegible] Broadcasting Company.

RIGHT NOW THERE'S PLENTY! STOCK UP ON Libby's TODAY!

(Continued from page 125)

were born; the prairie was forever, with nd whispering through the long, dead es, through the long and endless silence.
er came and spring and fall, then sum-nd winter again; the sun rose and set
, and everything that was once was —forever and forever. But for man, prairie whispered—never never. For
's father—never.

d as the boy stood with the prairie hing from him, he knew that things different now—forever and forever:
er the dark well of his mother's loneliforever the silence that could never s mother! The thought of her filled him tenderness and yearning. She needed now. He could feel tears sliding slowly his cheek; he could taste the salt of at the corners of his mouth. There no catches of breath, simply tears as he l alone in the silence that stretched from asting to everlasting.

meadow lark splintered the stillness.
startling notes stayed on in the boy's
l. He turned and started for home, e his mother was.

IV

THOUGH Brian thought often of his father he first months after his death, in time he d himself aware with sudden guilt that ad gone for more than a week without embering him. He frequently dreamed im, dreams in which he was sure that his er had just gone away and was not really
l. The boy woke after them with a faint ning that sometimes stayed with him ughout an entire day.

here was a new and warmer relationship his mother now that he turned to her for e of the comradeship he had formerly ed with his father.

Maggie O'Connal talked with the boys ut their father, carrying out her deteration to keep his memory alive in his
. She told Brian that he was the head he family now, and that she depended him. And there was in Brian a growing ideration for the other members of the ily; he taught Bobbie to skate and to
n. It seemed, too, that as he got older grandmother had come to meet him spir-lly in her declining years; for all his ity, he was still a child. He was now ve.

he grandmother had failed noticeably e Gerald O'Connal's death. She sat in room from morning until night and had meals brought to her. Cataracts threat-l her sight. Brian went often to visit her he sat in her rocker by her open window told him stories of his grandfather and old homesteading days.

One thing had not changed the Young Ben's attraction for him. He was the only child in the school who spoke to the Young Ben or to whom the Young Ben spoke.

The Young Ben was in Digby's room; he sat near the window, his strange gray eyes as always staring out over the prairie that spread from the schoolyard. As Miss Thompson had done, Digby sought to relieve the tension in the boy. He was no longer able to ignore the Young Ben's truancy, for Mrs. Abercrombie was on the school board now. She was not sure that Digby was a strict enough disciplinarian.

It was possible that Mrs. Abercrombie's doubts about Digby were helped along by Mr. Powelly: the principal was a stubborn man, he had told her often; there had been the case of the Young Ben and the stolen .22 rifle the year before. It was his duty, felt Mr. Powelly, to bring these things to the board's attention. Mrs. Abercrombie thanked him; Mariel was not doing so well in school as she ought to. She had never forgiven Digby for telling her that her daughter was lazy.

For Digby it had been an intolerable winter. He alternately cursed and blessed the fact that he and Miss Thompson worked together. When he was not with her, he could hardly wait for the candid and temperate friendship of her company; when he was with her on school business, he wished with all his heart that the woman were a thousand miles away. He wished that the school term would hurry its end; he wished that the school term would never finish. With spring and blandishing chinooks, he became, for the first time in his teaching career, irritable and unreasonable.

Then, at the end of the spring term, with the sudden lift of a reprieve, he heard the news that Miss Thompson's wedding to Svarich had been put off till fall.

The course of love was again not running smoothly for Peter Svarich and Miss Thompson. There had not been the fiery complications of the old affair, but there had been a certain just-missing-harmony that marred. With the engagement, Svarich's old [illegible] assertion had appeared again. There was the night late in spring when Peter had taken Miss Thompson for a drive and had stopped the car on the slight rise of ground by the town water tower. He had turned off the [illegible]

THE night had the diffusing clarity of [illegible] of the prairie nights. It was of the sort that prompted prairie people to tell Easterners, "The days are hot but the nights are always cool."

"What's on your mind?" Peter asked, his hand on hers as it lay in her lap.

She turned her head to him, for a moment unable to give the distinctness of expression to her thoughts.

"Nothing, Peter. Just thinking."

"Thinking of what?"

"Different things."

Peter frowned with a slight movement of his dark eyebrows. He took his hand away and sat staring ahead. Miss Thompson felt a tightening around her heart. She remembered suddenly that her mind had been casually on Peter's car, a long and shining one. She had been thinking that he took great pride in it, as he did in the new medical building that he had built. She had been struck with the thought that the key to Peter was his need for respect and attention, and his distrust of it when it was given him.

"Peter."

[illegible]

"Mother, I'll be home for dinner just as soon as I finish my [illegible]"

MENU

Grilled SKINLESS frankfurters wrapped in bacon strips with french fried potatoes, hot southern biscuits and steaming coffee

Skinless ...

THEY'RE SURE TO BE TENDER

Discover the extra juicy tenderness of SKINLESS franks. Youngsters and grownups prefer them—because they have no skins!

Your favorite packer's brand of franks is made the SKINLESS way. He puts the savory meat into pure, Cellophane-like casings, furnished by Visking. The moment the franks reach cooked and smoked perfection, the casings are removed. Behold! SKINLESS franks—with their natural surface sealing in all the juicy flavor. Here's brand new, tender taste excitement—with no waste!

SAY Skinless WHEN YOU SAY FRANKFURTERS

THE VISKING CORPORATION, 6733 W. 65th St., Chicago 38, Ill.

THE PROCTOR NEVER-LIFT!

IRONING is smoother, easier because there's no lift-work. The Proctor Never-Lift lifts itself at a finger's touch . . . stands on cool, sturdy legs, safe from tipping and falling. When you resume ironing, legs snap completely out of the way.

See your dealer demonstrate "Push Button" ironing and you, too, will say "That's for me!" If he can't supply you now, ask to be put on his preferred customer list . . . that's smart because America's most wanted iron is bound to be scarce.

No lift No tilt No twist

The "Color Guard" makes this toaster different!

At last every slice the same because the Color Guard accurately registers the actual temperature of the toast.

PROCTOR

AUTOMATIC ELECTRICAL APPLIANCES

PROCTOR ELECTRIC COMPANY, PHILA. 40, PA.

For efficient repairs, 150 factory-supervised Proctor service stations coast to coast . . . see local classified telephone directory.

"What's wrong?"

"Nothing—nothing's wrong." He said it with an edge of irritation on his voice.

"You know—I'm an individual too. I'm not you, Peter. I'm another person with feelings and wants and thoughts. You can't have all of me."

"What are you talking about?" He was looking full at her.

And Miss Thompson, who was too honest to say he was too possessive—that was not exactly it—and who was too confused to put her finger exactly upon what was wrong, said, "Forget it, Peter."

"Now what have I done?"

"It's just me. I'm tired." She turned to him and tried to smile.

As the spring term went on, her doubts and anxieties increased, and yet she could not bring herself to call the thing off; she had hurt him once before, she had become engaged to him again, well aware of what it would involve. In her unsettled state, she found herself turning more and more to Digby's company. After Svarich had left for a summer refresher course, the meetings were more frequent.

IT was that summer that the Reverend Mr. Powelly's bitterness bore its first fruit. Dolly, the Ben's mare, was the betrayer; led by the Young Ben, she entered the barn while Jake Harris was paying one of his visits. Before Jake's protruding eyes, she stumbled just inside the door, caught herself only to have her hind leg disappear up to the hock. As Jake strained with the Bens to release her, a fruity gentleness, as of rising bread dough, teased at his nostrils. Dolly's hoof came suddenly free. A rotten board in the still's cave had given way.

The Ben came up for trial three days later. Mr. Powelly attended.

The Ben stood before the judge, his hands trembling with a two-day drought, his raw-rimmed eyes steady upon the face of his best customer. He kissed the Gideon Bible borrowed from the Royal Hotel for the occasion, then pleaded hoarsely, "Not guilty." Jake Harris brought out the still pot and coil, a kerosene burner and a half-filled demijohn of whisky. He told of finding the still. The Ben changed his plea to guilty.

The judge picked up his metal-rimmed glasses, perched them on his nose, looked up to the Ben, and said, "Ninety days. Not includin' time in custody."

The Ben found imprisonment hard to bear, and that was a strange thing, for he had never before been so comfortable in his life. The Young Ben brought his meals each morning before school and at noon from the Chinaman who had taken over the Bluebird Café at Wong's death; the food transcended anything to which the Ben had been accustomed. He slept between sheets on a couch that stood in one corner of the twelve-foot-square room that served as his cell. These luxuries served only to sharpen the restraint the Ben endured with difficulty for three months.

The Ben's jail term ran over into fall and partly into the first month of school. It was just three days before his incarceration ended that the pencil-sharpening incident occurred.

Digby had a standing rule that no pencils were to be sharpened during school hours, a rule that, while it did not take into consideration the fallibility of pencils, did quench the pencil-sharpening hysterias that frequently swept that part of the room the schoolmaster was not teaching.

The sharpener lifted its grind of sound three days before the Ben's release. It was the Young Ben standing there by the window, his eyes lost in the expanse of prairie stretching from the schoolyard edge to the distant line of the sky. Digby dropped the intricacies of percentage; the low hum of the classroom faltered and was stilled.

"Ben!"

The boy turned, startled.

"You're sharpening your pencil!"

The Young Ben looked down at the chewed end of the pencil guiltily protruding from the sharpener.

"Take it out. Ben."

Don't be a Rubbit!

Don't rub a crusty, scorchy casserole with a flimsy dishrag. Let a square metal-fiber Brillo pad clean it fast!

Be BRILLO wise!

Brillo makes quick work of scorchy crust! Whisks pans shiny-bright! Neat! Easy! Use Brillo daily. The special shine ingredient in Brillo soap keeps pans sparkling!

RED box— soap pad
GREEN box— soap & pad

Shines aluminum fast!

SELL GREETING CARDS and PERSONAL STATIONERY

FREE SAMPLES NAME IMPRINTED STATIONERY

EASY W TO MA MON QUICK

Now 1947 line. Just how friendly, other tremendous value 16 card All-Occasion assortment. Sell for only $1.00. You make as much as 50¢ per box. Also fascinating Birthday, Get-Well, Baby, Humorous, Gift Wrappings, Correspondence Notes boxes 35¢, 25 up. Bonus, Special Offer, Written Everyday assortment on approval and FREE Personal Stat sample portfolio. Elmira Greeting Card Co., Dept. M-185, Elmir

Burpee Gigant ZINNI

Up to 6½ in. across, bi you've ever seen! New ors—apricot, salmon, or yellow, rose, scar- let. Some are like giant chrysanthe- mums. 3-ft. plants, very easy to grow. 75c-Pkt. of seeds only 10c—Send Dime Today!

7 PAC 10

SUPERB SEED CATALOG FREE

W. ATLEE BURPEE CO.

426 Burpee Bldg. Philadelphia 32, Pa. OR 426 Burpee Clinton, Io

DELIGHT THE MEN

Knit A PAIR O SOCKS

ENOUGH FAMOUS BEAR BRAND SOC YARN FOR ONE PA 4 SOCK NEEDLES INSTRUCTION

$1 00 POST PAI

NO. 860 Quickly Made Hand K Socks, a warm cushioned comf will appreciate. For $1.00 post p send you all the materials nee Knit one pair of socks, sizes up This includes a 3 oz. hank of the F Bear Brand Sock Yarn, your cho maroon, green, brown, or navy a Set of 4 Sock Needles and Instru for 3 styles, plain, ribbed and stitched. Your money back if not satisfied. Offer good in the U possessions only. Order by numb ing choice of color — Today!

FREDERICK HERRSCHNER

33 S. WABASH AVE., CHICAGO 3.

He did, then looked at Digby, uneasily ting his weight from one bare foot to the er.
'Take your seat."
When the four-o'clock bell rang, Digby ed the Young Ben to his desk. He saw t Brian O'Connal lingered behind, then down in a back seat to wait.
'How old are you, Ben?"
'Fourteen."
'Not fifteen?"
'No."
Digby reached for his register. He opened
He picked up a red correction pencil from desk and drew a line through the Young
's name. He said, "Ben, I think I better you go."
The Young Ben looked at the school-ster; he looked at the pencil sharpener, n left the room. Brian rose and went with
.

varich drove Miss Thompson to the ool-board meeting that evening. After his rn from his refresher course, the wedding been postponed again, to the Christmas days, at Peter's request. He gave her no son; simply said that it would be more conient then. Tonight, after he had picked up at her house and while he drove her he town hall where the board meetings
e held, he was silent. They sat for a moit in the car before she got out.
He said casually, "Ruth, I don't think you uld have liked a Ukrainian wedding."
'Peter, whatever are you talking about?"
He looked at her with his old, quizzical exssion, the lines deep at his mouth. "Both es—a mistake. More mine than yours.
knew. You—you're ded by an overdeveld maternal instinct. I ise children—lots of m—your own. And by's."
'But I don't ——"
'Come on. Get in to your eting. I've got a call."
'Oh, Peter—I'm so sorry!" she told him.
It wasn't your fault." He put the car in
r. "It's all right."
he watched the car move off down the et, then turned into the town hall.
Mr. Thorborn, chairman of the school rd, looked down the long table in the ncil chambers with reddened eyes and a vy feeling in his chest. It was a bad time the year for colds. Mr. Harris blew his e frequently. Mrs. Abercrombie's breath-was more audible than usual. She had d Mr. Johnson and Mr. Gillis, the secre-y, that really she should be in bed, but once gave in you were lost.
n spite of her cold, Mrs. Abercrombie med in high spirits, and threw herself
o discussions with abandon. The minutes he last meeting were accepted; the matter extra coat hooks for the primary boys' akroom (the reason for which Miss Thomp-had been summoned) was disposed of.

ISS THOMPSON, in her chair beside Digby, d little attention to what went on, her ad busy with what Peter had just told her.
om time to time she stole a glance at Digs rough face under the untidy lock of dy hair. A slight breathlessness possessed
; she wondered if her face was flushed.
'And now"—Mr. Thorborn cleared his oat—"we come to another matter the ——" He looked over to Mr. Digby.
—we find it rather painful," went on orborn, "to have to call certain things to ur attention, Mr. Digby. The board's of opinion that you don't keep strict you ht to keep a little tighter rein on the kids oils."
Digby's eyebrows rose slightly.
'Another thing's been worrying us some ve feel that you could uh set a little ter example in the community. The kids n't educated just inside the schoolroom.
feel that you should be taking more interin the church, and we figure it wouldn't t if you was to take a Sunday-school class
h Sunday."
Mr. Harris and Mr. Johnson nodded their ads in agreement; neither attended church, but their wives and children did regularly.
"The main point, though," said Mrs. Abercrombie, "is the Young Ben."
Miss Thompson saw Digby's face tighten. "What about him?"
"He's not attending school," said Mrs. Abercrombie.

DIGBY [illegible] him. I've crossed his name from the register."
"How old is he?" asked Mr. Gillis.
"Fourteen," said Digby.
"School Act says he can't leave till he's fifteen," said Mr. Thorborn.
Mrs. Abercrombie took over. "We aren't interested in having that boy in our school, but we must have some regard for the Act. I have suggested that he be sent away to a school an institution of correction."
"But to correct just what?" asked Digby.
Mrs. Abercrombie chose to ignore the question. She turned to Mr. Harris. "That theft from your store last fall could be reopened. Then, when he was was sent away, he would no longer be a bad influence on the other ——"
"Why not just say that he is a bad influence and expel him?" suggested Digby. "The board can do that. There's no need to send him away."
"No," said Mrs. Abercrombie flatly. "We feel that what we have in mind is best."
"I don't think so," said Digby. "I don't think you can expect me to throw in with you on ——"
"In that case," said Mrs. Abercrombie with a gleam in her eye, "we should have to ask for your resignation."

So that was it. Digby felt sick. He ought to have known there was more behind it than what appeared. She had carefully laid her trap; he had stepped into it.
"So we feel that you'll see it our way, Mr. Digby," Mrs. Abercrombie was saying. "That you'll be reasonable in this and the other things Mr. Thorborn has pointed out."
No, thought Digby, she doesn't want to get rid of me. It's the Young Ben; she actually wants to see the boy in reform school. That was what Powelly had meant by his parting shot the night he had visited a year ago.
"But Mr. Digby is a young man."
The members of the board and Digby looked at Miss Thompson with surprise. She stood by her chair with her candid eyes on Mrs. Abercrombie.
"I don't see what his age has to do ——"
"Oh, yes," Miss Thompson interrupted; "he has several more years in which he'll have to live with himself." She looked around the room at the other members of the board. "It seems to me there's something that ought to be cleared up here. And it seems to me that this whole thing goes back several years to an incident that occurred in the Presbyterian church. Isn't that right, Mr. Thorborn?"
The chairman looked at her in astonishment.
"May I refresh your memories? A still blew up. It was the Ben's still. I don't think Mr. Powelly has ever forgiven the Ben or his family for that and I don't think he ever will. I understand that the Ben evaded justice by the skin of his teeth at the time that his still blew up. Strange that there was no evidence for Jake Harris, Mr. Thorborn."
In an agony of embarrassment, Mr. Thorborn looked down at his papers.
"And, Mr. Mortimer," she addressed the judge, "was it not with regret that you sentenced the Ben to three months in jail or had you been foresighted enough to lay in a good supply of ——"
"I'm afraid we haven't time to listen to ——"
"Oh, yes, Mrs. Abercrombie. Mrs. Abercrombie, very soon after I came to teach in this town, I saw evidence of your influence — the insensitive and vindictive persecution of the China Kids by your daughter, Mariel."
Mrs. Abercrombie's face flamed. "You—that's the most ——"

If you growl all day, it's only natural to feel dog-tired at night. New World News.

Recipes

[illegible]
MOR "SCALLOPS"
1 can MOR 1 egg
cup fine bread crumbs deep fat
Cut MOR into 5 slices; cut each slice into 10 squares. Roll each piece in [illegible] and roll again in bread crumbs. Fry in deep fat, heated to 375° F., until browned. Serve on cocktail picks with zippy cocktail sauce (mix ½ cup ketchup, 2 tsp. horseradish, ¼ tsp. [illegible] 1 tbsp. hot water, and ½ tsp. Worcester[illegible]

It's Different!

Tickles the Palate
and Sticks to the Ribs!
George Rector

MOR and pancakes—the breakfast dish that makes a man give out his happiest morning smile. Your own good pancakes, doused in syrup (and butter?) will do. But when you add MOR, pan fried to a toasty, crispy brown, Madam you have a pancake dish that not only tickles the palate but, also, sticks to the ribs. Note my recipe above.

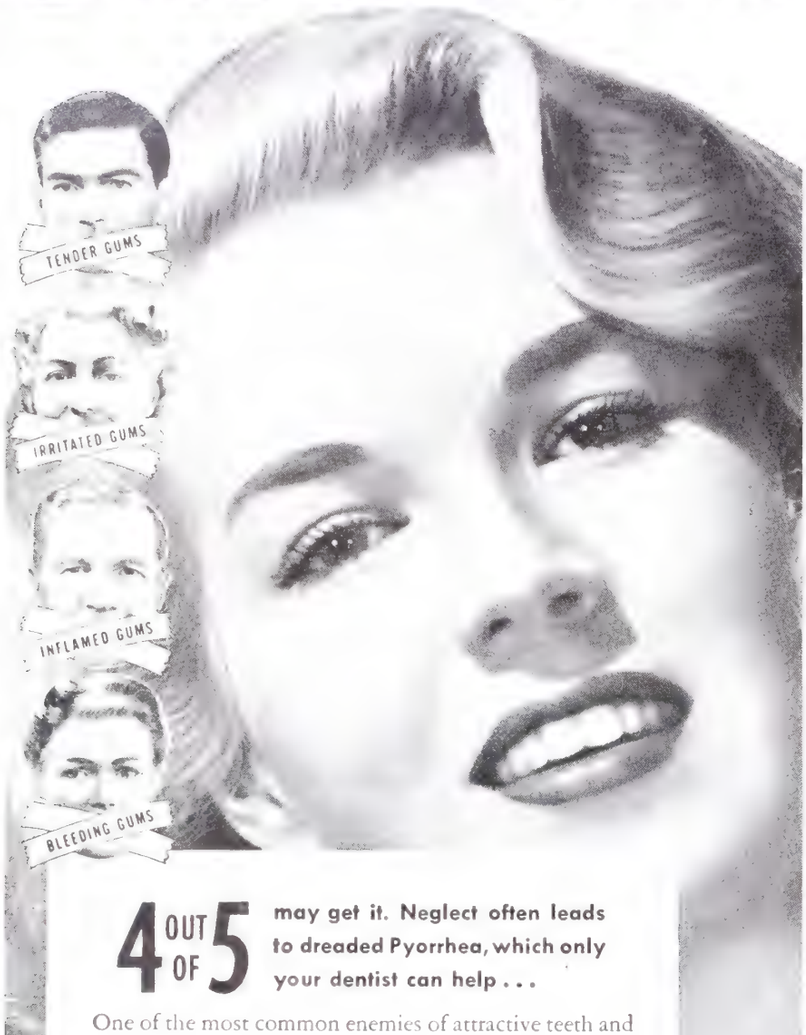
When it's for a nice dinner, with folks you'd like to impress, let me suggest our MOR "scallops." With their crisp, "french fried" crust and delicious centers of MOR they will bring you many compliments.

WILSON'S "QUICKIE" SHELF. Devote one shelf to these delicious [illegible] meat products. Wilson's MOR Corned Beef Hash, Chili, Tamales, Deviled Ham and America's favorite meat flavor, Wilson's B-V, all seasoned [illegible]

HANDSOME HEALTHY TEETH

need firm gums—bleeding gums may mean

GINGIVITIS



4 OUT OF 5 may get it. Neglect often leads to dreaded Pyorrhea, which only your dentist can help . . .

One of the most common enemies of attractive teeth and firm gums is Gingivitis. Watch out for tender gums—or gums which bleed when you brush your teeth. These are often the first signs of Gingivitis.

Never neglect this mild gum inflammation because neglect often leads to Pyorrhea with its soft, shrinking gums and loosening teeth, which only your dentist can help. See him every 3 months. Then at home here's one of the very best ways to help guard against Gingivitis.

The Double Benefits of Massaging Gums and Cleaning Teeth with Forhan's

Massage your gums and brush your teeth twice daily with Forhan's Toothpaste—the remarkably successful formula of Dr. R. J. Forhan—made especially for BOTH massaging gums to be firmer—more able to ward off infection—and for cleaning teeth to their natural sparkling beauty and lustre.

Notice how your gums feel so invigorated—how your teeth glisten with their natural radiant sparkle.

You'll like Forhan's refreshing taste, too. Used and recommended by many Dentists for over 30 years. Buy a tube at any drug, dept. or 10¢ store.

NO HARSH ABRASIVES IN FORHAN'S!

use Forhan's with massage

FOR FIRMER GUMS—CLEANER TEETH

"The deliberate spoiling of their birthday party is still to me even more—more—wicked than the callousness that led to Old Wong's suicide! You have asked Mr. Digby either to resign or help you. I find it hard to believe you people—all of you. Tonight you've shown me the heart of darkness—you, Mrs. Abercrombie. It is in you—all of it—in your dark, dark soul!" She turned to the rest of the board. "Isn't it about time for a little sweetness and light around here? A little backbone?" She turned and walked toward the door. She stopped. "I resign." She left the room.

For a moment there was shocked silence. Mr. Harris blew his nose loudly. Judge Mortimer cleared his throat. Strangely, it was Mr. Harris, a slight, sad little man with thinning hair, who spoke first.

"Seems like an awful lot of fuss—losin' two teachers in one crack 'counta one kid. I don't know so much about that there School Act—has it got anythin' to do with sendin' the Young Ben to jail?"

Digby got up and went quietly out of the board room.

"Not jail," protested Mrs. Abercrombie. "Just to ——"

"Isn't so much difference," said Mr. Johnson. "I didn't know the Young Ben was giving trouble."

"Gentlemen!" Mrs. Abercrombie was standing; her voice was shrill. "I have been insulted by that—that woman! I have only tried to do my duty as a member of this board. I thought the board would be interested in doing what was right. But I see that ——"

"I figger, Mr. Chairman, that ——"

"I'm still talking."

"Mebbe we ought to leave this matter over for a while till we git sort of cooled down a bit," suggested Mr. Thorborn.

"We will not!" Mrs. Abercrombie had completely lost the complacent restraint that made her a formidable antagonist. "If this is shelved tonight, you can carry on without—I will not be here when you come to take it up again!"

Mr. Thorborn leaned eagerly forward. "You mean you're thinking of resignin'?"

Mrs. Abercrombie had never resigned from anything in her life. Her words had been intended only as a threat. "Why—I—if something isn't done I ——"

"I move we accept the resignation," rumbled Judge Mortimer and spat on the floor.

"I second her!" said Mr. Harris.

"Wouldn't be a bad idea to move a vote of confidence in Mr. Digby an' Miss Thompson," suggested Mr. Johnson.

"There's already a motion before the board," said Mr. Thorborn. "But we will—we will."

Mrs. Abercrombie had recovered her poise. She looked around at the other board members. She rose majestically, turned; all eyes were upon her broad back as it went through the door.

There was upon the faces of the board members the same look: that of a boy who has waited for the explosion of a giant cannon firecracker, and has been given instead the long and disappointing whoosh of a dud.

HER chest had been aching that morning, and the flat, hard cough came oftener and with greater intensity. The evening before, Doctor Svarich had come with his stethoscope, thermometer, tapping fingers and the bitter smell that doctors always have. After the examination, the grandmother had heard Maggie and the doctor talking out in the hall. The voice subsided, then she heard Svarich's footsteps going down the stairs. Maggie had come into the room and told her that she was to stay in bed. With the window down.

So she lay now, looking at the flat faces of four walls and a ceiling, at the log-cabin quilt that covered her. Brian came in to see her. He seemed ill at ease as he stood by her bed.

"Open ——" Her voice thinned. She tried again. "Open—my—window."

Brian went to the window. He lifted it; it refused to move at first; then, as he struggled, it gave, only to stick again a few inches above the sill. He bent his knees and placed the heels of his hands on the bottom of the window. It slid the full length of his arms and the warm room was suddenly filled with the mint freshness of the outside. Stray flakes of the winter's first snow floated out of the afternoon and into the room, to melt in mid-air.

AS he turned around he saw that his grandmother's head lay back on the pillow. Her eyes were closed. He tiptoed from the room.

Flakes of snow floated softly down as he walked along Sixth Street, carrying his skates by their leather laces. It would be another couple of weeks yet till skating season, but he might as well take them in to Mr. Palmer's for sharpening.

The bell above the door tinkled as Brian entered the shoemaker's shop. As he laid his skates on the counter, the bell tinkled again.

Mr. Palmer picked up Brian's skates and looked past the boy. "Hullo, Jim."

"Afternoon," said Digby. "Hello, Brian."

Brian mumbled hello.

Mr. Palmer placed his hands flat on the counter. "I read that fella Barkly."

"Did you, Milt? Like him?"

"Just the way I figgered—same thing—a little cleaner," Mr. Palmer answered. "That's all—nothin' outside—all sensations."

"That's right," said Digby. "That's what the author says."

"All insidea me," went on Palmer in his metallic voice. "Shop's insidea me—town's insidea me—whole shootin' match insidea me."

Digby nodded.

Fascinated, Brian stared at the shoemaker. "You—do you get a funny feeling—like—well—you wanted to know something, only you don't know what you—have you got a feeling?"

Mr. Palmer looked down at the skate he held in his hand; he pursed his lips. "No," said Mr. Palmer, "can't say I got that, kid. I guess that ain't there no more." The shoemaker turned to Digby. "I still don't know who 'me' is."

"An idea."

"Whose?"

"God's."

"Oh."

"You're inside Him, Milt. When I get inside that door, I'm out of you, but I'm still inside Him."

Mr. Palmer stared at Digby. "That what he says—Barkly?"

Digby nodded his head.

"When'll my skates be done, Mr. Palmer?"

"Thursday." He bent down at the counter again, straightened up. To Digby he said, "Yours'll be ready Friday—the shoes. That soon enough?"

"I think so," said Digby.

"Best of luck," said Palmer.

"Thank you," said Digby.

Outside, the flakes fell lazily, silently.

"About Mr. Palmer," Brian said. "I was just wondering—is he all right?"

"Yes."

"I'm not inside of anybody."

"Aren't you?"

"No. What's he mean?"

Upon Digby's angular face was a faint look of frustration. "I don't—I don't think you're old enough."

"I wouldn't understand?"

"Name something."

Brian thought: Skates—ice—snow—road-apple. "Ice?"

"All right—what is it?"

"Something you skate on."

"Then you can feel it—you can see it, taste it. That's all it is—a sensation of sight, taste and touch. Anything you can think of is just such a bundle of hearing, smelling, feeling, seeing. That's all. A set of sensations. They're yours. They're inside you."

Brian tried to work his way through the seething sees and feels. "I guess you were right," he said.

(Continued on Page 134)

Training is everything. The peach was once a bitter almond; cauliflower is nothing but cabbage with a college education. —MARK TWAIN.

Vitamins
Get them All in food!
HERE'S THE NEWER WAY
FOR BETTER RESULTS
FAR MORE THAN VITAMINS
Read what you get in 2 GLASSES of OVALTINE
more PROTEIN than 3 Eggs more VITAMIN C than 4 ounces of Tomato Juice more VITAMIN D than 10 ounces of Butter more IRON than 3 servings of Spinach more VITAMIN A than 2 servings of Peas
more FOOD-ENERGY than 2 servings of Ice Cream more VITAMIN G than 1 pound of Sirloin Steak more NIACIN than 6 slices of Enriched Bread more VITAMIN B1 than 3 servings of Oatmeal
more CALCIUM and PHOSPHORUS than 2½ servings of American Cheese

"I was cooing in my shower when..."

"Suddenly I burst into song! I just couldn't help singing when I saw Mommie reach for that big bottle of soothy, silky golden oil . . . makes me feel so soft and glowy all over!

Baby can't read yet, but that "big bottle" says MENNEN . . . and it says Antiseptic! Mennen Antiseptic Baby Oil is the very special Oil 4 times* more Doctors and Hospitals prefer and recommend. It's the best preventive against diaper rash, impetigo, urine scald and other irritations to Baby's tender, sensitive skin. You'll prefer Mennen too . . . it helps keep your baby's skin so smooth, silky, sweet! Start today to give your baby's precious skin the extra protection of Mennen Antiseptic Baby Oil after diaper change and bath.

If you're going to have a baby, Mennen has a FREE gift for you . . . a BABY BUNDLE of: soothing Mennen Antiseptic Baby Oil, a book of 2000 baby names and their meanings, a Baby Care Guide, a layette sachet card, a helpful shopping list. Write to P. O. Box 1171, the Mennen Company, Newark 4, N. J., with your name, address and when you expect your baby.

*Acc. to Surveys

Mennen

Baby Oil.. Baby Powder

(Continued from Page 132)

"I was afraid so," said Digby. "Don't let it bother you."

"But it does!" Brian looked up to the principal's face. "I've been trying to—to figure out for a long time, and it won't! Everything has to figure out, doesn't it?"

"No—not everything. You just keep on trying."

"Then I'm on the right track?"

"I think you are."

Mrs. MacMurray's death did not come with the shocking impact of her son-in-law's; it was followed by a gentler sadness more akin to nostalgia than to deep grief. She managed a departure typically Scotch and Presbyterian in its restraint, a predestined event of logical finality. In her own words, her time had come.

It was Sean who handled the funeral details and arrangements for Maggie. He came into town in a cutter, and stayed at the house for a week. One evening, as he sat with Maggie before the fireplace after the boys had gone to bed, he asked her what plans she had for them. She told him she hoped to send them to the university.

Sean was silent for a moment. "Do you think Brian will be takin' over the store?"

"It's a long time yet," said Maggie. "You seem to have put an idea in his head."

"Me? What?"

"He says he'd like to be a—dirt doctor."

"Dirt doctor!"

"He's heard you say that the prairie's sick. Evidently you've told him what has been already done about rust—that there could never be another rust year like 1935. He has mentioned a new wheat too—being developed in Russia—a perennial." Maggie gazed a moment at Sean. "I'm told that you think it would be the—clear rig for this country—for feed—to prevent soil drifting. Brian tells me it wouldn't winterkill. His last composition for Mr. Digby was, 'Why People Should Raise Cows in Southern Saskatchewan.'"

SEAN got up. He stood with his elbow on the mantel, his red mustaches moving jerkily. "You figger you can swing it? University?"

"I think so."

"Next summer," said Sean, "wouldn't be a bad idea if he was to come out with me for part of the holidays."

"Why, Sean, that would be very ——"

"Be doin' me a favor—have somebody round listens to what I say—an' I'll learn him. I'll learn him to be a dirt doctor." Sean went back to his chair. "You got that there composition around?"

"It's in my sewing basket," said Maggie.

"Let me have a look at the thing," said Sean.

Two days after Sean had left for the farm, Brian walked home with Mr. Digby. The schoolmaster noted the intentness on the boy's face. Just as they were about to part at MacTaggart's Corner, Brian said:

"I've thought a lot about it since my grandmother died—about what I was telling you in Mr. Palmer's that day. I've thought about it ever since."

"Have you?" said Digby.

His mind went swiftly back to the first day of school some six years ago when Brian had faced him in the office. He thought of the Young Ben, who no longer attended his school. That was it—the look upon Brian's face—the same expression that had puzzled him on the Young Ben's: maturity in spit of the formlessness of childish features, wi dom without years.

"Perhaps," said Digby to Brian, "you'v grown up."

Brian walked the rest of the way hom alone.

No one answered his call at the doo way of the house. He hung up his scarf an coat and toque, then went through the livin room and up the stairs. He opened the doo of his grandmother's room. She had bee dead two weeks now.

As he turned toward the door, he was sud denly aware of an emotion long familiar t him; it was as though he were recognizin again an experience that his memory ha stored for him, but not too well.

Outside the door of his grandmother room, he remembered the meadow lark tha had sung the day he had been unable to cr He remembered it with an aching nostalg that he strained to keep within himself as h went down the stairs and as he took his co and scarf and toque from a peg in the ha way.

The freshly fallen snow protested und his feet. Why did people die? Why did the finish up? What was the good in being human? It was awful to be a human. wasn't any good.

Goose-gray above him, the prairie sky ha a depthless softness undetermined by i usual pencil edge, melting invisibly into th spread and staring white of the land. H walked over the prairie, his ankles turnin to the frozen crust of hummocking summ fallow and stubble fields. No living thin moved; and he saw only the domino trac of jack rabbits, the sidling wells of a trottin coyote's trail, the exquisitely stamped trac of prairie chicken. He looked out over th prairie again.

All kinds of people had died. They we dead and they were gone. The swarming hu of telephone wires came to him, barely pe ceptible in the stillness, hardly a sound hea so much as a pulsing of power felt. He looke up at rime-white wires, following them fro pole to pole to the prairie's rim. From ea person stretched back a long line—hundre and hundreds of years—each person stu up.

It had something to do with dying; it h something to do with being born. Lovi something and being hungry were with too. He knew that much now.

As he turned back toward the town he s the moon pale in the afternoon sky, a gr ghost half dissolved. And the town was dim gray and low upon the horizon, it lay, r real, swathed in bodiless mist—quite sunl in the rest of the dazzling prairie.

Someday, he thought, perhaps when was older he would know; he would find c completely and for good. He would be sat fied.

"He's been grounded—for flying in windows!"

Your baby's thinner skin needs special care

Your baby's "flower-petal" skin really is very fragile. It's actually thinner than an adult's you know, and your care of it is very important to your baby's comfort.

Of course you always keep him dry and make sure his diapers are rinsed completely free of irritating soap. But how much thought do you give to the choosing of his bathroom tissue?

WHAT YOUR BABY NEEDS IN A TISSUE

The three important qualities in your baby's bathroom tissue are softness, to prevent chafing . . . high absorbency . . . and sufficient strength to prevent tearing and shredding.

More mothers are finding this ideal combination of qualities in ScotTissue than in any other brand.

ScotTissue is ideally balanced for baby's use. It's "old linen" soft for safety and comfort . . . amazingly absorbent . . . yet strong enough for thorough cleansing. These three qualities will also be a real help in training him to proper toilet habits later on.

A GOOD WAY TO CUT DOWN DIAPER LAUNDERING

For babies under six months, try crumpling up 20 or more sheets of soft, absorbent ScotTissue and inserting in the diapers. You will have more dry diapers, less staining. Simply flush away the wet or soiled tissue. It's by far the most economical way to keep your baby "comfy" and save on laundry too. If you can't get ScotTissue every time, it's because the demand is so great.

Now · ScotTissue is softer than ever

Trade Mark

By Ruth Mills League

PHOTOS BY STUART

It really isn't up to you entirely to make a Saturday after-ski brunch a success. The weather will bring its own exhilaration. The gang can be depended upon for appreciative appetites in large sizes. All you have to do is fast footwork the day before, sleight of hand after play, and follow the rules. For once, your sporty friends will eat with more than just the gusto resulting from the exercise—it might be with a gourmet's delight.

Conversation Piece

PICK a fine Saturday in February when there's snow for skiing or ice for skating or perfect weather for a good long hike. Get your crowd together in the morning, have a lot of fine healthful exercise and then let everyone bring his fine healthy appetite to your house for brunch. Success? Of course, you can't miss, but let's not take advantage of the situation. Anything that called itself food would get by—that we know—but we want our food to be wolfed ecstatically, not just plain wolfed.

The menu must be planned carefully, for you're not going to stay in the kitchen whipping up delicious food while the others are joyously whipping up appetites. You'll be in on the fun; so—the same old day-before business I'm always talking about is scheduled. We'll have the stage set so that (Continued on Page 138)

You can begin with a hot drink—we like cherry punch. But you will finish up with icy-cold fruit—peaches and strawberries mounded high and just unfrozen are wonderful. You can use other kinds, naturally, but the fresh thaw adds a fillip. And you can have cookies, too—check your own favorite recipe for sweet-tooth filling—but there isn't any crying need for them—the fruit will be enough. We all know about the sugar shortage.

Take one part highly seasoned cheese sauce, one part spaghetti and roll in ham (or bologna or bacon) and you've got the pièce de résistance for the meal. Flanked with egg croquettes amandine (a dish you'll put in the place of honor for future meals) and tossed green salad, the meal hits a high spot for week-end treats. Guests, serving themselves, come back for seconds all around—and some of them, probably, even for thirds.

In silver, there is no prouder name WALLACE STERLING

[illegible] the Wallace patterns, examine it closely. The fine carving, depth of [illegible] all are a result of over a century of [illegible] passed silver-crafting at Wallace. All sterling is solid silver...but such artisanship as this [illegible] Wallace patterns of third dimension beauty: [illegible] Grand Colonial. Sir Christopher. Six place settings (knife, fork, soup spoon, teaspoon, salad fork, butter knife) about $25 to $30.

Ask for Wallace Sterling Silver

[illegible] 1955 WALLINGFORD, CONN.

CHOICE YOU [illegible] CE FOR A LIFETIME...THAT'S WHEN NOTHING LESS THAN THE FINEST WILL SATISFY

(Continued from Page 136)

even without a helper in the kitchen a little last-minute sleight of hand from you will do the trick—and a mighty neat trick it will be.

A hot drink should come first. I'll give you a recipe for hot cherry punch, and with it there will be an appetizer loaf served with crisp wafers and a fine bunch of water cress, if your grocer can supply it. Bowls of nuts and olives will complete the hors d'oeuvres. The main dish will be ham-and-spaghetti rolls, which have the twin virtues of being a gourmet dish and requiring the minimum of meat. Instead of the thin slice of cold boiled ham needed for each roll, strips of bacon or thin slices of pressed ham or bologna could be substituted. For the other hot dish, egg croquettes amandine, which could take first place on any menu and hold it with honor. A bowl of fine salad greens tossed with French dressing and a stack of crisp toast sticks, and next comes dessert.

Fruit should be the finale. For one thing, this is brunch; for another, our menu calls for a light, refreshing dessert. A platter or bowl of peaches and strawberries—icy cold, of course—will be perfect. The fruit can be fresh, frozen or canned, and with it you might serve some tiny icebox cookies.

Now we're ready for recipes. We'll plan for ten hungry people, and you can decrease or increase quantities depending on the size of your crowd.

HOT CHERRY PUNCH

Boil for ½ hour, covered, 1 cup water, 10 whole cloves, 3 inches cinnamon bark and 3 inches vanilla bean. Strain and add juice of 1 lemon, juice of 1 lime, 1 can of unsweeded cherries, black or red, and 1 sliced orange, skin and pulp. Cover and simmer 10 minutes. Let stand overnight, then strain. Just before serving bring this mixture to the boiling point, add 2 quarts ginger ale, heat until steaming hot and serve, either in a punch bowl or a large pitcher. (Dubonnet can be added if you like.) This is a very light punch and not too sweet.

APPETIZER LOAF

Use 1 pound cottage or cream cheese as the basic ingredient for this loaf. If cottage cheese is used, wrap it in several thicknesses of white cloth and remove as much moisture as possible by wringing and pressing.

To the cheese add 5 tablespoons chopped green pepper, 4 tablespoons finely chopped onion, 4 stuffed olives, chopped, 6 large ripe olives, chopped, 5 tablespoons minced sweet pickle, 2 tablespoons chopped sour pickle, 1 tablespoon chopped parsley, 1 teaspoon prepared mustard, 10 tablespoons fine cracker crumbs and 5 tablespoons mayonnaise. Stir until thoroughly mixed, form into a long-shaped loaf and wrap in heavy wax paper. Store in the refrigerator overnight.

To serve, turn the loaf out on an hors-d'oeuvre tray, garnish with strips of pimiento and heap a nice fresh bunch of water cress beside the loaf. The loaf can be made with a strong snappy cheese as the base, and very good it is, but not for this meal.

HAM-AND-SPAGHETTI ROLLS

This recipe will make twenty rolls, and you'll need a thin square or oblong slice of boiled ham for each roll.

To make the sauce, melt 3 tablespoons butter or margarine, add 4½ tablespoons flour and stir until smooth. Add slowly, stirring constantly, 2 cups hot milk and 1 pound good strong cheese cut or broken into pieces. Season with 1 teaspoon salt, ½ teaspoon dry mustard, 3½ tablespoons horse-radish, 1½ tablespoons Worcestershire sauce, 1 tablespoon chili sauce, ½ teaspoon powdered thyme and ½ teaspoon dry sweet basil. Cook in top of double boiler until cheese is melted and sauce is thick and smooth. Stir often, but not constantly. Try it on direct heat, and if the sauce bubbles up at once it is done. Taste for seasoning and add a little more of this or that if you like. Not too much, though, for this is pretty sharp as is.

While the sauce cooks, bring a large pan of salted water to a rolling boil, add 1¼ pounds fine, unbroken spaghetti and boil until tender but not mushy. Timing is important, but I hesitate to say and fun to make!

SOFT as a purr...

It's so simple to make fluffy, deep-pile rugs—easy as tying a knot, economical, too! You'll want to warm up your home with lots of...

BUCILLA FLUFFY-TUFT RUGS

Choose from a magnificent variety of stamped rug patterns and make them gloriously colorful with Bucilla Wonder-knit cotton—boilproof, sunfast, in rich decorator colors. Bucilla stamped rug foundations and Wonder-knit yarn at your favorite art needlework counter.

Bucilla GUARANTEED QUALITY

Other famous Bucilla Products: Embroidery Flosses • Knitting Yarns • Decorative Linens • Stamped Goods

NEVER A DULL MOMENT with BMC Change-a-Blade SCISSORS

NEW, SHARP BLADES IN 10 SECONDS

Bright Chrome or Black Handles

THAT'S ALL IT TAKES, JUST 10 SECONDS...

... to slip out old, dull blades and install a new set that will snip, snip with sharp precision. Hundreds of household cutting jobs will prove the worth of this improved scissors. CHANGE A BLADE is balanced to fit your hand . . . its tension is adjustable to your requirements . . . and it gives you...

Your Choice OF 4 HANDY BLADE POINTS

Yes, you can keep 3 sets of spares on hand and always be sure of the blade points you need for the work you are doing. New, sharp blades with pointed ends, blunt ends, one pointed and one [illegible] beveled. Actually CHANGE-A-BLADE gives you four scissors in one, at a fraction of the ordinary cost. Spare blades at less than sharpening charge for old-style scissors.

$2.50
Chrome finish 3.00

BMC MANUFACTURING CORP.
Binghamton, N. Y.

STRAWBERRY PLANTS
Our FREE Berry Book will tell about All of Berries, Everbearing and How To Grow Them. W. F. Allen Company, 16 Oak St., Salisbury, Md.

VOSS WASHERS
...Get Clothes Cleaner
Your cleaner clothes will be the envy of your neighbors. Investigate Voss "gentle but fast" Floating Agitator and Voss Electro-Safe Wringer — the world's safest. Electric and Gas Engine Models.
VOSS WASHERS
Time Tested Since 1876
VOSS BROS. MFG. CO., DAVENPORT, IOWA

BABY'S "Twin-Turtle" BIB HOLDER
[illegible] Practical and appealing. Makes meal-time napkin application easy. Protects baby's clothes at home . . . ideal when dining out. Attractive, [illegible] washable. Assures perfect [illegible] napkin in reach. Baby can't pull it off. Has tab to put on [illegible] plastic gift box. Now available at leading department [illegible] and jewelry shops.
BABY'S BIB-HOLDER
50¢
FEDERAL TOOL CORP., (DEPT. J) CHICAGO 12

Electric ROTO-ROOTER
Razor-Kleens
SEWERS AND DRAINS
At the First Sign of Trouble
Call YOUR LOCAL ROTO-ROOTER MAN
BETTER, FASTER, SERVICE FOR LESS
FREE [illegible] and Drain Pipe Book shows [illegible] how to keep your [illegible] and Drain Pipes [illegible]
ROTO-ROOTER CORP.
Dept. [illegible] Des Moines 14, Iowa

YOUR SHOES ARE SHOWIN

EMBARRASSING, ISN'T IT?
YOU NEED SHINOL

● Having your hands full is no exc unshined shoes. There is no good ex bad grooming. So remember—stock a full supply of Shinola Shoe Polishe

You'll find it pays to KEEP 'EM S WITH SHINOLA. Shinola's scientific co tion of oily waxes helps hold in replenish the normal oils in leather maintain flexibility, and that means wear. A shine is the sign of a healt —and a sign of good grooming, too.

IN CANADA IT'S 2 IN 1

Amazing New Plan
DRESS for YO for Ordering

THRILLING NEW PL choice of Gorgeous New D —in your favorite style, siz given to you for sending only Three Dresses for y neighbors or members of dly. That's all. Not one c Everything supplied with

Experience Unne
Spare Time Wil
Famous Harford Frocks w their big, new Style Li scores of latest fashions, fabrics, in dresses, B dress wear, etc., at se remarkable prices. wear, basky suits and styles and fabrics to fi bar, and trendy—sen order—and your own chided without payin

Be First in Y
WRITE TODAY
Presentation show latest fashions wit ple fabrics. No m Don't miss this get complete wa chance to earn u in a week beside

HARFORI DEPT. CINCINN

Your OF MOR 100 S

tly how many minutes it must cook. lve minutes should do it, but I've had ok some spaghetti fifteen. Taste test cooking when the strands are still g enough to be a little chewy. Drain ce and rinse with cold water. Put the hetti in a bowl, pour in the sauce and the two by lifting the spaghetti with spoons until the strands are coated cheese sauce. Set the bowl in a pan of water, roll up your sleeves and go to . Have a towel handy, and a pan of n water. This is sticky business, and e it might be done with spoons and s I wouldn't think of trying it.

ace a slice of ham on a mixing board, ut some strands of spaghetti and place n across the middle of the slice, letting n extend beyond the ham about an on either side. Be sure that at least t of the strands are looped at the ends. o this up until you have a sizable stack paghetti, then carefully fold the ends he ham around it and secure with hpicks. Thus you have a roll of ham strands of spaghetti sticking out of end. Clear? If the spaghetti becomes cool to handle successfully, pour boil- water into the pan under the bowl. e the finished rolls on a heavily greased y sheet, brush the ham with melted er or margarine and set in a cool place. the last minute, heat the rolls in a F. oven until piping hot, remove hpicks and serve. Make them the day re, if it suits your convenience.

G CROQUETTES AMANDINE

ake a heavy cream sauce of 5 table- ns butter or margarine, 9 tablespoons and 2½ cups k, using same hod as in cheese e for ham rolls. sauce will be very k and must be ed constantly un- t boils. Season h 2 envelopes cken-bouillon der, a little cay- e pepper and ½ poon salt. Hard- k 14 eggs, chop me- n fine and add n to the sauce, ring until thor- hly blended. Taste seasoning and add e salt if needed, don't be heavy- ded with the salt. croquettes should pply a bland ntrast to the rply seasoned a rolls. Make this ture the day before, because it must be y cold before it can be molded. lanch and sliver, the long way, ½ nd almonds and let them dry. ow to molding the croquettes, another ssy but not difficult job. Have ready almond slivers, a pan of soft white ad crumbs—don't use the crusts for se—and a pan of toasted bread crumbs, de by drying bread scraps and crusts in ot oven before they are ground. With a k beat 2 eggs to which 2 tablespoons er have been added.

Mold the croquettes into whatever pe you like. Cones are a little fussier to ke, but I think they look pretty. Take a all handful of egg mixture, shape it, l it in the soft white bread crumbs and it aside. Repeat until mixture is gone; l don't wash off your hands as you go ng, or you'll waste too much egg. Some the bread crumbs will stick to your gers and get mixed with the egg stuff, t that's okay. When you're finished with s step and your hands are dry you can ape the croquettes more perfectly. Next dip each croquette in raw egg, let it ain a bit, and roll it in almond slivers. re again I don't advise washing off hands you progress: too many almond slivers uld go down the drain. Now roll each oquette in the toasted bread crumbs. this time they are well coated and more anageable and you can put the final uches on the shapes. Set them in a cool ace until you are ready for frying.

Use plenty of fat for French frying, and very sure it is hot enough or your cro- uettes will go to pieces. Try the tempera- re with a little piece of bread. If im- ediately the bread begins to bubble hard d change color, you're ready. Cro- uettes can be fried ahead of time, allowed to cool off, and reheated just before serving. Or they can be fried ahead of time and kept hot for hours on an electric hot plate or in a barely turned on oven. Or, of course, they can be fried at the last minute. But whatever method you use, I think egg croquettes amandine will be part of your repertoire from here in. That soft creamy egg center with its crust of almonds and crumbs is hard to beat.

SALAD

Since this is the classic green salad, there's nothing much I need say. Just use the finest greens you can lay hand to, the more variety the better, and use the best oil and vinegar available for your dressing. If good olive oil isn't to be had—I've been able to get some lately, which encourages me—use my jar French dressing. Rub the salad bowl well with garlic and have the greens washed, wrapped in a wet towel and waiting in the refrigerator for last-minute tossing.

TOAST STICKS

Cut bread into thick slices, remove crusts and cut each slice into three strips. Toast on all sides, spread with butter or margarine and dry thoroughly in a low oven—about 250° F. Reheat at last minute.

COMPOTE OF PEACHES AND STRAWBERRIES

There's no trick to this except that the fruit must be attractively arranged and icy cold. If you use frozen fruit, set it to thaw just before you start out on your skiing, or whatever, expedition. Frozen fruit is best if it's a little bit icy when served. Pile the peaches in the center of your serving dish and make a border of the strawberries. I've found that crème de cacao has an affinity for peaches—why, I don't know, for they would seem to be strange companions. But if you like you might pour a few spoonfuls of crème de cacao over the peaches just before serving.

> The thing most equitably distributed in all the world is common sense. No man will admit needing more than he already has.
>
> —DESCARTES: Discourse on Method.

At one of those bluestocking salons where brilliant men and women used to forgather and engage in sparkling conversation, pitting their wits against one another, a lady, hoping to stump Sheridan, a famous wit, asked him a poser:

"Mr. Sheridan, as you seem to know everything, tell me what is the real, essential difference between a man and a woman."

Thinking deeply for a moment, Sheridan replied: "Madam, I cannot conceive."

There you are, except for the cookies, and that I'm leaving to you. Almost everyone has a favorite cooky recipe. Also, we each know how acute our sugar shortage happens to be at the moment. We don't need cookies with this menu, but they'd be a pleasant addition.

Service. Set the food out attractively on your dining table, buffet or whatever, and let everyone serve himself. It's more fun for this kind of party and it's easy on the hostess. The problem here is not how the food is to be served, but having it ready to eat in what seems to be the twinkling of an eye.

With a helper in the kitchen even that is no problem, but if you're swinging this alone you must do some careful planning. You don't want to seem flustered or hurried, and you needn't if plans are complete and you stick to them. The other girls will use a lot of time, what with make-up, perhaps clothes-changing and certainly talk. Fine. You can be quick about that and have some precious minutes in the kitchen by yourself. By the time the punch is hot and in the living room with the hors d'oeuvres, you should have everything under control.

Now just a word about the hot food and I'll stop. The croquettes could be fried at the last minute while the ham rolls are heating. Or both could be finished and kept hot in a warming oven or on electric hot plates while you're away. Or, if you have neither warming oven nor electric hot plate and still want the last-minute cooking out of the way, try this. Fry the croquettes and leave them in a barely turned on oven. Cover the ham rolls and let them stand in the same oven. Just before serving, remove the croquettes and broil the ham rolls for a very few minutes -long enough to brown them a bit but not dry them out.

HATHAWAY DOTS . . . sheer, crisp, beautiful fabric for curtains of elegant simplicity. Curtains made of Hathaway Dotted Marquisette are available at good stores everywhere.

Beautiful kitchen – but QUICK!

• In minutes, you add glorious color and banish that "bare-shelf" look, using wonderful Royledge. It's shelving paper and edging all-in-one—just fold edge down.

• Only Royledge has long-lasting doubl-edge, such wide choice of patterns, colors. Inexpensive —less than a penny a day to change pattern monthly. Ask for Royledge at 5-and-10's, neighborhood, hardware and dept. stores.

Royledge SHELVING 9 FT.

"...and be sure to get a WEAR-EVER...the one with the Snap-tite cover..."

"But why, Mom?"

Because you want your husband to say you're the best cook ever, though you spend less time in the kitchen! So get this Wear-Ever Pressure Cooker—it has the patented Snap-Tite Cover—you can use it with just one hand! Besides . . . .

even if the lid-lock is unhooked, this cover can't come off while pressure's on. Vegetables pressure-cooked in a Wear-Ever stay dewy fresh; meat comes out temptingly tender! Reaches temperature fast, then cooks, f'r'instance, peas in 15 seconds, fried chicken in 14 minutes!

With such a simple design, the Wear-Ever's so easy to use! The temperature control has no adjustments, no moving parts. Won't break if dropped. And a Wear-Ever saves pin-money for extras, too, by cutting fuel and food costs! Get yours today — demand's enormous! If your dealer's out of stock, have him save one from his next shipment.

COPYRIGHT 1947 THE ALUMINUM COOKING UTENSIL CO., NEW KENSINGTON, PA.

Made of the metal that cooks best . . . easy to clean

WEAR·EVER

Aluminum PRESSURE COOKER

WEAR-EVER ALUMINUM TRADE MARK

Keep aluminum gleaming the easy way. Use Wear-Ever Cleanser Pads. At all stores.

NEVER A DULL MEAL

By Helen Train Hilles

Helen Train Hilles, author of To the Queen's Taste and Young Food, has a nice respect for leftovers. Mrs. Hilles says, "I have always been annoyed at reading sets of menus, presumably following each other in the same household, that took no apparent note of the fact that you had roast duck the night before."

HERE are a week's menus in the life of a family consisting of a couple with two children of primary-school age. In this series I have tried to anticipate what might be left over; but the undeniable fact is that, no matter how you plan, no one can tell if there will be cold broccoli in the ice-box—or if there will not!

First Day

Situation: You have promised to work in a local drive from noon until relieved by the late-afternoon shift. You are not at all sure when that will be, as you know the late-afternoon shift and she is addicted to sudden colds in the head or forgotten dentist appointments. The laundress will cover the children and the telephone as she irons, if you are late. Your husband doesn't know when he'll be home, as he has a six-o'clock conference with a man who is never hungry until nine P.M.

Breakfast

Baked Apple
Oatmeal Gruel
Bacon Toasted Rusk
Coffee or Milk

Children's Lunch Basket

Vacuum Bottle of Milk
Peanut-Butter-and-Bacon Sandwiches
Bundle of Celery Hearts
*Cupcake Jam Sandwiches

CUPCAKE JAM SANDWICH

Take a plain cupcake, slice through center, spread with jam or jelly, and put together again. If cake is slightly stale, slice twice through center. It will be more moist.

Explanation: You pack the children's lunch while they are eating breakfast, using the extra bacon you cooked on purpose. You make the chowder in the morning, dressing while it cooks.

There is nothing left to do except reheat the chowder and fry the diced salt pork at the last minute.

Dinner

Large Casserole of Fish Chowder*
Pilot Biscuit
Wooden Salad Bowl of Shiny Red Apples
Cheese Coffee

FISH CHOWDER

Follow any recipe for New England fish chowder, and save a few crisp dice of salt pork to serve on top.

Result: The afternoon shift arrived on schedule, and you are home before the laundress is finished. You give the children supper early, and have time for a long, luxurious bath. The chowder casserole heats in a slow oven. When your husband finally shows up you have a relaxed meal on the card table in the living room. Neither of you says so, but it is a pleasant contrast to dinner with the children, which is sometimes a strain.

Carry-over: Some chowder; an apple or two; a piece of slightly crumbly cheese; about ⅓ pound of salt pork.

Second Day

Situation: The children have been off eggs, your son declaring they look naked, and your daughter, too suggestible for her own good, immediately agreeing with him. You plan to stay home today, as you have set yourself the task of going over the family wardrobe with a fine-tooth comb, and of undoing the boxes which have lingered on the top shelves and of whose contents you are no longer quite clear. You have time, in between, for cooking, but you want to be free tomorrow. The children are to eat with you both nights.

Breakfast

Half Grapefruit
Corn Flakes
*Oeufs en Cocotte Strips of Toast
Coffee or Milk

OEUFS EN COCOTTE

The advantage to this, besides the fact that it is good, is that you can cook any number of eggs to individual taste with almost no trouble. Take individual custard cups, place a spoonful of cream or a little butter or margarine in the bottom, slip in gg, add salt, [illegible] n or butter or margarine. Put cups in n of hot water over direct heat, or e oven, and cook till [illegible]

ed firmness.

Children's Lunch Basket

*Cream of Chowder
Chopped-Lettuce [illegible]
Bundle of Carrot Strips
Handful of Dried [illegible]

CREAM OF CHOWDER

e remains of the [illegible] ugh a sieve. Add [illegible] lt to make into a thin cream soup, ng additional salt and pepper. For a e meal, serve [illegible] eed parsley or chives on top.

lanation: [illegible]
ng the [illegible]
e firm. During [illegible]
[illegible] em from the stepladder. When you hrough with tonight's chicken, you pre-
[illegible]
whole and set [illegible]

Family Dinner

Jellied Mushrooms
*Breast of Chicken and Noodles and Chicken-Liver Pâté
*French Carrots Soft Rolls
*Peach Soufflé
Coffee Milk

ICKEN WITH NOODLES AND CHICKEN-LIVER PÂTE

e breasts of hot roast chickens on a ter with little piles of buttered bread nbs, and follow with a platter of noo-with chicken-liver pâté melting in e pools at intervals. The pâté is made king the chicken livers, sautéing them
t. Then rub them through a [illegible] salt, black pepper and onion juice to
, and work in as much [illegible] garine as they will absorb. Then set to harden.

FRENCH CARROTS

carrots any shape you like. Place in a ll amount of water. Add pepper, salt a little sugar and butter or margarine.
e pan uncovered and cook till carrots ender and water has evaporated. Serve their juice and [illegible]

PEACH SOUFFLE

e canned peaches and place in the bot-of a lightly greased baking dish.
nkle with a little sugar and put in the to get warm. While the fruit is heat-beat 5 egg yolks with 4 tablespoons gar. Beat 4 egg whites [illegible] in lightly. Pour soufflé mixture on of the peaches and bake in a moderate for about ten minutes. Serve at once.

ult: Your son, who [illegible]
[illegible]
[illegible]
[illegible]
[illegible]
too. During the day you answered a [illegible]
[illegible]
[illegible]
[illegible]

Save Sugar!

Luscious Fruit Bars

NEW, QUICK, EASY!

Made in a saucepan—easier to mix . . . and less dishwashing!

√ All mixing done in one saucepan!
√ A handle to grasp as you beat!

GOLDEN FRUIT BARS

Luscious, fruity . . . stay fresh for days!

½ cup shortening • ¼ cup sifted flour
½ tsp. baking soda • ½ tsp. salt
½ tsp. cinnamon
½ tsp. nutmeg • ¼ tsp. cloves
½ cup Brer Rabbit Molasses
2 eggs, unbeaten • 1 cup nuts, chopped
1 cup raisins, chopped

No creaming of shortening. Melt it in 3- or 4-quart saucepan over very low heat. Remove from heat; cool. Mix and sift flour, soda, salt and spices.

No beating of eggs. Just add the molasses and unbeaten eggs to the cooled shortening and mix until well blended. Add the sifted dry ingredients and mix thoroughly. Lastly, stir in the chopped nuts and raisins. Bake in a greased and floured 10" x 6" x 1" pan in a moderate oven (375° F.) for 20 to 25 minutes or until done. When cool, cut into 1" x 3" bars. Makes about 20 bars.

"Folks, my molasses is over 60% natural sugar—and Rich in IRON!"

Iron is essential for good red blood! Brer Rabbit New Orleans Molasses is one of the richest food sources of iron.

Two Types: GOLD LABEL, highest quality fancy light molasses—mild and sweet. GREEN LABEL, rich-flavored dark molasses.

FREE! NEW QUICK, EASY SUGARLESS RECIPES

Send me leaflet giving new, quick, easy recipes for sugarless desserts—made in a saucepan. Also 52-page book of 116 fine molasses recipes. BOTH FREE.

Name_____

Address_____

Paste on penny postcard and mail to:
BRER RABBIT, c/o Penick & Ford Ltd., Inc.
New Orleans, La., Dept. J2-7

eggplant, which the children say tastes "thick." You bought a small one and let the soup serve for their vegetable instead.

Dinner

Whole-Onion Soup Parmesan Toast
Eggs Scrambled with Browned Chipped Beef
Crisp Fried Eggplant Rounds
Blancmange
Jelly Roll
Coffee

WHOLE-ONION SOUP

This is more of a technique than a recipe. Take some good soup stock that has been skimmed of all grease, and pour it, boiling, over a whole Bermuda onion that has been put in an individual clay soup pot. Put the pots in a slow oven, and bake slowly till the onion is tender but has not gone to pieces. Serve the pots covered with their own covers (as they should have been all along) and pass cubes of thick dry toast that have been sprinkled with Parmesan cheese and toasted under the broiler.

Lunch result: The years have dealt lightly with your friend, who is unmarried, and you begin to feel a little middle-aged. She admires the house, but would never have noticed any dust, and has an excellent appetite, remarking that she never knows what she eats. However, she is very stimulating and knows a lot about world affairs. You ponder taking a refresher course in your favorite college subject.

Dinner result: The children like eggplant, if French-fried, which is usually forbidden, and there isn't enough.

Carry-over: Grapes; celery; ⅓ pound of salt pork; parsley; ⅔ loaf of white bread.

Fifth Day

Situation: It is Friday, and you have let yourself in for twenty people for buffet supper tomorrow. As you owed everyone in town, or so it seemed, you took the plunge earlier in the week and didn't think much about it till the phone rang before breakfast. It was the maid you had secured to help, and she had turned her ankle. The doctor said to stay off it a few days.

Breakfast

Orange-and-Grapefruit Juice
French Toast, Maple Sirup
Coffee or Milk

Children's Lunch Basket

Canned Cream of Asparagus
Crisp Crackers
Unpeeled Hard-Cooked Eggs
Buttered Hard Poppy-Seed Rolls
Grapes

Explanation: You are in for it now, and you market for both days. Then you mull over tomorrow while you do today's work, and leave word for your laundress, who washes for someone else on Saturdays, to call you as soon as she gets there. (She has no telephone and you don't know where she works on Fridays.) You bought six rolls for dinner last night and forgot to serve them, so they turn up in the lunch basket.

Dinner

*Cauliflower with Shrimp Sauce
Frozen Peas
Toasted Poppy-Seed Rolls
Applesauce (bought)
Gingersnaps (bought)
Coffee Milk

CAULIFLOWER WITH SHRIMP SAUCE

Cook a cauliflower till done, but firm enough so it stays whole. Make 2 cups of well-seasoned white sauce, using half and half milk and either chicken broth, shrimp liquor or cauliflower liquor. Add either fresh or canned shrimp, in the amount you can afford. Put cauliflower on a serving dish, and pour over it the shrimp and white sauce.

Result: You know shellfish isn't supposed to be the thing for the children, but it has never disagreed with them, and certainly tonight's dinner was easy to cook. You got everything pretty well planned for tomorrow, attempting no more than you could do alone, though you pray the laundress will call up. Your mother-in-law has offered to take the children for supper, which is a help. (Of course on Saturdays they are home all day.)

Carry-over: Celery; ⅓ pound of salt pork; parsley; ½ loaf of white bread.

Sixth Day

Situation: You are up early and have already made a row of long-stemmed glasses of dessert, when the laundress calls up and says she will come and help when she has finished her day's work. She is nice-appearing, and will fit into the black dress. The children are each going to another child's house to play this morning, but they have not been asked to stay for lunch.

Breakfast

Grapefruit Juice
Scrambled Eggs with Fried Salt Pork
Toast Points
*Coffee-Milk for the Children
(Because you are going to neglect them)
Coffee for You

Coffee-Milk

Stir a couple of teaspoons of the breakfast coffee into the children's milk—just enough to flavor it. Sweeten to taste.

Children's Lunch
(served from the kitchen)

Meat Balls Baked Potatoes
Coleslaw
Chocolate Dessert
Milk

Explanation: You do almost everything in the morning, timing the meat balls and baked potatoes so you have a ready-made lunch for the children. (You reserve two of the oddest-shaped dessert glasses for them.) The casseroles are ready to heat in the oven, and for last-minute chores there are only the buttering of the rolls and the making of the appetizers that require bread. You are satisfied with your menu, for you know that good simple food can be more epicurean than fancy.

Buffet-Supper Menu

Appetizers
(To be served in the living room with any beverage you like)
*Cottage-Cheese Finger Bowl with Fingers of Norwegian Bread
Green-Pepper Appetizers Tiny Virginia-Ham Sandwiches on Rye
Celery
(Served from dining-room buffet table)
*Casseroles of Herb Meat Balls
*Special Hashed Cream Potatoes
Vegetable-Salad Bowl
Buttered Rolls
*Chocolate Dessert
Bowl of Cut-up Fruit
Demitasse

COTTAGE-CHEESE FINGER BOWL

Take contents of a carton of cottage cheese and stir into it 2 or 3 tablespoons of canned tomatoes, draining the tomatoes of juice or the mixture will be too runny. Now stir in ½ small onion, grated, salt and black pepper to taste, a couple of tablespoons of sour cream. Put mixture in a finger bowl (this amount will just about fill it) and wreathe the edge of it with small bits of parsley.

CASSEROLE OF HERB MEAT BALLS
(For twenty)

Have 5 pounds of meat (pork, beef and veal) put through the grinder twice. Soak ½ loaf white bread without crusts in 2 cups milk. Mix with the meat, add 1 tablespoon mixed dry herbs, salt and pepper to taste, and 2 beaten eggs. Form into meat balls the size of large marbles, and brown

I WAS "fit to be tied"

My family turned up their noses at my cooking once too often. "No flavor," they said.

Then I heard how Herb-Ox "flavors up" soup, gravy, main dishes. Just 2 cubes to a casserole...

make it so much tastier! (So easy to use, too.... just dissolve cubes in a little hot water.)

WHEN FOOD TASTES BETTE —IT'S BETTER FOR YOU!

So "flavor up" your meals with

Herb-Ox
BOUILLON CUBI

Write for FREE menu booklet, illustrated in full color!

The PURE FOOD COMPANY, Inc
Mamaroneck, N. Y.

MORE MONEY For YOU
SELL EVERYDAY CARDS
Earn extra cash selling stunning Everyday 14-card Assortments. Sell for $1—pay you up to 60¢. Other BIG VALUES: "Little Dear" Notes, Gift Wraps, Stationery, etc. Write for samples today.
Cardinal Craftsmen, Dept. 716
117 West Pearl Street, Cincinnati 1, Oh

FRIED FISH

Fry fish till browned and remove from fire. Blend 2 tsps. Lea & Perrins Sauce with butter in pan. Pour over fish and serve. There's fish to bait a man's appetite! For extra seasoning keep a bottle of Lea & Perrins on the table.

A FAVORITE FOR OVER 100 YEARS

LEA & PERRINS Sauce
THE ORIGINAL WORCESTERSHIRE

FREE Recipe Book. Write Lea & Perrins, Inc., 241 West St., New York 13, Dept. L-2.

MONEY for YOU!

Do you want extra cash?

LET me tell you how you can earn $50 in the next thirty days . . . how you can keep on earning through 1947. Just send me a postal with your name and address and I'll send you an amazing Offer. No charge for supplies, no expense to start. So address that postal now to

M. E. Nichols

CURTIS CIRCULATION COMPANY
670 Independence Square, Phila. 5, Pa.

Dennison, Dept. P-1, Framingham, Mass.
FREE Please send me a whole day's supply of Dennison Diaper Liners.
Name.....
Street.....
City..... State

FOR THE SEAT OF YOUR DIAPER TROUBLES

HEY, MOM! Don't be a Diaper Drudge! Dennison Diaper Liners reduce unpleasantness in changing and washing my diapers. Just fold a Liner inside diaper next to my skin. When soiled, flush away. No hard scrubbing. Sanitary. Helps prevent diaper rash. Costs only a few cents a day. DELUXE: 180 for $1; CRADLE TIME & [illegible]

Dennison
DIAPER LINERS
Wherever Baby Goods Are Sold

a few at a time in fat in a heavy frying pan. As they brown, transfer them, a layer at a time, to a casserole. Sprinkle each layer with flour, and pour on stock, using in all 4 or 5 cups of stock. When the casserole is full, swish out the frying pan with some stock, and add to the casserole. Simmer slowly in the oven one to two hours.

HASHED CREAM POTATOES

Take a medium-sized baking potato per person and bake till three quarters done. Put aside till needed. When ready to make dish, peel potatoes and cut into as small dice as you can without using grinder. Place dice in casserole and add enough plain cream so mixture is a little runny. Also stir in about a teaspoon of meat paste and salt and black pepper. Place in oven long enough to cook the potatoes, but not long enough for them to mush—you will have to test. The dish should come out looking like creamy rice pudding. Sprinkle top with a little nutmeg and serve. (This can be done in a double boiler just as well.)

CHOCOLATE DESSERT

Melt 1 square of unsweetened, bittersweet or sweet chocolate per person in a small saucepan, adding enough sugar, depending on the chocolate, and stir till smooth. (You may have to add a few drops of water.) Remove from range and stir in thoroughly 1 egg yolk per person. Then fold in 1 stiffly beaten egg white per person. Spoon into sherbet glasses and let cool in icebox.

Result: The laundress came early and not only helped set the table, but polished the tines of some of the forks. You were tired, but had a feeling of accomplishment as you put the casseroles in the oven and left her to butter the rolls. The guests were impressed by your initiative in having a party, all of them evidently being under the impression that they, too, owed everyone in sight. (You begin to have a pleasant vista of parties ahead, all cooked by other hostesses.) The casseroles were bubbling when brought to the table, and stayed hot under their covers for second helpings. Everyone stayed late, but you don't mind, because that proves the party was a success. This bolstered you up no end as you cleared up the living room and eyed the food that was left.

Carry-over: Most of the cut-up fruit; some white bread; some rye bread; some Norwegian bread; 5 buttered rolls; a few slices of Virginia ham; a cup or two of hashed potatoes; ½ green pepper; celery; a few meat balls; some gravy; sour cream.

Seventh Day

Situation: Despite the fact that it is Sunday and you went to bed at two, you wake early, in an exhilarated mood. Your husband is still asleep. You had bought nothing for today except spinach and string beans, to make sure of the children's vegetable. You needn't have.

Breakfast for You and the Children

Cut-up Fruit
Hashed-Potato Eggs
Hot Buttered Rolls
Coffee or Milk

Your Husband's Breakfast

Fruit Juice Black Coffee

Family Lunch

*Meat-Ball Hash
*Spinach with Sour Cream and Onion
Norwegian Bread
Prune Whip
Coffee Milk

MEAT-BALL HASH

Mash remaining meat balls till smooth, adding enough gravy to make the right consistency. Cook like any hash.

SPINACH WITH SOUR CREAM AND ONION

To finely puréed hot spinach add a small grated raw onion and some sour cream—not enough to make it runny.

Explanation: You decided to start right in with the carry-over and give yourself and the children an unexpected breakfast. Then you take them out with you and when you come in you bring your husband his breakfast on a tray. (This disposes of the excess juice from the cut-up fruit.) After yesterday's cooking, four people don't seem very many and you wonder whether you couldn't get along without the part-time maid who is coming to you next week. You decide against this.

Family Supper

*Ham-and-Celery Casserole
Whole String Beans Scalloped Tomatoes
Breadbasket of Assorted Bread
Vanilla Ice Cream (from the drugstore)
Chocolate Shavings on Top
Coffee Milk

HAM-AND-CELERY CASSEROLE

Cook diced celery in a small amount of chicken broth, or water to which a couple of chicken-bouillon cubes have been added. Season with pepper but no salt. Make a white sauce, using half and half milk and chicken-celery stock. Pour the celery and white sauce into casserole. Stir in a few tablespoons of ground Virginia ham (depending on the amount you have) and reheat if necessary. Sprinkle with minced parsley and serve in the casserole.

"Nothing, thank you—I'm just looking!"

Result: You have made great inroads on the carry-over, have plans for the rest. The breads will lend variety to school lunches, and you have most of the ingredients to try out both the green pepper and cottage cheese on the children. For a wonder, you have added only one leftover (egg yolks from the prune whip) with which you will thicken the soup tomorrow. The party was well worth while. Your husband had remarked innocently, "Why don't we do this more often?" You did not make the remark you would have liked to at the time, and can now contemplate entertaining again—but not too soon.

French's

baked in U-m-m-m!

Ham with that French's Flavor!

Wrap a tender smoked ham loosely in wrapping paper, place fat side up on rack in uncovered roaster. Add no water. Bake ham in moderate oven (325° F.) allowing 3½ to 4 hours for 10- to 12-lb. ham.

Now take ham out, remove paper and skin. Score fat surface in squares. Spread with 4 tablesp. French's Mustard. Cover surface with 1 cup brown sugar mixed with 2 tablesp. flour. Stud squares with whole cloves. Bake in moderately hot oven of 400° F. 15 minutes or until golden brown. Serve with pineapple slices browned in ham liquor.

FREE! NEW RECIPE BOOK

"Mealtime Magic" in full color. Send name and address to The R. T. French Company, 1361 Mustard St., Rochester 9, N. Y., and this booklet will be sent you FREE.

Largest selling prepared mustard in U.S.A. today
Also made in Canada

The Natural Way to Build a

BARRIER against COLDS!

Delicious Florida Grapefruit Juice offers the helping hand of PROTECTIVE VITAMIN C

● This winter there are countless folks who have learned they can arm their bodies with a powerful weapon to help protect them from the attacks of colds and flu. It is the juice of Florida's tree-ripened grapefruit, abounding in vitamin C.

The delicious, plump fruit is squeezed for you . . . and its luscious juice put up in cans all ready to drink. So rich is the juice in vitamin C that it acts as a natural BODY-GUARD against the threat of colds and infections.

Why not join the delighted families who have found this natural way of helping to ward off colds before they get started. Keep several cans of juice on ice. Serve it for every breakfast. When exposed to drafts—or at the very first sign that a cold is on the way—drink plenty of it often. Keep grapefruit juice on guard duty 24 hours a day!

●

TRY ALL THESE DELICIOUS FLORIDA JUICES AND FRUITS!

Canned Orange Juice • Orange-Grapefruit Blended Juice
Canned Grapefruit Sections • Canned Tangerine Juice

100% REFRESHER!

100% DELICIOUS
100% HEALTHFUL
100% CONVENIENT
100% ECONOMICAL

• FLORIDA CITRUS COMMISSION
Lakeland, Florida

Canned

FLORIDA GRAPEFRUIT JUICE

YOUR BODY-GUARD AGAINST COLDS, INFECTIONS, FATIGUE!

LD YOU VOTE FOR A WOMAN PRESIDENT?

(Continued from Page 10)

n't think this country's destiny ive been much different under a ial system. Maybe I'm not a very t person, but I fail to find much e between men and women. My sually quicker to spot a bad male the road, and I am usually quicker ne bad female drivers. That's about nk Tolstoi summed it up very well said that the only difference he between the sexes was that a man be a wet nurse. Doctors say that a who has given birth to three or more and has successfully passed her ise is immune to practically every lisease and will die of nothing but —that is to say, sheer desiccation. ot so fortunate, no matter how many he may have fathered. (Note the sident and Mrs. Roosevelt.)

as soon vote nan for Presi- for a man. not the trou- ie trouble is hundred and illion people so little presi- timber of r sex. That's tional tragedy. up the right . and she'll y support." JY ENDORE.

ould not vote man for Presi- f the United Women have reached the equality with administrative which would em the back- necessary for . The largest of successful are found in ich were once d to the home re now per- d outside— , education, r decoration, o on. The department- esident, polit- der or diplo- still the excep- ther than the When women accepted in atter jobs so of-factly that vill no longer news value attached to their succes- those jobs, they will have acquired ckground necessary for the job of President. I do not think that time ved yet." —HELEN JEPSON.

not for or against a woman for Presi- I see no biological infirmities which prevent a woman's functioning in that ond that the question is only you eat a horse with no horse. I could and name many women who could ast as healthy and adequate a job in ite House as did Coolidge, Harding ver. I can think of no male or female uld have matched F.D.R., for ex- Of course women who might fill the President would have tough going to nomination." —MORRIS ERNST.

uld I vote for a woman for President nited States? Why not? Some of our e members of Congress have proved ey are more capable of manning the state than some of our congressmen. this country comes under the head of siness, there are many women with more business acumen than many of our misrepresentatives. Most women do not play politics, or at least the kind of politics played by our males; at present there are few, if any, female cogs in any of our corrupt political machines. Of course there may be corrupt women in politics, and on the fringe, but to date they haven't been in a position to prove it. Unfortunately, there have been males who left little doubt.

"So I'll answer your question by saying that I would vote for a woman for President if I thought she possessed the necessary qualifications, but I doubt if one will ever run. In the first place, if a woman threw her hat into the ring nobody would know what it was. And in the second place, where will you find a woman who will admit being over thirty-five years old?"

—"SENATOR" FORD.

★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★

The Dead

Written in a German prison camp in the spring of 1945

BY R. J. CROT

The dead are silent. Passionless and still
They lie in dreamless slumber, robed in peace.
They will not stir though raging armies fill
The air with frightful clamor. The sweet release
Of death has soothed their anguish. They have found Within that timeless land the secrets men
Have sought since time began. They are not bound
By fetters forged of race or creed . . . and when
The frantic living join the quiet dead
We, too, shall learn that in that gentle dust
All flesh is kin; within that narrow bed
There is no room for hate or fear or lust. . . .

The living plague the gods with selfish cries:
The dead are silent—the dead are wise!

★ ★

● "Don't you think we'll need a man for a change?"

VINTON FREEDLEY.

● "A female President in the White House would certainly add a fresh, vital and much-needed touch to our national affairs. Great women in history, with far less opportunity than the feminine followers of today, have demonstrated as much shrewdness and ability as any of the great men.

"The male of the species has long maintained his position of dominance by reason of his superior physical strength and his greater prowess on the hunt. The average apartment kitchenette of the present day no longer depends upon some muscled male to bring in bear meat or venison from the surrounding woods. Any delicate feminine thing, with a good secretarial job, can fetch home hard-to-get bacon with as little difficulty as any businessman. Since lady wrestlers have entered the field, the mighty male has been pushed off his last pedestal of dominance.

"Our next woman President will have to make more mistakes than Peck's Bad Boy to keep up with some of her male predecessors. Personally, as well as women's famed intuition, I think a well-turned ankle and a few lacy edges would humanize the habitual grimness of the White House and our national affairs." —FRANK C. HIBBEN.

● "Yes, I would. A woman, I think, would be more concerned with what will happen to the next generation rather than expedient, dead-end action lasting only for a day."

—MRS. NORMAN DER. WHITEHOUSE, President, Women's Action Committee for Lasting Peace.

● "When John Knox fulminated against 'the monstrous regiment (rule) of women' he started something that has come rolling down the ages, gathering masculine moss as it went. (At that, I would rather vote for Queen Elizabeth than the Reverend John!) Too many of us males cherish the unconfessed and uncomfortable suspicion that if allowed an even chance, the female of

When baby cries because of "Childhood Constipation"

...give Fletcher's Castoria!

"It's the laxative made especially for infants and children."

WHEN your usually-happy baby frets and cries...when he's upset merely because of "Childhood Constipation"...it's time to do the wise thing:

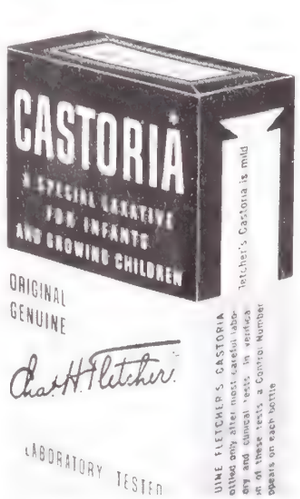
Give him Fletcher's Castoria. It works thoroughly and effectively. Yet it's so gentle, it won't upset his sensitive digestive system.

Why it's right for children

Unlike adult laxatives—which may be too harsh—Fletcher's Castoria is specially made for children. It contains no harsh drugs and will not cause griping or discomfort.

And Fletcher's Castoria has such a pleasing taste that children really love it. They take it gladly, without any struggle. Caution: Use only as directed.

Get Fletcher's Castoria at your drug store today. Look for the green band on the package. It identifies the original and genuine product.*



Chas. H. Fletcher

CASTORIA

The original and genuine

the species might do better at the job than we have done—just take a look at the world!—and so fear to risk our superiority complex.

"As for the presidency, is there anyone outside the intellectual Black Belt who would not feel safer with the late Jane Addams in the White House than the unfortunately extant Theodore Bilbo? Or with Eleanor Roosevelt than Pappy O'Daniel?

"And why not broaden the field? If there were a woman or two on the U. S. Supreme Court bench, would the nation have been treated to any less seemly an exhibition of hair pulling and toga snatching than the recent lamentable spectacle?

"Naturally one must discriminate; there are women and women. I would hardly have voted for the late Mrs. Carrie Nation, and it would take some persuasion to secure my suffrage for Miss Mae West. But to the specific question, 'Would you vote for a woman for President of the United States?' I return another: 'Why not?'"

—SAMUEL HOPKINS ADAMS.

● "Yes, I should like, sometime, to vote for a woman for President of the United States. Man is romantic; woman is realistic. She is the house cleaner, and we surely need a house cleaning in Washington on a grand scale.

"Woman has a keen political acumen. I could name some great women, past and present, who would have made great Presidents—greater than some of the men who were in that august office.

"At the City Temple, in London, I had as my colleague Dr. Maude Royden, the greatest woman preacher of my generation. She could do some things that I could not do; and handle some issues which I could hardly touch.

"More than once the wife of a President has been his wise helper, if not his savior—her intuition, her estimate of personalities saving him from blunders. Rare qualities, in either man or woman, are needed to fill the office of President; and seldom do we have anyone who really fills it."

—JOSEPH FORT NEWTON.

● "A woman President? Why not? Perhaps what we need is a neighborly over-the-fence 'Good morning!' every morning, instead of just on Sundays, holidays and during a war."

—NAN MERRIMAN.

● "I am not a very good person to ask about a woman President. I am not very politically minded; and, being a dyed-in-the-wool Philadelphia Republican, every time I ask myself that question I begin to wonder whether I would vote for Mrs. Roosevelt, to which, being dyed-in-the-wool, I reply to myself that I wouldn't. It gives me a curious sort of pleasure always to vote Republican.

"It has been my belief that people aren't primarily male or female, but primarily human beings. Which means that it would be much more sensible to vote for a good woman President than a bad male President. Against that is the fact that all too many of our women politicians have merely taken over from a deceased husband or somebody, cashing in on his assets. And that, so far, we have not a great many women who have enough political training, and that a woman President would be taking more of a chance, judging by the majority of women now working at politics, than a man. But—after all this wavering ——

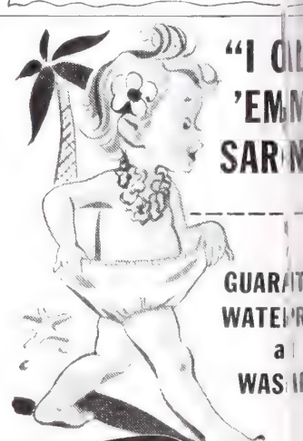
"I would vote for a woman presidential candidate if her record, and the record of her party, was better than that of her opponent. But I certainly would not vote for her merely to help forward the feminist cause, if she weren't as good as her opponent.

"Being a timid soul, I find myself shivering a little at the idea. So many women in charge of important affairs seem to turn matriarch; I would not like to have my country run by a lady who acted as if it were her angel child, to be adored and bossed in a personal way. I would not like to have my country run by a lady who was a politicians' figurehead.

"Oh! Oh! Mommy, us my Stork Castile

Your ... will tell ... Castile is ... irritating, ... especially to ke... ter care of bal...

MOTHER! Keep your skin ... baby's—with Stork Castile ...



"I ... 'EM ... SAR...

GUARA... WATE... a ... WAS...

Rand

BABY PANT...

Some baby pants are tighter 'n a tig... glove! But guaranteed Rand Bab... are the roomiest I've ever worn loose and comfortable as a saron... wriggle to my heart's content when I ... ing roomy, cool, ventilated Rand Bab...

Rand DRESS SHIELDS

Guaranteed by Good Housekeeping

My Mom wore Rand Dress Shields before I was born! She says they keep her dainty and fresh always!

RAND RUBBER CO. "They Last Longer" BROO...

Avoid Loss!

MARK EVERYTHING W...

CASH'S WOVEN NAM...

12 doz. $3.50 — 9 doz. $:...
6 doz. $2.40 — 3 doz. $ ...

Ask your Dept. Store, or write us

CASH'S 77 Chestnut St., So. Norwalk, Con... 6227 So. Gramercy Pl., Los Angeles ...

E-Z UNDERWEAR

"FOR ANY CHILD OF ANY AGE"

Shopping for baby's underwear? Be sure to ask for E-Z, the name that means comfort and long wear. E-Z infant's shirts are comfortable because there's no twisting, no binding, no buttons—and they are conveniently sized according to baby's weight.

Send for our free booklet, "Let the Scales Help You." It offers a handy weight-size chart.

E-Z MILLS, INC.
57 Worth Street
New York 13, N.Y.

"On the other hand, we have had male Presidents who couldn't possibly be worse. Perhaps, in the words of the Scotch proverb, 'a change o' deils is lightsome.' A woman mightn't be better or worse, but it would be interesting to see what would happen."

—MARGARET CULKIN BANNING.

● "The question, voting for a woman for President, may be an invitation to others for a light, bright and 'entertaining' reply. But not for me. I marched in a woman-suffrage parade in Pittsburgh in 1912 (when I was night editor of the Pittsburgh Post) and suffered not only catcalls but whatever vegetable was seasonable and ripe at the moment. The experience confirmed me to the cause.

"Today I would vote for a woman for President if the woman candidate was the more capable. In this, as in other matters, I would not draw the line of race, blood, color or even sex."

—GEORGE SELDES.

● "I'm old-fashioned. I wouldn't. I would feel much too sorry for the man who, in introducing his wife to his pals, is forced to say, 'And this is my wife—the President of the United States!' And yet someday I'm sure some poor man will be doing just that."

—LAURITZ MELCHIOR.

● "To me, the question of the candidate's sex is secondary. Very seldom have we had candidates for President so equal in themselves, running on platforms and backed by parties so equally desirable, that the question of a man versus a woman should decide the issue. In practice, of course, it would. A weak man with a poor platform and a corrupt party would defeat an able woman with the best of platforms and backing hands down. Hence I should always work against a woman's nomination, for practical reasons.

"There is no denying that there are important differences in temperament between men and women. We do not know what strength and what weaknesses a woman would show in the presidency. We know only that she would be different. All other things being equal, I'd vote for a man against a woman, simply out of reluctance to experiment. But all other things will probably never be equal.

"A sensible opinion on the matter cannot develop until we have observed, not an occasional oddity like Ma Ferguson, but a large number of woman governors, senators, Cabinet members, and so forth. We have never yet had a stateswoman of any significance. Let one arise and real opinions will begin to form."

—OLIVER LA FARGE.

● "I would vote for a woman for President of the United States. The hand that rocks the cradle has been ruling the world since time immemorial, so why not give women a chance to do their ruling directly instead of [illegible]"

—HELEN TRAUBEL.

● "Were Eleanor Roosevelt nominated, I think I would vote for her. I believe she would make a better President than either of the men the two major parties appear at this time to be likely to nominate in 1948. I realize of course that there is no chance whatever of Mrs. Roosevelt's being nominated. Also, she recently declared in print

Love is very much like a game of cards. You know how your partner will play, and you depend upon him: but you don't know what he will play—and therein lies the whole fascination of the game. Never to be twice the same, and always to be attractive—that is the whole art of finding love and keeping it.

RICHARD KING:
[illegible] Hands.
(Hodder & Stoughton, Ltd.)

© King Features [illegible]

FROM BABIES ON UP-THE QUINTUPLETS always used this for coughs of CHEST COLDS

The Quintuplets have always relied on Musterole for coughs and sore throat of tight aching chest colds. Musterole instantly starts to bring wonderful long-lasting relief! It helps break up painful congestion, too. Just rub on chest, throat and back.

In 3 Strengths: Child's Mild Musterole for average baby's skin. Regular and Extra Strength Musterole are [illegible]

MUSTEROLE

sow SALZER'S seeds

Salzers 3 Big Offers!! All postpaid!

NO 1 [illegible] all for $1.00

Home [illegible] for $1.00

NO 3 [illegible] for

[illegible] SPECIAL $1

3 offers for $1.25 postpaid. All seeds 99% plus pure

Send for Big FREE catalog [illegible] den seeds, plants, bulbs, shrubs, trees, field seeds

1947 John A. Salzer Seed Co.
Box 23-F
La Crosse, Wis.

FREE CATALOG

BACKACHES CAUSED BY MOTHERHOOD

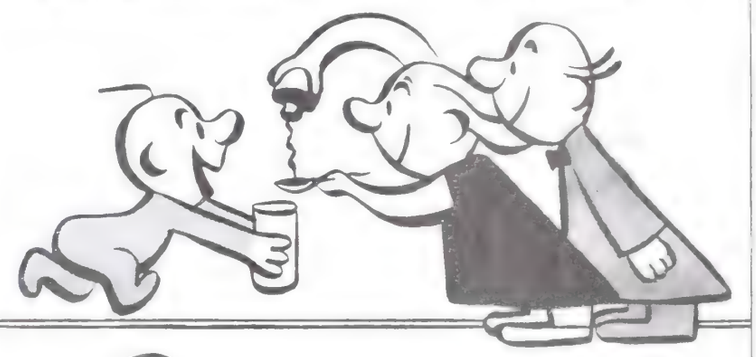
Muscles are often strained by motherhood and cause backaches for years. Allcock's Porous Plasters give prompt effective relief . . . They support the muscles, bring heat to painful spot. 25c at druggists

ALLCOCK'S Porous Plasters

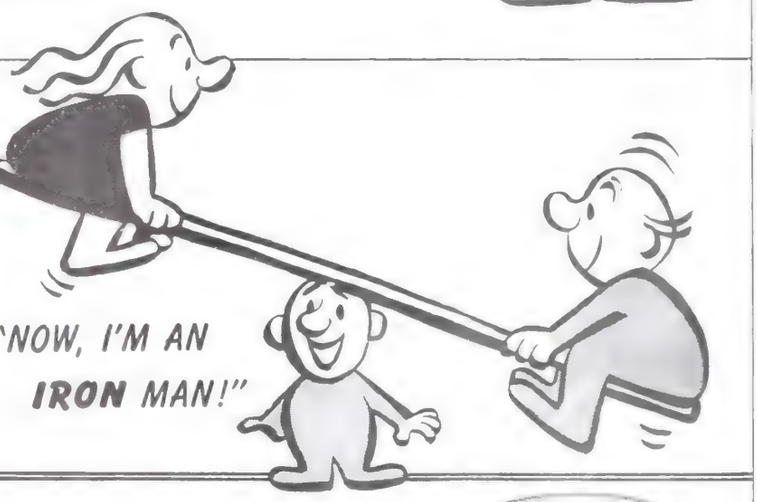
THE BOSCO KID!

"YOUR MILK, ANGEL!"

"WITH CHOCOLATE-FLAVORED BOSCO!"



"NOW, I'M AN IRON MAN!"



"BOY OH! BOY! I GET MY IRON EVERY DAY (VITAMIN D, TOO!) FROM JUST 4 TEASPOONS OF CHOCOLATE-FLAVORED BOSCO IN MY DAILY QUART OF MILK. IT'S KEEN!"

SEE HOW RICH BOSCO IS IN IRON!
The following chart shows the relative amounts of available IRON in:

Spinach
Raisins
BOSCO

Be sure your child gets his iron every day!

that she was out of politics. I am not aware of any other woman with qualifications for the presidency.

"Women are people—they are the product of their training and environment. A woman would be no more likely (all things else being equal) to bring about a series of calamities than a man of the same age. Men can be, and often are, just as silly and notional as women.

"How could the budget be any more upset than it is now? How could our affairs generally be in worse shape than they are now, in consequence of centuries of male 'statesmanship'? As for a housewife's applying household economics to the national scene, the woman who could survive the rough-and-tumble lifelong politics necessary to bring her to the attention of a political party would probably know as little about managing a household as most men in the same position." —LOUIS ADAMIC.

● "I wouldn't vote for a woman for President of the United States. To begin with, she wouldn't be elected—it takes a man to go around the country kissing babies, especially those around nineteen."

—GROUCHO MARX.

● "A candidate should be elected to office on personal qualifications and the issues involved, not on a basis of sex. I have seen many women who were well qualified to hold important executive positions. I do not anticipate the election of a woman as President at any time in the near future. There is a very definite probability that the nation will have a woman President sometime within the next 50 or 75 years."

—EUGENE TALMADGE.

● "I shall be disappointed if I leave this earth without having lived under a woman President of the United States. I have had the good luck to observe women in so many other activities—marriage, medicine, art, journalism—that I feel the presidency would be the final occupation not yet represented among women's activities. But I would feel that not only for the sake of completing my observation, but because surely women have special aptitudes for being President. As mothers, they are accustomed to looking after children. Why, then, should they not be good at looking after the citizens of a country, for the citizens are only that country's children? And as to foreign policy, women are used to having trouble from the neighbors' children, to having to pull their own kids out of a scrap, so why wouldn't they be good at handling other nations, who are simply the neighboring families of the world?

And I should like to see a lot of senators who hold dull ideas about keeping everybody in his place, including women, have to take orders from a woman. And I should like to hear a woman demanding a vast budget from Congress. Women have had budget trouble with men long enough; a woman President would be able to submit a budget without worrying about the squawks. And I should like to know what kind of hats a lady President would wear; whether she would wear a bright scarf over her hair on a windy day, and whether she would ever be found in the kitchen whipping up a batch of hot biscuits. Yu-u-m-m!"

—PAUL ENGLE.

● "In choosing the candidate for President of the United States for whom I would vote, certainly the matter of sex would not be taken into consideration. We have thousands of women in this nation who are certainly better qualified for the presidency than any male who has filled the position since 1932."

—W. LEE O'DANIEL.

Professor: "Name a great time-saver."
Student: "Love at first sight."
BOSTON TRANSCRIPT.

A Baby, a Spoon and a Dish

When your doctor says, "It's time to start cereal," buy one specially made for babies. It should be suitable as a starting cereal as well as for use all through babyhood. Millions of mothers have raised their babies on Gerber's cereals.

Your doctor will tell you how much to serve. Measure amount right into the baby's dish. Add milk or formula, warm or cool, and mix. That's all you do—Gerber's cereals are pre-cooked, ready to serve.

Your baby gets extra food values from these cereals. For instance, they are rich in added iron for a very good reason. Babies are born with a store of iron which begins to run low some months after birth. This must be built up and Gerber's cereals help you do just that! All three Gerber's cereals also have vitamin B complex as a further aid to baby's well-being.

Your baby's digestive system is delicate, so the three Gerber's cereals are finely strained. They mix creamy smooth, with uniform texture for easy digestion. Millions of babies have grown to healthy boys and girls on Gerber's!

VARIETY THAT HELPS BABY'S APPETITE

Gerber's makes three different cereals: Cereal Food, Strained Oatmeal and the new Barley Cereal. Many mothers find that serving all three cereals turnabout helps baby's appetite. Be sure to get Gerber's cereals, with "America's Best-Known Baby" on the front of each box.

Gerber's Baby Foods

FREMONT, MICH.—OAKLAND, CALIF.

CEREALS STRAINED FOODS • CHOPPED FOODS

© 1947, G. P. C.

FREE SAMPLES

My baby is now ____ months old. Please send me samples of Gerber's Barley Cereal, Gerber's Strained Oatmeal and Gerber's Cereal Food.

Address: Gerber Products Co., Dept. 82-7, Fremont, Mich.
In Canada: Dept. 82-7, 49 Wellington Street East, Toronto 1, Ontario

Name _____

"Coming, Mother!"

"You don't have to call twice! I saw you makin' those keen rennet-custard desserts this mornin'—an' do I love 'em!"

Babies—children—grown-ups . . . the whole family enjoys milk that's made into delicious rennet-custards. They have all milk's food value because they aren't cooked, and the rennet enzyme makes them even easier to digest than milk itself. They're so quick and easy to make—give your youngsters and yourself a treat by serving rennet-custards today!

Make rennet-custards with either "Junket" Brand Rennet Tablets—not sweetened or flavored—add sugar and flavor to taste; or "Junket" Rennet Powder—already sweetened, in six delicious flavors. Both at all grocers. For free sample of "Junket" Rennet Tablets, write "Junket" Brand Foods, Division of Chr. Hansen's Laboratory, Inc., Dept. 22, Little Falls, N. Y.

WORTH WAITING FOR!
"JUNKET" BRAND FOODS
Freezing Mix
Quick Fudge Mix
Danish Dessert

"JUNKET" is the trade-mark of Chr. Hansen's Laboratory, Inc., for its rennet and other food products, and is registered in the U. S. and Canada

DE LIS
PRESENTS A
Children's Fashion Show
In the new, exciting Spring and Summer Catalogue!

It's an outstanding collection of moderately priced fashions and accessories for infants and children, displayed for your pleasure in a beautiful catalogue. Just write and enjoy these wonderful items for a child's wardrobe and comfort. Write today: Dept. F87

DE LIS FASHIONS
218 Chartres, New Orleans 16, La.
Or come and see these fashions on display at the
DE LIS RETAIL SHOP
935 Canal St., New Orleans, La.

THANX AIDS IN CORRECTION OF THUMBSUCKING AND NAILBITING
A "STILL" PRODUCT

MARY TODD BURKETT

It isn't that a scratch is dangerous—it's the dirt that might be left in the break, and that's why mothers have to know first aid.

First Aid and the Home Medicine Cabinet

BY DR. HERMAN N. BUNDESEN

President, Chicago Board of Health

ACCIDENTS happen in every family, but tragedies usually happen to families which are unprepared for accidents. Every year thousands of children suffer, d a few die, because their homes did not ve the equipment, or their parents the owledge and skill, to meet an emergency ness or injury.

Thus it is every mother's duty to make re that her home has a first-aid kit or medine cabinet with the right things in it, and e must also know what to do when the ild gets hurt or becomes suddenly sick. Of urse, for serious hurts and acute illnesses, r first thought is to call the doctor. But e must be prepared herself to care for minor iergencies and to give first aid when the ctor cannot come right away.

The accompanying list shows what should in the home medicine cabinet to meet the eds of the average child. Ordinarily, these ems are sufficient, if mother knows how to e them all intelligently. In many cases there may be special needs, such as drugs to relieve the seizures of a child who has asthma, so it is always a good idea to go over this list with the family doctor and make certain that it has his approval.

Minor cuts and burns are the injuries that mothers must care for most frequently. It is for these that our medicine cabinet should have bandages, gauze, cotton, adhesive, green soap, salve and an antiseptic. Scratches, for example, are dangerous only because they may be dirty. These should be washed gently but thoroughly with soap and water, then painted with an antiseptic solution. If the scratch has stopped bleeding by the time it has been cleaned, it need not always be covered with a bandage, though usually this helps to keep it clean when the child returns to play.

Deeper cuts hurt more and bleed more, but are not necessarily more serious. In fact, the bleeding itself is often protection against contaminating germs, which are washed away with the blood. Nevertheless, cuts should be cleaned by the same methods, and covered with gauze or cotton and adhesive to protect against tears while the wound is healing. The same precautions should be taken when the child skins his knees, hands or elbows on the sidewalk or some other hard, rough surface. When cinders, gravel or dirt has been ground into these sores mother must take care that the particles are washed away during the cleaning. If they are ground in deep, so that removing them is too painful, the child should be taken to the doctor.

Cuts or wounds from which blood is spurting forcibly are harder to handle. If pressure on the wound itself will not stop bleeding, the artery from which the blood is flowing must be located and the flow stopped by pressing the artery against a bone. The "pressure points," or spots at which this can easily be done, are on the inside of the upper arms and legs, and at the angles of the jaws. To prevent possible tragedies from excessive loss of blood in such cases, all mothers should study a first-aid textbook or insist on learning this simple but important technique from the doctor or his nurse.

Puncture wounds, such as occur when a child steps on a protruding nail, are potentially the most dangerous of all, because they are the most often neglected. In these cases, infectious germs may be driven in

(Continued on Page 151)

GRATEFUL young mothers from Maine to California tell us that Doctor Bundesen's baby booklets have been of the greatest help to them in caring for their own babies. The first eight booklets cover your baby's first eight months. They sell for 50 cents. The second series of booklets covers the baby's health from nine months to two years—seven booklets for 50 cents. The booklets will be sent monthly; be sure to tell us when you want the first booklet. A complete book on the care of the baby, a necessary supplement to the monthly booklets, OUR BABIES, No. 1345, is 25 cents. A booklet on breast feeding, A DOCTOR'S FIRST DUTY TO THE MOTHER, No. 1346, sells for 6 cents. Address all requests to the Reference Library, LADIES' HOME JOURNAL, Philadelphia 5, Pennsylvania.

Give baby this modern skin care!

NEW LOTION PROTECTS HIM BETTER!

Irritations dropped when new Johnson's Baby Lotion was tested on thousands of infants in hospital nurseries. This entirely different kind of baby skin care—smooth, snow-white, antiseptic—lowered cases of diaper rash and prickly heat amazingly!

Mothers find Lotion pleasanter! "So different—so pleasant!" say mothers who have tried Johnson's Baby Lotion. You, too, will find it a delight to use—after baby's bath, at every diaper change. Leaves baby's skin soft, clean, protected. Start Johnson's Baby Lotion care—today!

Johnson's Baby Lotion

ANTISEPTIC

Johnson & Johnson

Priceless

What will you take for your children?

Nothing, of course. They're priceless. And within your means, there are no limits to your care for their happy, sturdy growth and well-being.

We're on your side. Because a spread for bread is even more important in a child's diet than in a grown-up's, we have always been mindful, in making Nucoa, of children's nutritional needs. So here are some of the things we do to make Nucoa good enough for your children:

- ✓ Maintain constant relationship with a consulting board composed of leading American nutritionists
- ✓ Guard Nucoa's uniformity and flavor by strict labo-ratory control.
- ✓ Guarantee at least 15,000 U.S.P. units Vitamin A in every delicious pound of Nucoa.
- ✓ Make Nucoa of pure vegetable oils churned with fresh pasteurized, cultured skim milk—products of American farms exclusively.

No wonder Nucoa has made friends with millions of mothers! Try it on your table. No other churned spread, at any price, furnishes more food energy or is a finer year-round source of precious, protective Vitamin A!

● So fresh, so good, "it melts in your mouth!"

Nucoa is freshly made the year round, on order only.
There is no "storage" Nucoa! For cooking, use it as it comes—pure white. For the table, tint it a delicate yellow with the pure Color-Wafer inserted in each package.

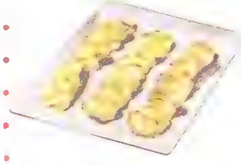
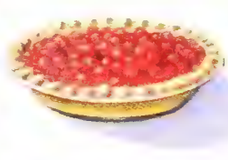
Enriches your cooking, too!

CORN CHOWDER: (1) Sauté ½ cup thinly sliced [illegible] in 4 tbsp. Nucoa until yellow. (2) Add 4 cups diced raw potato and 2 cups water, season to taste and cook 15-20 min., or until [illegible] are tender. (3) Add ¾ [illegible] pepper slivers, 1 can (2½) cream-style corn, 3 cups milk, and simmer 5 min. (4) Add 1 cup cream and 2 soda crackers crushed into crumbs. Serve very [illegible] servings.

OVEN "FRIES": (1) Peel and slice 6 potatoes in thin slices. (2) Arrange on Nucoa-d flat baking pan in rows, overlapping potato slices so that about half of each slice is exposed. (3) Brush well with ¼ cup Nucoa, melted. Bake in very hot oven (500° F.) for 15 minutes, or until potatoes are tender and have crisp edges. Season to taste. Yield: 6 servings.



NUCOA-QUICK-OATS CRUST: (1) Add 2 cups H-O Quick Oats to ⅓ cup melted Nucoa; stir well. (2) Add ¼ tsp. salt, 2 tsps. grated lemon rind, 4 tbsp. sugar. (3) Turn into well-greased pie pan; press lightly onto pan with moist fingers. (4) Bake in moderately hot oven (375° F.) 15 to 20 min., or until lightly browned. (5) Cool; fill as desired. Yield: one 8- or 9-inch crust.



(Continued from Page 140)

ep, beyond the reach of any cleansing proc-
s. Yet often the wound is apparently rmless, with only a small amount of pain id little, if any, bleeding. The puncture ould always be washed and covered. If it in the bottom of the foot, as it is in so many ses, the child should be kept off his feet un-all soreness has disappeared. If he has not ready had the antitetanus immunization jections, which are now given many times ong with diphtheria and whooping-cough ots, the doctor should by all means be told out the injury; he may want to give tetus antitoxin to play safe against this grave fection.

Mild burns—another common childhood jury—hurt more than they harm. Unless e burn is severe enough to blister, or unless covers a large area, such as the greater part the hand, foot or forearm, mother's main ncern can be directed at relieving pain and oviding protection against further injury the tender skin. Immersion of the burned ea in lukewarm water is the best way to ing quick relief. When painful smarting ops, the burn can be covered with a special lve (the doctor will recommend one for the edicine cabinet) and then with cotton or uze held loosely in place with adhesive. A in paste made from baking soda and water ll do the trick if no burn salve is available, t neither this nor the salve should be used r burns that blister. These should be left ne, except for immersion in water, until e doctor can come.

Few doctors think that the home medicine binet should contain antidotes for poison-
g. The chance that just the right antidote ll be at hand for the particular poison the ild has taken is small, and there is always a k that mother will get panicky and use e wrong thing. Few poisons act so quickly at mother hasn't time to call a doctor
d get specific advice.

Definitely belonging in the medicine chest, wever, are a mild laxative (again, the ctor's choice), aspirin to reduce fever and relieve discomfort of severe colds and infectious diseases, a gargle for sore throats, aromatic spirits of ammonia to be used sparingly if the child faints or suffers shock following an injury, and doctor-recommended cough medicine—either a sirup or lozenges. For the most part these are safe, useful remedies; but the laxative, especially, must be used only when the doctor explicitly recommends it, and never when the child has a stomach-ache. The possibility that an infected appendix may be ruptured through use of a laxative must never be overlooked.

Finally, a word of caution should be added about what not to keep in the home medicine cabinet: Never keep prescription drugs, including sulfonamides, after the illness for which they were prescribed is over; sleeping pills; cure-alls, or patent medicines—no matter how effective they are supposed to have been for the neighbor's Aunt Jenny!

Following these rules will make the medicine cabinet in your home what it ought to be: first line of defense against accident.

IN THE HOME MEDICINE CABINET

Do* Keep:

Prepared sterile bandages
Surgical gauze (2 inches wide)
Cotton
Adhesive tape (1 inch wide)
Green soap
Antiseptic solution
Burn salve
Baking soda
Mild laxative
Aspirin
Gargle
Cough medicine
Aromatic spirits of ammonia

Don't* Keep:

Poison antidotes
Prescription drugs
Sleeping pills
Patent medicines
Anything else

THIS IS A RUNAWAY
THIS IS A WATCHBIRD WATCHING YOU
THIS IS A WATCHBIRD WATCHING A RUNAWAY
By Munro Leaf
This sad-looking thing sitting on the curb is a Runaway, and it is lost. This Runaway is tired and hungry because it is way past suppertime and it doesn't know how to get home. It didn't tell anybody at home where it was going or promise to be back when it should. It just ran away and now it is sorry, but it's too late. Nobody knows where to start to look for it. Maybe this Runaway will have more sense the next time, if it ever gets home. Let's hope so.
YES
NO
WERE YOU A RUNAWAY THIS MONTH?

Why Delicious Quaker Oats is Unequalled For Your Growing Child!

1. Because, unlike many modern refined foods, Quaker Oats is a natural, complete whole-grain breakfast cereal. Gentle Quaker processing does not change, denature or destroy any of its natural values.

2. Because, even among natural cereals, none equals hot, whole-grain oatmeal in four great "key" elements* absolutely essential for normal growth, stamina and youthful energy.

3. Because Quaker Oats is unmatched in deliciousness. Voted best-tasting cereal in a national survey! Actually enjoyed by more people each day than any other cereal!

The secret of Quaker Oats is simple. Real oatmeal is simply our greatest natural cereal in food elements that promote growth—and your energy and stamina. Its greatest benefits can be obtained by enjoying Quaker Oats regularly. For this reason—and for its unique whole-grain deliciousness—start today serving Quaker Oats at your house! So economical. So easy to prepare. Quick Quaker Oats cooks fast as coffee.

* OATMEAL LEADS ALL NATURAL CEREALS IN PROTEIN, FOOD-ENERGY, VITAMIN B_1, IRON!

 Actually won more votes than any other cereal, hot or cold!

Quicker Oats and Mother's Oats Are the Same

Quaker Oats

The World's Best-Tasting Breakfast Food

"LOOK MOMMY! We left some for you"
Peanut Crunch Peanut Butter is a great thrill for kiddies . . . a great treat for mom and pop! With meals or in-between, everybody likes Peanut Crunch Peanut Butter, the blended combination of crispy, toasted peanut bits and smooth, delicious peanut butter. Contains essential vitamins that help build strong bodies. Look for Peanut Crunch Peanut Butter on your grocer's shelves.
A HOLSUM PRODUCT
Peanut Crunch BRAND
PEANUT BUTTER

ROSIE'S IN

(Continued from Page 45)

We went back and fixed the dam some more. The dog sat on the driveway and shivered.

We rang the front doorbell again.

"Look it how he's shivering," I told mother.

"Tell him to go home," mother said. "And get in here. You'll catch your death."

We told him to go home, but he just sat and shivered.

"He acts like he is home," Pud said.

We went in on the back porch. The dog came and looked in the door. He whined and shivered. We got some rags and got the dog in on the porch. We rubbed him as dry as we could. We got a rug and put it down in the corner where the screens are stacked. We pushed the dog down on it and tried to cover him up.

It was wonderful and warm and good-smelling inside after we had our wet mittens off. We looked out the kitchen window. The dog was lying on the rug shivering.

When father came home he was holding his ears. "Cold spell coming," he said. "What's that dog doing on the porch?"

"On the porch!" mother said. "Let it out. Send it home."

"It won't go," I said.

Father went out and put the dog out. "Go on!" he said, shooing it with his hands. "Go home! Go on home!"

The dog just looked at him. Father came back in and rubbed his hands together by the oven. The dog howled outdoors. Father looked at mother. She kept on setting the table. The dog howled again. Father sighed.

"I know, I know," mother said. "You wouldn't let a dog stay outdoors on a night like this."

"It's wet and getting cold," father said. "Just long enough to get dry?"

"All right," mother said. "But wait till I get into the dining room."

She went into the dining room and shut the swinging door. She's scared of dogs. She even has to walk to the car line a special way where she knows there aren't many dogs. She even walks in the middle of the street so they won't think she is thinking about coming to their houses. When she sees a dog in front of her, she turns around and goes the other way.

We let the little dog in. Was he ever glad! He ran all over and slid on the waxed linoleum. Father patted the floor under the oven. He lay down there. He looked so glad to be in the warm.

We had to serve the dinner. Mother sat in the dining room and pulled her feet up and looked nervous every time we went through the swinging door.

"Hi, Rosie!" Pud said to the dog every time we went into the kitchen.

The dog knew his name! He jumped up when we said it and wagged his tail.

"None of that," mother called. "Don't try to name him. That only makes it harder."

"He ought to be dry and warm by now," mother said. "Enough to find his way home." That was when we were through eating.

Mother did the dishes and came and sat down in the living room.

"Well," she said, "you see. I guess the little dog managed to find his way home all right."

"Yeah," I said. "I suppose he did."

"Yeah," father said.

"I wish he didn't," Pud said.

"Why, Pud," mother said. "That would be stealing. That is a good dog. He belongs to someone."

"He could belong to us," Pud said.

"But he doesn't," mother said. "After he got warm he trotted along home like a good little dog."

"Yow-oo-oo-oo!" It came from the front step.

Father laughed. "I guess he got cold again," he said.

"Couldn't we just keep him tonight?" I said.

"We could not," mother said. "You," she said to father, "go out and take him away a block or two till he gets the idea. He's young. He doesn't know enough."

"Me?" father said. "On a night like this? I wouldn't send a dog out!"

"Yow-oo-oo-oo," the dog yelled.

Father took him up to the corner and around toward the car line a block or two. "I gave him a swat and said, 'Get going,'" he said. "He got." He settled down in his chair and read the paper.

We went to bed.

"Pud," I said. It was the middle of the night, I guess. Pud sat up quick in bed. "Pud, he's back," I said.

The dog was howling on the front step. We could hear mother and father talking. We got up and turned on the hall light. We went into their room. Mother turned on the bed light. We just stood and looked. It sounded awful.

"I give up," mother said. "Close him in the kitchen. Tomorrow ——"

"Oh, tomorrow there'll probably be an advertisement in the paper for him," father said. He was hurrying down the stairs before mother changed her mind.

There wasn't any ad in the paper and Rosie didn't go home. He stayed around. It was warm in the sun.

Mother didn't let us feed him. "That'll encourage him," she said. "That'll make him think he belongs."

"I guess," Pud said, "I never wanted anything all my life like I want a dog. When I get big," he said, "do you know what?"

"No, what?" mother said.

"I'm going to be a—a—a dogman. I'll have a thousand dogs," he said.

"Eat your lunch," mother said.

We didn't feed him that day, but he was still there at night. Father roughed him up good. The dog jumped all over father. He jumped up and licked his face. He yipped and yipped.

"He's glad you're home," I said.

Father looked at the house. "I wish he was," he said.

"We couldn't let him in the house again tonight, I suppose?" I said to mother after dinner.

"No," mother said, "we couldn't. You people are encouraging him. And as soon as you have finished eating I have some errands for all of you. I have not been able to get out of the house all day with that beast standing at the door ready to pounce on me. I have emptied no garbage, I have not taken out the cans. The trash must be burned and those two rugs at the back door have to be taken out and shaken. I intended to make chocolate pie for dinner," she said, "but was out of chocolate and I couldn't get out

(Continued on Page 154)

BIRDS THAT FLY UPSIDE DOWN

In the Florida sunshine, visitors from the North are seeing America's only stork, the great wood ibis, go sailing overhead. Its five-foot wings are strongly marked with black and white.

The wood ibis has its avian cities, with thousands of the birds nesting close together. The wood ibis can soar like a vulture. Sometimes a whole flock will rise a mile or more into the air, and then will come rocketing down for thousands of feet apparently just for the thrill. It has been observed to climb in a sudden wing-over, roll on its back and go sailing along for hundreds of yards upside down. Ungainly and awkward on the ground, the wood ibis is a consummate artist on the wing. Edwin Way Teale

Welch's

For PURE Enjoyment

for free copy of Welch's Delicious Recipe Book, Dept. L, The Welch Grape Juice Company, Westfield, New York.

Copyright 1947 The Welch Grape Juice Company

(Continued from Page 152)

to go to the store." Mother started to clear the table.

"You ought to be ashamed of yourself," father said. "Teaching the children to be afraid of dogs."

"They don't have to just because I am," mother said.

"It's silly," father said. "Dog is man's best friend."

"But I'm woman," mother said. "And dog is not my friend."

"You don't trust them, that's why," father said.

"They attack me," mother said. "They always attack me."

"It's because you're afraid," father said. "They can smell it."

"They attack me even when I don't know that they're there," mother said. "I go walking along on the sidewalk peacefully and they run out and go for me. It should be against the law. The streets of this town belong to the dogs; people can't use them safely."

"You go walking down the street, looking carefully to both sides," father said. "The dogs can smell you're afraid before you see them. Well, give me something," he said. "We can't let this one starve."

Mother said, "Tomorrow I'll call the dog pound."

"When I get big, do you know what?" Pud said.

"Yes," mother said. "You'll be a dogman."

"No," Pud said, "I'm going to get married."

"Oh?" mother said.

"To a lady that likes dogs," Pud said.

Oh, he was a cute dog! He said good morning to us. He put his paws on our shoulders and licked our faces. He wagged his tail, he danced. It was wonderful how glad he was to see us. We put him out so mother could come into the kitchen.

"You can't send a good dog like that to the humane society," father said. "I'll report him to them, so if the owner calls —— There may be a reward," he said.

"There'll be a big reward for a dog like that, I bet," Pud said.

"It beats all," mother said, "how my home is not my castle any more. Go ahead. Keep me a prisoner. All right, I'll give you one more day. But outside. Maybe he'll wander off."

"Do you suppose he will?" Pud said when we started to school. So we tied him up back of the garage. We tied him up with a rope to a tree.

At noon he was gone! The rope was gone. We didn't hardly dare say anything. We

BABY LOVES THE JAR-FREE RIDE

It's so heavenly comfy! Thanks to Center-Suspension Springs*, exclusive with Whitney, practically all the jolts and jars are absorbed before they reach the baby!

MOMMY LOVES THE EASY GLIDE!

It's so effortless! No tilting and awkward shoving for Mommy with a Whitney Folding Coach. For only Whitney has the Steer-O-Matic Wheels* which turn corners automatically with just finger-tip guidance.

FOLKS ALL LOVE ITS SMARTNESS

Surrounded by loving glances is every Whitney Carriage. For Whitney leads in looks! Yes, Whitney has an exclusive Concealed Folding Gear† which gives it the smart styling of the expensive English coaches.

YOU, TOO, will love a Whitney, and so will your baby. See and try one at your favorite store, or write for the free Whitney booklet, "For Babies Only". Address Department L2.

IT'S SMART TO BUY A WHITNEY!

*Pat. and pats. applied for under the Jonkhoff System.

†Pats. applied for.

F. A. WHITNEY CARRIAGE COMPANY
Since 1858
LEOMINSTER, MASSACHUSETTS

Bringing up Parent

DR. BARBARA BIBER, CONSULTANT
Child Psychologist, Bank Street Schools, New York

How would you like it if everyone around you talked Japanese—and you could understand only English? How would you feel if you were alone in a strange land, with no map, compass or idea of when you could get home—if ever? Suppose you couldn't keep your job unless you could give a clear, three-minute explanation of Einstein's theory to your boss! How would you like to live in a world where chair seats and doorknobs were out of your reach, and you had to keep your wallet in a pocket that kept disappearing? It's safe to say that, in such a world, you would not be the bright and cheerful life-of-the-party type. Yet such a world is what a child faces every day of his young life. So when your youngster pleases you with endless questions, or when he insists on being lifted up to see something above his eye level—or even when he throws his new train out the window because he can't make it work—try to remember what he's up against in this world he never made.

"Last night you said when I woke up it would be tomorrow. Now you tell me it's today!"

Tip to a New Grandma

Do you remember how you struggled trying to stretch nipples over narrow-neck bottles? How the darn things sometimes slipped and spilled the milk? Do you remember how you watched the nipple to see that it did not collapse and prevent baby from getting its food?

Modern Evenflo Nursers with their handy nipple, bottle, cap all-in-one abolish these nuisances. Air valves in Evenflo Nipples prevent collapsing. Babies finish bottles better and get more benefit from food. Your busy daughter will welcome some Evenflo Units. In spite of increasing production, the great demand for these popular nursers makes it hard to keep the stores adequately supplied.

Evenflo
"America's 25c
Most Popular Nurser"

Sterilized Q-TIPS
Reg. U. S. Pat. Off.
25¢ 45¢ Double-Tipped SWABSTICKS
PKG. AT ALL STORES Q-TIPS, INC., N. Y.

Baby is SAFE in a BABEE-TEND Safety Chair

Don't let th happ

Can't be tipped over. Con into play table. Used for y Ideal gift. Sold only dire you, NOT IN STORES Co Phone Book for local age or write us for FREE fo

CERTIFIED AND COMMENDED BY PARENTS' MAGAZINE

THE BABEE-TENDA CORPORATIO
651 Finance Bldg., Cleveland 15, OH
In Canada Write: 347 Bay St., Toronto 1, Ont.

MATERNITY DRESSES!

Spring Styles

Smart, youthful styles for Morning, Street, or Afternoon. Also Maternity Corsets & Lingerie. CRAWFORD'S-Dept. A-729 Balt. Ave., Kansas City

Just feel a CHIX Gauze Diaper! y're softer, lighter, gentler...never fe or rub baby's tender skin.

HERE'S WHY...

nlarged view shows why CHIX Gauze pers are so soft! Finest surgical cot- in special CHIX weave makes them and feather-soft.

ved . . . Independent laboratory s show CHIX Gauze Diapers to be er-absorbent—extra soft. They're to wash—quick to dry. The differ- e is in the weave!

p your baby more fortable in these er diapers. Chic- e Sales Corpora- . 47 Worth Street, York 13, N. Y.

Chix
GAUZE DIAPERS

Extra Soft
Super Absorbent

uicker Toilet Training

Lil' Tyke
TRAINER

- Promotes quicker, comfort
- Affords baby relaxation
- Holds
- Light weight molded plast
- Fits all
- At leading

TOL. HIGGINBOTH

didn't want mother to know we had tied

"I gave him away," mother said.

"Gave him away!" I yelled. "You can't give him away. He isn't yours."

"Well, I did," mother said. "To a man."

Pud cried after school. I felt like it. He was crying when father got home.

"You gave the dog to a man?" father said. "What man?"

"Just a man," mother said. "A man who came around."

"Humph," father said. "Another tramp! Good heavens, woman! You befriend every beggar that comes to the door. You invite them in to eat. But you can't befriend a little homeless dog."

"The man was homeless too," mother said.

"You gave that dog to a homeless man!" father said.

"Now they'll have each other," mother said.

"The dog went with him?" father said.

"On a rope," mother said. "The boys had put a rope on him. He was crying. He didn't want to be tied up. The man was glad to get him."

"A tramp!" father said. He curled his mouth up. "He didn't want him. He'll sell him. That was a valuable dog." Father quit eating his dessert. He shoved it away.

"You make me tired," mother said. "All of you." She got up and started to clear the table. "You think more of a little tramp dog than you do of me. You don't care about my peace of mind. You don't care about my safety."

"No," father said. "We let you invite tramps in."

"I know a good tramp when I see one," mother said. "I don't invite bad ones in."

"Well, I know a good dog when I see one," father said.

"There are no good dogs," mother said, "as far as I'm concerned. That dog would have gone for me. They all do."

Just then we heard it. "Yow-oo-oo-oo!"

"He's back!" I yelled.

Father's eyes got sparkly and glad. He opened the front door. The dog came tumbling in. He jumped all over us. Mother edged around the wall. She ran upstairs and slammed the door.

We did the dishes. We fed the dog. Oh, he was a swell dog! He ran all over the kitchen smelling it. He ate everything we gave him. He licked our faces. He lay down under the stove when father told him to. He was a good dog. Anyone could see he was a [illegible] dog.

"I wish and wish and wish and wish we could keep him," Pud said.

"Oh, we've got to keep him," I said.

"We ought to be able to figure it out," father said. "He's a swell dog," he said. He sat down on the floor and patted Rosie's head. Rosie put his head in father's lap. "Good fellow," father said. "He's made up his mind," father said. "He intends to stay."

"I've made up my mind too," Pud said.

"I guess we all have except mother," father said. "What we have to do," he said, "is show her she needs a dog."

"Look," he said to mother in the morning. "Boys ought to have a dog. I couldn't ever have one when I was a kid. I always thought when I grew up I would. It really means a lot to us. Couldn't you try to get over being [illegible]?"

"How?" mother said, cold.

"Let him stay in for a few days. Just give it a try. I know he won't hurt you. He likes you."

"Does he?" mother said.

"Pat his head," father said. "See how good it makes you feel." He got a little rope and brought Rosie into the kitchen. He held him. "Stand still, boy," he said. Rosie stood real still. "Now," father said to mother, "pat him."

"On the [illegible]," father said.

"Of course, on his head," father said.

Mother did, just a couple of little pats. Rosie jumped at her. He wagged his tail.

MOTHER . . .
when your little one catches cold...

Warming, soothing Vicks VapoRub is the best-known home remedy you can use to relieve distress of children's colds. Rub it well on throat, chest and back at bedtime. Even as you rub it on, its wonderful relief-bringing action starts right to work—two ways at once . . .

DO THIS
at bedtime . . .

This special penetrating-stimulating action keeps working for hours during the night to relieve distress while the child sleeps. Often by morning most misery of the cold is gone. Try it! Get the one and only Vicks VapoRub . . . because remember . . .

only VapoRub gives you this special penetrating-stimulating action.

IT WORKS FOR HOURS
to relieve distress . . . bring comforting relief while the child sleeps!

Say...here's the low-down on Flu season rules

Medical School tests prove flu virus can dry up, live in house dust...still cause flu 6 WEEKS LATER! But "Lysol" kills flu virus quickly on contact! So, use "Lysol."

BABY: See how tough that flu bug is? See what y'gotta do?

YOU: You mean, if a flu-infected person sneezes in our house...

BABY: Yep! That sneeze can scatter the flu bug as far as 12 feet... to live in house dust. Then if this bug is stirred up, even 6 weeks later, it can still cause flu! That's a scientific fact, Lady.

YOU: I must keep my rooms spotlessly clean, then!

BABY: Sure—and disinfected too. That's your Flu Season Rule: Add "Lysol" brand disinfectant to the water—every time you clean! To kill that wicked old flu bug. See?

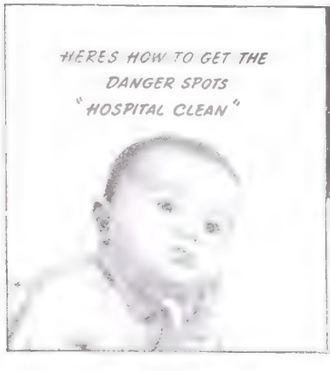
YOU: "Lysol" can kill the flu bug?

BABY: Right! That's another proved scientific fact. So, Lady, use "Lysol" when cleaning floors, shelves . . . all places where dust collects.

YOU: Sold! It's "Lysol" for kitchen, bathroom, baby's room...my whole house . . . every time I clean!

The "bug" that causes flu is a virus (an organism much smaller even than a germ), visible only under the new electronic microscope.

MORAL: Every single time you clean... disinfect with "Lysol" Brand Disinfectant REG U.S. PAT. OFF.



Clean all floors with "Lysol". Quick, easy! Add 2½ tablespoons to each gallon of water. Keep walls, furniture hygienically clean, too!

Clean the toilet with "Lysol". Powerful germ-killer. Helps remove stains. Deodorizes while you clean. Helps keep bathroom more sanitary.

Wipe the telephone, stair rail, doorknobs frequently with "Lysol", especially in flu time, to help protect your family's health.

More women use "Lysol" than any other household disinfectant. Don't ever risk being without it!

Product of Lehn & Fink Products Corp.

For FREE booklet on fighting disease germs, send postcard or letter to Dept. G-47, Lehn & Fink, 683 Fifth Avenue, New York 22, N. Y.

(Continued from Page 155)

ried to lick her hand. Mother screamed. ran into the dining room and shut the

Get him out!" she screamed. "Get him

No," father said. "He was being friendly. ," he said. "Does he bite me?"

'm different," mother said, peeking ugh the door. "I mean it. He's got to d sat down in the corner on the floor. ut his head down and cried. He cried cried. I could hardly stand to listen. I d hardly keep from crying, too, listen-guess Pud will maybe die if he has to up Rosie," I said. I knew I would.

other looked up at me quick. She looked at Pud. She looked like she might cry Didn't you ever want something you dn't have?" father said. "We'll help " He was begging her. "Give him a y-day trial. Just a month. If he still s you I promise we'll get rid of him."

d was looking up at mother with every- in his eyes. Everything. If Pud looked that and asked me for even my sheath I'd give it to him.

other put her arms around Pud. "You I don't want to be mean," she said. try. Thirty days," she said.

sie was in! For a thirty-day trial. He to make good. He had to.

What we have to do," father said when ook Rosie for a walk, "is show mother eeds a dog. Show her a dog is important a—a ——" pecial," Pud said.

Yeah," father said. "Yeah—like we've o teach him things."

ure," I said. "We could teach him to in the newspaper."

nd catch mice," Pud said.

nd wipe his feet," I said.

Yes," father said. "Those are all good s. But things like keeping other dogs f the flower beds, too, and barking at gers and ——"

nd saving our life if we fall in the ," Pud said.

Well," father said, "better not fall in. Rosie's a smart dog. We'll teach him a f things. And be careful he doesn't get other's way. Be careful he doesn't do hing wrong. Be careful he doesn't scare That would never do."

e tried hard to teach Rosie. For a little e it went pretty good. The weather was so he could be out-of-doors when we n't home. Mother was getting a little used to him. She'd save some good scraps for him. She bought some funny-looking meat and cooked some stew for him. On a chilly night she got down an old coat and told us to give it to him in the back hall.

The whole trouble was, Rosie was too friendly. He loved everybody. He loved everything.

Chasing squirrels is a helpful thing for a dog to do. Squirrels eat our awnings, so mother does not like them. We taught Rosie to chase squirrels when we said, "Sick 'em." But Rosie just played games with the squirrels. He'd chase a squirrel to a tree and then stand there smiling at it while it ran up the trunk and sat on a branch and scolded him. Then when the squirrel came down, Rosie would run and let the squirrel chase him.

We found a dead mouse down by the ravine. We brought it up and gave it to Rosie. We thought we'd call mother and tell her Rosie'd killed it. That would show her how useful he was. But Rosie picked up the mouse and went tearing into the house after us. He took it into the living room and put it down by mother's feet. It didn't make a hit with mother.

"He'll be a swell watchdog," we'd tell mother, and when someone would come to the door, we'd get down beside Rosie and growl and bark to show him how, but he'd only lick our faces and wag his tail. And when we opened the door, he'd fall all over whoever it was. He greeted everyone. If a man came up to leave a slip on the door telling us what was on sale at the paint and varnish company that Saturday, Rosie was so happy about the whole thing he almost knocked the man over giving him a welcome. When mother's best friend came, Rosie yelped and barked and jumped so that she ran back to her car, afraid he would eat her up.

But when the doorbell rang late one night and father wasn't home, Rosie just lay on the rug and wagged his tail a little bit. Mother was a little afraid to open the door.

"Come on, Rosie," she kept saying, wanting him there for protection. But Rosie just opened one eye and looked at her and went back to sleep.

It was a man, whose car was broken down, wanting to use our telephone. Mother let him.

"You hold Rosie," she said, "so he won't go for him." But the man could see it was just put on. Rosie was too sleepy to notice him.

When we tried to teach Rosie to wipe his feet, he got the idea quick, but he didn't wipe them on the mat. He wiped them in the mud where there wasn't any lawn yet

"Would it be all right if I express an opinion, provided the opinion were not my own?"

No tears, but joy in every moment of living . . .

I dream of her growing up happy . . . able to laugh easily . . . certain of being loved.

KNOWING SHE WILL HAVE A GREATER CHANCE OF HAPPINESS

if she develops beautifully from birth,
I will provide the special care she needs now to build physical assets which will mean so much to her throughout her life . . . sound teeth, a well-shaped head, a fine, full chest, a strong back, straight legs . . .

HELP HER GROW UP STRAIGHT-LIMBED AND SOUND by providing the essential factor Vitamin D, every day. Physicians will tell you that, in addition to her food, your baby needs Vitamin D to utilize strengthening minerals for her bones and teeth. Many mothers rely on Squibb Cod Liver Oil as a dependable Vitamin D source. Get Squibb Cod Liver Oil for your baby today!

OF THOSE FIRST 6 TEETH SHE CUTS, how many will decay? How many will threaten the soundness of her permanent teeth which are forming now below the gum? Be sure to give plenty of Vitamin D which, says an authority recently, has a "striking effect" in influencing the prevention of tooth decay. Get Squibb Cod Liver Oil for your baby today.

6 teeth at about 1 year

SQUIBB cod liver oil

a name you can trust

Weather-Bird Shoes

FOR BOYS AND GIRLS

Win in all kinds of weather

Ordinary shoes are easy prey for the weather elements—Dusty Dry, Mucker Mud, Ruffy Rain and Husky Heat. But, these popular Weather-Bird Shoes are protected from the weather by the 5 special Weatherized features!

PARENTS . . . win the battle of the budget, too, with stylish, long-wearing Weather-Birds! They have extra reinforcements in vital parts, and special fitting qualities. Demand Weather-Bird Shoes . . . because "it takes real leather to stand the weather."

Weather-Bird Shoes Peters Diamond Brand

FOR BOYS AND GIRLS ARE Weatherized

Look in Phone Directory or Write Us for Your Dealer's Name

PETERS, DIVISION OF INTERNATIONAL SHOE COMPANY, ST. LOUIS 3, MO.

and came bounding in, leaving tracks every place.

He went racing all around in the yard, where we had planted grass seed, and he left big footmarks. He made friends with every dog that passed down our street, bringing them back into our yard to tussle with them in the mud. He had a couple of friends who were St. Bernards and they left regular holes when they walked in the soft earth. The three of them were wrestling one day and broke down a shrub.

"It's a meeting place for all the dogs in this end of town now," mother said to father. It didn't sound much like Rosie was selling himself.

"He's hopeless," father said when we took him for a walk that night. "He does all the wrong things."

"But I like him anyway," Pud said.

"Sure," father said. "You don't stop loving someone because they're naughty. Not when you love them already. But it doesn't make someone like mother start loving them. But I tell you what, Pud," he said. "Maybe we can get a dog someday that's already trained, an old dog."

"Who wants an old dog?" Pud said. "I want Rosie."

"Well, there's still a little while," father said. "Maybe he'll get better."

He didn't get better. But what really decided mother was the day Pud came in the back door and held it open and called Rosie. It was raining and mother let us take Rosie into the back hall after school when we were there to take care of him. We were trying to teach him that the back hall was his place and he was not to go in the living room. Pud held the door and called and in came Rosie with his two pals, the St. Bernards. We had thought Rosie was getting pretty good about staying in the back hall where he belonged, but of course today he had company. Maybe he wanted to show them the house.

They all three bounded into the living room where mother was sewing. They ran all around with their muddy feet. They jumped up on chairs and knocked over a small table and broke a lamp. Mother was standing up on a chair screaming at them. Screaming at us.

We came and got them all out. We set up the table. Mother got down and picked up her sewing.

"That does it," she said. "That does it. Tomorrow that hound gets out of here. He's dumber than I thought he was. He's dumber than I thought a dog could be."

THERE was no use arguing. He had had a thirty-day trial. Anyway, twenty-nine. Tomorrow would be thirty. We couldn't teach him any better in one more day. He hadn't learned anything at all. He couldn't do one thing he couldn't do when we got him. He did everything wrong. He was dirty and a nuisance. And we loved him to pieces.

"There's no use crying," father said. "We made a bargain. We'll stick by it, like men, won't we, Pud?"

"I guess so," Pud said.

"We'll see that he gets a good home," father said. "We'll find out where he goes and we can go to see him there. You can go with me to take him down to the dog pound tomorrow," he said.

Tomorrow was Saturday. The sun was shining. The wind was blowing softly. It was a very sad day. Pud and I sat around on the front steps with our arms around Rosie. We didn't really see how we could ever stand it. Rosie was happy. He licked our faces. He licked tears off Pud's cheeks.

A CAR stopped out in front. A man got out and came up the driveway. "Got anything you want hauled away?" he yelled at us.

"I'll ask mother," I said.

I called to her.

Rosie went leaping out to welcome the junkman. He jumped up on him and tried to lick his face. He yelped and wagged his tail.

The junkman pushed him off.

"Get off!" he yelled at him.

But Rosie came right back. Finally the man lifted his foot and gave Rosie an awful kick. It sent him flying across the walk to the corner of the step. He lay there and whined a little bit.

Mother had come to the door. She was as white as a sheet and her eyes were like fire. "You—you beast!" she said to the man.

"He went for me," the man said. "I had to protect myself."

If mother's eyes had been loaded the man would have dropped dead with two bullet holes right through him. "A little puppy," mother said. "A sweet little puppy. Trying to lick your hand." She came out the door and knelt down by Rosie. "He's hurt," she said. "Come on," she said to Rosie; "come on, get up," she said like she talks to us when we are sick.

Rosie tried to get up, but he couldn't. His leg was hurt. He lay down and whined.

Mother put out her hand and felt of his leg. You wouldn't ever know she was afraid. She patted his head. "I won't hurt you," she kept saying to Rosie. She kept feeling of his leg. The man had gone away. "I think it's broken," mother said to me. "Go in and call father and tell him Rosie's hurt. Ask him what I should do."

She sat right down beside Rosie and put his head on her knee.

"Poor Rosie," she kept saying. "Poor, poor Rosie. We'll fix it up, Rosie."

Rosie stopped crying. He licked mother's hand.

I flew to the phone. "Rosie's done it," I said to father.

"Done what?" father said.

"Sold himself," I said.

Father let out a yip over the phone. "He has?" he said. "He showed mother she needed him?"

"Oh, no," I said. "He showed her he needed her. He broke a leg. What should we do? Mother's holding him."

"Mother's holding him?" father said.

"Yah," I said. "In her lap."

"Well, hap—py day," father said. "And I'll be dogged. I learn about women from him."

"What?" I said. "What should I tell mother to do?"

"Tell her to keep on holding him," father said. "I'll be right out."

★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★

Lullaby

BY MARK VAN DOREN

Sleep, grandmother, sleep.
The rocking chair is ready to go,
And harness bells are hung in a row
As once you heard them
In soft snow.

Sleep, grandmother, sleep.
Your sons are little and silly again;
Your daughters are five and seven and ten;
And he that is gone
Was not gone then.

Sleep, grandmother, sleep.
The sleigh comes out of the winter woods
And carries you all in boots and hoods
To town for candy
And white dress goods.

Sleep, grandmother, sleep.
The rocking chair is old as the floor,
But there he nods, at the noisy door,
For you to be dancing
One dance more.

★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★

Braces Away"

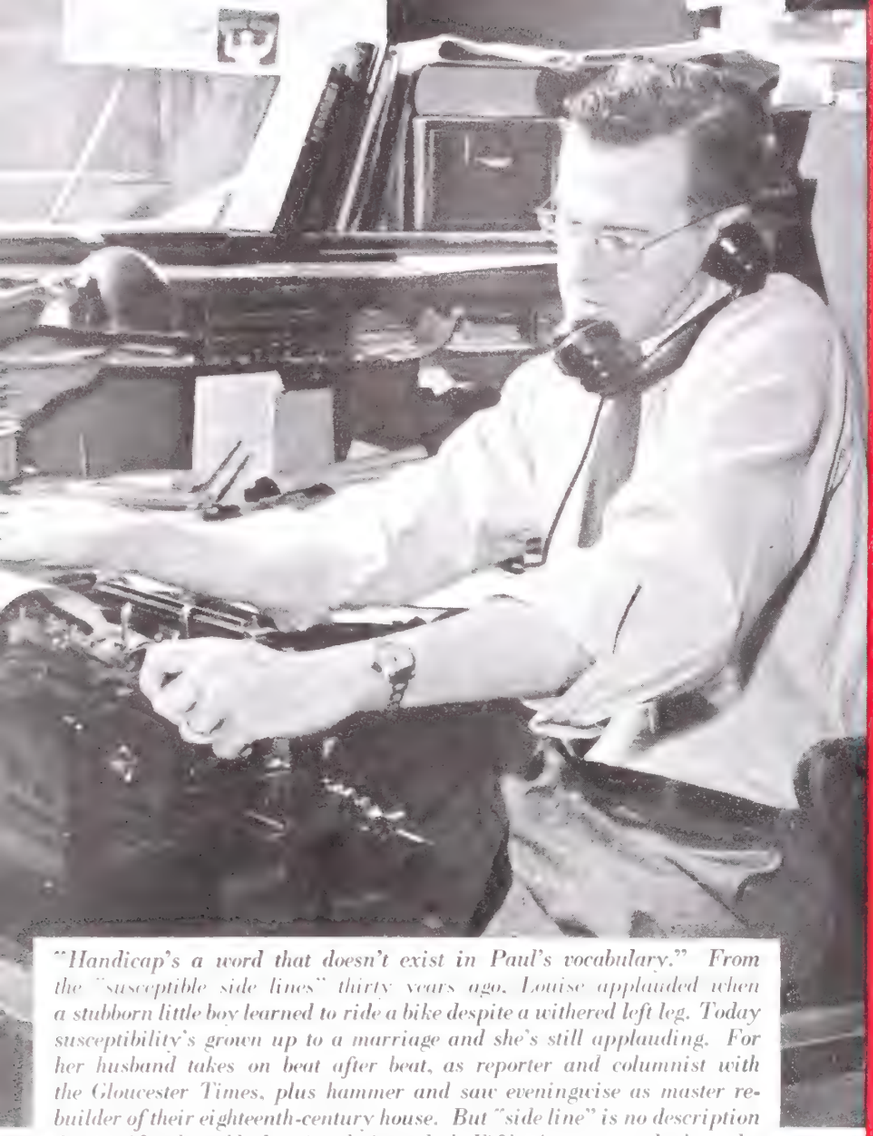
A POLIO VICTIM TURNS A BAD BREAK INTO THE BEST OF GOOD FORTUNE ★ BY J. C. FURNAS

THIRTY-SEVEN years ago brutal tragedy assailed a certain household in Boston, Massachusetts. Mrs. Estelle Kenyon's older baby boy, the one with the comically determined chin and the inquisitive air, had been mildly ailing a few days—just a touch of fever and loss of appetite. After the trouble went away, his mother became suddenly aware that he could not move his legs.

On the basis of knowledge of infantile paralysis then available, nothing had to say that the boy would never walk again. The start he had made on baby-style walking was lost forever, and Mrs. Kenyon would just have to learn not to fill up with strangling tears when she saw little Paul reverted to crawling on the floor alongside his three-months-old brother. But medicine could not know how Estelle Kenyon's devotion and Paul Kenyon's eager pluck could obviate its verdict.

Before Paul was well into long pants this mother-and-son team had his handicap licked to an abject frazzle. During the past seventeen years the team has been notably strengthened by a copper-haired girl named Louise whom Paul married, and gradually reinforced by two boy children.

First it was a crutch and then a brace—but today Paul Kenyon lives full speed ahead with his designer-wife and family.



"Handicap's a word that doesn't exist in Paul's vocabulary." From the "susceptible side lines" thirty years ago, Louise applauded when a stubborn little boy learned to ride a bike despite a withered left leg. Today susceptibility's grown up to a marriage and she's still applauding. For her husband takes on beat after beat, as reporter and columnist with the Gloucester Times, plus hammer and saw eveningwise as master rebuilder of their eighteenth-century house. But "side line" is no description for a wife whose block-print designs deck Fifth Avenue—and whose domestic know-how is always on tap for super apple pies or the super parties that crowd the Kenyon ménage with friends from "eight to eighty."

Nowadays, when Paul's mother visits the young folks at their place in Annisquam, Massachusetts, part of the ancient fish-salt-granite-and-summerfolks town of Gloucester, she finds her boy a zealously active newspaperman on the Gloucester Times, covering beats that would make a metropolitan reporter fold under sheer overwork, driving a car with no hint of clumsiness, sailing a boat, doing arduous chores round the place, even grown fond of walking for its own sake. True, his gait differs from yours and mine. But it gets over ground in a style so efficient that the stranger forgets any idiosyncrasies.

Refusal to be licked paid off early. Setting her boy on one end of the kitchen table, it was mother who made the crucial experiment. She stood at the other end and called him coaxingly; little Paul struggled to his feet and stumbled the length of the table into her arms, startled by his newly restored freedom into shouting and laughing as his mother cried, happy tears this time.

From then on progress was long-drawn-out but definite via casts and braces successively abandoned. This observant and conclusion-drawing youngster studied a one-legged man who often rode a bicycle past the house and determined that he, too, could manage it. So he did, learning on a girl's wheel without the hampering crossbar. Louise says the regardless nonchalance with which he snubbed his handicap and rode that bicycle was what first made her look more closely at him.

Later still, learning that some post-World War I cars were being made with clutch and brake on one pedal, he gave himself no rest until he found a jalopy built that way. One of Louise Tomlinson's brothers—she is one of eight—helped him tinker the jalopy when it needed it, which was often. Consequent frequent visits to the Tomlinson home in Newton, Massachusetts, just outside Boston, furthered his growing acquaintance with the second Tomlinson girl.

Paul Kenyon now wrangles his '37 Plymouth without even needing clutch and brake on the same pedal, performing immense but smooth dexterities with the hand throttle and one foot juggling two pedals. His mother saw to it that he early learned to swim and canoe as body developers consonant with his trouble, and went to agonizing expense for the best specially built-up shoes to compensate for his left leg's being permanently an inch and a half shorter. In his teens Paul made up his mind to wear regular shoes, trusting for compensation to his own skill in eccentric locomotion. The key to it all seems to have been asking nothing special from anybody, neither God, man nor shoemaker.

ANY expense was agonizing back then. Paul's father left the family scene early and Estelle Kenyon reared her boys on what her talent for music would earn. Thirty-six years she has been organist at a Unitarian church in Waltham, Massachusetts; she used to supplement that by a little music teaching, by playing in inconspicuous ladies' orchestras and later, for seven years, by a ten-hour-a-day stint of pounding the piano in a small movie theater, craning up at the screen to make sure that a few bars of the Light Cavalry Overture duly coincided with the hero's leaping on his steed and galloping off.

Lack of supervision for the boys, school age by then, was always on her mind while she was piano thumping. In illness and other emergencies, at least, her sister could be counted on to rally round, or sometimes a roomer obliged. Flittings from one Boston suburb to another were frequent. But finally, aided by two small family legacies, Estelle Kenyon managed to buy her present house in Newtonville. She went through it all scatheless. Her shy, gentle voice now carries no trace of whine or anger as she harks back. Like her boy, she is grit clear through.

Grit can have fun in it, as Paul's present life testifies. A familiar early-Sunday sight on certain Annisquam beaches is the Kenyons—Paul; "Weezie," as they all call Louise; Paul, Jr., now close to six feet and wearing seagoing dungarees by preference; smaller Peter, with his mother's red hair and a mind of his own; Snooper, the tan lady dachshund, and Butchie, her demure black son—all out gathering driftwood. They like the way the voracious, parti-colored flames devour it on their library hearth; it sometimes proves good timber—Paul built his basement workbench out of some gratifyingly solid oak that a storm cast ashore awhile back; and they approve the resulting saving in the annual cost of cordwood for their eight fireplaces. They also relish the sport of seeking treasure-trove with slick wet sand and odorous seaweed underfoot and the bay breeze in their six faces.

The Kenyons are experts at making do. Their incinerator, which doubles as outdoor fireplace when they grill hot dogs on summer evenings, consists of a chimneylike gap in the frowning outcrop of Cape Ann granite in their back lot, next to the vegetable garden from which comes two thirds of the provender that Louise annually cans. They have yet to build a garage, so Paul parks the car in the bitterest weather—and Cape Ann winters are bitter—by the edge of the side road, where, he explains triumphantly, a hundred yards of steep slope get the cold motor turning over without asking the battery to overwork.

A tugboat for sailing the seven seas and a wife "who can do without modern conveniences." Young Pete wants his future on the water, says he'd probably "have gone in for piracy" if he'd lived in skull-and-crossbones days. As is, the Kenyons' back yard is a minor shipyard. Kayaks and yachts materialize from the most unlikely looking lumber, and Louise can tell from the sound of her men's hammers when a nautical experiment is under way. At the whiff of a thaw, dachshunds and boys combine forces for a shore picnic. "I'm never one to object," says Louise. "Beachcombing's definitely easy on the housewife."

...py for the daily column"—odd jobs ...und the house turn up in the paper.

"Beauty with beast" is family's title for Paul, Jr., and decrepit power mower.

...e's personal boat has a ...

A New England winter without a sleigh ... Christmas without mince pie.

"Our cellar's the world's eighth wonder—most of the house has been built there." Louise owes fireplace shelves, kitchen work unit and a most antique-looking cupboard to the two Pauls' mechanical enterprise. But Pete's ideas do credit to Buck Rogers. Stray meat choppers and a salvaged roll-top desk have a way of adding up to a racing car, while orange crates on roller skates keep the firewood coming. "When he tries the air—we'll try not to worry."

Driftwood gets converted to treasure-trove on the workshop assembly line.

"Snacktime is any time Pete's in the kitchen—he's official menu tester."

Pete's piano technique is hunt 'er and peck, even with grandma to keep time.

Paul burns the week-end oil for a stin with his children's adventure novel

Visitors have to dodge the ball when

A stiff breeze and a summer day and

"When I've a problem, I head for the Gloucester readers like salt in the

Their house itself is a permanent and beloved make-do. They were crazy to buy it, in both senses. It has all the rich character appropriate to a Yankee farm cottage built part in 1689, part a couple of generations later, and sits cozily in the heart of Annisquam across from the village church, with a knoll fending off the worst of the winter storms. Big horse chestnuts and a couple of black locusts, ably assisted by a reverend lilac so huge as to deserve the name of tree, further shield it. But, when purchased, it had been let so run down that the floors were mostly on a dizzy slant and a whole side wall, where the kitchen now is, had pitifully collapsed. Such details kept the place within the modest Kenyon means. But they have also kept the Kenyons busy ever since redoing it with taste, skill and undiscourageable persistence.

They tried the first winter without modern heating. By now they can laugh in recalling how they huddled over the fireplace wearing all available wraps and observing with astonishment that, no matter how impressively the flames roared up the flue, they could still see each breath with painful distinctness. They never dared bring a thermometer into the house. One night when Louise exhausted the stove's hot-water tank for a bath, as the simplest way to get at least temporarily warm, the pipes immediately froze and a burst of water from a cracked joint flooded the place, practically freezing as it spouted. That, too, was the winter the boys chose to have measles. Somehow pneumonia was fended off, and next year central heating was installed.

Decently warmed for the first time in its long life, the old house opened up like an accordion, cracks appearing in all directions. The Kenyons calked some of the worst and concluded that the drafts from the rest would make window opening unnecessary—a point still holding good. Dust does accumulate in some of the remaining floor cracks—which, says Louise, would worry a demon housekeeper, but fails to bother her. This Yankee girl who holds her head so gracefully high to match the regality of her crown of red-gold—and naturally waving—hair has an eminent sense of first things first.

The Kenyons, in fact, treat their house like one of the family, valued for its own sake and entitled to some eccentricities, the charm of its low beams and wide-planked interior making up for occasional inconveniences—just as Butchie's ingratiating sleekness consoled Louise for his having recently spent a happy afternoon chewing up the only hat she ever found that her menfolks would not make fun of. Young Peter was even more philosophical when Butchie gnawed off the front half of his piano-exercise book. The young master is so far quite normally bored with his piano lessons.

Louise learned make-do the hard way. At the bottom of the depression, successive salary cuts from a top of $31 a week decided Paul to quit his job in the business office of the Boston Transcript, then on its last elderly legs. Long possessed of a hankering to write, he had persuaded a Transcript columnist to let him throw an occasional column that went over well. So, jobless now, he took the family for an experiment in the simple and literary life, first in the Tomlinson summer cottage on Cape Ann, then in a $12-a-month house near by for the winter. Low rent was indicated—$15 a week was the most they dared peel off the family savings account while Paul got into production.

PITHILY the Kenyons now tell you that due to the simplicity of planning on so small an amount, that was the only time they ever succeeded in making a budget work. It did work. Louise learned to bake her own bread—she still does—and food prices were then at rock bottom. Particularly, fish in this fishing capital was down to a few cents a pound. Characteristically, in spite of that experience, the Kenyons are still every bit as fond of sea food as are most Yankees.

Paul did sell a few bits of things to magazines, but his total take of around $200 was not encouraging. Playing a hunch when funds had just about disappeared, he prospected the Gloucester Times for a job and found just the news-staff opening he wanted—at $15 a week.

"A glow that lasts all winter"—that's the Kenyons' contribution to the Gloucester summer folk. To each other, it's a glow that lasts all year. Remembering happy hours popping corn, or roasting apples at an open fire, city dwellers wish the whole world were a small town.

Paul, Sr., has known how to win a decision ever since his bout with polio. And in a Y pool or ocean breakers, water's his element. For wrestling matches, marine style, boys put their odds on pop's team.

"Our house is just like a member of the family—always popping at the seams." Six years back, tipsy floor boards, buckled walls and lack of heat took some major reconversion. But now, six inmates all agree that results are worth the trials of the "awkward age."

HOW THE KENYONS SPEND THEIR MONEY

Food (Louise figures close to $95.00 a month)	$1100.00
Clothing (Louise makes most of own)	200.00
Furniture (gradual purchase of old pieces for refurnishing—yearly average)	75.00
Taxes (real estate, income, etc., and interest on mortgage)	450.00
Electricity and cooking gas ($11.00 a month)	132.00
Heating (anthracite for furnace, oil for kitchen stove which heats water)	225.00
Laundry (shirts, linen, some textiles for prints)	150.00
Doctors and dentists	100.00
Recreation ($33.00 yacht-club dues, $30.00 boat upkeep, misc.)	75.00
Contributions	50.00
Telephone	150.00
Car running, upkeep, registration, insurance	150.00
Newspapers and magazines	25.00
Boys' cash (Paul's allowance for school, Peter's music lessons)	125.00
	$3007.00

The Kenyons' average intake over the last three years from Paul's pay, less deductions, and Louise's earnings has been around $4000. Savings are represented by steady small investments in improvement of house and reduction of mortgage as cash is available.

The pay envelope has been on the upbeat ever since, and he enjoys himself immensely covering fire, police and school news and writing a daily column, called The Lookout, dealing with practically anything in a nice dry style. For ten years he also ran the society page. Just to make sure he keeps busy, he is head over ears in local community activity, such as the Leonard Club, the men's civic organization, the board of trustees of the Open Church Association, which has headquarters in Gloucester, birthplace of its founder, Roger W. Babson, the school committee, the preacher-picking committee of the village church, and half a dozen other things. During the early part of the war, when the Coast Guard formed local boating civilians into patrols, Paul Kenyon, the boy who would never walk again, was standing a regular all-night trick at sea on the same footing as everybody else.

Louise contributes solidly to family income through that most convenient thing, a paying hobby. As a girl she went to art school and spent months in New York and Boston dress shops learning how women's clothes are put together—which two trainings combined nicely when she joined the Folly Cove Industries, a group of Cape Ann women headed by Mrs. Virginia Demetrios, wife of the sculptor, George Demetrios, to design and hand-print textiles of great fame.

THE outfit is strictly co-operative. Designs approved by member juries are manufactured at home with hand presses—time was when Folly Covers got proper pressure by trampling the material with their bare feet—for sale through the organization. Proceeds go to individual designers who periodically return a percentage to the organization to cover overhead. Last year New York's Lord & Taylor's bought a number of Louise's designs outright and used them in big window displays. Paul and Louise blew themselves to plane seats to New York and spent a fine day featured by much sidewalk study of Lord & Taylor's Fifth Avenue windows.

The brilliant screen in the Kenyon living room, the wallpaper in the house's small ell apartment that was rented during the war to a friend, the materials that upholster some of the old chairs that they buy, are all home testimony to the composition and color sense of the lady of the house. Applying her own designs to informal dressmaking, Louise has three Gloucester housewives steadily working for her, making items for Boston stores that are good customers of hers. It keeps her busy, since her only household help consists of a cleaning woman once a week. But her workroom, picturesquely full of the blocky iron press, linoleum blocks and bolts of bright fabrics, is next to the kitchen and she can alternately (Continued on Page 181)

HER BABY CHARM STILL CHARMS 'EM!

BABY EVELYN McBRIDE was a cute, cuddly baby. She lived in Wilmington, Delaware and wowed folks for miles around with her laughing eyes and rosy-red-apple cheeks. Evelyn's baby complexion was cleansed with pure, mild Ivory Soap. How sane! Most doctors advise Ivory for babies' delicate skin. Then all other family members use it. And Evelyn knows. Baby's pinkly soft complexion are important for girls at any age.

EVELYN McBRIDE, FAMOUS COVER GIRL: That Ivory Look helped [illegible] one of the country's most popular models. She will tell you, "Use a soap that's pure and mild enough for baby. [illegible] use it [illegible]." If you have been careless about your complexion, why not start using baby's pure mild Ivory regularly? In just one week you can have a smoother, silkier, more radiant complexion. You can have That Ivory Look.

COMMENTS ABOUT EVELYN'S SKIN were lavishly mingled with the [illegible] modeled in local fashion shows. Her radiant complexion (pampered with gentle Ivory) helped take her to the top in a hurry. Evelyn says, "From my own experience I know that a soap that's pure and mild enough for baby's skin is right for my skin, too."

More doctors advise Ivory than any other soap!

99 44/100% PURE IT FLOATS

Don't let housework be unfair to your hands

Yes...housework can leave your hands rough, red, and dry as dust. But... don't blame the housework... blame yourself for not taking care of your hands. Pacquins helps keep your hands looking smoother and whiter in spite of daily housework.

Doctors and nurses use Pacquins

Doctors and nurses scrub their hands in hot soapy water from thirty to forty times a day. Now, that kind of treatment is harder on hands than housework. Pacquins was first made especially for doctors and nurses. If Pacquins can help their roughly treated hands... just imagine how much it can do for your hands!

Pacquins

HAND CREAM

Creamy-smooth, fragrant ...not sticky not greasy. More hands use Pacquins than any other hand cream in the world

AT ANY DRUG, DEPARTMENT, OR TEN-CENT STORE

DON'T LET IT GET YOU DOWN

By Leslie B. Hohman, M.D.
Visiting Professor of Psychiatry, Duke University

WILLINGNESS to help others by telling the story of his conquest of a handicap comes easy to Paul Kenyon, the successful Gloucester, Massachusetts, thirty-seven-year-old newspaper reporter. But the telling itself was difficult even with the help of his busy, active, loving, artist-textile designer, money-earning wife. The truth is that neither of them thinks Paul is handicapped or ever has been. True, infantile paralysis wasted the muscles of his legs and paralyzed some of them, but that only made Paul different—not different in any crippling sense, but different in the way he had to learn to do what he wanted to do. So thoroughly does Paul believe this that he looks puzzled and confused whenever the word "handicap" or "crippled" is mentioned. He's not sensitive or hurt; he simply doesn't understand.

"I knew I couldn't do a fourteen-mile hike to advance as a boy scout and I had to be excused from drill, but I did my hitch in a canoe. I couldn't fight the same as other boys, but I learned early to fight my way out if I got into a scrap. My mother saw to that: 'If you get into fights, that's your business. Get yourself out.'"

The training for this way of looking at life and his difference began early in Paul's life—so early that he remembers none of the pain and terror his mother felt when paralysis struck the two-year-old Paul. But the pain and agony were not communicated to the lad—only her indomitable will and determination that he would walk again and that he could learn to do what he wanted. The mother invoked all medical aid and used her religion to keep her hopefulness at its highest, but she never suggested anything but success in learning. The child was so thoroughly indoctrinated in the will to learn successfully that he can no longer remember a time that this was not his own attitude. As you look at his accomplishments in using his weak, paralyzed legs, one marvels at his ability to have learned bicycle riding, automobile driving without a special car, taking long hikes in ordinary shoes—not recommended orthopedic ones—canoeing, house remodeling, sailing and everything anybody else, in a busy, active, New England fishing village, loves to do.

The story of Paul Kenyon's psychological attitude toward his partially paralyzed legs is a particularly important story to tell at this time because it should be so helpful to our war-wounded who have so recently come back to be plunged into a world where handicap will receive all possible Government aid, but where successful living can be accomplished only by the man himself. Pensions and rehabilitation training will open the path to success, but the successful taking one's place in the world of accomplishment and happy living can come only with hopeful, determined resolution to learn to do the things a man wants to do.

I am going to set down a list of rules for success in handicap—based on a review of Paul's training and experiences. My first advice is to the families of the Pauls of the world—the children and the adults who are stricken in body or mind or nerves.

1. Accept no limit to your child's (be he infant or man) ability to learn new ways of accomplishment, except so far as sound medical advice tells you it is impossible. It is obvious that certain limitations are irrevocably set by handicap, but all too often parents, family and the person himself make the handicap more severe by crippling mental hazards. Consider the family who insisted that a man be rid of his occasional convulsive seizures before he began to learn to be a farmer. True, he never had convulsions until a German bullet hit him in the head, but his family did him a real disservice by not helping him to start his career in poultry raising. He could have been encouraged to seek complete recovery along with his work. We took the place of his oversolicitous family and persuaded him to start work at once in company with another buddy with the same handicap.

2. Use sympathy in your attitude, but remember that sympathy that paralyzes learning to do what one wants and paralyzes the desire to learn to earn one's living is sentimentally destructive.

3. Establish the attitude that handicap requires difference in learning, not limitation on learning. Keep this fact in mind: most people have very different abilities to learn special skills. To some a skill may be almost inborn, so easy does it develop with only the slightest practice. To others it may mean long and arduous practice, but amazing skills can be developed even in people who seem to have no knack. A handicap means that the arduous way must be followed, but learning the hard way makes for character development and makes further learning the easier. Paul's feet could not follow the easy pattern of learning, but determination made them work in other ways, so that he could even drive an automobile successfully.

4. Do not let overcautious, fearful attitudes hinder the handicapped child or adult. Unless there had been courageous, resourceful people, the blind would never have been freed to go about the streets and into the direct ways of successful life. I have seen, within the short period of a year after being blinded in the war, a wounded veteran taught to help run a chicken farm and to travel one hundred miles by train and bus, without an attendant, to get to a hospital for examination. How easily restricting family fear might have crippled him much worse than blindness

5. By hopeful, resolute attitude make successful solution seem the only possible one. Despair and resentment are easy to develop, especially for the seriously handicapped when the handicap strikes in adult life. We recently treated a war veteran with a bullet wound that pierced both sides of his brain and left him partially blinded and paralyzed in one arm. Resentment over the smallness of his pension to support himself and his dependent parents, difficulty in finding housing, and honest delay in permitting him to start vocational training had made this boy bitter and hopeless. A few weeks in the hospital, with easily given social-service help in finding a small house, demonstrating how readily he could learn to use his good arm and his remaining eyesight, turned this bitter lad into a hopeful working person whose determination to win was quickly revived. Vocational training is already teaching him practical techniques to earn his own living.

Now advice to the handicapped themselves. Follow Paul's rule: "I am not handicapped; I am only different in the way I learn."

6. Refuse to accept yourself as limited, except when doctors tell you that you have gone as far as you can. Remember always, even if you may be mistaken a little, that doctors, too, can make mistakes, and the pessimistic person may try to condemn you to limitations that can be overcome. I remember the amusing incident of an older man entering the military service after much struggle because the authorities thought he would not be able to keep up physically with younger men. Yet this very man solved and executed problems of physical prowess that were declared impossible to solve by the instructors who devised them. He had the mental agility and determination to accomplish what was declared impossible.

7. One of the advantages that come from following the rule to see oneself as different only in the way one learns is that other people soon accept the fact that you are not different even though you carry the physical appearance of handicap. Paul's wife, after a very short acquaintance, ceased to think of him as handicapped or crippled, because Paul himself was not self-conscious or obsessed about his defect. Paul's legs were paralyzed, but Paul was not paralyzed. It was the personality of Paul that showed itself to the world, not the shape of his legs. Think of yourself and act as a normal person, and the world will accept you as one and ignore your handicap as you do.

To most handicapped people who have learned new ways of doing things that other people do in a different way it is hard to accept help that is kindly given. One of my friends who lost a hand told me that it took him years to learn that he must not resent help given, even if he did not need it. He knows he can cut his own meat in his plate without a waiter's help, that he needs no help in dressing himself and that he can park his car one-handed better than most people can with two hands. Yet he must almost daily let himself be helped to do things by well-meaning strangers and acquaintances. A good rule to follow is:

8. Accept the help of well-wishing friends and let them gradually discover that you can do for yourself. Don't make them self-conscious by refusing help. It's amusingly true that people [illegible] what helpless to them. It serves your purpose by making them feel kindly toward you.

9. [illegible] pathy that is sentimental. It can only cripple you psychologically. I advise your relatives to avoid this sentimental sympathy; but if they insist upon giving it, resist it with all possible effort. Remember that there are years ahead when you must live your own life and when yearning parents will not be there to overprotect you. A grateful Government can support you with pension, but a little money and overprotection cannot make you the happy citizen. Only personal accomplishment and ability to earn your own living can lead to personal happiness. I shudder at times when I see children crippled, not in body alone, but in spirit, because parents will not let them try to walk. Paul's mother made him walk, even when doctors said he couldn't. Yet I have within the week seen a child who could have learned to walk long since carried about by a mother who was too sympathetic to teach the child how to use her legs.

Don't let your family, or friends, or the world make you into an invalid. Insist that you can actually or figuratively stand on your own two feet.

Paul Kenyon refused to talk long or much about his legs. He was busy showing me all the things he was interested in and was doing so successfully. He showed me a remodeled house on which he had done most of the rebuilding; he showed me a boat he had helped remodel; he showed me a heating system he had remodeled; he showed me a career remodeled to include time for writing and raising a [illegible] village; and he showed me, more importantly, a body crippled by disease remodeled into a form that made him [illegible] person.

Meet a Soft-Coal Miner's Family, of

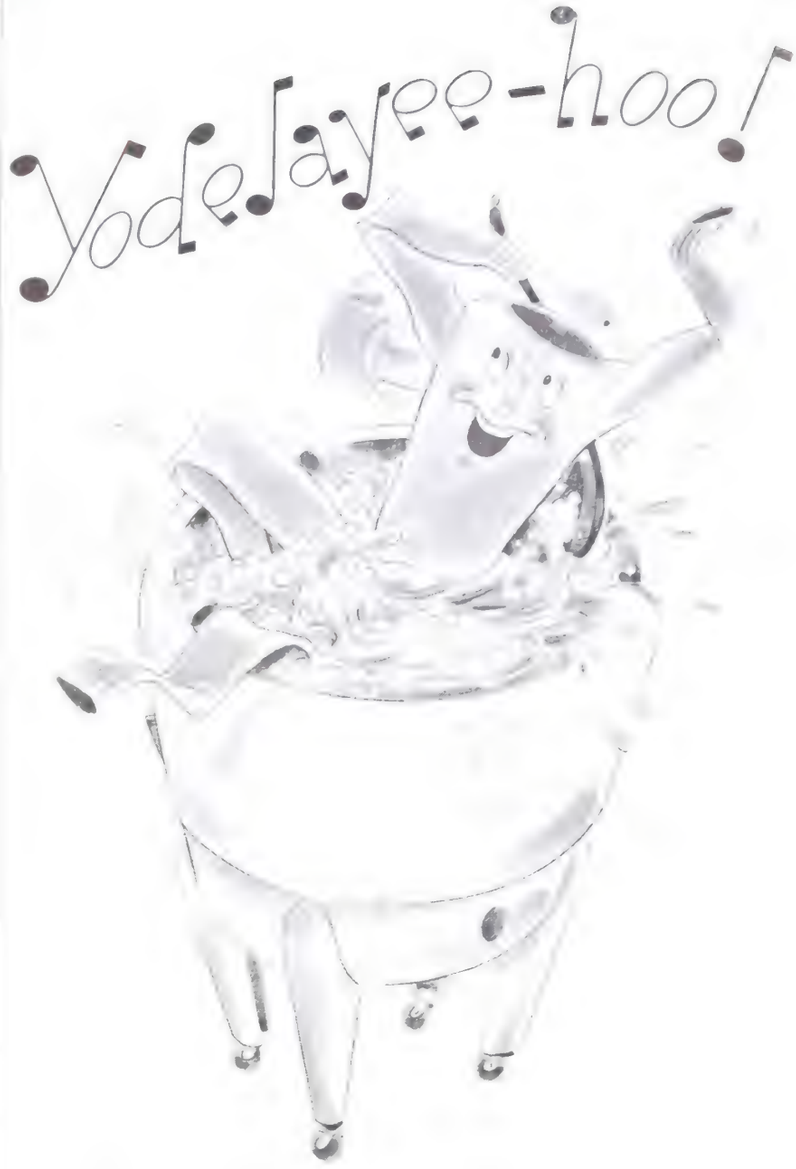
Harlan County, Kentucky

[illegible] most of its coal miners are a breed apart [illegible] who labor underground for twelve-hour periods of their days who work in danger and [illegible] and who are, without [illegible] important in the lives of each and every one of us. Barney Alice and Jim Perkins, coal [illegible] are like itself. Their last three seven children have lived out their lives in the shadow of coal and [illegible] the squealing of the pigs in the garbage under their four-room tarpaper [illegible] the cheap brand of chewin' tobacco Alice has [illegible] her youngest child. And, just as with all men, their lives are leavened by laughter and love.

More About Alice and Jim Perkins [illegible] LADIES' HOME JOURNAL

★ How America Lives ★



What makes Mr. L. W. (Long Winter) Heavies slightly 'pixilated'? The American Housekeeper knows.

Fels-Naptha Soap is back on her grocer's shelves.

Here is real proof that 'days of doing without' are past and gone. Once more the words 'clean' and 'white' apply to every washday—not just the times when she was lucky enough to find Fels-Naptha.

Now she can use Fels-Naptha Soap wherever its gentle, thorough action is needed. Now she can get out all the dirt, quickly and safely. Now she can have Fels-Naptha Soap whenever she wants it.

And so can you!

Fels-Naptha Soap

BANISHES "TATTLE-TALE GRAY"

BOTANY BRAND FABRICS

LOOK!
isn't it wonderful?
a whole wardrobe
all in one!

Smart girl! Smart manager! She insists on fabric quality. She picks her playclothes in "Botany" Brand Marchan. For this fine "Botany" Brand gabardine has the woven-in stamina that makes tailored clothes hold their tailored lines . . . makes it possible to look made-to-order at make-sense prices. This group comes in sizes 10 to 20. In dark and sunny pastel colors. At a fine store in most cities. Slacks around 23.00. Shorts around 13.00 Pedal Pushers around 18.00. Skirt-Jacket around 45.00. Printed Blouse around 11.00.

CALTEX of California Designed!

A leader in playclothes fashions, Caltex cuts each style with the flair for outdoor distinction that has made the Caltex name a national success.
In woolens, Caltex uses only "Botany" Brand Fabrics.

Look for the checkerboard label.

It is your double assurance of a completely satisfactory Fashion purchase. The "Botany" Brand is there to verify the woven-in quality of the fabric—The manufacturer's name is there to verify the style correctness of the garment This checkerboard label is found in Fashions for Women—Misses—Juniors—Children—in all-occasion styles.
Look for this label when you shop.

"BOTANY" BRAND FABRIC COORDINATES BY Caltex OF CALIFORNIA

the fabric comes first

Write for store nearest you featuring this Caltex wardrobe . . also for Free booklet of Fashions in "Botany" Brand Fabrics Address Dept. S-72, P. O. Box #538.

BOTANY WORSTED MILLS, Passaic, N. J.

Worsteds and Woolens for Women's, Children's and Men's Wear • No-Dye-Lot Knitting Yarns †Certified Fabrics for Home Sewing The "Botany" Brand Tie, Robe, "500" Suit Men's Sportswear • Lanolin Cosmetics

Reg. U. S. Pat. Off.

DO'S AND DON'TS FOR DATES . . .

DON'T ask a girl in the afternoon for a date that same night! "What are you doing tonight?" or "Have you got a date for the prom tomorrow?" is the most unflattering approach to a girl! Give her plenty of advance notice, especially for big dates such as proms, formal dances, and so on.

DO, before you leave your own house, check up carefully on your appearance. That helter-skelter slightly soiled look is all right on the football field—but dating a girl demands a clean-and-neat technique!

DO call for your girl at her home. Girls waiting on street corners are usually there because of some inconsiderate boy. And you don't want to be one of them! Calling for a girl and taking her home is all part of the date—and chalks up for you on the right side of her parents.

DO put your heart into your smile and produce a firm handshake when you are introduced to her parents; and say, "How do you do, Mrs. X"; or "I'm glad to meet you, sir." Sincerity is an admirable quality—and parents are quick to detect it!

DON'T lose your tongue and become self-conscious at the sight of older people. You, too, can begin a conversation! Start with something you know interests them. "I noticed your flower garden as I came in, Mrs. X"; or "I've heard about your interesting hobby, Mr. X." This immediately puts the conversational burden on their shoulders. Not yours!

DO remember to say, when you leave, "I'm very glad to have met you," repeating the name of the person you're speaking to. Courtesy and deference to elders are musts for manners.

DO (if it's a special date and you're in the market for flowers) use your initiative in discovering what color dress your date will wear. Boys who produce green orchids that have to be worn on red dresses are flirting with danger!

DO take enough money for you and your date! Boys who ask girls out should be prepared to pay the consequences!

DON'T forget your language when you are with a girl. Girls are partial to boys who treat them with respect. Masculine protectiveness, in any form, is always a delight to any girl.

DO give your girl "the little attentions." They mean a lot to her. Walking on the outside; holding her chair; giving her order to a waiter; seeing to it that she's made comfortable! And if you're with a mixed group of young people, don't forget the major part of your attention goes to the girl you are with!

DO adhere to any rules her parents have made about not going to certain places and getting home at a certain time. This is all-important in your success in maneuvering the second date!

DO see to it in person that your girl gets safely home! And do remember to tell her how much fun you had.

Paul practices last-minute checkups before he starts out on his personal-appearance tour toward the home of his best girl.

PHOTOS BY DI PIETRO

POLISHED, PRESSED AND PREFERRED

By Dawn Crowell

Beauty Editor of the Journal

WHEN a boy reaches the age where he finds himself thinking of girls in terms of dance floors and holding hands, it brings up such immediate problems as learning to whistle the latest love tunes and maneuvering an advance on next week's allowance. It also brings up the subject of good grooming. A subject which up until now he hasn't touched with a ten-foot whisk broom, preferring to think of it as something designed exclusively for girls. Begging off with such protests as "That's sissyish!", he has often succeeded in defeating his mother's pleas in matters of well-combed hair, an immaculate face and clean fingers.

But ever since our older American boys have been marching out of the armed forces, reconverted into neater, sprucer and consequently more attractive versions of their former selves, this argument that "grooming is not for males" has disappeared down the bathtub drain! In most cases, our ex-servicemen have not only cultivated more orderly ideas about their outward appearance, but in so doing they have polished up their personalities and have gained pride and self-respect.

Peter and Paul Kenyon, Jr., twelve and sixteen years old, are well aware of this grooming improvement in the masculine world. Paul, broad-shouldered, six feet tall and girl-conscious, knows a neat appearance makes a good impression. As a member of the R.O.T.C., he is accustomed to regimental orders concerning trim clothes, polished shoes and cleanliness, and says, "This training comes in handy when a guy goes out with a girl!"

In addition to regular toothbrushing and daily bathing, here are a few basic grooming aids designed to improve the appearance of any teen-age or preteen-age boy: stiff-bristled hairbrushes that not only put hair in its proper place, but help clean the scalp too; sturdy and really workable nailbrushes to be used with plenty of warm water and soap to give fingernails a clean look, but not necessarily a "manicured" look; a shoe-shine kit including brown and black shoe polishes and a chamois cloth to revive scuffed shoes; a sewing kit (like the ones used in the armed forces) for straying buttons. Hair tonics, talcum powder and after-shaving lotions are optional. But judging by the mysteriously dwindling supply of these items on a father's bathroom shelf, they seem to have a certain amount of appeal for the teen-age male members of the family!

Peter and Paul together attend to their own minor clothes casualties, such as loose buttons, spotted coats, unpressed pants and soiled socks and handkerchiefs. A good way to learn the meaning of "self-reliance" and "initiative."

Good grooming, however, does not end with the mastering of a polished outward appearance. The teen-age boy who discovers girls in this rosy light of dates and daydreams must consider his manners. Even the youngest girls prefer a certain amount of courtesy and respect. And the boy who has had no such training, or who has scoffed at his parents' attempts in that direction, is not going to sally forth suddenly as the Prince Charming of the Sub-Debs! Any boy who is not reasonably sure of himself in the presence of girls (and girls' parents!), who doesn't know what to say or how to act when confronted with unfamiliar faces in surroundings outside his own picket fence, may be in for some embarrassing moments.

But there is a remedy. Good manners act as a passport from one's own home into the homes and lives of others. Parents can furnish their children with this invaluable gift through giving the proper amount of training from early childhood.

Peter and Paul Kenyon have had such excellent bringing up in "home manners" that the courtesy, respect and good breeding they display to the outside world are as automatic as getting up in the morning. And now that Paul's afternoons and evenings are filled with outside activities, his training in conduct makes him not only a presentable but a desirable person!

Paul does a little predate pants pressing. Boys who balk at "helping mother out," please take note!

In matters of grooming, only Know why Yankee sailors used to break speed records winging home in their tall clipper ships? One reason was to get back to the feasts of baked beans our New England grandmothers used to bake with such a special flavor knack. Beans baked with true, old-time goodness exactly as B & M bakes 'em for you now "Down East" in Portland, Maine. Slowly (with no boiling) for one entire day! With lots of juicy pork chunks and spicy sauces! Till each flavor-drenched bean is mealy and tender and temptingly brown! Treat yourself to these genuine New England favorites . . . and you'll prefer 'em always.

Burnham & Morrill Company
Portland 2, Maine.

PHOTO BY J. DUPLETRO

Millions of pounds of fish are scooped from the holds of Gloucester schooners at all seasons of the year. This morning's catch is redfish.

Folly Cove Favorite

By Louella G. Shouer

EVEN if you had never peeked into the weathered old salt-box house in which the Kenyons live, you would know that there would be red geraniums and fat little pots of growing herbs on the kitchen window sill, old blue willowware plates in the cupboard, and fresh-baked ginger cookies in the crock near the breadbox. We did peek—and there they were. Houses should be like the people who live in them. Mrs. Kenyon makes a real home of her house and loves to cook in its big sunny kitchen all the simple, homely, good things that generations of New England mothers have offered their families. Being a creative artist, she believes it's good to cook. She's as proud of a stew or chowder which she's brewed up on her own as she is of a new stencil design for one of her Folly Cove prints. And why not? Cooking is creation too.

You can tell by her two cookbooks that no matter how much she may improvise with flavors and seasonings, she's loyal to the cooking traditions of the locality in which she lives. One is called the New England Cook Book of Fine Old Yankee Recipes. The other is the Annisquam Village Cook Book, published by the local sewing circle. In its frontispiece are these words: "Amongst its other traditions, Annisquam has always been proud of its cooking, as everybody who has attended a church supper or even a library tea will testify. In prosperity and depression alike, the Annisquam women have vied in friendly rivalry with specialties long since become more or less open secrets in the village."

It's a fine thing for any community—the gathering together of the best of its best cooks, their recipes written in each author's handwriting. It's much more of an intimate record of a group of people who live together than any local historian could provide. Maybe the proceeds bought a new hose for the fire engine, flower beds for the little park—I don't know. But I do know that there are mighty good cooks in this little fishing village close by the sea, and I'd like to pass on to you some of their specialties. There's little these women don't know about fish, and they're loyal to the varieties that are brought to their shores: the cod, the haddock and halibut; the mackerel in summer—which Mrs. Kenyon says is more heavenly to eat if broiled over a wood fire.

Everyone knows how wedded the New Englander is to fish and clam chowders, made with milk, salt pork, onions and potatoes as its only other requisites. No "tomatoey" chowder would stand a chance in this Down East section. I'm not a New Englander, but I'd choose their way any day. Here's a chowder the way they make it in Annisquam:

CAPE ANN FISH CHOWDER

Dice ¼ pound salt pork and fry until crisp. Remove the pork and sauté 2–3 onions, peeled and sliced or chopped in the fat. Add 4 potatoes, diced, and 2 pounds fresh haddock or codfish fillets, cut into pieces. Cover with water, add 1 teaspoon salt and cook until the potatoes are done. Add 3 cups milk and salt and pepper to taste. Add 2 or 3 hard common crackers broken into pieces, and 1 additional cup of milk if chowder seems too heavy of fish and potatoes. Put salt pork back in chowder. Reseason to taste and bring just to boil. Serves 4–6.

The recipe itself is quite elastic. Some cooks use more or less salt pork, more or less fish and potatoes, but i always has these basic ingredients. Clam chowder is made by the same "rule." Chowder fans believe it is even better reheated the second day. You might double the recipe.

Unless you live close by the sea, you can't expect your lobster to taste quite like that which the Kenyons provide. Mrs. Kenyon says that until you've cooked lobster in sea water you really haven't "tasted" lobster. Now in February lobsters aren't very easy to get, but when summer comes you might like to try this lobster stew from the Annisquam Cook Book:

LOBSTER STEW

Remove meat from the bodies and claws of two 1½-pound cooked lobsters or one 3-pound lobster. Cut the meat into medium-sized pieces. Add 2 cups water to the lobster shells and the tommi or liver of the lobster. Add ½ teaspoon salt, a piece of celery and a few little sprays of parsley. Simmer shells 20 minutes to make a stock. Heat together 1½ cups cream, 1 cup milk and 1–1½ cups of the stock. Add the lobster meat and 1 teaspoon paprika mixed with 2 tablespoons melted butter or margarine. Season with salt and pepper. Do not boil. Serves 4.

Strangely, the Kenyons don't go to the Gloucester wharf for their fish. They buy it in fish stores and supermarkets just as city folk do who don't have an ocean at their back door. Much codfish is dried in Gloucester, and dried salt codfish, creamed and served traditionally with boiled potatoes, buttered beets and coleslaw, is a family favorite supper. Haddock they like baked on a bed of tomatoes with herbs dried from their own garden for seasoning. Little half-moons of lemon add the final touch to the flavor at the table. Here are two ways to serve fish in the Folly Cove manner:

CASSEROLE OF FISH

Cut 4 tomatoes into eighths. Place the cut pieces in bottom of 4 individual casseroles. Bake in moderate oven, 350° F., until soft and tender. Sprinkle with 1 tablespoon chopped chives, ½ teaspoon salt, a dash of pepper and 1 tablespoon sugar. Cover content of each baking dish with 1 piece of any filleted fish (¾ pound cod, haddock). Sprinkle the fish with ½ cup chopped parsley. Cover casseroles. Put back in moderate oven and bake until fish is done (about 20 minutes). Before serving, top with a piece of butter or margarine. Serves 4. This is a good little dish—easy to prepare—and can be made in large casserole. During the winter it's more economical to substitute canned tomatoes for fresh. Heat and divide the contents of 1 No. 2 can among the 4 casseroles. Omit the first step of baking the tomatoes, as the canned tomatoes are already cooked.

BAKED STUFFED FISH FILLETS

Wash and dry 2 pounds fish fillets. Divide the quantity in half. Lay half the fillets in the bottom of a shallow rectangular baking dish. Make a bread stuffing, as follows: Prepare 1½ cups fine bread crumbs from stale bread. Cook 2 tablespoons chopped onion and 2 tablespoons finely diced celery in 2 tablespoons bacon fat. Stir into crumbs. Season with ¼ teaspoon salt, a dash of pepper and a pinch of marjoram and thyme. Add 1 tablespoon hot water. Mix well. Spoon the filling onto the fish. Lay the rest of the fish on top. Melt 2 tablespoons butter or margarine. Blend in 1½ tablespoons flour. Add 1 cup milk, ½ teaspoon salt, a dash of pepper. Cook and stir constantly until thickened. Add ¼ pound sharp American cheese, grated. Stir until dissolved. Pour sauce over the fish. Bake in moderate oven, 350° F., 30 minutes.

If the Kenyons are having company supper in front of the big open fireplace and Mrs. Kenyon has to spend most of her day in the studio—fortunately, it's just off the kitchen, where she can keep an eye on a cooking dinner—this is a favorite main dish. The boys help to slice mushrooms and cut

(Continued on Page 222)

★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★

"When I take the plump, brown-crusted loaves from the oven," says Mrs. Kenyon, "I feel kin to the traditions of this lovely old house."

PHOTO BY TANNELLI

Wonderful Lenten Supper

FISH FILLETS WITH CREOLE SAUCE

6 fish fillets or
2 lb. whole fish
1 cup Wesson Oil
¼ cup corn meal
1 teaspoon salt
¼ teaspoon pepper
¼ cup flour

Wipe fillets with damp cloth and dry thoroughly. Heat Wesson Oil in heavy skillet. While your oil is getting hot, roll fillets in the mixture of flour, meal, salt, and pepper. When Wesson Oil is good and hot, place fillets in pan and brown, turning once (notice how quickly they turn an even, golden brown). Serve immediately with Creole Sauce (see below). A simple supper, but how tempting! You'll find fish or any food, for that matter, is extra delicious fried in Wesson Oil. Digestible, too! No wonder good cooks everywhere have been frying with famous Wesson Oil for years!

Creole Sauce: Brown in skillet ¼ cup chopped onion in 2 tablespoons Wesson Oil. Add 1 can condensed tomato soup, stirring constantly. Add: 2 tablespoons each of finely chopped green peppers, celery, olives, pickles. Bring to boiling point and serve.

IT'S A JOY to fry with clear, pure Wesson Oil. So handy and economical. Just pour what's needed into the pan. Know immediately when there's enough. Never any waste. And what a difference in the taste of food fried in Wesson Oil. Flavorful outside! Juicy inside! For frying—there's nothing like Wesson Oil. America's favorite salad oil!

TIP

Try browning bread crumbs in delicious Wesson Oil. See how extra good they taste!

Wesson Oil

FOR SALADS & COOKING

NEW ORLEANS

SO GOOD! HERB DRESSING ON GRAPEFRUIT!

½ teaspoon salt and, if desired, 1 clove garlic, sliced
¼ teaspoon sugar
¼ teaspoon pepper
½ teaspoon dry mustard
½ teaspoon paprika
¾ cup Wesson Oil
1 teaspoon mixed dried herbs, or minced parsley
3 tablespoons lemon juice

Mix in a jar and shake vigorously so that all ingredients are perfectly blended. Pour over fresh grapefruit sections on crisp greens and toss. Use only enough dressing so that salad is lightly coated. Notice how clearly you can taste the fresh flavor of the fruit. That's because light, unobtrusive Wesson Oil never drowns a salad under a heavy, oily taste. One reason more American women buy Wesson Oil than any other brand of salad oil.

for gracious living...

be sure to keep air-wick in your bathroom ...always guests even invade the privacy of the "most private room" in your home. Then, as always, rely on the protection of air-wick. Yes, air-wick is as necessary in the modern bath as soap itself. air-wick is the little bottle with the magic wick which started its meteoric career in the kitchen... moved into the living-room and bedroom... and now is a "must" in millions of bathrooms throughout America.

Upstairs and down, air-wick makes indoor air "country-fresh"... destroys cooking odors and the unpleasantness left behind by smoking. air-wick freshens musty closets and bathrooms... keeps the nursery as fresh as a country garden. Simply uncap the bottle and pull up the wick. That's all. Nothing to light... nothing to burn. You will find air-wick at all better stores.

air-wick contains more than 125 basic compounds as found in nature, including chlorophyll, the marvelous green substance which makes each green leaf and blade of grass a miniature purifying laboratory. *air-wick deodorizer and household freshener is fully protected by U.S. Patent... a trademark of Seeman Brothers, Inc., New York 13, N. Y.

why risk offending?

air-wick kills household odors

new easy-to-use wick

use air-wick for...

1 cooking odors
2 stale smoke
3 airless bathrooms
4 bedrooms
5 children's nurseries
6 sick rooms
7 pet odors
8 musty closets

Tune in "Monday Morning Headlines" every Sunday, coast-to-coast ABC network, 7:15-7:30 P. M., EST, directly following Drew Pearson and his "Predictions of Things to Come".

©1947 SEEMAN BROS.

Dining in the living room is not obtrusive if backgrounds are built in and the dining table and chairs match the rest of the room's furnishings.

Dining in the Living Room

BY HENRIETTA MURDOCK

Interior Decoration Editor of the Journal

THE Kenyons had a dining-room problem. Their two-hundred-year-old house had no room suitable for dining; and being decoration-minded, Mrs. Kenyon didn't like the idea of spoiling her living room with obvious dining equipment which she couldn't disguise between meals.

"These big old houses just have rooms and rooms," she said, "and each general [illegible] to the kitchen to remodel into a dining room. We can't find a room near enough to the living room."

These days many families find it necessary to eat in the living room. To do so with style is in the nature of a decoration problem, but not too difficult for an amateur to undertake.

The most successful plan and the key to a really delightful effect is to match the dining accessories to the living-room scheme, so their presence seems a natural part of the day-long furnishings. If you do this, the dual purpose of the room is not noticeable, and even when in use the dining equipment isn't obtrusive.

The plan we worked out for the Kenyons adapts itself readily to any style, furnishings and background. Yours may be a homey room, a modern interior or a period setting, but the procedure for adapting a dining unit is the same. The job can be either amateur or professional, and you can do the whole works, or just any one part that seems to answer your needs.

Here are some helpful suggestions for you to follow:

Since dining table and chairs against a plain wall are stark and uninviting and obviously out of place, plan for them a compatible background which makes them seem to belong there. The very best effect comes from building in a unit arrangement which gives pleasant emphasis to the spot rather than contrasts it. For instance, since the Kenyons use their living room for both work and play, and need lots of places to write and study, visit with friends and work at hobbies, we gave them a homey, informal built-in unit, definitely in character with the rest of the room. If you were to take away the (Continued on Page 215)

When the rhumba's not your number . . . Better reduce the Ry-Krisp way!

No romancing in dancing? Don't let "too-fat" spoil your fun! Get the Ry-Krisp Plan . . . a simple way for those in normal health but overweight to lose fat . . . yet choose delicious meals from long lists of foods (in portions given) . . . with Ry-Krisp as bread.

Ry-Krisp is delicious! Crisp, golden, whole-grain bread with a rich rye flavor. Has vitamin B_1 and minerals to help tone you up. Helps cut calories only 25 per double-square water.

Ry-Krisp
RY-KRISP
HAPPY REDUCING!
Roast pork, mashed sweet potato, broccoli, salad of shredded cabbage on spinach leaves, Ry-Krisp, fresh apple, coffee

FREE! "DESIGN FOR REDUCING," GIVES COMPLETE REDUCING PLANS FOR MEN AND WOMEN. WRITE RY-KRISP, 200 CHECKERBOARD SQUARE, ST. LOUIS 2, MISSOURI.

Good food sends savory fragrance ahead . . . when you cook with Derby Barbecue Sauce. Its mouth-watering goodness works a spell on appetites. Dozens of easy ways to spice your cooking with it. Send for Free Recipe Book.

GLASER

Derby Barbecue Sauce

• Steak Sauce... Barbecue Sauce. Hot Sauce Worcestershire Sauce... Chop Suey Sauce
GLASER, CRANDELL CO., Chicago 8, Dept. 82

FIRST AID FOR CLEVER CHEFS

A Wealth of Healthful VITAMIN C

BORDO CITRUS FRUITS AND JUICES

GRAPEFRUIT, ORANGE, AND ORANGE-GRAPEFRUIT BLEND

Rich vitamin content means better health . . . plus fresh fruit flavor for greater natural enjoyment.

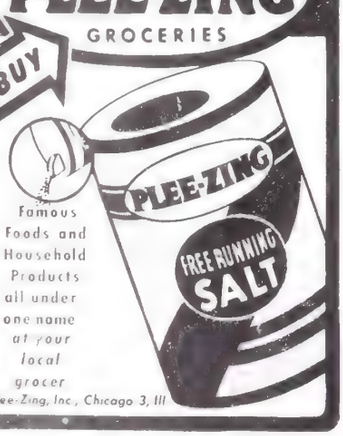
Packed in Florida and Texas under continuous government inspection.

Guaranteed by Good Housekeeping

Bordo Products Co., Chicago 13, Ill.

PLEE-ZING GROCERIES

BUY



Famous Foods and Household Products all under one name at your local grocer

Plee-Zing, Inc., Chicago 3, Ill.

GETTING DOWN TO FREEZING

The Kenyons ask some questions you may ask, too, if you're approaching the freezing point!

PHOTO BY STUART

Before deciding definitely, Mr. and Mrs. Paul Kenyon measure their catchall back room, which they hope to make a freezer-utility room.

BY JUDY BARRY

"What will a freezer do for me?" Several good things, if you choose it and use it well and wisely. A home freezer can be an investment in good living, providing its owner with a variety of good food all year round, allowing the enjoyment of out-of-season delicacies on a moderate budget. A freezer owner may prepare whole meals for some gala occasion well in advance at a time that's convenient for her, or a week's supply of school lunches on some quiet afternoon. She may cut the number of her shopping trips down to minimum, since she may, if she's canny, keep a small-scale market right in her own house. She may save money by buying food in wholesale quantities, or taking full advantage of the yield of her own garden and fruit trees if she's a landowner.

"How large a freezer would I need
At Cornell University, a study was made estimate the number of cubic feet wh would be required to satisfy the proba needs of one person with the kind and qu ity of food needed to furnish good nutrit at reasonable cost. Based on the use frozen meat all year round (3 pounds a w per person) and frozen fruits and vegetal about 32 weeks of the year (7½ pounc week), this study indicated that to fre this amount of food, about 6 cubic feet a y per person would be desirable, but that v well planned and efficient use, about 5 cu feet could be ample. (Six cubic feet wo allow for the freezing of cooked fo baked goods, fats, such as butter and cre in addition to the above-mentioned foo ow much food do they hold?"

hat about a freezer locker?"

there any need for both?"

w long does freezing take?"

e they hard to take care of?"

w much will it cost to operate?"

here is the best place to put a ezer?"

of their "built-in" thermostat and the side-opening freezer door helps to hold in the

"What type of freezer do I want?"

is that packages are easier to get at with the shelves at hand level. It's sometimes quite a stretch for a small or short-armed or plump person to dig, just the back of peaches or the bottom of a chest.

well, but if a chest freezer and its kids may present fewer problems than the doors of are kept right up to the minute and ab-identification.

"I'll probably buy most of my frozen foods."

usual re-

—if, of course, store a package or two or new ones will take care of them. In their

"How much do they cost?"

cubes but in New York freezers' prices around $60 for 10 cubic feet, up to freezer in size in New York at present to

"How soon can I get one?"

the side-opening upright freezers are in pro-

YOU DON'T Cream Shortening YOU DON'T BEAT EGGS!

Betty Crocker

Yet amazing Betty Crocker New Method with Softasilk will give you lovelier cakes than any other method, any other flour!*

- [illegible]
- [illegible] mixing time to 5 minutes!
- [illegible] cakes!
- Betty Crocker Softasilk is [illegible]

- [illegible] the cake flour and the Betty Crocker New Method that spell cake-making magic!

* See guarantee on package

A Betty Crocker New Method Recipe

Maraschino Party Cake

Have [illegible]

Sift [illegible] 2 1/2 cups sifted SOFTASILK Cake Flour, 1 1/2 cups sugar, 1 tsp. salt, 3 tsp. double-action baking powder

Add 1/2 cup high grade vegetable shortening, 1/4 cup maraschino cherry juice (from 5-oz. bottle), 6 maraschino cherries cut in eighths, 1/2 cup milk

Beat [illegible]

Add [illegible] 1/2 to 2/3 cup unbeaten egg whites (4 large)

Beat [illegible]

Fold [illegible] 1/2 cup chopped nuts

Pour [illegible]

Bake [illegible]

Frost [illegible]

*To Save On Sugar: [illegible]

15 CAKE RECIPES, 7 ICINGS & SUGAR SAVING HINTS WITH PACKAGE

SOFTASILK CAKE FLOUR

A Product of General Mills

BARGAIN! AMAZING OFFER OF 14 PIECE CAKE-MAKING SET WITH PACKAGE!

NAN:

Oh, let the sink go—we'll be late!

SUE: Want to bet? Cleaning's a cinch when your cleanser doesn't scratch.

NAN: That's a new one on me! I thought a cleanser had to be harsh and scratchy to be quick.

SUE: Heavens no! Coarse cleansers leave scratches that catch and hold dirt and make cleaning up take twice as long.

NAN: Seeing is believing! In no time at all you've made that sink absolutely gleam.

SUE: All the honors go to Bon Ami, dear. It slides dirt right off. Polishes while it cleans, too . . . see?

NAN: I wouldn't have eyes if I didn't! From now on I switch to Bon Ami for all my cleaning.

SUE: You won't be sorry. Bon Ami leaves everything satin-smooth, including your hands!

Bon Ami

THE SPEEDY CLEANSER that "hasn't scratched yet!"

FINE, WHITE Bon Ami Powder makes fas of cleaning bathtubs as well as sinks. A Bon Ami Cake for cleaning windows and m

I Wear the Apron Now

By David Duncan

IE first day was hectic, and at five o'clock it began to get frantic. The children were clamoring for food, and I had forgotten that to be eaten at five, must be prepared before then. Even an ent gas stove requires time to bake a o. My wash was still on the line and g was coming in.

th masculine competence I poured two of milk into a saucepan, stirred in a ge of brown powder which was sup- to turn it into chocolate pudding, and on the range. Then I was out the back after the laundry.

r clothesline is the pulley type. I hauled lothes in rapidly until a sheet that come unpinned at one corner caught rosebush. I gave the line a yank and ther corner came unpinned. The sheet d over the bush like a bridal veil.

th an armful of ly clothes I d into the house, ited them on a in the hallway ter sorting, and harged down the steps after the I had my hands when my five- ld daughter ap- d at the top of teps and bawled :

addy, the pud- boiling over." e rosebush was ate, but I was ronger, and with heet a tattered er of triumph ring behind me s back in the once more. The ng had become ingly thick and . It had boiled and was burning oss the top of the I turned off the mmediately and d mopping up the late pudding with heet, which in the confusion of the nt I mistook for a dish towel.

the children were coughing, so I d through the smog to the windows ot them open. I threw the sheet back laundry basket, took a deep breath of e and nerved myself to a new start. otatoes were still like rocks, and my supply was too low to attempt pudding . My daughters stopped coughing long h to tell me once more how hungry they I poured the remaining milk into two s which I placed before them as a s of stopping the clamor while I fried each a chop. Too late I realized I had e milk in the wrong glasses. The three- ld, it seems, could drink milk only the cheese glass which I had placed e the five-year-old. In the ensuing ble the milk went off the table, one landing in the older one's lap and the on the floor. A wail went up from the en, answered by my own deep-throated w as my patience expired and the chops d burning.

en my wife arrived home an hour later, ildren had each eaten some bread and r and retired to their room, where they shrieking out their derision of my s. The kitchen was a mess; dinner for ife and me was a mirage on the future horizon. I was physically exhausted and close to the gibbering point.

THAT describes a small part of the first day after my wife and I decided to make the great experiment and exchange our economic positions. We had talked about it ever since our second child was weaned from the bottle. My wife had worked before our marriage and wanted to continue with some kind of work outside the home. On the other hand, I resented the rigid schedule of commuter trains and office hours which kept me away from home eleven hours a day all during the week. I wanted to write fiction, and was of the opinion that if I stayed home I could increase production to the point where it paid off. My wife kindly withheld comment as to how much I would accomplish under such conditions. By working nights I had managed to finish five novels in six years, but only one of them had sold and returns from royalties stayed in three figures. That wasn't enough of a guaranty for me to leave my job, since we both realized that my wife's potential earnings were less than mine.

The necessary impetus came a few months ago with the sale of a second novel. The cash advance was sufficient to buy food and keep a roof over our heads for a few months at least, and that—plus whatever salary my wife could secure—should be enough to give us a fair chance at the new way of life. If worse came to worst, I could always get a job again.

So I donned the apron and took over the running of the household while my wife donned a business suit and went to work. She leaves the house each morning at 8:30 and returns sometime between 5:30 and 6:30 in the evening, depending upon her schedule. During her absence I care for our two daughters, clean house, market, cook the meals and try to find time to write.

Let me admit frankly that the last activity has occupied the least amount of time during the daylight hours. I still do my writing at night. In that respect our great experiment has so far been a flop. But in giving me opportunity to investigate the life led by the vast majority of mothers, the experience has had an educational value worth all the nervous agony of my first few weeks in the new role.

I have learned humility. Never again shall I be guilty of such banalities as, "But, dear, the children would be no problem if you'd just let them be their sweet selves"; or, "I can't see why you haven't time to pay the bills. All you have to do is sit around the house all day."

Such misconceptions have fled my mind forever. When Sunday comes, I don't think of it as a day for my working wife to spend in golfing; I think of it as a day when my wife takes over at least half the household duties and lets me relax for a change.

I have learned patience. No longer do I explode at the end of the day because the True Tale

By Annie Laurie Von Tungeln

Two loves there were in my young life:
One laughed and chattered all day long;
When evening shadows fell, still gay,
He sang a lilting song.
The other was a quiet lad
Who sang no song and spoke no word.
Attuned to long, dark silences,
My soul found his and heard.

The gay love stole my heart away.
(I had it back by break of day.)
The silent one, against my will,
Plucked out my heart and has it still.

Dogs I've Known... by Robt Day

Finicky Eater —

Noses his food as if it was so much sawdust. His appetite would get a break with Gro-Pup Ribbon! It has real dog-appeal, say 7 out of 10 dog owners who've fed it. These crisp toasted ribbons are different from any other dog food!

Lazybones —

Nothing seems to stir him to life. What can his master expect if the dog isn't fed right? Gro-Pup Ribbon would give him every vitamin and mineral dogs are known to need for vigor, vitality, and growth. A tested, scientific formula of 23 essential nutrients.

Contented Playmate —

Happy, chipper, and well-fed—on a basic diet of Gro-Pup, of course! It's economical, too. Each box of Gro-Pup Ribbon supplies as much food by dry weight as 5 one-pound cans of dog food! Get Gro-Pup from your grocer today. It's made by Kellogg's—a name you can count on.

Dogs Go For GRO-PUP

P.S. You can give your dog the same tested, scientific formula as Gro-Pup Ribbon in popular Gro-Pup Meal, or in crunchy, bite-size Gro-Pup Pel-Etts. For variety, feed all three.

MADE BY Kellogg's
OF BATTLE CREEK AND OMAHA

This gay clock upon my wall
I never have to wind at all
It's a Telechron

One more kitchen chore you can cross off your list . . . taking care of the kitchen clock. The electric Telechron, Buffet, simply runs itself. Never fast, never slow, it gives you the right time . . . to cook and work by . . . for months and years. And you never have to wind, oil or regulate it. You see, the heart of this bright little clock is the famous self-starting Telechron motor . . . the very same motor that has always helped make Telechron the first choice in electric clocks.

Buffet comes in red, green, ivory, and white plastic. Sorry, no mail orders

. . . see your Telechron dealer.

$4.50

Prices and specifications subject to change without notice

Telechron
REG. U.S. PAT. OFF.
ELECTRIC CLOCKS

Telechron Inc., Ashland, Massachusetts

children are fussy about their dinner or slow about getting to bed. This used to be the part of their day I shared most often, and it gave me a distorted picture of the whole. Now I see the day in its entirety—the cheerful mornings and afternoons with the gradual accumulation of fatigue which leads to the minor crises of evening.

I have learned flexibility. Under office procedure my life had become a series of habits. I received my mail at a certain time, dictated my correspondence at a certain time, had lunch the same hour each day, made appointments with the expectation of keeping them to the minute, and caught the same train home each evening. Variations from the routine were largely a matter of choice. Now life is all variations. I have learned to leave my typewriter in the middle of a sentence to fish a toy from under the bed or pass judgment on one of my daughter's latest creations with finger paints. Children's activities follow a certain routine, but it is not an adult routine. The adult must conform. I do.

Finally, I have learned a great deal about grown people through constant attendance upon children. Traits of stubbornness, selfishness, quick tempers and foolish pride, which used to annoy me most in dealings with other adults, I now realize are nothing more than continuations of preschool behavior which the individual somehow never outgrew. I have discovered these same tendencies in myself after seeing them reflected in the attitudes of my children.

Obviously, children are the factor which makes the job of the housekeeper difficult. Without children complications would be few, and largely products of the imagination. Illness is a luxury a mother can rarely afford. Social obligations are always dependent upon the physical condition of the family. The children always come first and other things come later, if they can be squeezed in at all.

> Dionysius the tyrant, being at table with Spartan soldiers, criticized the menu as being insipid. The chef replied: "I do not wonder at it, for the seasoning is wanting."
>
> "What seasoning?" questioned the tyrant.
>
> "Running, sweating, fatigue, hunger and thirst: these are the ingredients with which we season our food."
>
> ELIZABETH CRINNELL: Thoughts for the Kit-Bag. (Association Press)

"But how do the children take it?" is frequently asked by our friends.

There is a popular belief that children need the care of a mother, which cannot be replaced by a father, regardless of how conscientious he is. It is probably true that if one parent were to disappear from the household altogether, the father could be more easily dispensed with, as far as the children are concerned. But when it boils down to a matter of which parent is preferable as a caretaker, the popular belief is a fallacy.

By the time I had developed to the point where I didn't burn the pudding any more, the children had adjusted. After the first few days I was accepted as the logical person to whom to turn in case of a skinned knee, a bumped head or desire for a graham cracker. My wife has become the charming lady who arrives home in the evening, listens to a rehearsal of the day's events, reads them a story and assists in putting them to bed. The children hold her in considerable awe and proudly tell their playmates that their mother goes to work each day. When asked about father, the reply is generally, "Oh, he just stays home and takes care of the house and sometimes writes on the typewriter."

What the final outcome of our changed life will be, I cannot predict at present, but I do not believe results will be bad. For one thing, my wife is already looking and feeling better. Her job has given her a long-needed and much-deserved rest from the drudgeries with the patented

INNER-CONTROL

Skillful designing and quality fabrics combi
to enhance your figure and give you th heavenly feeling of freedom from restrai

There is a Starlight Bra for every figure ty including long line and teen age. Also wir bras with detachable strap

Guaranteed by Good Housekeeping
REPLACEMENT OR REFUND OF MONEY IF DEFECTIVE OR NOT AS ADVERTISED THEREIN

At leading store
everywhe

L. & W. BRASSIERE CO., NEW YORK

SEW YOUR OW
HATS, BLOUSES SUITS, BA GIFTS!

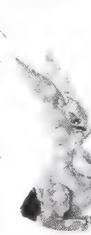
Make spring handbags, the newest wide belts, fascinating accessories, unusual gifts, newest decorations for your room. Tailor your suits and coats like a professional. Do new, different trimmings that MAKE your costumes. Clear directions, easy illustrated steps in 10-cent books listed.

"Gay Teen Ideas" has 28 pages of wonderful hats, bags, accessories in Book S-16.

Bags for every occasion, easy to sew, in Book S-17.

New quilted blouse, one of 79 trimming ideas in Book S-23.

A whole book full of "Easy-to-Sew Toys," No. S-14.



"Learn to Sew teaches while you ma blouses, dresses, e

SEWING books just 10 cents
Limited quantities. First come first served. ORDER NOW

The Spool Cotton Company, Dept. LHJ-2
54 Clark Street, Newark 4, New Jersey

Please send me the books checked at 10 cent each. Enclosed is ..... cents.

☐ No. S-11, "Gifts" ☐ No. S-17, "Bags"
☐ No. S-12, "Sewing for Babies" ☐ No. S-18, "Tailoring" ☐ No. S-20, "Aprons"
☐ No. S-14, "Toys" ☐ No. S-21, "Learn to Sew
☐ No. S-16, "Gay Teen Ideas" ☐ No. S-22, "Quilts" ☐ No. S-23, "Trimmings"

Name (please print)

Street

Address

INSTANT
Sweet-Aire
AN ORIGINAL AIR DEODORANT
NOW End TOBACCO Odors Faster!

Sweet-Aire gives you jiffy-quick tobacco odor control . . . leaves air fragrant . . . fresh. Frees clothes, draperies, upholstery of clinging odors. Spreads through the room quickly. The all-purpose air deodorant . . . proved by years of home use. At drug, department, hardware stores . . . beauty shops.

Miller Protecto Products Company
Kalamazoo 41, Mich.

Dealers Write us for the name of jobber in your line who can supply you.

Cedar Pine or Oriental
4-8-16-oz
Bottles

NO WICK! NO WAITING!

BE A HOTEL HOSTESS

JOY YOUR WORK! Fascinating ... in hotels as Hostess, Executive Housekeeper, Manager, Steward or Head ... Grade school education plus Lewis Training qualifies you. Lewis National Placement Service Free of extra charge. One student writes: "Offered three positions by Lewis School, I selected this one as Hostess-Assistant to manager of a famous resort." Write for Free Book.
VETERANS: ...

LEWIS HOTEL TRAINING SCHOOL
Sta. LB-501, Washington 7, D. C.
31 SUCCESSFUL YEAR

SELL FAMOUS SUNSHINE "EVERYDAY" CARDS
1947 CREATIONS NOW READY
SUNSHINE 21 NOTES—A LEADER
Sunshine Folders for Birthdays, Get Well ...
EARN MONEY EASILY
SUNSHINE ART STUDIOS, DEPT. LE-2,
5 FULTON ST., NEW YORK 8, N. Y.

It's a Pleasure to use—

✓ CLEANS TOILET BOWLS WITHOUT SCRUBBING
✓ BANISHES TOILET ODORS

of boarewood. [illegible] ances and a wider range of interests. We understand each other better and are able to discuss the problems of our home on the basis of common experience.

The children have shown signs of increasing adaptability and an interest in those subjects which I am better able to teach them than my wife.

On the whole, we have a feeling of greater economic security. Should disaster overtake either of us, the other will be in a position to earn the living and supervise the home.

Although I do not consider our present arrangement permanent and do not intend spending my next fifteen years being handmaiden to two growing girls, I nonetheless look forward to a day when all of us will be adult and able to find real enjoyment in each other's company. Too many fathers end up being strangers to their children. Whether my own will like me or not remains to be seen, but certainly they will know me.

In the meantime my chief requirement is an apron. The ones I took over from my wife have ruffles, and I am still masculine enough that I dislike answering the doorbell wearing ruffles. Besides, a man needs a long apron that protects him all the way to his shoetops.

"BRACES AWAY"

[illegible]

print off a few more yards of an order and dart out to see how the pie in the oven is doing. Even print designing ties in with the family—the motifs of the library-window curtains are strictly all Kenyon, including the family boat and some family jokes.

Few newspaper reporters own pleasure boats and belong to yacht clubs. But in Gloucester such summer-folks doings, associated with the seasonal colony of visitors, tie in cordially with the local people. And the economic fact is that belonging to the Annisquam Yacht Club, which gives young Peter and Paul worth-while privileges, costs the Kenyons only $33 a year, while the Catkin, their seventeen-foot catboat, thirty years old and still sound, asks only some $30 a year for paint and materials lovingly applied by Paul and the boys. The total is hardly what many families in moderate circumstances spend on movies annually—and the Kenyons seldom go to movies.

At double the price it would still be worth it in recreation—Paul and the boys handling Catkin man-of-war style and Weezie stretched out, relaxed as a rag, on the scrap of deck forward, breaking lazy silence only to protest bitterly when it comes time to come about and she has to remove herself to make room for the boom. When he has a spare evening and feels like it, Paul is writing a kids' book about a family strikingly like the Kenyons building a boat, with the hero a small boy very much indeed like young Peter. The Kenyon boat-mindedness goes even farther, with Paul, Jr., now constructing a kayak in odd moments and Pete developing an ambition to be a tugboat captain. And, says Louise: "I don't know just how it will be managed, but I have a feeling in my bones, from the way Paul and the boys are behaving, that there'll be a new boat in the family pretty soon now."

Make-doers naturally have problems. Small ones like how to get Pete into shoes for state occasions between June and September—he claims, with justification, that you don't need shoes in summer and they hurt his feet anyway. Medium ones like how to match postwar high car prices against the multiplying rattles in the old Plymouth. And big ones like should Paul, Jr., whose high-school tests show high mechanical aptitude, learn a skilled trade or go to Massachusetts Tech, and, if so, what will he use for money? But Paul Kenyon, Sr., learned at the age of two what real problems are. In that painful wisdom, neither he nor his are ever likely to lose perspective.

A summer neighbor of the Kenyons' says that just renewing his acquaintance with them annually gives him a glow that lasts all winter.

Magnificent Tone . . .

LESTER Betsy Ross Spinet

Rich glorious tone is just one attribute for which the Lester Betsy Ross Spinet is famous. It is equally famous for its distinguished appearance . . . feather light action . . . durable construction . . . and compact size.

One look at the new models will convince you that they are truly a decorator's dream come true . . . and the choice of handsome styles offers the ideal one to harmonize with your home decorations. The compact size of the Betsy Ross Spinet enables you to place it to advantage in either a large or small room.

The Betsy Ross Spinet will be the "keys to happiness" in your home . . . opening wide the gates of musical enchantment for children and adults.

For lasting satisfaction . . . make your piano the Betsy Ross Spinet . . . made only by the Lester Piano Manufacturing Company, makers of the renowned Lester Grand Pianos. Moderately priced and Guaranteed for ten years.

ONE name quality price

SOLD BY AMERICA'S FOREMOST PIANO DEALERS

Foreign Sales Office:
H. A. ASTLETT & CO., 27 William St., New York 5, N. Y.

MAIL THIS COUPON FOR ILLUSTRATED BOOKLET Y
LESTER PIANO MANUFACTURING CO., LESTER 13, PENNSYLVANIA

Send me your 24-page illustrated book showing piano arrangement in the home. (Enclose 10c for postage.)

NAME _____
ADDRESS _____
CITY _____ STATE _____

A BEAUTIFUL PIANO WITH A MAGNIFICENT TONE

FOR SMO-O-OTH IRONINGS

Do up your next basket of freshly washed things with Quick Elastic—find out the difference it makes in your starching and ironing. 1. You'll get smo-o-th hot starch—all cooked and ready to use in 30 seconds. (Follow directions here.) 2. Each piece you iron . . . your cottons, curtains, dresses, shirts . . . will have a nice, soft, fresh-smelling body and finish. 3. Special ingredients already mixed in powdered Quick Elastic end sticking, pulling—make your iron fairly glide along.

Why stick with the old kind any longer? For smo-o-th ironings—quick starching—join the thousands changing to this special powdered mixture. Get Quick Elastic—that quick starch—the only one in the yellow box. Instantly prepared . . . gives a lovely finish . . . wonderful for ironing. Get your yellow box, today.

THAT QUICK STARCH

1 CREAM A LITTLE QUICK ELASTIC IN COOL WATER—

2 NOW, STIR AND POUR BOILING WATER INTO IT.*

THEY SAY:

A new user writes: "Ma[illegible] box of Quick Elastic . . . it's a pleasure to iron. Now I use Quick Elastic exclusively."

Says a California woman: "I sure admire the idea of not boiling the starch. I ironed my first set of dresses today and they ironed so smooth and even."

From the Middle West: "My sons [illegible] Quick Elastic because the shirts had such a sweet smell and were so glossy and had just the right stiffness."

A lady writes this: "Everything you say about Quick Elastic is true. It's amazing to be able to do away with the old cooking method and save time and [illegible]."

*Be sure to pour your boiling water into your Quick Elastic and cool water. Do not pour the creamed Quick Elastic into the boiling water.

WHY STICK WITH THE OLD KIND ANY LONGER?

REPORT to the Housewife

BY JUDY BARRY

LOOK, NO LEGS!

Handy for baby clothes, blouses or many another small quick pressing job is a new little legless ironing board, which clings firmly by a metal loop to any doorknob, held steady by a wooden brace beneath. It's 32″ long, 8″ wide, a size that fits into many traveling bags and bureau drawers.

•

SHOCK-SAVER

A neat new plastic shield for electric wall outlets seems to be something that every home, particularly where there are children who play on the floor with metal toys, ought to invest in as a safety measure, to help prevent electric shocks, short circuits or even worse. This cover is attached to the baseboard by a special long screw which accompanies it.

•

Did you know that one pound of salvaged fat makes six—count 'em, 6—bars of laundry soap? Don't let a drop go to waste!

•

WONDER STUFF

This is news—a plastic-treated paper that is sewable, water-resistant, wrinkle-resistant, and may be wiped free of soil and stains with a damp cloth! It's good to look at, done in pleasant colors and patterns, has an interesting crinkly texture, and suggests itself for many decorative and practical uses in our homes, since it's reasonably rugged and takes a good deal of surface wear, we have found. Comes by the yard or made up into shelf paper, bridge-table covers, book jackets, and so on, and can be sewed by hand or machine, pasted or glued. Right now, in the Workshop, we are planning to cover our notebooks and cookbooks with it—and to make gay place mats out of the tag ends. Ours isn't, but we are told that the next batch from the factory will be flameproofed.

•

NEVER A DULL MOMENT

Clever new scissors have replaceable blades. When the edges become dulled, the tired blades can be thrown away and replaced with sharp new ones at less than the usual cost of sharpening scissors. It takes about ten seconds to replace a set of blades.

•

ELECTRIC LULLABY

The glamour girl of the electrically-warm-by-night family should be arriving in your town just about now: a gleaming satin electric comforter. Practical as present-day glamour girls usually are, the satin shell of the comforter may be easily zipped off for dry cleaning, while the inside warming sheet, where the businesslike electronic controls are, slips out for washing. The "under" side of the 72″ by 86″ comforter is of spun-rayon faille, which is said to be proof against slipping, the bad habit of so many comforters.

•

M-M-M, GOOD COFFEE!

A new thought in filters for glass coffee makers has arrived in the Workshop, and we've invited it to settle down and stay. It's a simple stainless-steel coil easily cleaned in a few moments by just rinsing under the water faucet.

ANY MAIL?

You can see your love letters (or bills, alas!) at a glance in the new transparent plastic mailboxes, which come in ruby red, blue or green to harmonize with the color of your front door, or in crystal-clear plastic. This plastic is well suited for such outdoor service, since it withstands extremes of temperature, rain or hard knocks, and can be kept clean easily with soap and water.

•

DIVIDE AND MULTIPLY

If you have as much trouble with kitchen arithmetic as we do, you will welcome a helpful little gadget, a new kitchen calculator, which does all your dividing of cups and spoonfuls for you when you're trying to cut down or build up a recipe. All you have to know is what portion of the original recipe you wish to use. The economical little measurer will fit into your recipe file, and would certainly fit into the affections of a neophyte cook.

•

OUT WITH THE OLD

Now you can buy replaceable Venetian-blind tapes, with a simple fastening device that makes it easy to slip on fresh new ones without removing the blinds from the windows or even disturbing the cords. Once the new tape is slipped over the end of the blind, the grimy old ones can be snipped off, the fresh ones moved into position.

•

MINIATURE MIXER

Handy little fellow, especially to dinner-for-two cooks, is a new small portable mixer which can be used with any bowl, jar or saucepan. We've found it convenient in the Workshop for whipping up small quantities—a cup of cream or thin popover batter. It's easy to wash: just detach the six-inch-long agitator and slip it under running water for a minute.

•

At the public library in most large cities you will find the Standard Refrigerator Manual to help you find out the trade-in value of your old refrigerator.

•

THREE TIMES A DAY

Anything that makes dishwashing easier is one of our favorite things to report to you about! A new kind of paper dishcloth does this, and so does a new liquid detergent whose mission in life is to make china and glasses sparkle. We've used our Workshop dishcloth (it's vegetable parchment, 17" by 17", all perforated) once a day for a month, and it's still whole and hale and hearty. We think its chief virtue is the fact that it keeps its white fresh appearance, doesn't get that soggy look that even the best of cloth ones do. As for the detergent, a bottle cap full is enough for a large pan of dishes.

•

GLAMOUR GIRL

Believe it or not, we've seen a new garbage container that's practically a thing of beauty. It's polished aluminum, squared in shape so it fits neatly into a corner with its step-on lever recessed so there's no treadle sticking out to bump your toe or catch your nylons. . . . Also of polished aluminum is a little "career girl" washboard, which comes in just the right size for bathroom-basin laundry such as underwear, dickeys and gloves.

•

FLAVORSOME FAVORITE

Pepper, freshly ground from the corns in a mill, has always been a must to gourmets. Now, attractive little pepper grinders are made with salt shakers to match in hobnail glass, in modern blond wood, or brightly colored plastic—making them provide a feast for the eye as well as the palate. Complete with a little packet of fresh peppercorns for the first grinding.

•

PIE IN A PACKAGE

The entire wherewithal for an apple pie just like mother used to make will soon be on your grocer's shelf, all done up in a compact little box. Dried apples and the piecrust mix sit cheek by jowl in the package, just waiting for water, sugar and a short sojourn in the oven; after which it will emerge as a pie which should wreathe your family in appreciative smiles.

•

TOUCH TILE

You'll enjoy getting acquainted with the new pastel-tinted plastic bowls. They're useful and hardy in spite of their lightness. They'll take hot or cold foods, stay in the refrigerator without expanding or contracting, won't chip or crack or break. A little squeeze on the sides and you can pour as neatly from a plastic bowl as from a pitcher—they're very pliant and flexible.

Revive and Shine with these 3 RECIPES!

DUSTLESS DUSTING

- First, make your own treated duster by adding a few drops of O-Cedar All-Purpose Polish to a clean, dampened cloth.
- Then, dust with a "gathering-in" motion, to keep dust from scattering.
- Do floors this same dustless way, by adding All-Purpose Polish to your O-Cedar Mop. It cleans and gleams both.

FURNITURE FEEDING

- Experts recommend "feeding" the finish several times a year, to help prevent cracking. Like this:
- Apply O-Cedar Polish sparingly and let stand 15 minutes. (It's famous for its protective qualities.)
- Then rub to satiny luster with clean cloth. Notice how O-Cedar cleans and polishes at the same time. More homemakers use it than any other brand!

SPOTS AND SCRATCHES

- Fresh alcohol stains: Wipe up immediately and rub spot quickly with cloth treated with O-Cedar All-Purpose Polish.
- Light burns and scratches: An application of O-Cedar All-Purpose Polish will often help these.
- Deeper scratches: O-Cedar Touch-up Polish does a remarkable job of concealing scratches and other blemishes.

Genuine O-Cedar

ALL-PURPOSE POLISH

CLEANS – POLISHES – PROTECTS

IF YOU PREFER A CREAM POLISH, say O-Cedar, too! Quick—easy—no rubbing—to make refrigerators, venetian blinds, woodwork and other surfaces gleam! O-Cedar Corp'n, Chicago, Illinois; Toronto, Canada.

O-CEDAR—"THE GREATEST HELP IN HOUSEKEEPING"

For hair that commands admiration

Jewelite

All the lovely things you are to him are expressed in the shining glory of your hair. Keep it soft and lustrous by frequent use of a Jewelite Brush. Supreme creation of the brushmaker's art, Jewelite Brushes by Pro-phy-lac-tic have bristles of long, resilient Prolon that reach right down to your scalp to provide healthful stimulation, while burnishing each strand of hair to alluring, natural loveliness. Brushes, Combs and complete Dresser Sets in Jewelite are available at good brush departments. Look for the name Jewelite on the box. Jewelite is a product of Pro-phy-lac-tic, makers of the famous Pro-phy-lac-tic Tooth Brush. No other name means so much in a brush.

PRO-PHY-LAC-TIC BRUSH COMPANY, Florence, Mass.

Jewelite Roll Wave Brush, Comb and Mirror Set, available in delicate shades of ruby or sapphire or in diamond-clear crystal

Pro-phy-lac-tic Combs for men and women are beautifully styled in Jewelite and other lovely plastics. Remember the name . . . Pro-phy-lac-tic!

JEWELITE BY PRO-PHY-LAC-TIC

The Aristocrat of Plastics

UNDER-COVER STUFF

(Continued from Page 5)

the water on the floor had apparently brought into play the beaver's dam-building instinct. He had carefully sawed up all the eighteenth-century chairs and tables, and with the aid of cushions and books had constructed a completely adequate dam.

• • •

Every New Englander who hasn't done so already will surely want to read Ferris Greenslet's THE LOWELLS AND THEIR SEVEN WORLDS—the backbone of Harvard, the Unitarian Church, the Boston Athenaeum, the textile industry and Massachusetts law, poets, architects, astronomers and world travelers. It's an engrossing book because you find yourself arguing with the Lowells at every turn. But they always win. All, we might say, except Lawrence Lowell, who, of all the great Lowells, went out in something less than a cloud of glory. When Sacco and Vanzetti had gone to their deaths, President Lawrence Lowell, of Harvard, who had been one of the committee of three to look into the case, lost prestige with a large part of the country. In the Athenaeum on the morning after the two Italians had been electrocuted, there was a slip of paper in every magazine. It read: "On this day Nicola Sacco and Bartolomeo Vanzetti, dreamers of the brotherhood of man, who hoped it might be found in America, were done to a cruel death by the children of those who fled long ago to this land for freedom."

• • •

Now there's a patriotic dog book! SHADOW, THE ALL-AMERICAN DOG, by Pearl Darr Snyder, is written for third and fourth graders, and concerns a dog who wasn't pure poodle or bull or dachshund but a little of each—of French and English and

REPRINTED COURTESY THIS WEEK

"You're as impossible as your father, whoever he is!"

German stock. How he made out in the show with his mixed blood is the crux of the idea.

• • •

Betty Betz does a smart job on teen-agers in her amusing cartoon book (verses by Anne Clark), YOUR MANNERS ARE SHOWING—an Emily Post for bobby-sockers and up, done in their own language. Certainly a few years back, though there were no doubt quite as many casually made acquaintanceships (pickups) as now, there was definitely no comment on them, especially in verses for the young. But now:

"Beware of wolves! Play safe, my pet,
Don't speak to guys you've never met.
'I'm sure I've seen your face before!'
Are words you'd do best to ignore."

YOUR MANNERS ARE SHOWING presents sound advice. The fact that it doesn't side-step reality is probably all in its favor. "Don't ever smoke or drink, all you young 'uns! Liquor is poison which tastes like

SUSIE Q. SMITH

REPRINTED COURTESY KING FEATURES

"MUST you rustle your newspaper, daddy, when I'm trying to study?"

straight formaldehyde and cigarettes are filthy weeds which stain your teeth and fingers yellow.' Actually that's my personal opinion," says Betty Betz. *"But let's not kid ourselves, kids. If more than half the people of the world indulge in smoking and drinking of some sort, chances are you'll probably be exposed to them somewhere along the line. . . . All I suggest is that you think it over carefully."

And she proceeds very wisely to show them how to go about considering.

• • •

Apparently ex-Follies girls are not content with the simple pleasures that satisfy ex-Rockettes (see December issue). Not long ago one of these beauties had a purse stolen from a night-club table when she left it to dance. As listed to the police, the purse contained: five hundred dollars cash, diamond-studded gold lipstick-and-perfume set, solid-gold memorandum pad and pencil, diamond-studded gold money clip, diamond-studded gold cigarette lighter, diamond-studded gold compact, diamond-studded gold coin purse, forty solid-gold keys and a diamond-studded pillbox. Saccharin or aspirin?

• • •

According to publishers, a book about Abraham Lincoln can't fail. Every year a new life appears, and now we have THE LINCOLN READER, compiled by Paul Angle. This is a new type of biography. It is a selection from the various lives—from Sandburg, Ida Tarbell, Herndon, Gideon Welles, Nicolay and Hay, and so on. These contributions Mr. Angle has tied together to form a chronological whole covering Lincoln's life from his birth to his death. Americans are personally proud of their Lincoln. He was a plain, homely, awkward, poor, honest man, and we love him because of each one of these attributes. That he was also smart and turned a neat phrase and had a good sense of humor is so much extra gold. A country can't go far wrong with such a hero.

• • •

It came as a great surprise to read that at least 500,000 women in the U. S., according to a well-known wigmaker, are bald!

INTERNATIONAL

INTERNATIONAL

For 500,000 women, a wigmaker is as essential as the local beauty shop.

YOUR Pride and Joy FOR YEARS TO COME

a lifetime of PERMANENT glowing beauty of your bedroom smile with bright, cheerful, ning furniture.

modern pieces like these. Friendly beauty in the vibrant warmth of the Sandy And lingers there

s you live with it you'll ure is built to stay sound and lovely for a e. It's Permanized!

anized?" Why . . . haven't you heard? el has discovered a way to keep joints and ed surfaces from ever coming apart . . . re- ss of climate . . . no matter how damp or how hot or cold.

And here's something else you've often wished for. A drawer you can pull out with your little finger.

That's a Permaslide® drawer, made only by Mengel, of molded plywood . . . guaranteed never to stick or loosen. Its smooth, rounded corners dust as easily as a flat surface.

More! Feel that Mengel finish! Many coats are there . . . oven-hardened, so you can restore its lovely lustre with every polishing.

The "Mengel Man" trademark is your guide to advantages like these. Look for it when you buy . . . so you can brighten your bedroom at a price that's no blow to your budget.

MENGEL

We have a new booklet "Let's Dress Up Your Bedroom." Mail the coupon for your copy. The Mengel Company, Dept. 123, Louisville 1, Ky.

*Name*_____

*Street*_____

*City*_____

©1956 The Mengel Co.

Mengel

Permanized Furniture

*Mengel Inc.

caresses your instep collects his compliments

If ordinary pumps cut, try the blissful ease of TANGO, famous Paradise classic. Its flexible instep gives with every tiny movement of your foot. Watch his admiring glances, too!

Paradise Shoes

BRAUER BROS. SHOE CO., ST. LOUIS 2, MISSOURI

THE TEMPLE OF DEMOCRACY

(Continued from Page 34)

*The purpose of the theater is to find, and hold up to our regard, what is admirable in the human race. The theatrical profession may protest as much as it likes, the theologians may protest, and the majority of those who see our plays would probably be amazed to hear it, but the theater is a religious institution devoted entirely to the exaltation of the spirit of man. . . .

The priests and priestesses of these temples are certainly unaware of the nature of their profession. But consider what they sell, and you face a different prospect. The plays that please most and run longest in these sin-haunted alleys are representative of human loyalty, courage, love that purges the soul, grief that ennobles. . . .

As everybody knows, the great plays of the world—those accepted by civilization as part of a great heritage and played for centuries—these are almost all concerned with the conduct of exceptional men or women in positions of great responsibility, men with tragic faults and weaknesses but with mind and strength enough to overcome in the struggle with evil forces, both those within themselves and those without. This is Hamlet, The Cid, Prometheus. And it is also, please note, Abe Lincoln in Illinois. . . .

The worshipers pay a fairly high rent for their pews in Broadway's theatrical Forties, and not many of them realize that they are assisting in a worship, but they sit in church nevertheless, and acquire virtue thereby according to their understanding and the wisdom and skill of the functioning playwright.

Oedipus Tyrannus and Macbeth and Lear and Eyolf and The Little Foxes teach one and all that an evil action revenges itself upon the doer. Antigone and Hamlet and a thousand modern plays argue that injustice is a corrosive, and will eat the heart out of him who practices it. Analyze any play please which has survived the test of continued favor, and you will find a moral, a rule of social conduct or a rule of thumb which the race has considered valuable enough to learn and pass along. . . .

And now I give a definition of what seems to me morally sound. An artist believes that there is good and that there is evil in his work for what seems to him good, and expects ultimate victory for it; then he is moral sound. If he does not believe in the existence of good and evil or if, believing in them, he asks, or even anticipates, the triumph of evil, he is morally unsound. . . .

In brief, I have found my religion in the theater, where I least expected to find it, and where few will credit that it exists. But it is there and any man who tries to write plays with himself serving . . . only because he can succeed in no other way. . . .

According to the worshipers of the good who sit in our theaters, a hero may have his doubts and indecisions, for he is only human, but when it comes to the test he must be willing to take steel in his bosom or take lead through his intestines or he resigns his position as a man. The audience, sitting in our theaters makes these rules and, in setting them, defines the purposes and beliefs of Homo sapiens. There is no comparable test that knows of for what is good in the human soul, what is most likely to lead to that distant and secret destination which the race has chosen for itself and will somehow find.

★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★

New Father

By Ethel Barnett de Vito

He came in set to break the tradition
That hounded the men in his position:
No fingernails gnawed, no jumps, no glooms,
No swooning in hospital waiting rooms.

His manner was careless, meant to say
That he went through this at least twice a day,
And as for his poise, his detached air ——
A lion could envy his savoir-faire.

But an all-night wait and another's pain
Reduced him to something else again,
And something as big as half his arm
Played hob with his boredom and his calm.

And when it was over, his sheepish grin
Appeared no kin to the one that came in;
Pale and trembling, he paused in the jamb,
"A boy," he breathed, and went out like a lamb!

★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★

 Excerpts from The Bases of Artistic Creation, copyrighted 1942 by The Trustees of Rutgers College in New Jersey and published by the Rutgers University Press, and to be included in The Writer and the Theatre, a series of essays by Mr. Anderson to be published by William Sloan Associates.*

BED MAY BE BAD FOR YOU!

(Continued from Page 33)

Nervous patients show evidences of fatigue and easy fatigability; this fatigue is a symptom of the neurosis. Overstudy, overapplication, overexertion and all other excess expenditures of energy do not cause psychiatric troubles; they are often the expression of psychiatric illness."

And so the modern psychiatrist rejects rest as a cure even for "tiredness"—a symptom which, to most of us, would seem to demand rest, if anything does. But we are wrong. Consider the neurotic being as if he were an automobile, Doctor Menninger suggests. If he is "worn out," perhaps it is because he has been living too tensely—an automobile will become overheated if it is driven with the brakes set. Resting the car will not effect a cure, for as soon as the engine is started up again the same overheating will result.

The question is, "Why are the brakes set and how does one release them?"

And that question leads into the whole vast subject of modern psychotherapy which includes the effort to redirect the patient's wasted energy. Neurotic and psychotic individuals are people whose aggressive drives cannot find a satisfactory outlet; something has blocked their energies so that they can not work or play or really rest. The old treatment of forcing them to be idle and passive meant forcing them to turn the aggressive tendencies inward on themselves; guilt, unhappiness and sometimes suicide were the possible results.

The Army physicians, dealing with men just returned from conditions of abnormal stress, were particularly aware of the psychological effects of rest versus activity. On the doubt about it—a [illegible] h her happiness. And you can learn to make your own [illegible] ger Sewing Center.

(Continued on Page 188)

"Another date? Gosh, Sis—what that Singer Sewing Center did for you!"

Friendly Singer experts teach you how to plan, cut out, fit. How to remodel dated dresses into gay, new styles. We do finish-up tasks for you, too—cover buttons and belts, picot, hemstitch. And we've smooth accessories and smart trims, at prices that won't embarrass your purse.

We'll be looking for you at your Singer Sewing Center!

• Sparkle up your simplest frock with our [illegible] tume flower, a bright scarf, or a frilly [illegible]

• Delight a dainty lady with one of these [illegible] scented as spring blossoms, satin-covered hangers, and boxes keep frocks, hose, and hankies leading a charmed life.

forms save tedious try-ons. [illegible] s us only 30 minutes to mold it to gure! This "stand-in" is a wonder-, too, for anyone who sews for a er away at school.

• Electric Irons of true Singer quality! Folding travel iron has easy thermostat control. Balanced Singer iron for home [illegible] durability.

• Easiest notion-shopping in town! Wealth of notions well displayed so you choose what you need without effort. Threads, zippers, shoulder pads, buttons, and novelty trims—for mighty little money.

• This lovely incidental table holds all your sewing needs. Period lines. Mahogany or walnut finish. Ample drawer space and sliding spool tray. One of many handsome models fitted and unfitted.

antam-weight [illegible] ble is efficient out of all proportion size. Sews perfect lockstitch, back- or forwards. Carrying case holds ments and accessories.

FOR YOUR PROTECTION!

Singer sells its machines only through Singer [illegible] the window, and never through department stores or other outlets.

Check address of your local Singer Shop in [illegible] Central Avenue, Fort Dodge, Iowa. Hundreds more from coast to coast. There's one [illegible]

SINGER SEWING CENTERS

THERE'S ONE NEAR YOU TO SERVE YOU

NOW!
WASH and BLUE
at the same time
with BLU-WHITE
MAKES CLOTHES
DAZZLING WHITE!
BLU WHITE
FLAKES
BLU-WHITE
Blues while you wash
Does not streak
WHITENS! BRIGHTENS!
JUST IMAGINE!
BLU-WHITE COMBINES
A SPECIAL BLUING WITH PURE, MILD SOAP
FLAKES!
WHITER WASHES!
Blu-White does what soap alone cannot do – washes and blues! It gives mounds of white cleansing suds with beautiful blue water. No extra bluing rinse! No streaks! Blu-White alone does a complete washing job, or you can use it with your usual soap.
BRIGHTER UNDIES!
Blu-White is all you need to wash tinted things dainty as never . . . white things dazzling. It's safe for everything, even nylons. And so gentle to the hands. Blu-White never over-blues. No wonder 9 out of 10 users prefer it to any thing else they have ever used
Today-Get BLU-WHITE

(Continued from Page 186)

basis of the first front-line hospital reports—when rest was ruled out by practical considerations alone—Army physicians learned the value of pressing patients to almost superhuman efforts toward recovery. In air-evacuation planes, on their way back from the battlefield, wounded men were told to begin exercises which would make it easier to adjust their artificial limbs later.

In this country, in Army hospitals, men were kept as active as their strength allowed through a series of graduated exercises; these varied from wiggling of the toes, among the patients who could do nothing else, all the way to ten-mile hikes with field equipment for those nearly recovered.

The results of this system—first devised for returned men by Dr. Howard Rusk, of Army Air Forces, at Jefferson Barracks, St. Louis—have been sensationally good. In the 259 A.A.F. hospitals where they were used they reduced the relapses in all types of disease by 25 per cent, and cut down to one third the average period of convalescence. Even patients suffering from contagious diseases—scarlet fever, measles, and so on—were up and about in a third of the usual time under the heroic methods of the Air Force.

The get-up-early system was so successful in the Army that it has been carried over into the Veterans Administration hospitals. Dr. John E. Davis, director of the athletic services of V.A., reported to the American Psychiatric Association that "convalescent reconditioning rather than inert bed rest has reduced the length of hospitalization by as much as thirty to forty per cent and has cut readmissions as much as twenty-five per cent." One hundred thousand veteran patients have so far been involved; this shortening of their period of recovery has had the incidental result of cutting the cost of rehabilitation from the $40,000 per case spent by the Government on each World War I hospital patient to $300 a case.

"We have come back to the fundamentals of therapy," Doctor Davis has said, "to increase the patient's sense of importance, to help him feel that his efforts are worth-while and that he, himself, is necessary for the unique contribution to life that his pattern of individuality alone can contribute." Getting the patient up and about is one of the first steps in this program.

Doctors thus are tending toward the belief that—except for patients with a fever—the less quiet the hospital stay, the better. This consideration applies to every type of malady so far investigated. Dr. George Minot, a psychiatrist, reminded a conference of doctors last year that "rest" means different things to different patients. He told of a policeman who was advised by his doctor to rest for two weeks. "He took an automobile drive from Boston to California and back in twelve days. To him, rest meant change. Another patient, a woman, was told to rest in bed; she spent a certain number of hours a day in bed, but answered the telephone, jotted down notes, made up menus, advised the family and worked out her problems for the day. To her, rest meant simply being in bed." Such patients have always got around the doctor's injunction to "take a good rest"; it appears now that their instincts were quite right. Not rest, but a change of pace, was what they needed.

For the human spirit is involved in the debate on bed versus wheel chair. Man is a dynamic animal; neither his body nor his spirit can be happy at rest. Even in sleep—even in sickness—growth and recovery come through movement.

We have to retire from life for a little while when we are feverish or unconscious or in unendurable pain. But the lesson of the newer medical studies is clear enough: the sooner we grit our teeth and take the first painful steps back to active living, the better our chances of making a full recovery.

Pampered patients have died unnecessary deaths. The Army, which could not afford to baby its men under the stress of a war emergency, has given civilian medicine a precious discovery which will be of benefit to all of us for all time to come; the lesson is: Get up quickly, and start living again if you want to get well!

★ ★

Ask Any Woman

BY MARCELENE COX

THERE are three kinds of dusting: In the first, you dust everything, including air rungs; in the second, you dust only the s of things; in the third, you draw the les.

to erworked as a dog with four children low.

th sh stery: How a boy can go straight gh a tub of sudsy water and come out ıg dirty.

a te of encouragement to parents of escents: Children grow up to their noses way puppies do to their feet.

What a man hears is "news," what a nan hears is gossip.

Excerpt from a freshman theme entitled spense: "A flash of lightning showed us at the candle had gone out."

Perhaps parents would enjoy their children even more if they stopped to realize that the m of childhood can never be run through r a second showing.

Families reside in houses and live in homes.

If a graph were taken of some parents' scipline, it would waver like the coast line New England.

Daughters will learn how to iron quickly ough when it becomes a question of hether they're to wear wrinkled or scorched othing.

A group of schoolgirls, giving beau-by-beau descriptions of their latest triumphs.

When I was a child, no disciplining measure equaled the power of a tiny switch; even the flourishing of a dandelion sprout was enough to keep me good a month.

Before the architect goes ahead on the plans of a house for any woman, he ought first to call in all her friends and find out the kind of house they like.

Note to children: Always carry your food to your mouth instead of your mouth to your food.

Perhaps one reason that women who have a good start in children just keep on is that they've discovered that the visit to the hospital is their one chance at a vacation.

It is possible to tell almost all you need to know about a woman by listening to the way she calls her children into the house.

They say it's never too late to learn, but in the case of a first child it may be too early.

People liked the family so well they used its guest towels.

Fathers sometimes shirk punishing the children for a selfish reason: they don't want to make themselves unpopular with their offspring.

No one ever balanced a budget without first balancing his wants.

While you go out to market your clothes wash sparkling clean

The dial's set; the soap's in. And there's nothing more to do! All by itself the Bendix fills itself with water ...washes clothes...changes its own water...rinses 3 times...damp drys clothes ...cleans itself...drains itself...shuts itself off. You never put hands in water. Go where you please...stay as long as you like!

Only the BENDIX tumble-action principle washes clothes so clean...so gently...with so little hot water and soap...and no work at all!

IT'S TUMBLE-ACTION SUDSING! Clothes are tumbled through the liveliest suds hundreds of times—washing through fabrics so thoroughly that even heavy dirt doesn't have a chance. No agitator—no paddles—no suction! Nothing to pull, snag or grind delicate fabrics. That's why the Bendix washes everything from mud-stained denims to trousseau treasures so clean, so gently!

NO DIRTY WATER WASHING! Of course you wouldn't start a wash with dirty water. And, it stands to reason, you can't get clothes as clean when second and even third loads go through soil-weakened suds and chilled-off water. Every load gets a fresh, clean water sudsing in the Bendix—and clothes never get that dull, gray, dirty water look.

THE RINSING CHAMPION! The Bendix rinses three times—with fresh, warm water. First the Bendix shower rinses away soil-laden suds. Then come two deep rinses—tumbling clothes hundreds of times through two more automatic changes of clean, fresh water. What a cure for washday gray and soil-dulled colors.

SAVE A LOT OF HOT WATER! The water saver cylinder does just that for you. It's so efficient . . . it uses only $7\frac{1}{2}$ gallons of hot water for the big 9 pound Bendix load—only about 6 gallons more (depending upon temperature of hot and cold water) for all three rinses. And, with less water in the cylinder, you need less soap for good, brisk cleansing suds.

LABORATORY TESTS have proved it time after time—and half a million Bendix owners prove it over and over, with every washing. Only the Bendix tumble-action principle washes clothes so clean, so gently—with so little hot water and soap. Only the Bendix has a nine-year record for wonderful, workless washing. See your dealer's Bendix demonstration.

Coming Soon:
Bendix Automatic Dryer
Bendix Automatic Ironer

BENDIX automatic
Home Laundry

Guaranteed by Good Housekeeping

BENDIX HOME APPLIANCES, INC. • SOUTH BEND 24, INDIANA

AVAILABLE IN CANADA AND M IC

A room that turns its face to the sun may be opened to receive its warmth and friendliness—one end completely glazed, with top and bottom sash hinged to allow for almost perfect ventilation, and the flooring beneath the windows done in an impervious material, so that green growing things can be watered without impairing the surface.

PHOTO BY HAROLD FOWLER

Room in the Sun

BY HAL WILLIAMS

SUCH a room as this, flooded in brilliant sunshine, could be created on the top floor of a town house, to feed the soul of a city-bound sun worshiper, as easily as it was in the Poconos where this one was made. The large center window sash are fixed; those above and below are hinged for ventilation. Over these, removable interior screens could be installed in summertime, if they were needed. The split-bamboo roller shades are of warm tortoise-shell coloring; the slightly raised floor section beneath the windows, where flowering plants are bound to thrive and grow beautiful, is, in our sunshine room, done in bluestone. It might have been brick or tile or flagstone with equal effectiveness. A small bleached-oak cabinet, between the twin rose-red armless chairs, was once a washstand. Full draperies of striped spun glass may be drawn to shut out the outdoor scene, if the day is rainy and cheerless.

In the inner room with its dusky blue walls, the flooring is bleached oak; the hooked rug, contemporary American. Drawn up to the oversize sofa covered in textured rayon fabric is a coffee table proportionately generous in size and comfortably low, made of wood with a dark marble finish and fitted with a glass top.

In Just 3 Minutes You'll Know

How to choose a Radio-Phonograph by making this simple test:

1. Ask your radio dealer to play one of your favorite records (bring one from home if you wish) on any radio-phonograph in his store except the new Zenith with the COBRA TONE ARM.

2. Then ask him to play the same record on a Zenith with the amazing COBRA TONE ARM. The difference will astound you! Gone is all annoying noise, hiss, rattle! And the music sounds as if a muffling blanket had been miraculously removed, revealing notes and passages never heard in such glorious fidelity before! Yes, even your oldest records will reveal thrilling new richness of tone through the COBRA'S magic.

That's because the COBRA TONE ARM is an entirely new principle—uses no crystals or magnets, but reproduces tones on a Radionic Wave—responds to the most delicate shadings and overtones which are almost completely lost by old-way methods. So lightly does the COBRA float in the groove (only $\frac{2}{3}$ of an ounce) that records also stay like new—you enjoy them hundreds of plays longer!

See, too, how foolproof the COBRA is . . . drop it, even scrape it across the record . . . its filament retracts so nothing's harmed! And watch Zenith's new Silent-Speed Record Changer at work. It changes 10 inch records, 12 inch, or both sizes mixed—so gently, quietly, swiftly, that you enjoy a practically continuous flow of music! Get this demonstration today, and you'll see the last word in how to buy a radio-phonograph for your home that will make you forever proud of your choice.

ZENITH RADIO CORPORATION, CHICAGO 39, ILLINOIS
30 YEARS OF "KNOW-HOW" IN RADIONICS EXCLUSIVELY

Model 12H090, $375. Others from $26.95 to $395.
(West Coast Prices Slightly Higher.)

REMEMBER . . . NO OTHER INSTRUMENT . . .

AT ANY PRICE . . . CAN GIVE YOU THIS

SENSATIONAL NEW WAY TO PLAY RECORDS!

ONLY ZENITH •LONG DISTANCE• RADIO

HAS THE AMAZING

COBRA TONE ARM

Three ways to warm your Valentine's heart
HEARTS AND FLOWERS
Boil ¼ cup sugar, ½ cup water, 2-inch stick cinnamon for 5 minutes; remove cinnamon stick. Add ½ cup each of pineapple and orange juice, 2 tablespoons lemon juice, 3 cups strong hot tea. Add heart shaped cherry on sliced nougat
VALENTINE HONEY
Place 1 teaspoon honey or jelly, 1 slice lemon, whole cloves and cinnamon stick in tea cup. Add muddler in tea cup. Add strong tea prepared according to package directions. Serve at once.
MINT CUP
Prepare tea according to package directions. Add 2 teaspoons mint jelly instead of sugar to each cup. Serve with lemon slice, topped with heart shaped maraschino cherry
There's an old proverb that says tea gladdens the heart—and these truly tempting recipes prove it. And to enjoy heartwarming goodness, choose one of these famous blends: Our Own, Nectar or Mayfair. Each is Flavor Tested to bring you a full measure of enjoyment. One taste will tell you why they are America's favorites!
A POPULAR BLEND
OUR OWN TEA
FULL-BODIED AND VIGOROUS A NATIONAL FAVORITE NECTAR TEA
RICH AND FLAVORFUL
A LUXURY BLEND
MAYFAIR TEA
DELICATE AND FRAGRANT
Famous For Quality Since 1859
A&P
IMPORTED SOLD AND GUARANTEED BY A&P

LOOK YOUR PRETTIEST

(Continued from Page 52)

S and S. You might spend quite an evening with pencil and paper, guessing what those two letters mean. Might mean anything. Might mean sugar and sillabub—but they don't. They mean ——

Salmon and Sole. This is a loaf, a hot loaf. This is the receipt:

SALMON-AND-SOLE LOAF

Grease a loaf pan about 9 inches long very, very heavily with butter or margarine. Drain and take off the skin and bones from 3 cans salmon (large ones). Flake the salmon. There should be 5 or 6 cups. Fresh salmon can be used, too, if you can get it. To the salmon add the juice of 1½ lemons, ¼ cup fine dry bread crumbs, 1 onion, grated, 1 tablespoon minced parsley, 1 teaspoon dried dill, ½ teaspoon Worcestershire sauce and a dash of Tabasco sauce. Now make a very thick cream sauce. Melt 6 tablespoons butter or margarine in a saucepan over low heat. Add 6 tablespoons flour and stir until smooth and bubbly. Then add 1½ cups milk and 2 teaspoons salt and a dash of pepper. Stir constantly until thick. Mix thoroughly with the salmon. Then fold in 3 egg yolks beaten until light and thick. Taste for seasoning. (How often I've said it. How often I shall say it in times ahead.) Wash 3 fillets of sole or 4 of flounder. The larger ones are better, if you can do your own picking. Season on both sides with salt and pepper. Be sure all bones are cast into limbo. Line the inner sides of the greased loaf pan with the fillets—2 whole fillets for the long sides, 2 halves for each end. They'll stay put pretty well while you pack the salmon mixture. Set the loaf in a pan of hot water and bake 15 minutes to 1 hour in a slow oven, 300°–325° F., until firm. Let it rest 10 to 15 minutes before turning out. It will still keep hot. Turn out upside down on a platter, first loosening around the edges. Garnish with cucumbers dressed with vinegar, salt and pepper. Serve the loaf with:

ALMOND-AND-OLIVE SAUCE

For this, start with a medium-rich cream sauce, made with 4 tablespoons butter or margarine, 4 tablespoons flour and 1 cup milk and 1 cup cream. Season well with salt and pepper. Keep hot. Just before serving, stir in ¾ cup sliced stuffed olives and ½ cup almonds that have been blanched, slivered and toasted to a golden brown in a moderately slow oven, 325° F. There you are. Will you treasure this?

Running mates. Now, is there one among you who isn't perfectly cognizant, as my lawyer friends say, of the fact that I love—and I mean love—croquettes? Not the old battered down-and-outs you get in most restaurants, composed of a medley of whatever was left from yesterday's plates, but real croquettes, the kind I make, that you make, that my fine cook, Leah, makes. Those are croquettes. I love most fried things. I could eat them every day, and most days I do. My heart leaps up to 146 over 90, or whatever it is, and I get all misty-eyed when the croquettes are brought in.

POTATO CROQUETTES

Cook 1 large or 6 medium peeled potatoes in boiling salted water to cover. Drain and rice them. There should be 3 to 4 cupfuls. Whip up light with 3 tablespoons hot milk and 2 tablespoons butter or margarine. Add 2 well-beaten egg yolks, 1 teaspoon grated onion, ½ teaspoon salt, a dash of pepper, a dash or two of nutmeg and about 1 teaspoon minced parsley. Taste to be sure it pleases you. Spread the potato mixture out in a shallow pan or tray. Chill until very cold in refrigerator. Shape into thin finger-length cylinders. Roll first in fine cracker crumbs, then in beaten egg, then in crumbs again. Chill until ready to fry. Fry in deep hot fat, 365°–380° F., just a minute or so, until golden brown. Drain on unglazed paper and keep hot in the warming oven until everything is dished up.

Speak your mind. If you really did speak it, wouldn't you say that something in the

"Your man wants this"
Frank's RED HOT SAUCE
Dan Cupid's right! Your man favors the spirited flavor of Frank's Red Hot Sauce. Add 5 to 10 drops of this choice blend of Louisiana peppers and spices to meats, fish, cooked vegetables, eggs, spaghetti, soups.
NEW!
SAUSAGE BAKED POTATO
1½ lb. link sausages
8 baking potatoes
Frank's Red Hot Sauce
Wash and pare potatoes. Make hole with apple corer in each. Slit each sausage and add 4 or 5 drops Frank's Red Hot Sauce. Push into potato. Put in baking dish. Bake in hot 450°F. oven until soft. Baste every 10 or 15 minutes with drippings
A 10c Bottle Flavors 108 Meals
FREE! 32 Man-favorite recipes in New Booklet, "The Way to Your Man's Heart." Write for copy today. Address The Frank Tea & Spice Co., Dept. J, Cincinnati 2, Ohio.
Other Frank Quality Products include
Frank's Jumbo Peanut Butter
Frank's Dove Brand Olives, Spices, Mustard
Only 10c on most grocers' shelves and meat counters
Frank's RED HOT SAUCE

Vaughan's
Gardening Illustrated
265 FLOWERS IN FULL COLOR
More than 2500 new varieties and old favorites are listed in this beautiful catalog—roses, dahlias, gladioli, annuals, perennials—265 in full color!
Vegetables, too, of the luxury quality which only home gardeners can enjoy, are offered in this annual, which is packed with information invaluable to amateurs. It tells how to grow everything listed, and all about the new weed killers, insecticides, fertilizers and post-war tools and gadgets. FREE on request.
SPECIAL FOR 1947. Rated by many the most beautiful of cut flowers, the gold-veined Salpiglossis can be grown in any garden by the simple culture included with this offer. Packet of seed including all colors sent with catalog for 10c.
VAUGHAN'S SEED STORE, Dept. 112
10 W. Randolph, Chicago 1 • 47 Barclay, N.Y.C. 7

Muy bueno
SATISFACTION OR REFUND OF MONEY
Guaranteed by Good Housekeeping
IF NOT AS ADVERTISED THEREIN
OLIVES
WONDERFUL ONES IMPORTED FOR YOU
by HAASE
Glorious Spanish Queens and Manzanillas. Superb fruit of the tree of peace packed bright and green in sparkling glass jars. Watch for Haase's Olives.

1 line ended up a luncheon like this as well as anything? I would. I can think ly three other things that measure up. s a soufflé. (Ever eat a lemon-custard with a sauce devised by angels?) Or e Brûlée—that concoction that only the ed can bring to its infinite perfec- Or Crêpes Suzette—not the tough old ernecks made hours before and stacked where in the linen closet until mealtime. speak with some bitterness, it is only I have been around in strange places. -now to dessert.

FRUIT SHERBET

aw 2 one-pound packages frozen sweet- sliced strawberries. Purée through a . There should be 3 cups. Heat. Add p strained honey and a pinch of salt. ner 5 minutes. Add ¼ teaspoon rose ring, 1½ teaspoons unflavored gelatin ned in 2 tablespoons cold water and nice of a lemon. Pour into the freez-ing tray. Set up the refrigerator to the coldest place. Freeze until solid around the edges, but not completely frozen in the center. Scoop into a chilled bowl. Beat up until light and fluffy with an egg beater or a mixer. Quickly fold in 2 stiffly beaten egg whites and return to the freezing tray as fast as you can. Freeze until firm. Serve with a garnish of chopped pistachio nuts—you know, just chopped up and scattered about, casual-like.

Making good. You can forget the chill winds and the great white open spaces, the cold blue sky that, like a cynical politician, promises so much and delivers so little. You can plan George's birthday party with roses and candles or kerosene lanterns and baked-bean pots—but either way, you can make it a lovely, friendly, warm and heartening occasion. Myself, I'll eat two or three croquettes, depending on the size and my size. And think of you all—as I do a good deal of the time. Yes, indeed, you'd be surprised!

LEAVE US FACE IT

(Continued from Page 20)

h, I don't know, ma'am." Victor Hood d at us with a lot of good white teeth. nd what are you doing now, Mr. ?" she said.
till trying to rehabilitate myself, I ." nd where do you do that?"
little town in upstate New York. I'm ere to see the sights."
h, an upstate boy, huh?" Katie turned ary. "Aren't you from New York State ' she said.
es." Mary was arranging a bowl of rs over by the window. "This is an old, iendship," she said. "Vic used to carry umps home from dancing school."
weet." Katie almost whispered the and there was a very different note in oice now. "Do sit here, Mr. Hood," aid, "and tell me thing about your-were the sort oup, I remember ing, that you'd be likely to find sit- about an apart- in the East 50's w York—not cer- in a drawing in Washington, But in one way, s we were all there se of Joe.

eph Wood Demp- was not only my friend; he'd also coproduced with me hree shows I'd done on Broadway. e, of course, staged all three.) He had back in the happy 1930's, without any ion, one of the most successful men in heater. He'd produced ten plays, and f the ten he'd had seven smash hits. he beginning of the war he'd come to ington to the Office of the Co-ordinator overnment Films (OOCOGF), taken se, settled down and done a very re- able job.
e was one of the lucky ones; he could l Washington—financially, I mean— se, aside from what he'd made in the er, he was the blessed heir of a rich lfather, a Middle West railroad king. n other ways—mentally, spiritually and rth—Katie and I were not at all sure this. When the war had finally d to its conclusion, Joe, instead of ng back to show business, had stayed on. it began to look as though maybe he'd ys be in Washington. There was some e job with the State Department, some of selling good will to other nations gh movies and plays. But the point is, new Joe was not really working.
e often thought a piece might be en about the low altitude in our nation's al and its effect on people who try to work there. It's true that with some men you can almost see the slow atrophying of all creative drive. The life may not be pleasant, but it is easy. And Joe Dempster, Katie and I had to keep reminding ourselves, was energetic and a bright boy only in that special way rich people are energetic and bright. You know a person who has not had to work for his initial money in the world is under a cruel handicap when it comes to resilience and starting off again, and the two of us were genuinely concerned about how to bounce Joe back. Katie, of course, was especially worried because she was beginning to think that young Miss Mary Smith might find the answer before she did.

But, to be fair, I must admit that I knew that no matter what lethargies Joe might have fallen into, he was still a great fine fellow. He was generous, witty, had more than average good looks—and women always fell for him.

Perhaps if we define the greatest charm of personality it will be found in sympathy; that giving out of one's self when in communion with others—a lavish laying at their feet of intellect, wit, kindness, and any quality we may happen to possess. If we can do this without being unduly gushing or making ourselves cheap, then, poor or rich, we collect for ourselves in our journey through life a mighty army of friends who will feel, should we be suddenly taken away from them, that indeed we are irreplaceable.

—TROUBRIDGE

There was no question about Katie's being there because of Joe. During the war she had moved down to Washington because of him on two counts, really.

When he found that he was responsible for directing a few Government films as well as co-ordinating them, he'd screamed for her and she'd come because—well, because she was a nice, patriotic girl and liked doing her duty, and also because ever since the first night she met him Katie Hewitt had been in love with Joe Dempster. Ever since the first production she worked on with him she had forgotten that there were any other men around; he was her world. They had fought, loved, separated and made up, but there'd never been a possibility of anyone else for Miss H.

Of course, my reason for being there was much simpler and only indirectly Joe. It was Katie. At last I'd discovered a play I wanted to produce on my own, and I was confident I could arrange the necessary backing without Joe's help. I was keen to do this. It was a simple, straightforward, little comedy that I believed in completely, and naturally Katie was the one person I wanted to direct for me.

I guess, considering who we were, it was a little strange that our talk that afternoon wasn't all show business, but it wasn't. Katie concentrated on the ex-pilot, Mr. Hood, and Joe and Mary sat apart from us and talked on and on interminably about dogs, and human affection versus puppy affection.

About eight-thirty Joe announced that we were going out to eat and we all went

Invited to the Best Parties

It's only natural that Jane Parker Donuts grace the table at the finest parties. For these favorites . . . light, tender and delicious . . . are always in big demand at refreshment-time.

Jane Parker Donuts are rich with home-made goodness, and they're guaranteed fresh by the freshness date right on the package. Try them yourself . . . see why over 3,000,000 are enjoyed every day. Sugared or plain.

Jane Parker DONUTS

A&P

AT ALL A&P FOOD STORES . . .
Except on Pacific Coast

For Valentine Gifts
DOUBLE KAY NUTS—GIFT SUPREME ORDER DOUBLE KAY NUTS FOR YOUR Valentine Party
NOW!
½ lb. serves 8
So FRESH So CRISP
A FAMILY TREAT
FOR SUNDAY DINNER
Try ¼ pound DOUBLE KAY Nuts with dessert next Sunday
Look for the sparkling—white—electrically heated Double Kay Nut Shop in good stores in your community—ready to serve you with the finest nuts from all over the world—packed fresh for you at moderate prices.
Double Kay NUTS
FRESHNESS TOASTED IN

FRESHNESS TOASTED IN! FRESHNESS TOASTED IN! FRESHNESS TOASTED IN!

The sugar house stands right among the Vermont maple trees so the maple sugar can be made from freshly gathered sap.

Taste this real maple sugar flavor

The flavor of real maple sugar is a heart-warming and unforgettable treat. And that's the flavor we give you in Vermont Maid Syrup!

First, we choose maple sugar with unusually full flavor. Then we blend it with cane sugar and other sugars. This makes the maple flavor uniformly rich and delicious.

You get the same satisfying enjoyment of real maple sugar flavor every time you pour our Vermont Maid Syrup on your pancakes or waffles.

Penick & Ford, Ltd., Inc.,
Burlington, Vermont

Vermont Maid Syrup

FREE! EXAMINE THIS MONEY-MAKING PLAN ON FREE TRIAL

MAKE BIG MONEY

Just Show Delighted Friends, Neighbors, Co-Workers These Lovely All-Occasion Greeting Card Assortments That Sell On Sight!

YOU need no experience to make big money—in full or spare time, ALL YEAR LONG, selling the acknowledged style and value leaders of the greeting card industry. Show to friends, neighbors, co-workers—these exquisite new DOEHLA Everyday Assortments. So beautiful, irresistible, they sell on sight!

DOEHLA REPRESENTATIVES ARE BIG EARNERS!

FOLKS JUST LIKE YOU conduct pleasant, profitable businesses—right from their own homes—showing Doehla's 16 nationally advertised box assortments for every occasion. YEAR 'ROUND PROFIT PLAN shows you how to make as much as 50c a box, taking orders for $1 All-Occasion Assortments, Correspondence Notes, Gift Wrappings, etc. You can make EVEN MORE on quantity orders from churches, clubs, organizations through Bonus Plan.

"My customers always prefer Doehla cards," writes Miss A.D. of Indiana. "They're easier to sell and my earnings have enabled me to pay for an 80-acre farm!"

FREE TRIAL

Mail coupon NOW—at our risk—for lovely sample boxes on approval. Show them around. If friends don't buy on sight, return samples at our expense! HARRY DOEHLA CO., Dept. J-2, Fitchburg, Mass.

HARRY DOEHLA CO., Dept. J-2, Fitchburg, Mass.
Please rush to me—for FREE TRIAL—samples Everyday Assortments on approval, money making plan and special extra-profit offers. If not delighted, I will return samples without obligation, at once.

NAME .....
ADDRESS .....
CITY ..... ZONE (if any) ..... STATE .....

downstairs, got in his car and drove over to a place called Halls.

It was warm and pleasant in a back room there. We had a really spectacular dinner: shrimps Norfolk, lobsters, and steaks burned crisp on the outside and almost raw in the middle. And finally we began to sing.

There is something important in the fact that we sang just then, and especially in the list of songs we chose—something which I believe turned out to be intricately connected with what happened later—because, you see, as we began to sing we showed our ages. Joe and Katie and I—because of that pride and smug satisfaction which comes from remembering a ten or fifteen year old lyric—insisted on our songs. To these the youngsters, Mary and Victor Hood, could only listen and grin. Sometimes they would manage to get one of their new 1940-'46 tunes in, but I'm afraid we outnumbered them and we were impatient. After all, a song without a memory fixed to it does become a bore, and we soon got back to My Blue Heaven, Blue Room and Oh, By Jingo. We leaned our chairs against the wall, closed our eyes and remembered.

It was from this mood, then—warm and close and full of good food and singing—that the conversation between Katie and Mary started. I remember Joe said something about everybody's having "one special period" in his life when he is sensitive to good cheap music. And Katie said, "That we call the happiness period."

"Oh, I don't know." Vic Hood had his arm on the back of her chair. "I think it's just when you first start going out, don't you?"

"Could be," Katie said. "But it certainly does date you."

"The music at your first prom," Hood said, "is always the best music."

Katie nodded. "It's a funny thing," she said, "but no matter how you may try to conceal your age, when it comes to the words of songs you actually boast about it. I know I've won and lost more money on songs—on who sang what in which Music Box Revue—than any other betting."

"And most of it," Joe said, "you've lost to me."

Up until now, I remember, Mary had said very little. She had been leaning back with her head against Joe's arm, but suddenly she sat up. "All this talk about age bores me."

"It does?" I saw Katie come very easily to attention. "And why is that?"

"There's nothing so impressive about age as age."

"Oh, my dear," Joe said, "you're wrong."

"Just what do you mean exactly?" Katie leaned across the table.

"I mean—well, what I'm trying to say is"—Mary was frowning now—"youth as youth isn't any more impressive than age as age. It's what you are and what you think."

Katie raised her eyebrows. "That's very interesting," she said. "But don't you think there's a little matter called experience, dear? That sometimes counts."

"It counts only in how you use it," Mary said. "You can be fifty and full of experience and still be a fool. Or you can be twenty-two and intelligent and understanding."

"Irrefutable," said Joe.

"That's the trouble with youth," Katie said. "Its arguments are always irrefutable."

"Please don't make fun of me." Mary was very serious, and, oh, she was so very pretty.

"I'm not," Katie said. "I talk from force of habit."

"I have a friend," Mary went on, "a girl I was in school with who married a man fifteen or twenty years older than she is and everyone thought she was out of her head. Her family raised all kinds of objections, everyone made prophecies. You know. But they were all wrong. She couldn't be happier. It isn't how many years you have. It's what you do with them. That's the important thing."

"What's all this fight about anyway?" Vic Hood said.

"You see, older people are so intolerant, and that's what my friend had to break down.

YOUR FLOOR ALWAYS LOOKS SO IMMACULATE, EDNA!
I USE CLOROX. IT BRIGHTENS THE FLOOR... MAKES IT SANITARY, TOO!
CLOROX MAKES GERM "DANGER ZONES" HYGIENICALLY CLEAN!
CLOROX

IT'S SO EASY to include the benefits of Clorox in your normal housekeeping routine. The disinfecting value of Clorox provides the hygienic cleanliness recommended by health authorities; its deodorizing quality leaves kitchen and bathroom fresh, and its ability to remove stains makes linoleum, wood, tile, enamel, porcelain, glass surfaces sparkling clean. In laundering, Clorox makes white cottons and linens snowy-white (brightens fast colors). Use Clorox regularly, it does the job right! Simply follow directions on the label.

AMERICA'S FAVORITE BLEACH AND HOUSEHOLD DISINFECTANT

CLOROX

FREE FROM CAUSTIC

Years of unsurpassed quality and performance have made Clorox the choice of millions... it's always uniform... it's always dependable

FOR A TASTE THRILL! THE ROYALTY OF QUALITY

Ellis TAMALES SMOTHERED WITH CHILE

AT YOUR GROCER'S

THE ELLIS CANNING CO. Denver, Colo.

HERE IT IS! THE NEW PIOMAR Iron the automatic iron with the one year GUARANTEE

9 BIG FEATURES

• "Second to None" guarantee with each iron • 5-way automatic control • weighs 4½ pounds—not too heavy, not too light, but just right • even heating over entire ironing surface • tip-to-heel plate • modern streamlined design • molded handle stays cool • built-in 7-foot cord • even distributed heat ranges up to 1000 watts.

PIONEER PRODUCTS, INC.

MAIN OFFICE: 5224 FAIRLAWN AVE., BALTIMORE 15.

SAVE Time and Money

enjoy a delicious main dish

It's so-o satisfying to hearty winter appetites! Morton's combines tender chicken with pure egg noodles and sweet peppers—perfectly seasoned! It's all edible, no waste. Ready to heat and eat. Keep several jars handy for last-minute meals.

MORTON'S OTHER QUICK-FIX DINNERS
Chicken a la King
Noodle Chicken
Giblet Dinner

Guaranteed by Good Housekeeping

THIS MENU
ton's Noodle cken Dinner •
d Lettuce Salad
ned Fruit • Coffee

Morton's
QUICK-FIX DINNERS

U CAN USE 'EM
RE THAN ONCE!

artha's Hot Iron Tr
desigs, for t baby things, etc. suitable ile painting, embroidery or
No. 124
8 colonial girl motifs for tea pot holder. A 3 artha's Hot Iron Transfers at variety
F Central, pattern number

Martha's HOT IRON TRANSFERS

RUN DOWN?
FAGGED OUT?
t Vita Sert
MIN CHOCOLATE BAR

WHERE DO YOU GET THAT NEW ENERGY?

THANKS TO VITA-SERT, I FEEL ALERT ALL DAY

L fresh as a daisy.
nulate your well-be-
h Vita-Sert, the rich,
some chocolate bar.
ar contains 5 essential ins you need. For some, energizing en-nt, eat Vita-Sert.

You Get These
IN EVERY BAR
B, ... 1 Mg
B, ... 2 Mg

LERT—EAT VITA-SERT

Vita Sert
Vitamin
CHOCOLATE BAR
COOK CHOCOLATE CO.

Guaranteed by Good Ho

L COUNTERS

She even had to convince the man she married, she had to prove to him that they had a mutual need. She could have married half a dozen young guys that would have made perfectly acceptable biological mates, but she understood, and I know it's true, that biology isn't everything."

"Well," Katie said. "Well now ——"

"You've got to have a humanly workable combination as well."

Vic Hood turned to me then and whispered that he'd never realized it was so complicated. "I thought you just fell in love," he said "and got married."

"Live and learn," I told him.

Mary was talking directly to Joe now. "You see, those old proverbs," she said, "about a man being as old as he feels and a woman as old as she looks they're a lot of nonsense. The point is that neither one is any older than his or her ideas."

"Very interesting," Katie said. "If I understand you correctly, that's very interesting." She turned to Hood. "What about your ideas, my friend?"

"I've got a few," Hood nodded.

"I wonder," Katie said, "if they're on the same level as mine?"

♥ ♥ ♥ ♥ ♥ ♥ ♥

To a New Love

BY DOROTHY QUICK

I should have only tender words for you
Who make spring riot in my veins once more,
Should thank you for this love that can renew
My inner being. I should not deplore
The fact your kisses still can make me feel
The surge of earth responding to spring rain,
Yet, plenitude that growing things reveal
Is only possible through birth and pain.
Youth doesn't realize that this is so,
But I, alas, have years enough to know.

♥ ♥ ♥ ♥ ♥ ♥ ♥

I happened to be looking at Mary's face when this was said, and I couldn't help wondering from her expression whom she'd been talking to; was she trying to convince Joe of something?

"People make life so complicated," she said finally. "It should be simple."

"Yes," Katie said. "It should."

Joe cleared his throat very loudly then and said, "Well. This is fun, but I've got to get up in the morning. Oh, waiter dear!" and he signaled for the check.

I made an elaborate business of helping Mary with her coat, and Hood did the same for Katie, then the five of us started out.

As we got to the street Katie said to me, "I have a bright idea, thanks to you."

"Good."

"I'm going to give this little drama a third act after all."

"Oh, my," I said.

"That girl's out of her class. She's playing me on my home field now."

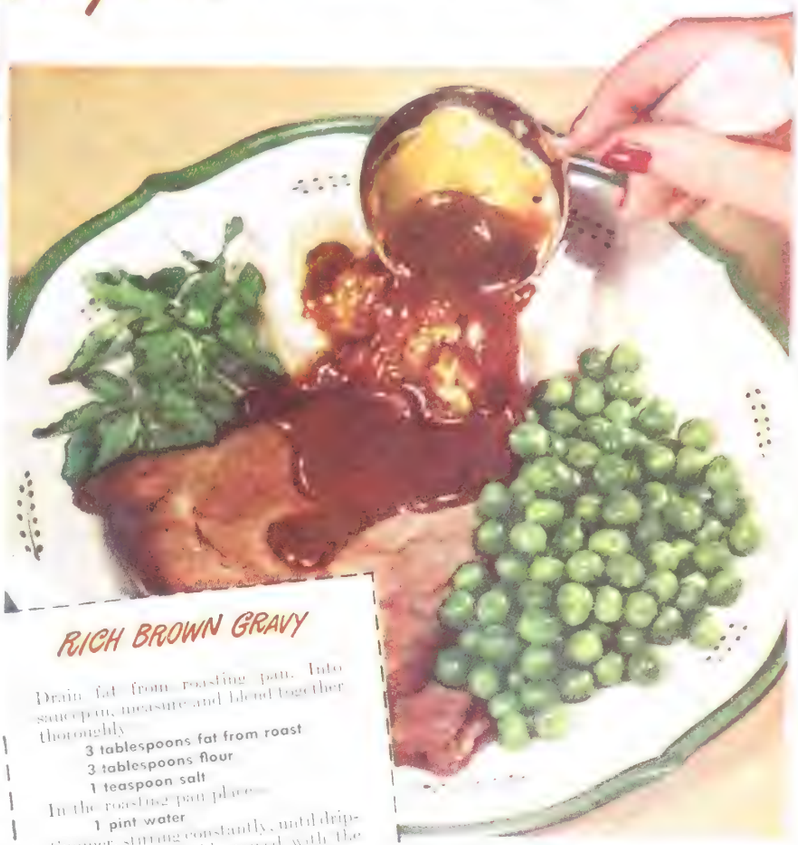
Then when we were in the car driving home I heard Katie say to Victor Hood, "Look, I have to be up on the Hill tomorrow morning, and I wonder if it would interest a visiting fireman to come along."

"I'd love to," Hood said. "But only if you'll let me give you a lunch."

"Fine," Katie said. "That'll be fine. Pick me up early."

That's about all there was to that episode, except for a few words at breakfast the next

Make GRAVY
RICH BROWN DELICIOUS
Every Time This Easy Never-Fail Way!



RICH BROWN GRAVY

Drain fat from roasting pan. Into saucepan, measure and blend together thoroughly
3 tablespoons fat from roast
3 tablespoons flour
1 teaspoon salt
In the roasting pan place
1 pint water
Simmer, stirring constantly, until drippings are thoroughly mixed with the water. Add all at once to the fat-flour mixture, stirring vigorously. Bring to a boil and cook 2 minutes. Add and stir in thoroughly
1 teaspoon Kitchen Bouquet
For a browner gravy, add a little more Kitchen Bouquet.

Save this recipe. Use it every time and make perfect gravy the rest of your life! For here's the gravy secret good cooks have long known. KITCHEN BOUQUET—the sure, easy way to get that delicious gravy with the rich, brown, appetizing color you love!

Made from garden-fresh vegetables, herbs and spices, KITCHEN BOUQUET adds no artificial flavor of its own, simply steps up—enhances—the true rich taste of the meat.

INEXPENSIVE STEWS, meat loaves, casseroles—are turned into flavorful treats. And for hearty appetites, serve potatoes (they're plentiful!) and lots of gravy—the rich, brown, delicious KITCHEN BOUQUET kind!

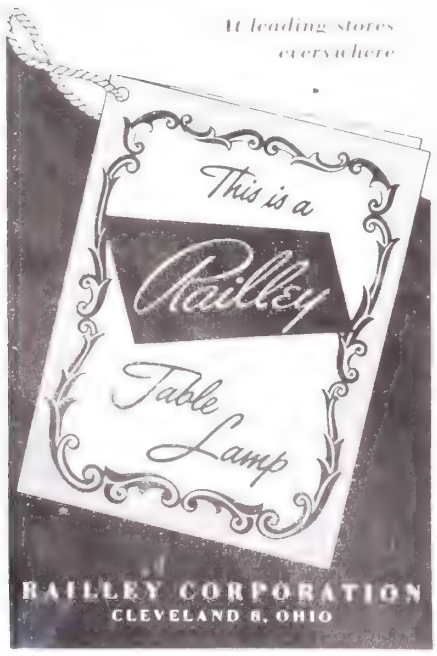
KITCHEN BOUQUET
MADE BY GROCERY STORE PRODUCTS CO.

USED BY GOOD COOKS AND CHEFS FOR OVER 70 YEARS!

And Better Light, Too

There's more than decorative beauty in Railley Table Lamps. Railley's exclusive deep-set socket lowers the light source, gives better light over a wider area. Reflector bowls shield eyes from glare. The Oxford, illustrated here, will soon be available in polished or bronze-finished brass with shade of deep maroon or forest green.

At leading stores everywhere



RAILLEY CORPORATION
CLEVELAND 8, OHIO

morning. It was one of those clear, crisp Washington days, and Joe sat across the table looking a little sleepy, but still depressingly bright and well turned out.

"I've got to start getting more sleep," he said. "These late hours are no good."

"How you feel doesn't matter," I said. "It's your ideas that are important."

"Cut it out, will you?" he said. "The girl was making love to me, and I liked it fine."

I remember thinking, I wonder how this is going to turn out. Joe was getting love with soft flatteries now, and he'd always been so accustomed to getting it with hard work.

Exactly what happened at the lunch up at the Capitol I never found out, but I got a pretty good picture of events from a telephone conversation the following night.

"But this is heaven," Katie said. "Just as I thought, our Mr. Hood loves Miss Smith devotedly. He wants to marry the girl and return her upstate fast."

"H'm," I said.

"Only we have to work quickly because Junior is leaving town Monday."

"What are you going to do?" I said.

At the other end Katie was silent for a moment, then she started humming a little tune. "Pray for me," she said. "Pray, will you, sweets?" and then she hung up.

Of course, what bias I had in this whole affair should have been toward Joe, I suppose. He was my old friend. I should have wanted him to be happy but—well, I was all for Katie. So I guess I keep thinking of that Washington week as her story, although she was only one of four.

I certainly saw more of Joe. I was staying at his house. I was with him every night and morning and I did know how, in a sense, he felt upset about Katie, but how on the other hand he could not help himself when he was around Mary. That beautiful Mary. When you're thinking back about it you can easily forget the excitement and wonder of a beautiful young girl; when she's across the room, you can't. And my friend Joe had healthy impulses, to say the least.

At first I thought Katie's plan was merely to work on the old jealousy motif again. She and young Hood immediately became inseparable. They went everywhere together and usually with a great flurry and style—and that, believe me, takes a bit of doing in Washington, D.C. She unearthed some of her most fabulous gowns, and Victor Hood proved himself quite an adroit performer. He was only twenty-four or five, and certainly to all appearances he became an utterly enraptured beau. All week they made late entrances and early exits everywhere in Washington—and invariably Katie Hewitt would be seen hanging on Hood's arm and smiling up at him over a cluster of little orchids which I knew had been sent down from New York.

But as far as I could tell it was all so much waste effort. I don't know if Joe or Mary even noticed. Mary Smith went on being Mary Smith, young and earnest, and Joe went on basking in her compliments.

FINALLY on Friday Katie gave a dinner party up in her suite at the Mayflower. There were to be just the five of us, the same five that had been at Halls on Monday. I arrived early, because Katie had called and said she had something of the utmost importance to tell me.

"Look, love," she said as I came in, "this little girl's too good. You know, I'm afraid she believes all those words she uses."

"You may be right."

Katie shook her head. "She's nobody's fool. And she knows what she wants."

"Yes," I said.

"But so do I," Katie said. "Bloody but unbowed, that's Hewitt. And I still have one more trick."

"Give," I said.

"I'm placing everything to win tonight, Charlie, and you can help."

"How?"

"By steering the conversation around to age again."

"Look," I said, "if all those nasty orchids didn't do it, no amount of dialogue will."

"But I've written some awfully good lines; you wait. And Vic knows his part. Now, come on, be an angel and cue us in."

I shrugged. "I don't feel very confident," I said. "The whole thing's too mental."

"Don't say that!" Katie almost screamed the words at me. "You gave me the idea."

"I know I did," I said. "But it seems sex is so unpredictable, isn't it?"

"You're telling me," she said and crossed to the door. Then Vic Hood came in and in a moment Mary and Joe, and we began having some wonderful shrimp canapés.

After about an hour dinner was brought up and it looked very much like just another regular Washington evening with lots of Government talk. But I had that pleasant feeling of thinking, In a minute, in a minute something's going to happen.

When it did, it began so slowly I hardly noticed. Hood was talking to Mary about a gent they knew back home named Wallace.

Mary said, "I remember him, he had red hair."

"A terrible thing happened to Wallace," Hood said. "His girl married someone else. And a funny thing, like your friend she married a guy twice her age."

I brightened up.

"Oh, really?" Mary said.

"Poor Wally is all shot about it."

We were silent for a moment then. I searched for something to say.

Hood stretched his legs out in front of him and shook his head. "I can't see it," he said. "Giving up your life like that."

"What do you mean?" I asked. "She doesn't necessarily give up her life, does she?"

"Sure she does. She doesn't have a life of her own now. Everything's handed to her on a platter. She doesn't have to learn how to live with someone, because her husband already knows."

"Well," Mary said, "I don't see how that matters."

"You don't?" Hood said. "Listen. Everybody's got a right to find things out for himself. When you marry someone who's already found out, you merely accept. The book's already written, you just read it."

"Oh, nonsense," Mary said.

"It's not nonsense," Hood said. "Take this girl of Wallace's. The gent she married has plenty of dough. She'll never have to decide whether she can buy a new coat or get a new chair for the living room. Consequently a new chair will never mean anything. And her house will never mean anything because she never had to work or plan or save."

I didn't dare look at Katie. This Hood had learned his part well.

"But chairs aren't the most important thing in a marriage," Mary said.

"Maybe not," Hood said, "but the fun of getting them is."

"You're wrong," Mary said.

"No, I'm not," Hood said. "And you'll notice another thing: girls never marry poor old men, they only marry rich old men."

"That's absurd."

He made it sound, in the argumentative way he went on, almost like a plea from the heart. "Wally's girl's finished now," he said. "Really finished. She's become just a sort of glorified housekeeper to this man's furniture and tastes and thoughts. She even dances his kind of two-step. What excitements, what new thrills can she get?"

THERE was a lot more, of course. Vic took perhaps fifteen minutes to make his point, but finally Mary stood up.

"The whole thing's a lot of sentimental nonsense," she said. "Caveman talk. We live in a much more civilized age."

"Do we?"

"But even so. Even if you take it that way, still there's one little point you forget, Mr. Hood." Her eyes were flashing. "Surely there is a difference now. And in ten years there may be even more. But in twenty years ——"

"Candida," Katie Hewitt said quietly.

"And in thirty years they'll be the same."

"And they'll be far, far too old to care any more." Katie held my hand. Hood had used up all his words. This was the topper then. This ingenious line of Mary's she had not been prepared for. She had to admit defeat.

I watched Katie's face. She smiled at me and shrugged her shoulders.

"Come on," she said finally. "Let's go on and dance. Let's go out and dance all night, shall we, kids?"

Then suddenly I felt a peculiar kind of embarrassment. I felt sorry for Katie. Here something that should never have been permitted in a proper order of things—and I knew, at that moment, I would have to take a hand.

I had been selfish all along, I was aware of that, but now the time had come for me to break in and become involved. Katie could never handle this; she could write a new third act every night and it would never work. And Joe and Katie were a major part of my life. If I wanted that life preserved ——

At least I could make my bid. Abruptly I said I had to go. I gave some excuse about a long-distance call and went out and got in a cab and gave Joe's Georgetown address.

In a closet in my room there was a suitcase, and in the suitcase were four or five typed manuscripts of my new play. I pulled out a clean copy and held it in my hand. Half aloud I said to it, "I hope you are as good as I think you are. I hope you can do this for me." I took the manuscript in and placed it on Joe's bed.

At ten o'clock the next morning Joe woke me. "Buster," he said, "this is dynamite."

(Continued on Page 198)

"It's the same old thing, every year they wake up in the middle of February and want a drink of water."

COPR. 1947 THE INTERNATIONAL SILVER CO. MERIDEN, CONN.

A proud hostess in 1847

A proud hostess in 1947

1847 Rogers Bros. brings you 100 years of beauty

ST LOVE ETERNAL TOURS ADORATION

100 years ago, hostesses set their tables agleam with beautiful 1847 Rogers Bros. Today, this silverplate, endowed with a century of artistry, is loved and owned by more women than any other!

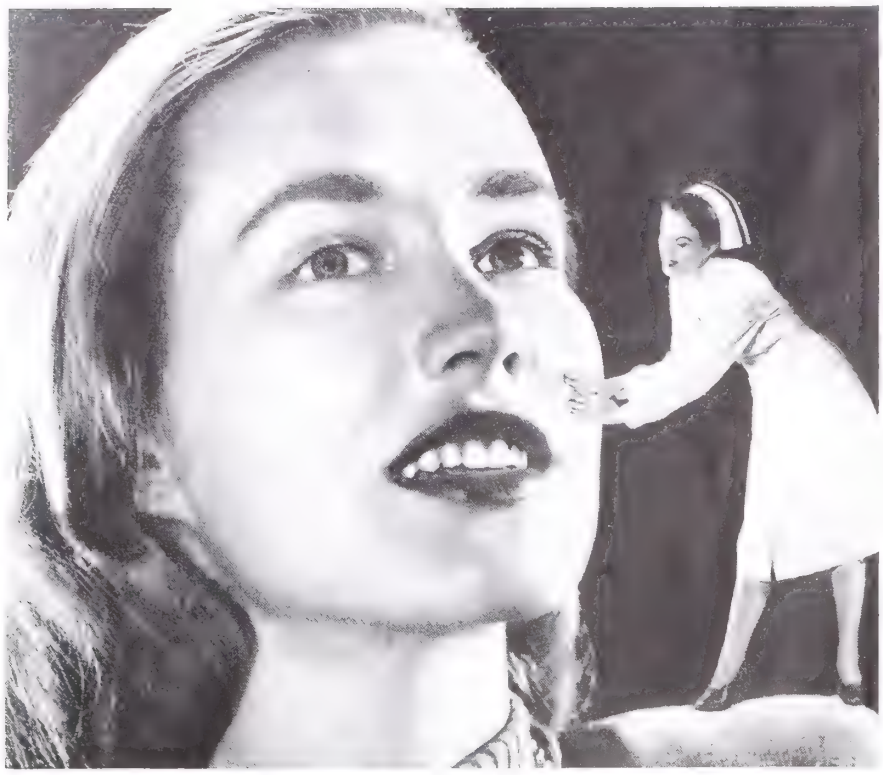
Each rich, modern design has magnificent quality...extra height and depth of ornament no other silverplate has...craftsmanship usually found only in solid silver.

Select your favorite from the only patterns with the year-mark "1847"! America's finest silverplate...same quality, no price increase since the war. No federal excise tax. 52-piece service for eight, $64.75, with chest.

1847 ROGERS BROS.

100th Anniversary

TUNE IN, "THE ADVENTURES OF OZZIE AND HARRIET," SUNDAY, 6 P.M., E.S.T. OVER CBS.



. . . for a lovelier complexion

let Noxzema nurse Your Skin

YOU want a skin lovely to look at—smooth to touch. Every woman does! Do as thousands of nurses do. Use Noxzema Skin Cream regularly as an aid to lovelier skin. It's medicated, greaseless. Use it as a night cream and a long-lasting powder base. See for yourself if this famous beauty aid doesn't help make your skin look more attractive . . . more beautiful . . . more alive!

Discovered by Nurses. Nurses in Baltimore were among the first to find that Noxzema is a valuable beauty aid that helps to soften rough, dry skin. They discovered, too, that Noxzema helps heal blemishes and other externally-caused skin irritations . . . soothes and smooths. Today Noxzema is used by thousands and thousands of women.

Helps soothe, soften, heal chapped hands. Actual clinical tests by physicians on the painful cracks and other skin irritations of badly chapped hands demonstrate that Noxzema soothes, helps heal hands faster—helps make red, rough hands become softer, whiter, lovelier—often overnight!

Over 20,000,000 jars bought yearly. Get your jar of Noxzema today. Use it regularly for that softer, lovelier look. Start now to let Noxzema nurse your skin!

Noxzema is sold at all drug counters—10¢, 35¢, 50¢ plus tax

(Continued from Page 196)

"Yes," I said.

"How could you keep it from me and when do we put it in rehearsal?" It was the old Joe; I hadn't seen him since before the war.

"Hello," I said.

"Hello," he said. "When do we start?"

"You'll have to ask Katie about that."

"Oh, I love you," he said. "I love you, you little sleepyhead. Get up. I've already sent the Hewitt a script and she'll do it, I know. She's busy all day, she says, but she can meet us for some talk at five."

Then he pulled me out of bed and started reading aloud from the play.

Well, I was encouraged. The first step, at least, had been taken. Of course, there was no reason to feel safe. Mary was just as pretty as she had ever been.

But anyway I had moved. All I could do now was have faith.

When I joined the others for our conference—it was at a little cocktail-dance place we knew on Connecticut Avenue—the four of them had apparently been there some time. The orchestra was playing a waltz, I remember, and as I made my way over to our divan by the side I could hear Joe and Katie already at it, both talking at once. They had very positive ideas about the casting and just how the show should be set.

Vic Hood and Mary were on opposite sides of the table. Their heads were moving, I noticed, very slightly, but in perfect rhythm with the band.

Then suddenly I had my real inspiration. It was one of those things that occur to you and that you act on automatically. You don't even stop to consider the morals of the situation—that comes later—you just move.

I took a ten-dollar bill from my wallet and walked over to Teddy Hymes, the violinist and leader of the band. "You'll think I'm nuts," I said and handed him the bill, "but I want you to promise that for the next hour you won't play one number written before nineteen-forty-five."

"Okay," Teddy said. "Okay," and as I started back to the table he gave a signal to his boys to start in on a medley from one of the newest musical-comedy hits.

Neither Joe nor Katie looked up as I joined them.

Katie was saying, "But you're so wrong, so very wrong ——"

And Joe was saying, "No, Katie. No. You're wrong, I tell you."

I sighed and relaxed.

The music played on—the ten dollars seemed to add a new feeling, good and loud. Then—well, it was almost too much to expect.

I saw Mary reach out and put her hand on Joe's. "Don't you love this?" she said to him dreamily. "It's one of the nicest songs I know. I'll never forget it, Joe. And you know, it'll always mean this winter to me and all the times we've had."

Joe looked at her. I could almost see his mind working, trying to come back to Mary, trying to leave the argument about casting.

"I'm afraid I didn't hear what you said, kid," he said. "The music is making so much noise."

Then I saw Vic Hood put out his cigarette and turn to Mary. He must have said what I'd prayed he'd say, "Let's dance," because in another moment they got up and went out onto the floor.

I knew there was no point in my staying then. We could talk about the script any time, so I took out my pencil and wrote on one of those paper cocktail napkins: "Our civilized age is toppling, I think. It's your show now. Carry on, Kate." And I slipped it into her hand when I said good-by.

Out in the street, I whistled for a cab, and just as one was driving up a waiter came out and handed me a note. It was written in lipstick on the same paper napkin.

"Thank you," it said. "You were right. My third act stank, yours will work. I'm going to make it work. And, oh, what lovely music. Devotedly, Kate."

And I noticed there was a ten-dollar bill enclosed.

OUR READERS WRITE US

(Continued from Page 13)

counter. Unless one is sufficiently well in with the assistant—no JOURNAL!

Sincerely,
UNA MAEVE REDMOND.

Old Girl Puts on Weight

Flint, Michigan.

Dear Editor: A friend and I were comparing an old copy of the LADIES' HOME JOURNAL, dated October, 1895, with my November, 1946, copy of the JOURNAL.

1895 Vol. XII No. 11 32 pages
1946 Vol. LXIII No. 11 260 pages

The JOURNAL was a grand little magazine then, just as it is today.

Most sincerely,
RUTH COOK.

How High is Up?

Dear Editors: The LADIES' HOME JOURNAL is getting very bulky to handle.

MRS. A. KIMMELMAN.

The larger the magazine, the more subscribers get for their money—the question is, how much is too much for a quarter? ED.

Milk Bank Might Save Your Child

Norman, Oklahoma.

Dear Editors: Chuck Vose is a chubby, rosy-cheeked tot that anyone with half an eye can see has never been sick a day in his life. But, when the two-weeks-old boy came home from the hospital, he seemed fretful, and within a matter of hours he was a gravely sick baby, the victim of epidemic diarrhea. Formula after formula was tried without success until the specialist suggested mother's milk. A mother with an oversupply of milk was found and a few drops of breast milk gotten down. And then a miracle began to happen. The baby improved. With each feeding he gained strength. But one night they received a call from the hospital that there was no more surplus milk available. Someone mentioned the possibility of a supply from a milk bank and they asked the long-distance telephone operator to place a chain of calls until she found one. At last, in Milwaukee, Wisconsin, a nursing home was found with a milk-bank supply sufficient for their needs. A few hours later an iced pail containing forty ounces of precious milk arrived at the Oklahoma City airport.

As the grateful parents watched their son develop into a robust baby, able to digest an ordinary milk formula, they began to make inquiries. How many babies die needlessly because mother's milk isn't obtainable? How many milk banks are there in the country?

The answers were frightening. Scores of babies in every community could be saved from diarrhea deaths if breast milk were available. Many more premature babies would live if they had mother's milk. Yet there was only a handful of milk banks in the entire nation.

The Voses reached a decision. Their own son had been saved for them and they decided there was only one adequate way

(Continued on Page 200)

Copyright, 1947, Better Vision Institute, Inc.

...pray you deserve their faith! Yours to protect, to guard and to cherish—the eyes that look into yours with such serene and abiding faith. Life lies before them: beautiful or distorted, rich or impoverished, depending largely upon your forethought and devotion. Without perfect sight the world is hard to understand, difficult to cope with . . . Don't take those precious eyes for granted. Plan now for their consistent and constant care. Safeguarded and protected sight opens the doors of life. Neglected or abused sight raises a dark curtain before life's radiance. Yours the responsibility, yours the privilege to insure for your child the great gift of good vision . . . Justify the faith that lies in precious eyes! Grant them the conscientious, professional care of your Ophthalmologist or Optometrist, the skilled aid of the Ophthalmic Dispenser (Optician) . . . BETTER VISION INSTITUTE, INC., 630 Fifth Avenue, New York 20, N. Y.

Better Vision for Better Living

"Soaping" dulls hair—
Halo glorifies it!

Yes, even finest soaps and soap shampoos hide the natural lustre of your hair with dulling soap film

- Halo contains no soap. Made with a new patented ingredient it cannot leave dull soap film!
- Halo reveals the true natural beauty of your hair the very first time you use it, leaves your hair shimmering with glorious highlights.
- Makes oceans of rich, fragrant lather, even in hardest water. Leaves hair sweet, clean, naturally radiant!
- Needs no lemon or vinegar after-rinse. Halo rinses away completely!
- Carries away unsightly loose dandruff like magic!
- Lets hair dry soft and manageable, easy to curl!

HALO REVEALS THE HIDDEN BEAUTY OF YOUR HAIR!

Lovely hair deserves fine care . . . use Du Pont Combs

The girls men care about . . . somehow . . . are girls who care about their hair. Keep yours neat and shining with gay, plastic Du Pont Combs . . . gentle to your scalp, your curls, yet strong, strong, strong! Colors to match your room, your purse...Du Pont quality... 10 to 50 cents . . . at good stores.

DU PONT

Du Pont Combs

BETTER THINGS FOR BETTER LIVING . . . THROUGH CHEMISTRY

(Continued from Page 198)

of repaying the debt. And so the Oklahoma City milk bank was founded, and highest standards set for mothers who were to furnish the milk. Unalterable rules were formulated. Mothers and babies have weekly checkups; no mother can supply milk if her own baby fails to make the proper gains in weight each week; milk is not taken until after the first month, and no longer than the ninth month. A surgeon preparing to go into the operating room is no more sterile than the mothers who supply the milk. They follow a supervised routine. Upon arrival mothers drink a pint of hot chocolate or milk, don surgical clothing and wash in the scrub-up room for a required number of minutes under the supervision of a nurse. They then remove the surgical gown, cap, mask and apron and go into the room where the milk is obtained. They wash a second time with boric-acid water and then the milk is expressed into sterile cups. The milk immediately is boiled for five minutes, poured into bottles and quick-frozen.

The mothers are paid for each ounce of milk they contribute, and parents who receive the milk are charged according to their ability to pay, with 25 cents per ounce the maximum price. Indigent parents pay nothing.

The first really tiny incubator baby to be saved by the milk bank weighed a pound and fourteen ounces. At four months she weighed almost eight pounds, and now at two she is a normal, healthy toddler. Now it has become routine in Oklahoma City for the milk to be prescribed for babies who weigh four pounds or less at birth.

Sincerely,
RUTH S. FERRIS.

Teacher Wants Decent Wages

Tucson, Arizona.

Dear Editor: I am a junior at the University of Arizona College of Education but, frankly, I don't know if the training is going to be worth the trouble. A teacher is subject to more criticism than anyone but a minister, and salaries are not high enough to cover living costs. I remember seeing my biology teacher "slinging hash" to make a living during the summer months. I still want to be a teacher, but I want to be able to get a decent wage for [illegible] of high prices.

Yours truly,
NAOMI DUMES

Help Yourself—and Others

Noroton Heights, Connecticut.

Dear Mrs. Gould: Twice a year, in spring and fall, a group of enterprising women in this small town organize the most practical rummage sale I've ever heard of. Many of the items to be sold are donated outright. But the majority are clothes in good condition, to be sold on consignment. The greatest interest centers in children's clothing. Since they grow so rapidly, much of the clothing mothers must dispose of from time to time is hardly worn at all. The women of Darien look forward to replenishing their children's wardrobes twice each year from this source.

People seem to have no qualms about seeing Mary wearing Louise's coat or Jane wearing Jean's dancing frock. The children don't mind either; I think they rather like it. One third of the price of each garment sold on consignment, as well as the entire proceeds from items which are donated, is given to the Connecticut Children's Aid Society, which places children in foster homes.

Why couldn't other communities adopt this idea? It worked last fall to the tune of $4000, raised free and clear, in a community of 10,000.

Very truly yours,
RUTH S. NEWMAN.

Best Baked Beans in Town

Ontario, Canada.

Dear Ann Batchelder: I have established a reputation for the best baked beans in town by using the recipe you gave in your spread for Washington's birthday, if I'm not mistaken, 1944. I remember you remarked about liking plenty of mustard with or in your beans. I took the hint.

I will be deeply indebted if you will forward a new copy of the recipe. Mine is lost—and think of my reputation if I continue baking beans from memory.

MRS. H. H. DELHI.

Special for DRY SKIN

The Countess de Petiteville says... "Pond's Dry Skin Cream does so much for my skin—it's so rich, so soothing."

Delicious, smooth texture like rich, thick country cream! Pond's Dry Skin Cream has special skin-softening power. Not draggy or sticky. Your dry, tense skin loves it—truly seems to "drink it up."

3 Special Features

Rich in Lanolin—very like oil of skin
Homogenized—to soak in better
Special Emulsifier—extra softening aid

Work the seepy smoothness of Pond's Dry Skin Cream well over face and throat. Leave 5 to 15 minutes, or overnight. Use every day. See how it helps your winter-dry skin feel softer—look prettier. Ask for Pond's Dry Skin Cream today.

Pond's DRY SKIN Cream

If you're keen on skis, bobsled ice skates, or just the "whit outdoors—watch those lips yours. 'CHAP STICK' is the sw comforter for rough, chappe cracked lips.

It was tops with our Armed Forces the frozen North, and wherever wi and weather made lips act up. handy, so easy to apply—so swift a lasting in results. Get 'CHAP STICK' every member of your family.
Specially medicated, specially soothing.

T. M. Reg. U. S. Pat. Off.

GET THE ONE AND ONLY FLEET'S ChapStick 25 U. S. and

KEEPS LIPS

WOULD YOU MARRY YOUR HUSBAND AGAIN?

Age at time of marriage. If you're worrying because your early twenties are slipping by and you're still single, relax; your chances of married happiness, if you do marry, are improving somewhat. For the survey shows that the people whose marriages turned out better than they expected married a little later in life, on the average, than those whose marriages have proved a disappointment.

The average happily married person interviewed was married at twenty-three; the average "disappointed" person was married at twenty-one.

And, as a corollary, two thirds of the happily married would choose to marry at the same age—neither older nor younger—if they had it to do over; fewer than one in five wish they had waited till they were older. But among the disappointed group, half wish they had waited till they were older.

Why is age at the time of marriage a factor? The remark of one wistful young mother supplies a hint: Asked what had been her biggest problem in marriage, she said, "I was so darn' young when I was married. I've got four kids, and I'm only twenty-two now! It's O.K., though!"

Though her plaint leaves a lot unsaid, her hankering for another taste of freedom from [illegible] is clear enough, even if it is O.K.

And the wistfulness of her remark was echoed by many other people, without the optimism.

However, if you're over twenty, and in love (or if your daughter is), don't interpret these facts as an argument for arbitrarily postponing marriage a few years, simply to increase the chances of a [illegible] past twenty, it doesn't make that much difference; it's the extremely youthful marriages that are handicapped. Here are the figures:

Marriage has been a disappointment to:

27 per cent of people married before they were twenty years old;

16 per cent married in the early twenties—twenty through twenty-two;

15 per cent married in the middle twenties;

12 per cent married at twenty-seven or older.

How happy were your parents? Professional observers—sociologists, psychologists and others—have often pointed out the close relationship which exists between childhood impressions of family life and the achievement of married happiness as an adult. Now the survey brings new evidence of this relationship through the testimony of the country's husbands and wives who were interviewed.

The happier your recollections of your parents' marriage, the better your chances of happiness in your own marriage. Presumably it follows that if your marriage is happy, your children's chances of married happiness are correspondingly improved. For among the people whose marriage has turned out better than they expected, 57 per cent say their parents' marriages were very happy

In contrast, among the people whose marriage has been a disappointment, only about one in three (36 per cent) recall their parents' marriages as very happy ones. Try [illegible] so far as you can. You're likely to come out with the same conclusion reached by the survey: that happily married individuals look back on their parents' lives together through rose-colored glasses, while unhappily married people take a dimmer view.

What about children? The parents' happiness in marriage affects the children's chances of similar happiness; do children, by the very fact of their existence, affect the parents' chances?

Rather surprisingly, the presence or absence of children makes no appreciable difference in the likelihood that the marriage itself is happy. The proportion of happier-than-expected marriages, of so-so marriages and of those that have proved to be disappointing is almost precisely the same among couples with children and among those without.

To be sure, there are individual exceptions to this, as to any generalization based on averages. Nor does it follow that the childless couples are happy about the situation; many of them feel that they are missing an important source of satisfaction.

But—and this is the important thing—however deep the disappointment of married people who have failed to have children, in the main it has not affected their attitude toward marriage itself. Marriage is essentially the union of two people; if their relationship is satisfactory, even the absence of children is not likely to disturb it.

Family finances a common problem. Money troubles are more often named as a source of difficulty between husband and wife than any other specific problem. Yet people have a good bit of confidence in their ability to cope, for 76 per cent say that, granting the same conditions, they would marry again on the same income they had when they were married. And this despite the fact that more than half the people interviewed were married on an income of $1500 a year or less!

Compare this fact with the findings already discussed, on age and choice of partner:

Four out of five (81 per cent) of married people say they would marry the same person—probably or certainly—if they were doing it over.

Three out of four (76 per cent) say they would marry on the same income, under the same conditions.

One in two (51 per cent) say they would marry at the same age. Of the others, people who wish they had postponed marriage awhile outnumber, by almost two to one, those who wish they had married when they were younger.

This doesn't mean, of course, that it's more important to marry at the right age than to marry the right person—presumably most people did make a suitable choice. But the table is worth pondering a bit, just the same.

Stranger than fiction is the medical career of Abraham Lewis Metz, New Orleans doctor, teacher, chemist and pharmacist. Until he was fifteen years old, he could neither read nor write—he was a hired boy who drove cattle around Lake Charles, Louisiana. But at fifteen, when Abraham was making eight dollars a month, he began to pay six dollars a month to learn reading and writing. In order to be able to study at night in his dark room, he made candles by molding tallow in hollow sugar-cane stalks, using sausage strings for wicks. He placed these candles in a box painted black to prevent reflections, for he knew that if his boss caught him studying at night, he would certainly lose his job. What lessons he did not finish at night he would tear out of his book and pin inside his shirt to study during the day.

Such was the primary education of a man who took a Ph.C. degree from the New York College of Pharmacists, an M. D. degree from Tulane University, and who was awarded an honorary Master of Pharmacy from Tulane. Illiterate at fifteen, Doctor Metz was instructor at Tulane University at twenty-three, and became one of the youngest men of the Medical faculty.

—JAMES T. NIX.

A Student Refresher course from State University Press

---

enever a headache gets you down, e Bromo-Seltzer. Because Bromo-zer works fast in fighting ordinary dache three ways:

1. Helps relieve headache pain
2. Helps relieve upset stomach
3. Helps quiet jumpy nerves

ch may team up to cause trouble. y to take: Simply put poonful in a glass and water. No waiting. mo-Seltzer effer- antly. Pleasant to taste, Caution: Use only as cted.

Bromo-Seltzer at your store fountain or coun- today. Compounded in convenient home sizes egistered pharmacists.

FAST headache relief
ROMO-SELTZER
ODUCT OF EMERSON DRUG COMPANY SINCE 1887

Here's help for the aching pain of COLD WEATHER JOINTS!

Help increase the flow of nature's own lubricating fluids

IF cold weather makes your joints feel sore and stiff—if every move you make hurts—remember this: Cold weather actually constricts tiny blood vessels, cutting down the supply of nature's own lubricating fluids to your joints—that's why they creak, and feel stiff. But rub aching joints with Absorbine Jr. and local circulation speeds up. That wonderful "warmth" helps those tiny blood vessels feed your joints with more lubricating fluids—and you feel like shouting for joy! Always keep a bottle of Absorbine Jr. on hand. Only $1.25 at your drugstore.

W. F. Young, Inc.
Springfield, Mass.

Absorbine Jr.

—that Always-Fresh look...

Lovely star, Elyse Knox, has it . . .
skin sparkling-fresh all day long.
"For cleansing that beautifies, too . . .
it's Woodbury Complete Beauty Cream!"

Elyse Knox

featured in Monogram's Cinecolor picture
"BLACK GOLD"

WOODBURY Complete BEAUTY CREAM

- Beautifies skin as it cleanses
- Freshens tired skin as it cleanses
- Brightens dull skin as it cleanses
- Fights tiny dry-skin lines as it cleanses

around the clock... the Woodbury-Wonderful Way

8 A.M. Skin glows morning-fresh after a dewy "cream bath" the Woodbury-Wonderful Way. Even Baby Sharon approves mother's "Always-Fresh" beauty. As Elyse Knox says: "An early-morning face-dose with Woodbury Complete Beauty Cream—is magic for my skin. It beautifies as it cleanses. Try it!"

6 P.M. Luscious-looking Elyse with her adoring football-star husband, Tommy Harmon . . . her skin sparkling-lovely after another Woodbury-Wonderful cleansing. "Woodbury Complete Beauty Cream whisks off studio grime and make-up in a hurry . . . leaves my skin looking glowy!"

That "Always-Fresh Look" this Woodbury-Wonderful Way

Cleanse with Woodbury Complete Beauty Cream, using upward pressing strokes. Tissue off cream, loosened dirt, make-up. Smooth on more for plus-softening. Tissue off. Woodbury's four rich oils soften, smooth, beautify. Next—a brisk cold-water spanking. Now skin glows with Woodbury "Always-Fresh Look".

FOR SPECIAL SKIN PROBLEMS

Very Dry Skin: Woodbury cream-cleanse. Soften with Woodbury Special Dry Skin Cream—lanolin's benefits! Under make-up, Woodbury Creampuff Powder Base.

Oily Skin: Use Woodbury Liquefying Cleansing Cream. Light—melts on skin. Finish with Woodbury Vanishing Facial Cream to check shine. Purifying Stericin in all Woodbury Creams helps protect against blemish-causing germs.

11 P.M. Woodbury time again. And skin-glow cleansing with Woodbury Complete Beauty Cream. "And," Elyse, "a thin film for overnight softening Woodbury's 4 fine oils smooth, beautify low the Woodbury-Wonderful Way for "Always-Fresh Look" all around the c

HOW TO INFURIATE YOUR HUSBAND

By James C. Adams

Here is an easy, reliable, indisputable method of ascertaining how much you actually earn weekly but are probably not being paid for taking care of your home and family.

Warning: After you have finished this, show it to your husband and in your office—[illegible] responsibility.

Occupation	Rate (Per Hour)	Total Time (Per Week)	Rate (Extra Hours)	TOTAL Cooking
Housework
Washing
Shopping
Child Care
Mending
Driving Entertaining
Beauty

Grand Total of Amounts [illegible] Earn Weekly $ ———

See Below for Your Hourly Pay Scale

COOKING. If you are an expert and can get up meals similar to those served at the best hotels, you're worth $1.00 an hour. That's how much one hotel pays its head chef. If you are just plain everyday good, put yourself down for $1.50 an hour. If you are plain butter-fingered and still can't bake a pie, give yourself 50 cents an hour.

HOUSEWORK. Make it a flat 60 cents an hour. That is about standard these days.

WASHING. A good laundress receives 75 cents an hour. However, if you scorch while ironing give yourself only 50 cents. Remember, if you overpay yourself your husband is bound to remind you of the time you burned his collar. So beat him to the draw and let your conscience be your guide.

SHOPPING. Professional shoppers usually charge on a per cent basis. In the case of the housewife that would come to around 60 cents an hour, so pay yourself that amount for each hour spent in shopping.

CHILD CARE. Reliable nurses demand 50 cents an hour. No nurse, though, was ever as good for a child as his own mother. Mothers actually earn more than the standard rate, but to keep your husband happy give yourself the regular rate.

MENDING. If you can darn socks so that your husband never feels about that bump in the heel giving him a blister, pay yourself $1.00 an hour for time spent in mending. A good seamstress gets that much. If you darn with bumps, take only 50 cents.

DRIVING. You should certainly receive pay for all driving that has to do with getting members of the family about and for making purchases for the house and table. Good taxi drivers make $1.50 an hour. Pay yourself the same.

ENTERTAINING. Since entertaining is a chore and not a pleasure a good part of the time, pay yourself what the professional entertainers get—$2.00 an hour. If your husband kicks up a rumpus about this, explain that most entertainment is for him and him alone. As a final shutter-upper, ask him why he doesn't take you out more often.

HOME BEAUTY TREATMENTS. [illegible] of a woman's job. If you had constant [illegible] cost $2.00 an hour. So, if you are conscientious about your appearance most of the day and evening, pay yourself $2.00 for each hour you spend in making yourself that way.

Now total up and see what you are worth in your own home. It may surprise you, but [illegible] what it does to your husband!

"Problem Hair"
made Lovely again
Discouraged by dull, lifeless, listless hair? Then start shampooing with Admiracion. Its luxurious cleansing lather wakes all the luster—all the lovely, glamorous highlights now dimmed by film, dirt or loose dandruff. Get Admiracion at your favorite toilet counter or hairdresser today.
NOW GET 7-WAY AID TO HAIR BEAUTY
More luster... no film
Hair easier to manage
Removes loose dandruff
Rinses out quickly
Easy to apply
Works in hard water
Does not dry hair
ADMIRACION Shampoo
TO SOFTEN WIRY OR HEAVY HAIR — USE ADMIRACION OIL SHAMPOO

IT'S a "meal in one dish," this Shepherd's Pie—and as easy to prepare as it is to budget. It's the robust, satisfying sort of fare that a man likes—and talks about, too. And, of course, there's creamy-smooth Carnation Milk, heat-refined and homogenized, to produce that wonderful velvet blend. Try it!

SHEPHERD'S PIE

A little meat . . . a hearty meal!

4 tablespoons chopped onion
2 tablespoons chopped green pepper
½ cup diced celery
1 cup diced, cooked meat
4 tablespoons fat
4 tablespoons flour
1 tall can Carnation Milk
1 beef bouillon cube, dissolved in ⅓ cup boiling water
½ cup diced cooked carrots
¾ teaspoon salt
½ teaspoon pepper
2 cups mashed potatoes

Slowly brown onion, pepper, celery and meat in fat. Blend in flour, stirring constantly until brown. Add Carnation Milk, dissolved bouillon cube, and carrots. Cook slowly until gravy thickens slightly. Add seasonings. Pour into well-greased casserole or baking dish. Drop mashed potatoes by spoonfuls over top, or press through pastry tube. Bake in moderate oven (350° 375° F.) to brown top. Serves 4 to 6.

FOR MORE RECIPES, write for the new "Velvet Blend Book" of milk rich Carnation dishes. Beautifully illustrated. Address Carnation Company, Dept. L-2, Milwaukee 2, Wis. And for entertainment, tune in Carnation's romantic [illegible] new daytime serial, "Lone Journey," Monday through Friday. See your newspaper for CBS station.

FOR BABIES, ask your doctor about a formula prepared with safe, nourishing, digestible Carnation Milk, fortified with Poto vita min D. Universally approved for babies and children.

MARRIAGE IS SO COMPLICATED

(Continued from Page 51)

"Oh—love," said Libby largely. "I could be in love with either of them, that's the trouble. When I'm with Steve, he catches me up in a dazzlement. When I'm with Amos, there's a swift run of excitement, just beyond my reach. It's a simple biological matter, that part of it."

"Simple biological nonsense," Doris said vigorously. "You're talking about sex, not love."

"Well?" said Libby.

"You always have sex, in love. But you don't always have love, in sex," Doris told her, from the tremendous vantage of three months of marriage.

"You're just handing out capsules," Libby protested.

Doris shook her head. "I guess I was wrong: you weren't in love with that boy in college. You don't know anything about it."

"Then it's time I found out," Libby said shortly.

"But you can't think it out," Doris said, her eyebrows knotted earnestly. "And you can't go emotionally haywire, Libby. If Steve or Amos is right for you, you'll know it. You'll know there's only one person you could marry."

"All mysterious again," Libby muttered rebelliously.

"What?"

"Nothing." Libby stared at the grass, with its deeper stain of green under the trees. Everything must seem awfully simple, after you were married. Apparently you knew things about men, without doing any thinking. The catch was to know the right things before you got married.

She stayed there on the bench for a little while, after Doris left. People crossed the park on its slanting paths, and spoke to her as they passed. She felt at home there.

A memory nagged at her, as the leaves dipped and blew gently around her. Another green place—but there was a gate, and she was outside.

The Parkinson place, that was it. It had been broken up for building lots years ago, but when she was little she used to walk very slowly past the iron fence, staring in. It was an entrancing place, after the back-yard gardens that she knew. Flowers burst out with a sudden blue and scarlet flaring, far inside the fence. Down the slope toward the house there was the thin shining spray of a fountain, rising above a hedge. She always wished she could see whether the water fell in a pool or on the grass. And then there was the path, the narrow green path, twisting in between trees and leading out of sight, leading on deep into the garden. She would stand holding the iron fence, wanting to walk down that path.

Once in a while she saw people walking in the garden, but they never looked her way. She used to believe that if she called, they wouldn't even hear her. It was their private garden, their fountain and their small green path.

Remembering, now, the park around her seemed dusty, and the passing people too well known. She shrugged it all away and went back to the laboratory.

Working in a white glare of concentration, she closed out all the fretting thoughts about Amos and Steve. But that evening after dinner, waiting for Steve to come, uneasiness caught her again. There must be a simple way to decide about anything as important as marriage.

Steve whistled under the window, Steve came in with his light step, and instantly she felt the streaky excitement that he always brought. Bells, little gay bells ringing somewhere, promising fun around the corner. Steve caught her shoulders, whirling her around and kissing her once on the nose and once on the mouth. After that, it was silly to say hello.

He was laughing, the way he did, so the corners of his eyes and the corners of his "vous êtes les Bienvenus!"

Enjoy a winter vacation that is different in Québec—winter wonderland of North America. A warm welcome and old-fashion hospitality await you and your family in Québec's modern inns and hotels. For help in planning your trip, write to The PROVINCE OF QUEBEC TOURIST BUREAU, QUEBEC CITY, CANADA.

LA PROVINCE DE Québec

26

HERE'S MONEY for Women WITH SPARE TIME

Sell Everyday Cards

. . . Show exquisite new folders for Birthdays, Anniversaries, etc. Your friends and others gladly buy from you. Get CASH PROFITS DAILY. No experience or money is needed.

Smart Designs, Amazing Values

Quick sales when you show samples of Everyday Cards, Gift Enclosures, Humorous Cards—12 assortments priced from 60c to $1.00. Also Gift Wrappings and Personal Stationery. Make up to 100% CASH PROFIT.

15 FOLDERS FOR ALL EVENTS Sell for $1.00

SEND FOR SAMPLES

Start NOW—every day brings earnings. WRITE TODAY for beautiful samples sent on approval. Do it now!

FRIENDSHIP STUDIOS, INC.
312 ADAMS ST., ELMIRA, N.Y.

SHOULD PRODUCE OVER 1000 BLOOMS

Plant now! Enjoy spectacular beauty and ravishing color of gorgeous full flowered chrysanthemums this fall at an unbelievably low price. All Mich. Dept. of Agriculture inspected Mum plants... Ten assorted colors and varieties.

EXTRA 5 Blooming-Size Lily Bulbs—with order

Send No Money . . . Order Today! Avoid usual high prices. Just send name and get 10 fine healthy plants for just $1.69 plus c.o.d. postage. Prompt action brings 5 blooming-size Lily Bulbs EXTRA, at no additional cost. Money back if not delighted. Cash order, we pay postage. Don't delay—order today. Send to: MICHIGAN BULB CO. Dept. UA-1414, Grand Rapids 2, Michigan.

BUIST'S

INTRODUCTORY PACKET

RUTGERS TOMATOES 1 pk. ONLY 5¢ (10¢ VALUE)

and Buist's 1947 Garden Guide

Blood-red, large tomatoes of excellent flavor.

ROBERT BUIST CO., Dept. K, 4 & 6 S. Front St., Phila. 5, Pa.

SEEDSMEN FOR OVER A CENTURY

Etta Gaynes

ESIGN

AMERICAN WOOLEN COMPANY ill, quality rayon lined with RL-GLO, about $50. Ask your favorite re for ETTA GAYNES fashions or te for the store nearest you.
TTA GAYNES, 500 Seventh Ave.
NEW YORK 18, N. Y.

mouth twisted up brightly and she had to laugh with him. His short-clipped hair shone silver-blond under the light.

"Let's go," he said.

"Where?"

"Just go," said Steve.

He had his car parked in front of the gift shop, with the top down. Libby leaned back with her head on the cool leather.

They drove out of town with two quick turns and a couple of swoops down a straightaway. They fled along a dark road, and the telephone poles swayed toward them in the headlights and swung away behind them.

"No moon," said Steve. "Did you ever sail in wheat?"

"What? No," said Libby.

He turned sharp right, and a dirt road led straight through a wheat field. The grain was high, growing close to the road, blowing and ruffling a little. Steve turned off his headlights and slowed. Abruptly the stars came out as Libby stared up. The car ran slowly, quietly through the darkness, and a soft rustling murmur sounded close by. As her eyes cleared in the dimness, Libby looked out from the car. She saw the dark waves go rippling out all around them. She saw the waves close in against the car, and she let go of her imagination, and sailed on dreamily.

Steve swerved left, and the headlights sprang out fiercely, and she sat up straight. They were running on concrete again.

"That was swell," she said.

"Fun," Steve said simply.

She didn't want to stop having fun. "There's a carnival," she said.

The Ferris wheel signaled, its lights turning slowly. An overtone of sound spread to them, people calling and laughing, barkers shouting, and a clash of music.

"Yes?" said Steve.

"Yes," she said.

So they stopped in the soft thick dust of the parking lot, and followed the others where the music never stopped. The concessions were in a circle, surrounding them with lights and flickering colors.

They got into a swinging seat of the Ferris wheel, and started the slow climb up.

"Let's get married," Steve said, at the [illegible]

"No," said Libby, and they plunged down, and she caught Steve's arm, and he laughed at her.

"That was timing," said Steve.

They rode on the merry-go-round, and Steve caught a ring, and climbed off his lion and gravely presented it to her.

"Let's get married, Libby."

"No," she said, but she put the ring in her pocket.

They ate white spun-sugar candy and pink spun-sugar candy. They shot rifles and they played a complicated game with little white balls that possessed their own personal insanity of spinning.

Climbing up a flight of wooden steps, they sat in a little boat-shaped sledge, Libby in front of Steve, leaning back against his shoulder. A man pulled a lever, and they shot

FIRST WOMAN BANKER

Offhand you may think of bankers as men. But today women play as important if not as obvious a part in the country's financial system—to say nothing of controlling the purse strings of the nation's spending. Look for America's first woman banker and you'll discover a young colored woman from Richmond, Virginia, named Maggie Lena Walker, who began her career by delivering wash. After teaching in public schools, then selling insurance, at 31 she founded the Penny Savings Bank of Richmond, with a paid-in capital of $25,000. As its president she led her bank through one successful venture after another and today, as the Consolidated Bank and Trust Company, it is one of the foremost colored banking institutions in the country.

—JUDITH CHASE CHURCHILL

Lovely to own
..THE LUXURY OF QUILTRON

Exquisitely tailored accessories for bedroom and boudoirs. Quiltron, a new swan-soft quilting encased in brilliant hued satin-smooth plastic, gives new radiance to your home. Soilproof, moth tight, will not crack or peel, and cleans instantly with a damp cloth. Modestly priced. Matching Quiltron by the yard, 36 inches wide, also available at leading stores everywhere. Write for free booklet LH, "How to Decorate with Quiltron".

Protex QUILTRON
347 Fifth Avenue, New York 16

WRITE FOR IDEAS
MORGAN
Masterpiece Furniture
Send 10c for "FASHIONS IN FURNITURE"
Morgan Furniture Co., Dept. L-2, Asheville, N. C.

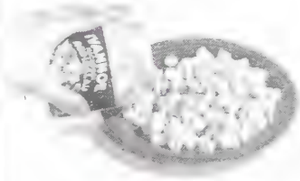
SELL GREETING CARDS
Thomas Terry Studios

Mr. T. Spoon says—
It's EASY to add Pure ONIONS to Casserole Dishes with IVANHOE Teaspoon ONIONS

No wonder women are so enthusiastic over Ivanhoe Teaspoon Onions. No peeling—no tears—no cooking odors. Each jar contains 12 fresh onions, grated and superdried. So concentrated that 1 teaspoon equals 1 onion. Recipes on jar. Ask your grocer for a jar today. The Tupman Thurlow Co., Inc., 155 E. 44th Street, New York 17, N. Y.

RECIPE for tastier Casserole Dishes

Follow your favorite recipe. A few minutes before serving, add 2 to 4 teaspoons of Ivanhoe Teaspoon Onions. Mix well. Tastes extra good. Also, sprinkle on steaks, chops, hamburger.



P.S. You'll love Ivanhoe Potato Redi-Salad and Ivanhoe Macaroni Redi-Salad, too. They taste like the home-made kind. Just open and serve.

THE CHORE GIRL
"The Pot Cleaner of the Nation"
Safe—Efficient—Economical
Look for my picture on box and "Chore Girl" stamped on eyelet closure—so handy for hanging me up. At your local store.
10¢
METAL TEXTILE CORPORATION, Orange, N. J.

FREE! AMERICA'S Most Beautiful SEED AND NURSERY BOOK
INTER-STATE NURSERIES
527 E. STREET HAMBURG, IOWA

FOR EASIER BAKING

WAXTEX
HEAVY WAXED PAPER

A Message to the Women of America

You all know that the making of good gravy is one of the trickiest tasks in cooking. Many of you have mastered the art so that your resulting product is something to be proud of. But to those of you who have difficulty making a gravy to your own satisfaction, may we suggest that next time you try making it with Gravy Master. We are sure you will then find it very easy to make a gravy that has flavor and appearance of which you too can be proud.

EVERY BOTTLE SHOWS HOW
GRAVY MASTER
Guaranteed by Good Housekeeping
MAKES RICH, DELICIOUS GRAVY

Beauty Experts Say: Do This...

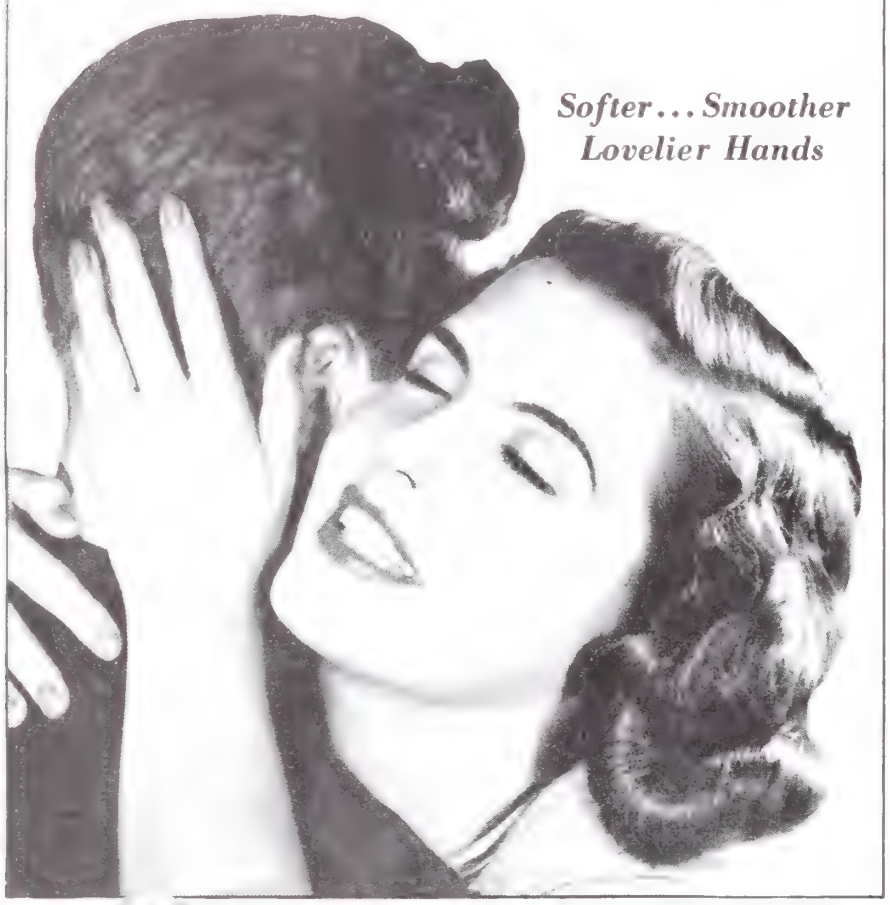
For Hands That Invite Romance!



Softer... Smoother Lovelier Hands

"Cream is Best" Say Experts 3 to 1

We asked 51,170 beauticians what's best for hand care. The answer was "Cream!" 3-to-1. And their first choice by far—"beauty-rich SOFSKIN!"

See what a Sofskin beauty massage can do for your hands! After the very first application you'll thrill to the wonderful improvement... you'll see how much whiter, younger your hands look... you'll feel how much softer, smoother they are... not greasy... not sticky!

Here's the Secret: Sofskin's special mollescent action works right into surface skin where it conditions and beautifies! That's why so many beauty experts say...

No matter what hand cream or lotion you've ever tried just wait until you use

Sofskin

CREME

At drug and cosmetic counters down a long tunneling drop. Libby lost her breath and couldn't get it back, and they spun around a curve.

"Marry me?" said Steve.

"No," said Libby, and they stopped with a bump against a padded rail.

They left the bright circle at last, eating hot popcorn as they went. Steve drove slowly now. The air had freshened, as if there were rain behind it somewhere, and there was a smell of cool earth and leaves.

Libby felt half stirred and half content. She watched Steve's face in the little glow from the dashboard.

Still looking at the road, he lifted one hand from the wheel and touched her hair. As if he knew exactly where she was. "No moon," he said softly.

"Why do you like that, Steve?"

"Make my own moonlight, if it's needed," he said, half laughing, half arrogant.

His hand tightened in her hair, and slowly she drew away. He was too sure, and that pricked her into swift defense. But she went on watching his face, and liking to have him there. And she was sorry she had moved away. The little pulse that leaped inside her when he touched her beat on with a muffled waiting thud.

When he drew up in front of the gift shop, however, she slipped quickly out of the car. And she said good night on the sidewalk, and he smiled and made no protest.

She wondered if he knew she was suddenly afraid to have him touch her. As if he could catch her into a sudden dizzy loop, like the Ferris wheel—and then she might say "yes" before the lights stopped spinning.

"Good night," she said again.

"I'll be around," said Steve.

She almost made up her mind, that night. She almost decided it was Steve.

But next morning, with a strong sunlight coming through the window, with coffee boiling on her electric plate, some of the evening's glamour slipped away. You didn't spend your life on a Ferris wheel, after you were married.

And when Amos phoned, she was still more uncertain. Amos said "Hello," and gladness stirred in her, a pricked-ear quick gladness. "Did you say 'no' last night?" Amos inquired.

Libby chuckled. "Don't tell me you're curious."

"Put it this way," Amos said. "Have I got a date with you tonight?"

"Yes," Libby told him. Which was a convincing answer to his first question, after all.

"Then that's all right," Amos said. "Pick you up for dinner?"

WITH THE CHILDREN

I have just been over to Denny's house and his grandmother is here from Chicago. I don't think she is really truly grammy though. You know why? Her hair is black, her lips are lipstick-red like mommy's, she has on blood fingernails and there are holes in her shoes. Besides, she didn't even want to kiss me.

Everybody has a mouth, but there are really only two kinds of mouths—those that turn up and those that turn down. Why don't people whose mouths turn down stand on their heads for a little time every day until their mouths turn up?

Brother and sister, four and three years old, were told the story of Christmas and then taken to a church to see the crèche. Most impressed, they gazed and gazed. In a very tiny voice sister said, "The Lord Jesus' birthday, a lot of candles and no cake!"

When you are sick and people are not in your room it is nice to look at a bowl of goldfish. It looks like someone making faces at you. Sometimes the faces look like people we know.

—KATHRYN COFFEY GLENNON.

UNGUENTINE* has many uses

You know it for burns... but have you used it for other "Skinjuries"—surface cuts, abrasions, scrapes, scratches, chafing and skin irritations?

1. It relieves pain
2. It fights infection
3. It promotes healing

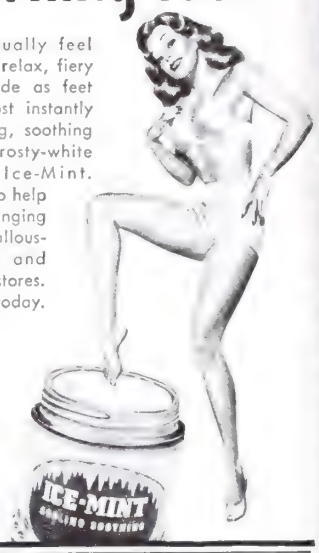
In tubes and jars at all drug stores.

A Norwich Product — Norwich

*Reg. U. S. Pat. Off.

So soothing for tired, burning feet

You can actually feel tired muscles relax, fiery burning subside as feet respond almost instantly to the cooling, soothing comfort of frosty-white medicinal Ice-Mint. Grand, too, to help soften up stinging corns and calluses. At drug and department stores. Get Ice-Mint today.



COLD SORE STICK!
EASY TO CARRY—HANDY TO USE

Check cold sores with COLD SORE IVO. Medicates, lubricates, protects. Feel relief instantly! Made by the makers of famous LIP IVO since 1907. At drug stores 35¢.

IVO, INC., WEST BEND, WIS.

Cold Sore-IVO

Start your own profitable BUSINESS MAKE AND SELL Costume Jewelry

Send today for our Free Book "How to Make Costume Jewelry." Includes complete instructions, colorful pictures and all information to start your own profitable business—at home. Write Today—It's FREE.

FREE BOOK VALUE 50¢

ZANONE'S, 434 S. Dearborn St., Dept. 30 Chicago 5, Ill.

La Mode
BUTTONS

B. Blumenthal & Co., Inc., 1372-82 Broadway, N.Y. 18, N.Y.
Button Specialists Since 1877

Chest Cold Misery Relieved by Moist Heat of ANTIPHLOGISTINE

IMPLE
IEST COLD
ORE THROAT
RONCHIAL IRRITATION
IMPLE
PRAIN, BRUISE
ORE MUSCLES
OILS

The moist heat of an ANTIPHLOGISTINE poultice relieves cough, tightness of chest, muscle soreness due to chest cold, bronchial irritation and simple sore throat.

pply ANTIPHLOGISTINE poultice ust hot enough to be comfortble—then feel the moist heat go ight to work on that cough, ightness of chest, muscle soreess. Does good, feels good for everal hours.

he moist heat of an ANTIPHLOGISTINE oultice also reduces swelling and reeves pain due to a boil, simple sprain, ruise, or similar injury or condition nd limbers up stiff, aching muscles. et ANTIPHLOGISTINE (Aunty Flo) in ube or can at your drug store NOW.

Antiphlogistine

e White Package with the Orange B

Antiphlogistine

They arranged it that way, and at six o'clock he came for them in a car and drove them down. Amos seemed very tall, after Steve. Very tall and very dark. He smiled at her slowly, and for a moment she couldn't look away.

Then he said, "Let's eat at the inn," in a practical tone. And everything was easy and natural again.

Dinner at the inn was calm and colorless. Amos made quiet conversation. He watched her, but his tone was impersonal. He was the kind of man that nice girls married, Libby reflected. Steady and prosperous. Conservative. Controlled. Predictable.

Half an hour after they'd left the inn, she wasn't sure about those last three items. In fact, she wasn't sure about anything, a condition that was becoming chronic.

Because without any comment or warning, instead of an evening at the movies or in her living room, Amos drove her over to the river. He stopped at a little tight building, newpainted, with a shiny new padlock.

"What's this?" asked Libby.

"Speedboat," Amos answered briefly. "I've always liked the water, you know."

"No, I didn't know," Libby told him. "I mean, like this."

"Maybe you never asked me," Amos said.

He settled her in the boat without any further conversation, raised the water door, and then they were out on the river. It was almost dark on shore, but the water seemed to hold the light longer. The little boat cut ahead, and Libby trailed one hand over the edge to let the water swing it.

"Nice," she said.

"I've wanted it a long time," Amos told her. "But I didn't like to say anything till I was sure I had it."

"Why, Amos?"

He didn't answer right away, and she glanced at him. His dark head was turned so she couldn't see his face.

"Remember my kid brother, Kent? There wasn't a thing I cared about, when we were little, that he didn't get away from me. Because my mother backed him up, and shamed me into it. And then I got smart, and didn't let him know the things I liked. I guess I got into a habit of playing safe."

"It's a good habit, Amos."

"Not very attractive," he said dryly. "Not dramatic."

She was silent, and the boat took them on down the river, till darkness sifted over them. The shore stood away remotely.

Then they turned and started back, with the town lights glowing faintly against the sky. Neither of them spoke, and the silence held till Libby could feel it tautening between them.

Amos cut the motor suddenly and they lost way, drifting soundlessly. Libby sat very still, and knew she was waiting.

He touched her arm and then his hand covered hers, lightly. Libby felt her fingers turning slowly to lock against his. Then he was holding her, and his mouth burned steadily against her face, and the brightness came again. Brightness that swirled inside her and drove her fiercely toward him.

When she finally pulled away and spoke, her voice was shaking. "You didn't—you never ——"

"Yes," said Amos, his own voice changed. "You told me the other night that I never made love to you."

"But I didn't mean ——" she began, and stopped in honesty.

"I'm taking you home," Amos said abruptly. "I'm certainly not going to stay here and not touch you." She didn't answer, and he said, "You don't love me yet, do you, Libby?"

"I—don't know," she said.

"That's why I'm taking you home," said Amos then. "Because I want you for keeps." And the phrase stirred an echo in her mind of the little boy who learned to play safe, when he wanted things.

When they were in the car, driving home, they sat with clear space between them, space that Libby measured over and over, and was more conscious of than the road ahead. And that same little pulse that she HOOP-LA! Munsingwear has made a mighty mite for you. A Foundette...a glamour pantie girdle that coaxes a little here, curves a little there...does such a super-slick job all around you'll think it's heaven sent. Could be, too, so tissue-light is its knit fabric of Lastex* and rayon...so heavenly is its two-way stretch.

*Reg. U. S. Pat. Off.

There's a Future for Your Figure in Foundettes

by MUNSINGWEAR

Reg U. S. Pat. Off.

It's like walking to music...
dancing along on Invisible Rhythm treads
one-two-three to a step
Every
Yes...
a lovely day
walking the RHYTHM STEP way

$9.95 & $10.95

For the name of your nearest dealer
write
JOHNSON, STEPHENS & SHINKLE
SHOE CO. St. Louis

knew beat on deep within her, expectant, alive.

With a swift shock, she realized that was how she had felt, driving home the night before with Steve. Was that the kind of girl she was, so easily stirred by two different men? Something was wrong with her, or the system of things, or maybe with love. She was half angry, half ashamed. It wasn't decent, to feel like this about both Amos and Steve.

Saying good night in front of the gift shop, Amos turned her face toward him briefly till he could see her eyes. "Don't worry, Libby," he said gently. And it wasn't till he was gone that she wondered how much he knew. She had done that, too, the night before.

She had a few brutal things to say to herself, that night before she got to sleep. And she remembered what Doris had said, about love and sex; it was barely possible that Doris was right.

The next afternoon, after work, she stopped by Doris' house. She had a vague plan of tapping a little of Doris' new store of wisdom about marriage. But she didn't get the chance.

Doris was working at the side of the house, where some ivy had fallen down. She was untangling the strands grimly, and looping each cleared vine over one arm.

"Hello," she said to Libby. "This stuff is fighting me. Hold that piece, will you, please?"

Her husband, Tim, came out as Libby answered He was nice, if not romantic, Libby thought. He had the most friendly smile she knew.

"Thought I heard voices," he told Libby. "Where've you been lately?"

"Around," Libby said, smiling back at him.

"Darn!" said Doris, and they both looked at her. She stood there with her arms full of ivy. "I forgot the string," she said.

"I know you did," said Tim, pulling string and a knife out of his pocket. He began to cut lengths of twine for her.

"I'm dumb," Doris told him ruefully.

"Then I'm crazy about dumb people," said Tim.

He and Doris were looking at each other, and Libby watched them. They hadn't said anything important. They weren't doing anything but fixing some ivy. And yet, for an instant, she knew that if she had spoken, they would not hear. They were off beyond her reach, like the people in the green garden long ago. They had a little green path, where no one else could go. Well, now she knew something more about marriage, even if it didn't help her much.

She went away after a while, still full of unanswered questions. The only thing she was sure of was that she didn't want to have a date alone with either Amos or Steve for a while. Not till she got over the shock of finding out she could react so swiftly to each of them. Not till she was a little more clear about what that reaction was.

And since she couldn't exactly explain all this to Amos and Steve, and since they both phoned her frequently the next couple of days, she ended up having a date with the two of them together. They had gone out only once before, as a threesome; and that time the general mood had been strained. This time, both men seemed to be making a fine effort toward a sporting attitude. There was a general flavor in the air of "let the best man win," and somehow this did not please Libby. She didn't want them giving each other black eyes, but a little healthy antagonism between them might have helped her own problem.

They all sat in the front seat of Amos' car, Libby naturally in the middle. And the two men kept up an irritating run of talk about taxes, golf, politics and blue laws.

"Don't mind me," she said once, rather crossly.

"We don't, Libby," Steve assured her. "We don't mind you at all." He patted her hand, but in a definitely public manner.

Amos turned to give her a swift grin. "We don't you start a nice juicy subject, Libby," he suggested.

And immediately, of course, her mind went blank of conversation. Except topics that would emphasize their personal situation.

"Where are we going, anyway?" she asked finally.

"Thought we'd run out to the country club and have a drink," Amos said. "And then Steve knows a good place for dinner."

It might have been a good place for dinner, but Libby never found out. Because it was at the country club that it happened. One of those small things that carry unexpected power, like touching a family electric socket in your own home, and having the thing stare at you with a sudden tingling heat. It was like that to Libby, who expected nothing from the country club but a cold drink.

She was standing with Steve and Amos at the big walnut bar, drinking a lime rickey. She looked into the big mirror behind the bar, saw her blond hair, and started for the powder room to make repairs.

With her mind full of her Steve-Amos problem, she walked around the bar through the familiar little brown door. And it wasn't till she'd pushed the door open, got well inside it, that she realized she had turned left instead of right. Green metal lockers towered around her, with white benches at their feet. And straight in front of her was a group of men, decently clothed in shorts but obviously startled to have a woman in their midst. They were playing poker, and beyond them was a sprinkling of other men just come in from the golf course.

Libby stood staring at them, appalled, to see that she had calmly walked into the sacred precincts of the men's locker room. Bare tanned arms and shoulders were all around her, and a hideous sea of startled and amused faces.

"I didn't—I'm sorry ——" she said and fled.

She turned into the cocktail lounge again, and the wave of heat that had swept over her lifted to a still hotter embarrassment. Plenty of people had noticed her wrong choice of doors, it seemed. The entire roomful of people seemed to be watching her, laughing at her.

She hadn't done anything so dreadful, she told herself indignantly. Perfectly natural

For My Young Daughter Growing Up

By Joseph Auslander

Dear child, so wise and loyal, though I tell
Over and over crazy golden things,
Still you believe them; though I say, "Her wings
Were moon drift" . . . or "A bright red cockerel
Stalked across the sky at sunset, fell
Into a pool of stars, and left white rings
Of water dust on darkness" . . . your hand clings
Tightly to mine, your eyes accept the spell.

Someday I shall begin, "Dusk rang a bell
Of raindrops in the lupine's rocking steeple" . . .
And when I look up, you will murmur, "Well?"
Quite like a hundred million other people;
Then I will think how beautiful you were
When you insisted that the pansies purr.

REALSILK MEANS QUALITY
IN PRODUCT . . . IN OPPORTUNITY

FOR MEN
Socks
Neckwear
Shirts
Underwear
Pajamas
Robes
Sportswear
Accessories

FOR WOMEN
Coats Suits
Dresses
Rainwear
Sportswear
Lingerie
Hosiery
Accessories

FINE MERCHANDISE—sold direct by reliable local men and women—with direct-to-consumer shipment, from one central point, assuring quality control of Fashion . . . Fabric . . . and Fit.

FINE OPPORTUNITIES—for men and women in both sales and management positions open in many communities.

WRITE DEPT. J-1
REAL SILK HOSIERY MILLS, INC.
Indianapolis 6, Indiana

Use this famous Canadian Formula for CHAPPED
DRY HANDS

1. Quicker results. Softens roughest, driest skin overnight.
2. Proved effectiveness for 65 years in cold Canada.

Economical—single drop serves both hands

3. A pure, rich concentrated emollient. Aids healing. Choice of countless doctors, nurses, housewives, mothers.

At cosmetic counters—10¢ 25¢, 50¢ and $1.00 a bottle

Campana Balm
THE SKIN SOFTENER

Sell GREETING CARDS
100 MONEY MAKERS
343 Broadway, Dept F

mistake. Two little brown doors. Probably people did this every other day. But still her feet refused to move, and her ears buzzed with heat.

And out of the confusion of faces, she saw Steve. Incredulously, she saw that he was laughing, too, with his bright head tilted back. He was laughing the way he always did at funny things but now he was laughing at her.

She swallowed, and lifted her chin and took one step forward. And then Amos was beside her, his hand firmly on her arm.

"It's too blasted stuffy in here," Amos was saying casually. "Come on out on the terrace, Libby."

She went with him gratefully, while he talked on about the weather in a clear carrying tone. People began turning back to their own tables.

Everything was all right, Libby knew abruptly—walking between the little tables with Amos. She and Amos had nothing to do with the rest of the room. And she discovered that it really didn't matter that she'd gone into the wrong room and interrupted a few men playing cards.

Outside on the terrace she took a step away from Amos, and his hand dropped to his side. She looked at him slowly, carefully. He didn't look different from the way he had before: the same intent dark eyes, the straight mouth that gave nothing away. But everything about him was different to Libby.

THE vines on the terrace wall hung still, the leaves on the trees were motionless, but she felt caught in a high wind.

So this was what happened when you loved a man. No small easy excitement. No pondering and deciding. No drama, even. You just knew that when the bad things happened, and the little hateful things, too, you could hold out your hand and he'd be there. You knew that with him you walked apart from the rest of the world, in a safe place.

"My little green path," she said aloud suddenly, "in the garden."

"What?" said Amos.

She couldn't tell him then, she couldn't tell him yet. Not only because of the shyness that caught at her throat, but because of Steve.

"Come on, Amos," she said quickly. "Let's get the car."

"Steve?" said Amos.

"I'll phone him," Libby said. "Take me home, Amos."

She didn't have to talk to Amos, going home. She remembered now how she never had to talk to Amos.

When they got to her apartment, she went straight to the phone and called the country club. She had a boy sent to page Steve, and then she settled back in her chair and looked at Amos. He was sitting in the chair he always chose, straight in front of her. He was lighting a cigarette. And his face was politely blank as she phoned.

Libby grinned suddenly. This time, perhaps, he wouldn't hold that blank expression. Then she heard Steve's voice saying hello, and she sobered.

"Steve?" she said. "Libby."

Amos knocked the ash from his cigarette carefully on the floor.

"Steve," she said, "you always like it quick and straight."

"Yes?" said Steve's voice cautiously.

"Steve," she said, "I'm going to marry Amos."

Amos dropped the cigarette. His face did more than lose its blankness. For an instant the straight mouth held still, and then the glory came.

Libby's hand shook and she steadied the receiver. Out of the silence, Steve's voice came clearly.

"We had fun, Libby," said Steve.

Amos took the receiver from her hand and laid it gently down in its cradle. Amos was with her, close. Someday she'd tell him about the green garden. But not now, she thought, as his hands touched her face. Not now.

Beau-Catcher Cotton
by JERRY GILDEN

Sweet, neat little cotton dress to go gay in the morning and glamorous at night. (A quick change of accessories does the trick). Wonderful, tubbable cotton that's sanforized to prevent shrinkage. Choose it in pastel shades of blue, pink, aqua, gray or maize. Sizes 10 to 20.
$10.98.

Berkdale Sanforized cotton by Lonsdale

EXCLUSIVELY AT ZCMI
IN SALT LAKE CITY, UTAH

A Jerry Gilden SPECTATOR

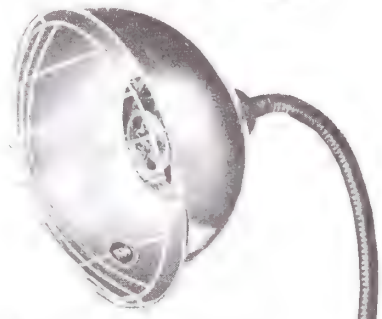
ORDER BY MAIL
ZION'S CO-OPERATIVE MERCANTILE INSTITUTION
Salt Lake City, Utah

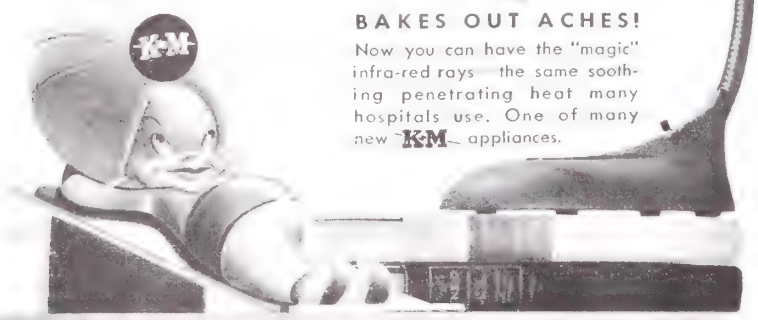
Please send_____"Beau-Catcher" Jerry Gilden Dresses, postage prepaid.
My size is 10 ☐ 12 ☐ 14 ☐ 16 ☐ 18 ☐ 20 ☐
Color: *1st choice*_____ *2nd choice*_____
NAME_____
(Please print)
STREET_____
CITY_____ ZONE_____ STATE_____
Cash ☐ Charge ☐ C.O.D. ☐ Money Order ☐

UNTIL YOU SEE K-M

YOU HAVEN'T SEEN THE FINEST

Things for comfort—things for fun—that's what the genial K-M Genie brings you! A whole host of amazing new Electrical Servants made to new high standards of quality—packed with unique features you'll want to see before you buy. Watch for them. Wait for them. Check with your K-M dealer today!





BAKES OUT ACHES!

Now you can have the "magic" infra-red rays—the same soothing penetrating heat many hospitals use. One of many new K-M appliances.

K-M Infra-Red Ray Lamp

For Modern Magic—watch for the K-M GENIE!

K-M Electrical Appliances — Knapp Shavers, Therm-A-Jugs, Jack Frost Fans, Magik Mist, Moth Vapor are manufactured by . . .

KNAPP-MONARCH CO., St. Louis 16, Mo.

HOW TO RELIEVE

PERIODIC PAIN?

I'll answer that...

Just take a Midol tablet with a glass of water. That's all!

Then you can forget that old idea that functional periodic pain means suffering, for you'll be doing what millions of girls and women do to get relief from periodic pain, headache, backache and "let-down" feeling.

You see, Midol doesn't interfere with the normal menstrual process, yet it acts 3 ways to bring relief from pain and discomfort: 1—Midol contains an [illegible] ingredient that [illegible]. 2—Another ingredient [illegible] menstrual headache fast. 3—Still another ingredient acts to dispel "blues", picks you up!

Take a Midol tablet at the first sign of menstrual pain, and learn how easy you can go through your period. Your druggist has Midol.

MIDOL

[illegible]

CRAMPS—HEADACHE—"BLUES"

New! Enriched!

Select SHAMPOO CREAM

CONTAINS NEW HAIR-VITALIZING ELEMENTS

A new way to glow-light your hair to unbelievable sheen! Select's exclusive ingredients do it. Try Select Shampoo Cream today.

Select Shampoo Cream

Large Jar $1.00

SELECT COSMETICS
Chicago 10, Illinois
CHICAGO • NEW YORK • PARIS

WANTED: A FEDERAL LABOR POLICY

(Continued from Page 6)

limited application; and the so-called "anti-Petrillo" act, technically called the Lea Act, has been declared unconstitutional, as imposing discriminatory restrictions upon a specific group of workers and on no others.

Disinterested studies made by our most competent experts on labor relations, in and outside of Government, of other proposed legislation such as the Case Bill, vetoed by President Truman, and the Burton-Hatch Bill do not induce confidence that they merit acceptance as an adequate labor policy. "Most of them," says a leading student and expert, Ludwig Teller, "incorporated repressive legislation and reflected pet peeves." Most of them also were hastily considered responses to extreme crises and framed in the worst of atmospheres, passion. Some also showed remarkable ignorance of existing laws and, like the Lea Act, would probably have been declared unconstitutional before courts. Others tended to mix up and confuse different problems, such as antitrust legislation and labor regulation, failing to see that two perils cannot be met by the same means.

It therefore seems to me, who am no expert, but an avid student of the experts, that Congress ought to start all over from scratch in creating a new labor policy and code and institutions for its support, framed in one comprehensive Federal statute to supplant all existing statutes and institutions in this field.

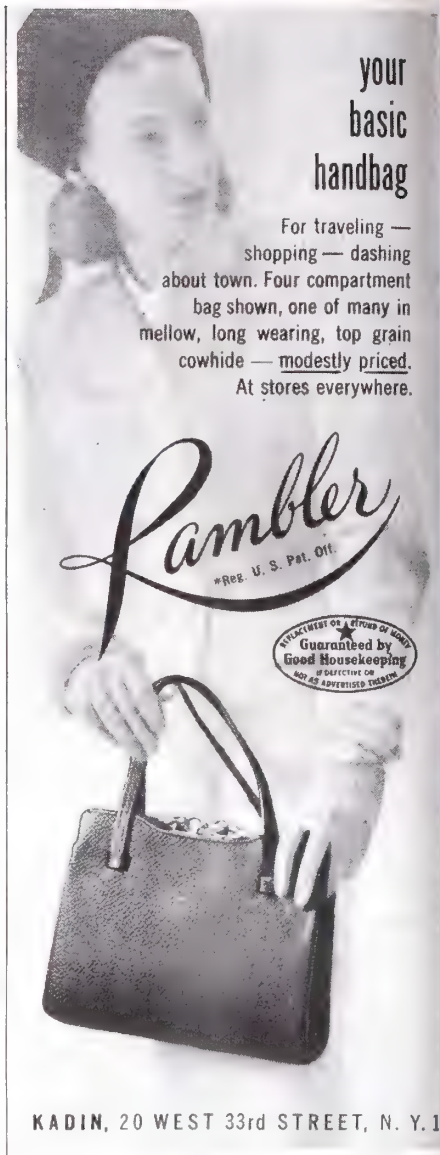
The statute must express in clear and definite terms what public interests must be precedent to all interests; define the rights and obligations of unions; and create new administrative and at least one quasi-judicial body through which the statute can be upheld. The assumptions of such a statute should be: 1—That trade-unions are necessary and desirable to our system and here to stay. There should be no intention or hint of any desire to restrict their functioning; the object should be to assist them to function in the interest of the public and of their membership; 2—That private and corporate enterprise within a proper legal framework has legitimate functions and interests to defend; 3—That all industry is, in the first line, a public service, failure to render which is failure to the common welfare; and 4—That Government is partisan only to the common good.

THE public interest lies in full production and equal access of all to the labor market. That is the basis for prohibiting practices, whether of labor or management or collusive between them, which militate against these public interests. These practices must, however, be clearly defined and prohibited not only in law (as in the Lea Act) but prohibited in agreements arrived at by collective bargaining.

The building and electrical trades, for instance, the stage unions as well as the musicians', are full of make-work rules, quota systems, stand-by practices, and so on, which simply compel the public to pay in prices for services not rendered.

The argument against the closed shop is that no democratic society can legitimately permit control over the job market to be monopolized by any private person or organization. There should, in this connection, be embodied in a labor statute prohibition against discrimination by unions or employers against any persons for reasons of race, creed or politics. Breaches of contracts, or strikes or lockouts in breach of agreements, should be prohibited, as should disorderly conduct, violence, sit-downs, and the hiring by management of strikebreakers.

If labor in Government employment is to be forbidden the right to strike, that should be made clear in the comprehensive statute which would supplant an existing legislation. But wherever strikes are outlawed, much better personal-relations systems need establishing.



your basic handbag

For traveling — shopping — dashing about town. Four compartment bag shown, one of many in mellow, long wearing, top grain cowhide — modestly priced. At stores everywhere.

Rambler *Reg. U. S. Pat. Off.

Guaranteed by Good Housekeeping

KADIN, 20 WEST 33rd STREET, N. Y. 1

LOSES 40 POUNDS OF FAT listening to Music!

WITHOUT STARVATION DIETS OR DRUGS

In just 7 days, you can prove to yourself that the Wallace method can help you to take off 10, 20 or more pounds of excess weight. Now—banish "spare tire" waistline, reduce bulging hips. Reproportion your figure to slender, attractive lines. And, once you are reduced you can wear clothes sizes smaller.

GET THIN TO MUSIC with Wallace Reducing Records

It's fun to reduce this easy, safe way. The Wallace method works hand in hand with nature. That's why it brings such gratifying results. Over 500,000 women have reduced by this method.

WALLACE Creator of "Get Thin to Music" Radio Program

Here's sensational offer you cannot afford to miss.

Sent on 7 Days' FREE TRIAL

Don't send a penny. Simply mail coupon. By return mail, postage prepaid, you'll receive a Wallace Reducing Record and lesson on 7 days' FREE trial. Sent in plain wrapper. No obligation. This offer is open only to women over 18. Address

Wallace Records, Suite 1095
154 E. Erie St., Chicago 11, Ill.

Wallace, Suite 1095
154 E. Erie St., Chicago 11, Ill.
Please send me FREE and postpaid the Wallace Reducing Record and lesson for 7 days' free trial. This does not obligate me in any way. I am over 18.

Name .....

Address .....

City ..... Zone ..... State .....

Stout Women

"The answer to a stout woman's prayer"

writes this customer of

Lane Bryant

Thank heaven! At least twenty years ago I found Lane Bryant. Since then I have been able to dress myself satisfactorily, comfortably, and at very reasonable prices. And I consider Lane Bryant the answer to a stout woman's prayer.

Mrs. Austin W. Stitt
Freusburg, N.Y.

Lane Bryant
152 EAST MARKET ST., DEPT. 33
INDIANAPOLIS 12, INDIANA

AT LAST! SOMETHING NEW and SENSATIONAL in EVERYDAY CARDS

Gorgeous Satin and Velour Designs

Show rich new Satin and Velour Greeting Cards. Astounding value, 16 for $1. Get easy orders FAST! Pay up to 100% cash profit. 14 other assortments retail 60c to $1. SAMPLES on Approval. Write today.

Make Money Easily

CO., 2801 Locust, Dept. 713-B, St. Louis 3, Mo.

AT LAST!

A HAND CREAM

THAT HELPS KEEP

HANDS SOFTER,

SMOOTHER . . . AND

IS NOT STICKY—

NOT GREASY!

Luxor
HAND CREAM

Luxor contains Carbamide, the ingredient long familiar to surgeons, which helps relieve the tiny cracks and scratches that make hands look red, feel rough!

Most [illegible] if [illegible] the ordinary courts [illegible] before which to hear cases involving collective bodies of men. We need special labor tribunals, of which some foreign countries have an encouraging history. Such tribunals should be quasi-judicial; partly, at least, administrative, for what they need are experts rather than judges, and the object in all labor disputes should be to avoid litigation and the use of the injunction, which past and recent history has revealed to be a most unsatisfactory form of judicial process in labor disputes.

We also need, in the place of the present agencies, a new mediation service, conciliation service and arbitration service, all outside of the Department of Labor, which is traditionally partisan, and a compulsion on labor and management to resort to them if a strike threatens.

Labor tribunals, neither strikes nor management decisions, should settle such matters as jurisdictional issues between contending unions. And they should also be authorized to hear individual complaints of union members against intimidation, violence and suppression of democratic rights within unions.

Also, if a national emergency necessitates the seizure of a plant, the rights of employers and labor should be much more clarified during seizure than they are at present, and a regular agency—not, as at present, the President or a person or committee appointed by him—should be in charge of adjusting the controversy which led to the seizure.

Even a comprehensive Federal labor policy will not solve the problems of a modern free industrial society, nor guarantee full and continuous employment. But it would start to bring some order into the present chaos. And for the present chaos neither management nor labor is primarily responsible. Primarily responsible is the Government of the United States, which, vacillating between concessions and impotent showdowns, according to the winds of public opinion or estimates of vote getting, has signally failed up to now to produce anything comprehensive, integrated, rational, constructive and workable. There should immediately be created for the proper congressional committee an advisory commission from among the nation's most objectively minded and unprejudiced experts, in which the nation is by no means lacking.

★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★

Jeered Clique

By Georgie Starbuck Galbraith

I'd be the last one to deny
You have, my prince, a full supply
Of faults, as who am I to doubt
Who have to wring the bathroom out
When you have bathed? You're often prone
To make a most unseemly moan
If dinner's late. And when did you
Hang up an overcoat, or screw
A tooth-paste cap back on, or bash
An ash tray squarely with an ash?
Yet such my love for you, I'd not Attempt to bleach one leopard's spot
With which your lordly hide is flecked.
Though frankly, dear, should you elect
To do the job yourself, my cheers
Would deafen your beloved ears!

★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★

A richer color – a richer cream!

It looks rich, this luscious golden-yellow night cream! And it is rich in lanolin, one of the most effective skin-softeners. Even hyper-dry skin begins to feel supple and smooth under the influence of this superbly rich blend. Like all Tussy preparations, this was designed for loveliness. $1, $1.75, $3 plus tax. At better cosmetic counters, of course.

TUSSY rich cream

"Red Majesty is terrific!"

says: MRS. RONALD COLMAN

MRS. RONALD COLMAN, delightful wife of the distinguished screen star is one of many Hollywood beauties who give "rave notices" to Red Majesty.

World's Newest Shade!

No wonder this new queen of the reds—Tangee Red Majesty—is a sensation in New York and Hollywood. It's that rarest shade of all—a truly royal red. And you'll love what it does for your lips!

1947's Smartest Case!

Last word in post-war beauty! Gleaming brass—exquisitely etched. A simple twist of its swivel base and up comes your Red Majesty.

America's Top-rated Lipstick!

In a recent test of 27 leading lipsticks (conducted by a group of impartial experts) Tangee Satin-Finish lipstick was rated No. 1...receiving particularly high marks for "staying power" and ease of application.

PRESENTED IN:

RED MAJESTY RED-RED GAY-RED
THEATRICAL RED MEDIUM-RED
NATURAL

CONSTANCE LUFT HUHN
Head of the House of Tangee and creator of Tangee Red Majesty Lipstick and Petal-Finish Cake Make-Up.

USE Tangee...

AND SEE HOW BEAUTIFUL YOU CAN BE

"Her voice was ever soft, gentle, and low, an excellent thing in woman."—Shakespeare.

We hear you talking

BY DAWN CROWELL
Beauty Editor of the Journal

DID you ever stop to think that your voice probably needs make-up just as much as your face? It is possible, of course, that you are a great beauty who needs no added cosmetic polishing. It is possible, also, that you are divinely gifted with a speaking voice of such natural beauty that strong men, who confess themselves extremely susceptible to melting tones, flock to pay you homage. If, however, you are about like most of us, you take pains to make your face as appealing as possible . . . and you should do exactly the same thing for your voice. There is no more reason for accepting the voice you are born with than for meeting the world with an unretouched face or a hang dog hair-do! Good grooming is for inflections as well as complexions. In fact, you are a lot less limited in dealing with the former, for in voice you can choose your own coloring and features, so to speak, instead of taking what your parents handed you.

Just because you do not plan to use your voice professionally is no excuse for ignoring it. That would be like forsaking make-up because you don't want to look theatrical! Professional speakers, radio and movie actresses were not born with attractive speaking voices any more than you were. They have cultivated them. Every woman, wife, mother or career girl can cultivate and improve her voice, not for public speaking, but to add charm and loveliness to her own life as well as to the lives of those around her.

A good voice can be your golden key which will unlock the doors leading to a harmonious home life, happy friendships and successful work. A warm reassuring voice can give tenderness and trust to children; scold effectively without leaving a scar; command others without fostering resentment; give sincerity to words of sympathy and understanding; be the song in the heart of your home; or, if you're a working girl, be the music to your boss' ears! A good voice does not have to show age with the passing of years, but can act as a constant well-spring of youth, enthusiasm and gaiety!

With such invaluable gifts "within speaking distance" of every woman, it might be well worth while to learn and follow some basic rules that will add a golden glow to your voice and make you infinitely more attractive.

Hear your voice as others hear it. You can make a recording of your voice, then listen while it is played back to you. This is an excellent way to discover your tone qualities and voice defects. But Lisa Sergio, radio commentator known for her delightful voice, suggests reading to a wail! Sounds silly. But it's effective. It can give you a pretty true picture of the way your voice sounds to others.

Take something to read over to the corner of a room. Sit as near the walls as possible. Now read out loud, directing your words to the corner in front of you. Use your most natural, everyday voice. (Dressing up your voice for this occasion defeats your purpose.) The sounds you hear are the sounds everyone else hears.

"You can get the same effect," adds Crystal Waters, voice coach, "by using a large piece of cardboard, a door or a vanity mirror to act as your sounding board."

Now that you've heard your voice, do you like it? Does it sound gay and interesting? Dull and monotonous? Are the tones low and melodious, or high and shrill? Do you think your voice has the qualities necessary for making it "the golden key"? These questions, answered uncheatingly, may start you wishing you could do something to improve your voice. For a perfect voice—or a near-perfect voice—is a rarity.

Breathing and posture exercises will flatter your voice the way other exercises flatter your figure. Miss Gertrude Fogler, Hollywood voice coach, has taken the slurs, burrs, nasals and gutturals out of more voices than you can hear at a party. She suggests this exercise: Stand erect. Inhale deeply through your nose, and feel your stomach pushing forward. Now exhale and feel your stomach receding to its original position. Repeat the exercise, breathing through your nose and mouth. Ten or fifteen minutes each morning and night will help form correct breathing habits. While you're doing these exercises for your voice, you're also doing your lungs a favor. For what pair of lungs doesn't appreciate expansive areas of air with which to function?

Another exercise. This is probably one you would prefer to practice in the very, very privacy of your own room. But, if you're a mother, practicing it in front of your children is as funny as the funny papers to them . . . and it's one way of getting them interested in their voices at an early age! Loll your head around and around, completely relaxed, jaw and tongue hanging. Rotate your head in one direction six or eight times. Then reverse rotation, going the same number of ways in the other direction. This (Continued on Page 215)

Do You Slur Your Words?

Slurring words is the most common of all mistakes. We detect the mistakes when others make them, but do you make them yourself? Check yourself on this list:

Lemme see	Let me see
Whajasay?	What did you say?
Izzinit?	Isn't it?
Izze?	Is he?
Izzatso?	Is that so?
I dunno	I don't know
Litturcher	Literature
Stujus	Studious
Tamarra	Tomorrow
Whaddyno?	What do you know?
Whadidjasay?	What did you say?
An then he tol me	And then he told me
Cannidate	Candidate
Becuz	Because
Avenoo	Avenue
Labatary	Laboratory
Havenyoo	Haven't you?
Salry	Salary
Awright	All right
Secretree	Secretary
Soverthere	It's over there
Didja?	Did you?
Havya?	Have you?
Whasnoo?	What's new?
Suprise	Surprise
S'mother	Some other

Easy does it!

Preparing nutritious meals planned around canned foods is a pleasure. Easy to serve attractively, these delicious foods make light work of setting a mighty fine table.

Raw foods too often lose precious flavor and nutritive values in transit and storage and during home cooking. But, food authorities agree—you can trust foods in cans.

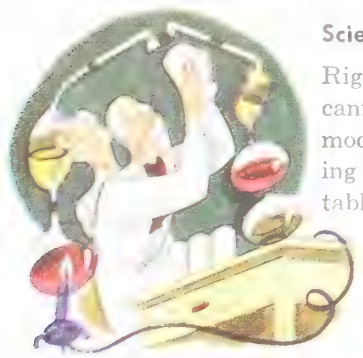
Thank today's modern, scientific canning methods for those delicious fruits and vegetables in cans, whose vitamins, minerals and flavors are sealed in, for your protection and enjoyment.

"Reprinted from the booklet 'Food Reminds'"

Fit for a king...chicken, mushrooms, and pimiento for shortcake; cranberry jelly; vegetable juice; crackers; string beans; mincemeat for tarts; coffee...and they all come to you in cans.

Meals Mere Men Can Make

With so many fine foods in cans to choose from, plus the agreeable fact that canned foods are so simple to prepare and serve—you can turn even a husband loose in the kitchen and expect a feast! He just can't go wrong in preparing a meal to be proud of—a most economical and nutritious meal—around canned foods.



Science Knows Best

Right from the beginning, foods chosen for canning are pampered and fussed over. Many modern canneries actually oversee the growing and harvesting of the fruits and vegetables which they can. Foods packed in cans come to you at the very peak of their goodness, for each can itself is actually a miniature "pressure cooker" which protects flavor, minerals, and vitamins.

Short Cut to Chicken Shortcake

Prepare cream sauce, add canned chicken. Heat through and pour over shortcake. Garnish with canned pimiento and mushrooms. Easy does it! And what a dish to serve proudly—good-looking, good-tasting, and good for you! Yes, canned foods do make meal planning seem like fun.

FOODS YOU BUY IN CANS ARE

SAFE from dirt, germs, odors.

SAFE from air, light, moisture.

SAFE even after a can is opened—because in the canning process, both the can and its contents are sterilized. Simply cover the top and place in the refrigerator.

BECAUSE

No other Container protects like the Can

CAN MANUFACTURERS INSTITUTE, INC., NEW YORK

(Continued from Page 174)

ves constriction or tightening of muscles our throat area, two things which pre-your voice from having the richness of and full, deep resonance so necessary.
her voice improver is yawning.

The importance of good posture is obviadds Miss Fogler. "If you stand with head up, chest out and back straight, ribs are elevated and you are allowing space for circulation of air. Conse-tly you are making it easier for your h to rise triumphantly from your ving cords. Little short breaths are o for good voices. You must breathe your diaphragm, because full breathing e key to attractive speaking."

to retune thin, metallic or al-sounding voices. Lillian Burns, atic coach, and Arthur Rosenstein, sing-nstructor, are two more people who d their working hours improving the s of Hollywood stars. Both know a few s about making a voice worth listening Miss Burns says, "Exercise your mouth pening and closing it in an exaggerated Close your mouth, purse your lips and until your cheeks are round and filled air. Repeat several times. Practice ng broadly. It increases the flexibility our lips. This exercise is particularly ul to the tight-lipped person, or word er, who looks as though she's hardly ing her mouth at all, and you wonder the sound manages to come out!"

Humming," adds Mr. Rosenstein, "helps ance of voice and relaxes face muscles. m and n humming sounds are vibrant good. Try to feel the hum riding out our mouth supported by the breath. Feel ibration in your nose, on the roof of mouth. The more vibration, the better. eans your throat is an open passage, free of constriction and able to produce attractive sounds. You might also practice singing vowels. Try it with your face muscles completely relaxed. Practice the scale up and down several times. It adds quality and low tones to your voice."

How far can a good voice go? Crystal Waters told us of a girl who came to her about her voice. The girl held a good job in an office, but promotions (along with the boys) were passing her by. Finally a friend of the girl told her she had overheard the boss say that he couldn't bear to have that screeching around him. Miss Waters sympathized with the girl. But she sympathized with the girl's boss too. Each word the girl emphasized sounded like a hack saw cutting through steel pipe. Her voice pattern had been developed through association with her neurotic mother, who screamed at everyone. Miss Taylor had developed a defense by screaming back. She was free of her mother's influence now, but the screech remained.

"I went to work on her," Miss Waters told us. "I should say that I showed her how to go to work on herself. The development came entirely through her own efforts. To bring the lower tones of her voice into play, I told Miss Taylor to grunt and groan like an animal. She was puzzled, but game. She groaned like a soul in torment. Then by alternately humming and groaning a short sound, she brought throat and body muscles into natural juxtaposed movement. Her low voice came into constant use. As her throat became relaxed and free, the savage sounds she was making smoothed out. The groan was still a groan, but it was no longer unpleasant. The open spaces in her throat and mouth brought forth the reverberations called resonance. The sounds were warm and full-toned, free and gentle. Gradually we translated these animal sounds into word sounds. At the end of a month of practice as constant as training for both there was no screech, no nasal twang, no metallic thinness. A pleasant, mellow voice had evolved."

The happy ending should be that she moved onward and upward in her job. Miss Waters says it is even more cinematic: Miss Taylor married her boss a year later!

Probably you don't want to marry your boss. But you certainly want to impress him. You can't use sign language, and mumble-jumble inarticulate ways will gain you nothing except antagonism from him.

It's like knowing you look your prettiest at a party. You automatically become more at ease, and you have more fun. If you know your voice is attractive, there will be vitality and interest in what you're saying. Those qualities are catching. Your boss will show interest too.

The personnel manager of a leading New York employment agency said, "The sound of the voice and the manner of speaking tell me a great deal about the interests, vitality and emotional stability of a girl during an interview. They reveal her education and breeding. Her intelligence, her disposition and her attitude toward life are disclosed."

Words and music combine for good speaking voices. You can't do justice to your voice if you mispronounce words. Many unpleasant sounds can be taken out of words by practicing pronunciation. When does an e sound like an a? When does an i sound like an e? You can turn this into a family game. All you need is a dictionary for authority and a prize for the winner!

A good voice is available to everyone. With a little effort on your part, you can learn to speak words correctly, enhance them with warmth and vibrance, and so make other people anxious to hear what you have to say.

DINING IN THE LIVING ROOM

(Continued from Page 175)

e and chairs, the built-in unit would still well in the room. The pine cupboards shelves, the flat desk for writing and the built-in seat really belong in a living n. The table is used for magazines be-n meals and the chairs look well placed ever convenient.

Built-in Unit. The type of car-ry we used for the built-in feature is st and cheapest to do because of its lute simplicity in both construction and n. There are no tricks at all, just plain t angles with no paneling or design com-ations. But if you are building in a win-seat, be sure to buy your mattress first take your proportions from that. This is r than trying to find a cushion to fit a already built. A cot mattress is ideal; a le-bed mattress is right for a seat which be used as an emergency bed. Two three old automobile seats e a superb built-in, and of se if you have an old sofa can build around that.

he tall cupboard economizes iving-room furniture, by the , and eliminates that empty-er look, no longer fashion-. You can put into it your e collection of glass, Victori-, pewter or plates. You may use it for the living-room e of collection, such as por-in animals, birds or figurines. closed cupboards under-th will hold the tableware you ually use every day. Shelves books add a substantial living-m touch and are excellent oration.

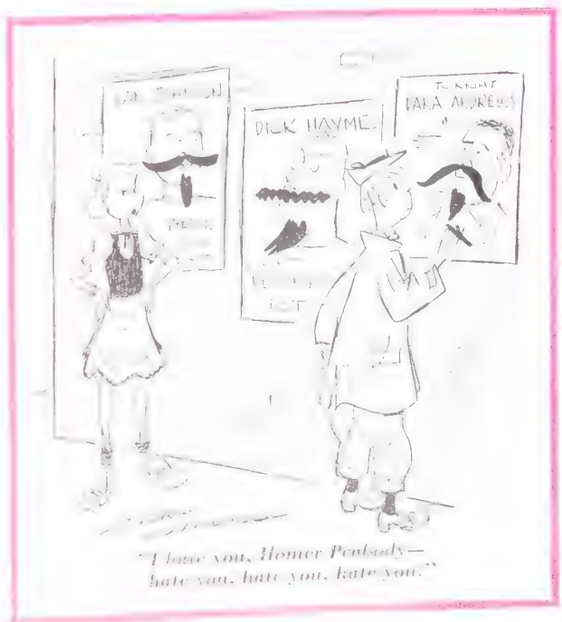
n designing your own built-feature, remember that it sn't have to be attached to walls, or the sections joined ach other. You will find it help-to sketch several possible nbinations of shelves and pboards, book sections and t tops, before you finally decide on the background you need. You can plan the flat tops first if you like, and then make the boxlike cupboards to sit on top of them. Include your radio, if you like, and the aquarium; make magazine files if you need them. Leave out the seat if you would prefer a long desk effect in front of the window. Fit it with a drop leaf if there are just two of you in the family, and use it for your table.

The Finish. If you use pine for your built-in feature, tone it to harmonize with your other furniture. You do this by applying oil stain with a brush, and then rubbing off with a cloth until you arrive at the tone desired. If you want to make your pine go toward brown rather than yellow or red, add a small amount of nigrosine to shellac and apply that with a brush. There are no definite proportions, so it is best to try for the effect you want on an odd piece of board. You can, of course, paint such a unit in color to match your room scheme, but you will have to use clear pine for the construction if you want a smooth painted finish. Two or more coats of paint are necessary to arrive at a lustrous top coat.

The Furniture. Choose a table of the same general character as the remainder of your living room, suited to the size of your family, plus accustomed guests. A trestle table such as the one shown is suitable for use in Early American and country-style rooms, as well as the average room of no period which uses cotton hangings and slip covers and no conspicuous dark wood.

A mahogany drop-leaf table would be suitable in a room with traditional furniture, damask hangings and upholstery or other suggestions of elegance. A glass-topped iron table looks well in a sunny chintz-hung room. But if yours is a room with pickup temporary furnishings, do not hesitate to paint your table leaf-green, lacquer-red or any other darker color that harmonizes with your scheme. With light wood in a modern room, choose a long table with tapering legs and perhaps a glass top, using it as a lamp-and-magazine table between meals.

Since the Kenyons were using New England type furniture of native design, we had made a trestle table as authentic for the period as any you might find in a museum. The cost of lumber for this table was $22.85; the cabinetmaker's bill, $60.00—almost an economy these days, especially as the dimensions are oversize. Such a table does not betray its real function when arranged for the day with magazines and a garden-flower bouquet. The chairs are copies of old arm Windsors, comfortable for dining, but looking quite at home in a living room.



"I hate you, Homer Peabody—hate you, hate you, hate you."

NOW! A Delicious NEW Hot Cereal!
CREAM OF RICE

Specially Designed for children under 12

SO NUTRITIOUS!
Cream of Rice adds Vitamins B_1, B_2 and Niacin—plus iron—for rich, red blood and better growth.

SO DIGESTIBLE!
Many doctors recommend Cream of Rice as baby's first cereal food. Can't irritate delicate digestive tract.

SO RICH IN ENERGY!
Cream of Rice actually gives children more energy than hot wheat or oat cereals. And how they love delicious, different Cream of Rice!

CHILDREN LOVE IT!
READY IN ONLY 5 MINUTES!
ONE OF THE QUALITY FOODS OF GROCERY STORE PRODUCTS CO.

DRESS IT UP FOR COMPANY...
DROMEDARY
GINGERBREAD LOAF
"How bea-oo-tiful," your guests will sigh! And it's luscious as it's lovely . . . the same tender, velvety crumb, the same melt-in-your-mouth flavor that Washington's mother built a reputation on! Bake batter in loaf pan. Then divide into layers. Fill and top with creamy boiled frosting. Trim with melted chocolate, bright cherries.
Just add water, bake! Always perfect!
OR EAT IT PLAIN AND WARM-A-M!
LESS THAN 4¢ PER SERVING!
(Package serves 6 to 8)
Dromedary's a wonderful buy (still a bit scarce, alas!) Same top quality makings you'd use yourself, for less than they'd cost you! No work . . . and what gingerbread! Wonderful warm . . . plain or with whipped cream or ice cream. Like the stripes? Pin paper strips on the baked loaf, sprinkle confectioner's sugar, then remove paper and dig in!
Saves your sugar . . . eggs . . . shortening!
NOTHING IN THE WORLD TASTES SO MELTINGLY LUSCIOUS AS Dromedary
World's Finest
Gingerbread
Washington's Mother's treasured old recipe —ready to pop into your oven
Dromedary Gingerbread Mix
Just add Water!
Candy from Trees... DROMEDARY Pasteurized DATES!
Enjoy nature's most delicious confection
DROMEDARY DATES
Right out of the package, or in the fruit bowl . . . in cereals or salads . . . nothing is more toothsome than fruity Dromedary Dates. And there's no finer energy food for the children—or you! Get them... whenever you can!

DALE MacLAREN IS BACK IN TOWN

(Continued from Page 46)

that even the syllable with a different meaning could cause the familiar lurch of unhappiness inside her. She had only to hear the words "hill and dale," and there it would be, before her mind could come to her rescue.

And now, after all these years, Dale had come back to Wrenn to spend a week of vacation with her aunt. And on Tuesday morning at breakfast Lincoln, with that look on his face, had said, "I'd like it if you'd invite her out, Lib. Casually, you know, to dinner, or something."

Why, Lib had thought as she ironed the blue dress, would he have asked her to do that unless he still harbored some love for her? What other reason could there be? How could he have suggested such a thing when he must be aware of how easily she tired these days? She would have to spend at least two days on the house, and at least another working herself into a frenzy to prepare one of those little meals that seem effortless, smart and delicious, and which she hated.

She could have jellied consommé, she supposed, lobster salad in avocado halves, with tiny whole-wheat rolls if she could find that recipe, and radish roses and curled celery. Perhaps homemade freezer ice cream in meringue shells. Demitasse in the living room.

She had jerked the dress around on the board to iron it crosswise at the waist, hoping to stretch it, and at that moment Linc came in, his eyes bright and his face flushed with more than the day's heat.

"I've got a sore throat."

She could have burst into happy tears when she read the thermometer. It was a hundred and one and a half. Linc's sore throats could be counted on to put him to bed for the better part of a week.

Not that avoiding Dale had settled anything. Lib admitted that to herself now as she took hold of the hymnbook and stood up beside Lincoln. But Dale's week of vacation at her aunt's was up today. Probably she had left already. By the time she came back to Wrenn again she would doubtless be married. Or maybe she never would come back at all. Gradually Linc would forget her. Lib opened her mouth and began to sing.

And then, halfway through the first verse of that second hymn, there was a lull in the singing, due to the fact that those who turned to stare lost their places for a few bars. Some leaned to whisper to their neighbors. A few, like Lincoln Jones, did not resume singing at all.

The latecomer had seated herself in the pew directly behind the one occupied by the Joneses. Lib, too, had turned to look at the beautiful, beautiful girl. Cream-blond hair was drawn up sleekly under her black cartwheel hat; her dress was summer black, and her long taffeta gloves were diagonally striped with white and a sapphire that was the exact color of her earrings and her eyes.

Lib glanced at Lincoln and saw that he had that look around his mouth, and that his face had gone dull red. So that's how it is, Lib thought. I've wondered and worried about this thing for five long years. Now I know.

She knew a lot of other things too. Among them was the sudden-born knowledge that prints were dowdy. Even the concealing quality of the dress that, only a few minutes before, had gladdened her heart, now was a source of despair. She wished that her baby were to be born next month instead of in October. There was a sort of massive dignity to late pregnancy; now she looked only as if she had a very bad figure.

Her hair, she could tell, had come out of curl at the back. She was sure she could feel lank strands on her neck. She took off her right glove and was about to put her hand back to feel, when she remembered that her arms were scratched from blackberry briers.

She remembered, too, something that until that moment she had completely forgotten: last August Nancy, in a wet diaper, had sat on her hat. Briefly, to be sure, but long enough to have made a wilted dent at the back of the crown that she never had been quite able to steam out. Nobody would notice it, of course. Nobody but your husband's old girl, sitting behind you for the better part of an hour, with nothing to do but stare at the back of your head.

Lib heard little of the sermon. I'll have to meet her after church, she thought. I'll say, "I've heard so much about you," and Dale would say, "I've heard so much about you too!" And they would stand there with fixed smiles, appraising each other, finding little else to say. It would be ghastly, but over quickly.

It was ghastly, but it was not over quickly.

They stood on the steps outside in the now broiling sun while the young minister shook hands with everybody.

Lib said, "I've heard so much about you," and Dale, from under the vast shade of her hat, said, "I've heard so much about you too."

And then there was the silence, which Lincoln broke by saying something about she was staying an extra day, wasn't she. Lib didn't hear the answer. She thought, Here I am holding my bag in front of me the way pregnant women always do, and I know my slip is showing, and she is the most beautiful girl I've ever seen in all my life.

And then Dale was smiling, and the dimples Lib had heard so much about came into her cheeks. Her voice was soft and friendly: "I hear you have two of the most adorable little girls. I do wish I could have seen them." Her sapphire eyes moved from Lib's face up to Lincoln's.

"I want you to see them," Lincoln said. And then, as one inspired, "Say—tell you what, why don't you come on out to our house for dinner? Lib always has a great big dinner on Sunday. We can stop at your aunt's and tell her. She can spare you for a few hours, I guess. That okay with you, Lib?"

On the three-mile ride out from town Lib sat in the back with the children because

(Continued on Page 218)

★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★

Song for February

By Elizabeth Coatsworth

Washington and Lincoln
Were tall men and bold;
Often they stood alone,
Or so I've been told,

Looking at an eagle
Lonely in the sky,
Listening to a wave of rain
Passing them by.

They were used to spring green
And the long low hills,
Many a ford they forded
With its rocks and rills,

Many a harvest watched for Growing in a field,
Knew the long, long patience
Waiting for the yield.

They were country born and bred,
Tempered by the land,
Danger took and forged them
In his harsh strong hand.

Washington and Lincoln
Were tall men and bold;
Often they stood alone,
Or so I've been told.

★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★

You've never bought coffee packed under a higher vacuum!

. . . thanks to the new Airtight Snap-on Cap

: Woman, take a kiss! Best coffee you ever made in your life.

E: Know why? The jar it came in is the best coffee-keeper I ever had in my life.

: Some high-powered new vacuum pack?

E: Right! It's an ultra vacuum pack. And it keeps coffee fresher—even after the jar is opened!

: Must reseal—is that it?

SHE: How'd you guess? It has a flexible cap that you just pry off with any sturdy kitchen tablespoon. And to reseal the jar, you just press down. That blessed cap will reseal—even if it's bent!

HE: Gosh. Airtight?

SHE: Airtight—always! Doesn't cost any more than any other vacuum container, either.

Owens-Illinois Glass Company, Toledo 1, Ohio

TO UNSEAL: Pry cap up firmly in several places with bowl-tip of a sturdy kitchen tablespoon.

TO RESEAL: Press cap down firmly with palm of hand. Cap is flexible. REseals, even if bent!

Duraglas ULTRA-VAC JAR
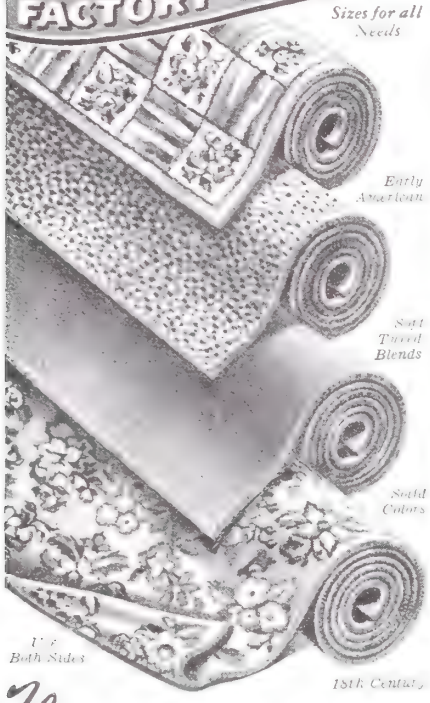
WITH THE NEW AIRTIGHT SNAP-ON CAP

RUG "MAGIC" by OLSON

FACTORY-TO-YOU!



Your OLD RUGS CARPETS, CLOTHING

Save up to ½

LEARN HOW Olson "Rug Magic" makes beautiful New Rugs from the valuable wools, etc., in discarded materials.

IT'S ALL SO EASY! Your bundle of material is picked up at your door by Freight or Express and shipped at our expense to the Olson Factory. We do the rest!

By the Olson Process we shred, merge, reclaim materials of all kinds, then bleach, card, spin, dye and weave lovely, new

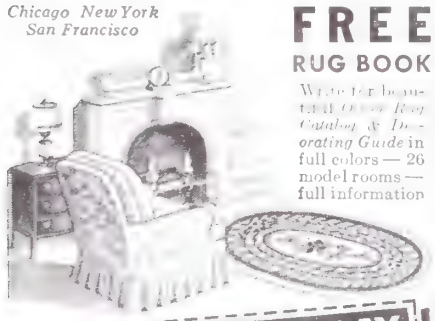
BROADLOOM RUGS

. . . deep-textured rugs that are Seamless and Reversible for double wear and luxury. Sizes up to 16 ft. wide, any length, in:

Solid Colors	18th Century	Texture
Two-tone	Early American	Leaf
Tweed Blends	Oriental Designs	Ovals

Our 73rd Year. We guarantee to satisfy or pay for materials. Over 2 million customers. We do not have agents or sell through stores. Please patronize your neighbors, factory-to-you.

Chicago New York San Francisco



FREE RUG BOOK

Write for beautiful Olson Rug Catalog & Decorating Guide in full colors — 26 model rooms — full information

MAIL COUPON OR POST CARD TO-DAY

OLSON RUG CO. E-17, CHICAGO 41, ILL.

Please mail Free Olson Catalog of rugs, decorating helps, model rooms in colors:

Name _____

Address _____

Town _____ State _____

(Continued from Page 216)

somebody had to keep them from falling out. Yes, hadn't Wrenn changed in five years; and indeed they would be glad when the new road went past their house; and Nancy was two and a half, and yes, she talked well for her age, and Susan was four, and had her daddy's eyes, and yes, she was a little s-h-y with strangers at first; and no, don't be silly, Dale wasn't imposing one single bit. Impromptu things were always twice as much fun; didn't Dale think so too?

The living room, she was remembering, was strewn with Sunday papers and dropped pajamas. The silver was unpolished, and the beds were all unmade. It was a source of wonder to her that she could speak at all.

In fact, always thereafter, Lib was to look back on her behavior that day with pride and not a little awe: it was quite perfect. She could have wished she had been born into a simpler and more primitive society, before the days of movie wives like Myrna Loy, but, standards being what they were, it was unthinkable to do other than accept them. She kept her smile just right, not wistful, not tremulous, nor yet a leer. She maintained the degree of bright interest she felt befitting to one neither in on the conversation nor yet quite out of it, while her husband and his ex-fiancée, seemingly bent on crowding old home week into one afternoon, said, "Do you remember the time that ——" and "Whatever happened to ——" and "Had you ever heard about ——"

Lincoln showed off in a way that, Lib felt, ill became him. He even bragged a little. "Our land starts here," he said, stopping the car. "Got the best acreage anywhere around for building sites. Everybody's wishing they'd had the sense to grab it when I did."

In the house he started at once on a tour of it. "Now this living room used to be the kitchen—never know it now, would you? First time I ever saw it I said it should be the living room because of the fireplace—remember? I built all the bookshelves myself. This is a Dutch door." He worked it for her. "See that view from the terrace? You can see right down on to the town, and the lights at night." He made her come out to look.

He took her down to the cellar to see the furnace and the water softener and the water heater. He took her up to the attic to see the fan and explained how it pulled the hot air out of the house at night. He showed the girls' rooms with unmade beds. In the workshop he turned on the power saw.

He took her to see the brook that edged the lawn, and Lib, clad in her slip, stood back from the bedroom window and watched Dale in heelless toeless shoes pick her way down the steppingstones, while Susan and Nancy, over their shyness now, clung adoringly to the pretty lady's hands.

"Last summer," Linc was saying, "I diverted the brook to flow along here. Lib had an idea she wanted to plant all this stuff."

For a moment Lib just stood there, moving her thumbs over the places in her palms where the blisters from the shovel and pickax had been. Linc had started, but she had finished it. Baffled, she turned to the closet and took down the first smock her hand came to. It didn't matter what she wore; nobody paid any attention to her.

By the time they sat down to dinner not a breath of air stirred. Lib pushed the damp hair off her forehead and saw for a moment in her mind's eye the perfect little dinner-for-a-hot-night that she had been planning last Tuesday: candle flames wavering a little in a soft breeze, highlighting the cool green of avocado, giving jeweled depth to quivering consommé. She averted her gaze from the pot roast, looming hot and dark out of a barricade of carrots, potatoes and rich gravy.

Linc said heartily, Ah, there's nothing like a big Sunday dinner."

Dale said, also heartily, "I think it's simply wonderful. I don't know when I've had a real old-fashioned Sunday dinner."

Susan and Nancy were eating with them. At Lincoln's suggestion they had been allowed to postpone their naps so they could eat with Auntie Dale. And now, apparently taking their cue from their father, they outdid themselves in eagerness to entertain her. Susan poured her milk on the rug. Nancy, giggling in her high chair, put blackberry jelly into her hair.

Do you remember, and did you ever hear about, and whatever happened to? And, oh, ha-ha, will you ever forget the time that? Adjust the smile and laugh at the right places and think, What would Myrna Loy do?

Lib's smile was still brave, if twitching slightly, by three o'clock, when Lincoln went off with Dale to show her his vegetable garden. She rubbed her face when they were safely around the corner. What was that bit of information, frequently encountered in Pollyanna literature, about how many muscles it took to make a frown, and how few to make a smile? She didn't believe it · her whole face ached.

She sighed, put her feet up on the chaise longue, and reached for her knitting. The girls were asleep at last. The dishes were rinsed and stacked—she had been firm in her refusal of help, because it was simply too hot to think of doing them now. In spite of the shade here on the east porch, the blue yarn stuck to her fingers. She decided on an intricate stitch for the border of the little sweater, so that she would have to keep her mind on her knitting. Pregnant women were notoriously inclined to get silly ideas. Imagine things.

It was stupid, for instance, to resent Lincoln's almost uncontrollable laughter over how funny Dale's little feet had looked in his wife's big shoes. Really ridiculous. Not that Lib hadn't joined in merrily enough. "Here," he had said. "Tie the laces around

WHY are my rugs dingy... when I try so hard to... keep them Clean?

• Carbon from smoke and automobile exhausts floats in through windows and doors and is tracked in on shoes. Each tiny particle clings. It holds dust and dirt and your rugs become dingy and dull.

Powder-ene loosens carbon and dirt, enabling your vacuum cleaner to remove both and bring back like-new beauty and freshness.

Powder-ene is easy to use. It saves work. No liquids! No suds! No scrubbing on hands and knees. Just sprinkle it on. Brush it in. Let it stand. Then vacuum as usual to remove the sooty carbon and the dirt it has held.

Use Powder-ene often where shoes track in dirt. It does not leave rings—does not fade colors—does not remove twist. It cannot harm any floor covering.

Get Powder-ene right away . . . in bright blue cans, at department, furniture, hardware or other stores.

THE THREE LITTLE WOMEN OUR TRADEMARK SINCE 1941

Guaranteed by Good Housekeeping IF DEFECTIVE OR NOT AS ADVERTISED THEREIN REPLACEMENT OR REFUND OF MONEY

Powder-ene REG. U.S. PAT. OFF.

RUG CLEANER

VON SCHRADER MANUFACTURING CO.
RACINE • WISCONSIN • U.S.A.

NEW UNDER-CABIN KITCHEN LITE

Combines all newest refinements in kitchen lighting in one prac unit. Dust work in your own shadow! Enjoy glare free diffused on work areas. UNDER-CABINET KITCHEN LITE is easy to m under wood or metal cabinets or to any wall in your present kit

Available NOW at appliance shops everywh

ALKCO MFG. CO., CHICAGO 16, ILLINC

Friends PAY YO for Calling on The

Sell EVERYDAY GREETING CARDS

MAKE MONEY FAST

Take easy orders from friends, others—for gorgeous new greeting cards. Year 'round sellers. Smart designs, cute verses, rich papers & ribbons—offer biggest value—14 cards for $1. Make up to 100% profit.

Send for Samples NOW

Get started making money quick. Full or spare time. Easy to get samples. Write today for FREE details of MONEY-MAKING Sample Offer. ACT NOW!

WETMORE & SUGDEN, INC., Dept. 21-X
749 Monroe Ave., Rochester 2, N. Y.

ALL BI MONE MAKE FOR YO
16 differen sortment Birthdays, gratulati Easter, Well, G Wrappir otherallyea casions, 60

Berth-Robert

Semi-made Dresses are back again!

Due to conditions beyond our control we were unab to serve you during the war emergency. But now y can again get the most beautiful semi-made dress and suits you ever dreamed of. You remember how ea it was to merely stitch up a few simple seams, fitti the garment perfectly as you sewed. We sew all t difficult parts for you, furnish findings, zippers, e

SEND FOR FREE SPRING FASHION BOOK... NO

Berth-Robert, Inc., Dept. L, 136 W. 22nd St. N.Y.11, N

Please send me free fashion book. This doe obligate me in any way.

Name _____

Address _____

City _____ State _____

Paste on the back of a Penny Postcard kles like this so they won't fall off.

n't you coming with us?" Dale had rcy, no. It's too hot." The thought of te was too tempting, and besides, addle oxfords Dale had on were the oes she owned that were suitable for through the garden.

was that story she had read once ow a wife had been kept at home by ple expedient of taking her shoes? she said to herself sharply, and went pick up the stitch she had dropped. lly Dale couldn't be expected to make f the garden in high heels.

rowned, using all those muscles. But Lincoln ever suppose that Dale, who er had a garden, would be interested Corn could be five feet high on June d mean nothing at all to a nongar- Lincoln really was being rather dull, he insisted on showing every inch of ce to Dale.

aybe I'm the one that's dull. Maybe it's excuse he can think of to get her to himer a minute or two Lib perceived that started doing a cable stitch instead pcorn stitch two rows back.

as a good hour before Lib heard them back. The children were still napping. adied her expression, an oh-how-the- es-fly, here-you-are-back-already one. ad seen the garden and the orchard, d even gone up to the spring that fed ok to see if water cress still grew there. rried a bunch of it as proof.

moved her feet so that Dale could sit end of the chaise longue. Strands of r had escaped from the black velvet that circled the bun on top of her he was flushed from the long hot walk; ack dress was untidy. She was still ul.

oln took the water cress from Dale. don't get it like this in New York, all [illegible] and cold from the [illegible] Susan [illegible] about that watercress sandwich, you and you were going to to stay to supper, of course."

"Of course!" Lib said it warmly, quickly. Stay all night. Spend the summer.

Dale looked at her watch. "Well just for a snack. I've got to be at Hartnagles' for dinner by seven. But I would adore a watercress sandwich."

Linc made the sandwiches great wedges of bread with water cress trailing. He served drinks in peanut-butter glasses. Lib said nothing; Myrna Loy would never belittle a husband in front of a guest.

She still said nothing when, after the sandwiches were eaten, Linc lit a cigarette and took off his shoes.

But her thoughts were bitter. Like a hillbilly cartoon that's what Dale must be thinking. Probably she was surmising how different Linc would have been if he had come with her to New York. Certainly none of the people Dale knew in New York would sit around on Sunday afternoon and entertain guests with their shoes off.

When Linc left around six o'clock to drive Dale back to town, the relief was exquisite. She gave the girls an easy supper, and when Susan poured her milk on the floor Lib slapped her hands hard and felt quite good about it. Thank heaven, she could lose her temper now if she felt like it. "Now clean it up," she said calmly.

"Auntie Dale laughed when I poured my milk on the floor," Susan told her, as she dabbled with a cloth in the spilled milk.

Lib spooned cereal into Nancy's mouth. "That's because you are not Auntie Dale's little girl."

"Why?"

"Because daddy married me."

"Why?"

Lib regarded her elder daughter silently. Frankly, my poppet, because Auntie Dal

That's the Story

. . . with dates galore! Smart Sub-Debs know how to make that happy ending come true. Just order the booklets listed below and see how you, too, can become the gal that rates No. 1 with all the fellows.

URNAL REFERENCE LIBRARY

YOUR DATE-ABILITY

Do Boys Like You? [illegible] out how you can improve. 5c.

How About Dates? [illegible] phia 5, Penna.

Know Your Man. [illegible] Some subtle hints. 5c.

Going Steady. How to hold him. 5c.

Dating Too Little? [illegible] Find out what to do about it. 5c.

YOUR DOINGS

Nix on Necking. [illegible]

Memo for May [illegible] on parties, on clubs. [illegible] what to do when. 5c.

Act Your Age! Or [illegible] but are you really out of rompers? 5c.

Sub-Deb Club Handbook. Need pointers for your club? Here are the answers. 5c.

Fun and Funds. New ideas to swell your club treasury and put your club in the spotlight. 5c.

Speak Up! Does [illegible] Well, learn to speak up. 5c.

YOUR LOOKS

Let's Be Lovely. [illegible] that clean, well-scrubbed, rosy, fresh look that fellows like. 5c.

Mirror Magic. Your skin, your make-up, your eyes, your smile how to make them the kind you want to see in your mirror. 5c.

Glamour for Gl[illegible] sketches to help you choose the right shape and shade for you. 5c.

Facts About Figures. Pounds in the wrong places? Exercises will help you. 5c.

Clothes Check List. W[illegible]

Count Your Calories [illegible] pounds off your figure. 5c.

1378. The Way You Wear Your Hair. The style for you. 5c.

YOUR PERSONALITY

1022. How to be Popular. The real low-down. 5c.

2[illegible]. Don't Shy Away. Bolster your self-confidence. You may be missing out. 5c.

1[illegible]. Do Girls Like You? If not, find out why. 5c.

1511. Personality Report Card. Rate yourself. 5c.

YOUR FUN

1515. Fun Outdoors. Picnics, hikes—open-air fun. 5c.

2254. It's a Date for a Party. One for every holiday of the year. 5c.

1504. Let's Eat. What to serve. 5c.

1377. Games to Play. Pep up your gatherings with some new fun ideas. 10c.

2210. Let's Have a Party. For every occasion. Eight complete plans. 5c.

1691. Halloween Antics. Tricks and stunts for Halloween parties. 5c.

[illegible]. Dance Doin's. A prom coming up? Make this one different. 5c.

[illegible]. Let's Dance. [illegible]

2271. Banquets to Give. Ideas for initiation and [illegible] from centerpieces to favors and nut cups. 10c.

[illegible]. [illegible] fellows. Playing time, 30 minutes. 10c.

[illegible]. Objective Johnny. A one-act comedy for three girls and two fellows. 10c.

FOR [illegible]

1192. Gentlemen Preferred. A book you can pass on to him—etiquette for the man in your life. 5c.

1668. Know Your Girl. Tips on types and what to do about each. 5c.

1546. If I Were a Man! Some inside information on what a gal expects. 5c.

ll gladly send any of the [illegible] the [illegible] States and Canada upon receipt [illegible] or Savings Stamps. Readers in all foreign countries should send International [illegible] ost office. Please address all requests to the Reference Library, Ladies' Home Journal, Philadelphia 5, Penna.

Vim..

SPRINGS FROM WITHIN

Rest won't restore energy...But food will. Dr. Pepper is the jiffy-quick energy lift. After exertion, drink Dr. Pepper. Regain that fresh, eager zest for work or play. Dr. Pepper! Icy-cold, sparkling and nippy-tart, yet luscious and mellow-rich. Drink a bite to eat at 10, 2 and 4 o'clock, or anytime you're hungry, thirsty or tired. Still rationed and scarce...but still tops ...and still 5c.

DRINK Dr. Pepper GOOD FOR LIFE!

DRINK A BITE TO EAT at 10 2 4 O'clock

IN A MINUTE!...

COLD Discomfort Begins to Change to WARM Smiles

Rub MINIT-RUB on chest and back.

1. IN A MINUTE, Minit-Rub begins to stimulate circulation, begins to bring a sensation of warmth. That quickly helps relieve surface aches and pains.

2. IN A MINUTE, Minit-Rub's welcome pain-relieving action begins to soothe that raspy local irritation.

3. IN A MINUTE, Minit-Rub's active menthol vapors begin to ease that nasal "stuffiness" feeling.

MINIT-RUB is wonderful for both children and adults. Greaseless! Stainless! Disappears like vanishing cream! Won't harm linens. Get Minit-Rub—today, in the jar or the new handy tube.

MINIT-RUB
The Modern Chest Rub

PRODUCT OF BRISTOL-MYERS

Send for your FREE copy
HENDERSON'S 100th ANNIVERSARY SEED CATALOG
PETER HENDERSON & CO., Dept. 13-F
35 Cortlandt St., New York 7, N. Y.

Extra Money Every Day
SELL EVERYDAY CARDS
Easy to sell stunning folders for Birthdays, Anniversaries, etc. 15-card Assortment sells $1. You make good profit. Also sell other Everyday card assortments, engraved Stationery $1 a box. Samples on approval
PROCESS CORPORATION, Dept. G-2,
Troy at 21st Street, CHICAGO 23, ILL.

TRY LAVORIS
It's Different and so Thorough
Lavoris does not depend upon high-powered germicidal agents; but coagulates, detaches and removes objectionable matter, without injury to delicate tissues.

For soft, absorbent tissue ask for...

remember to say "SIT-TRUE"
THE BOX WITH THE BOW ON TOP

wouldn't have him. Thank heaven. Daddy may have turned my stomach somewhat this afternoon, but I'm glad I'm the one that got him, whatever the reason.

It was also an occasion for thanks, she thought as she got the children into bed, that this day was over. She had about decided that she had made of it a needless strain. Attached significance to things that meant nothing. "God bless Auntie Dale." Well, that was to be expected. Hadn't she promised to send them both presents from New York the minute she got back?

She took a cool shower and strewed some cologne over herself and brushed her hair and put on a nightie and the pink peignoir she had been saving, more or less, for the hospital. She peeked in at the children and was surprised to find that, in spite of their late nap., they were almost asleep. She went out on the terrace, feeling relaxed and cool, and really quite a bit like Myrna Loy.

Actually, she admitted to herself as she watched the shadows lengthening on the lawn, she had liked Dale well enough. Not a great deal of depth, perhaps, but she was pleasant to have around and had been sweet with the children.

Any minute now Linc would drive up the road and turn in at their lane and find her looking rested and, if not beautiful, at least adequately pretty. There would be no recriminations. "Darling," she would say, "I think Dale is just the loveliest thing I ever saw. I like her very much."

DOWN in the town a church bell began to ring. It couldn't be seven-thirty. It wasn't possible that an hour and a half had elapsed since Linc had left with Dale. He had said he'd be right back.

The sunset glowed, then quickly slipped from rose to magenta to deep purple. And then the very last of the light was gone from the sky. The insects of the night began a shrill sh-h-h, sh-h-h; as if to hush the country noises so that she might better strain her ears for the sound of Lincoln's car. She had not seen the stars burn slowly through because she watched for headlights.

That's a car I hear now. I won't look this time until it turns in at our drive. It went on by and she said to herself, I'll wait until the next one comes, and if it isn't Lincoln I'll really go on in.

Suppose, she conjectured, just suppose they had decided to spend the evening together. Suppose she had read the look on Lincoln's face correctly. Most wives had to face this sort of thing sooner or later. It didn't have to mean the breakup of their marriage. What was it men usually said—"It doesn't have anything to do with my love for you"?

In Linc's case it would be the truth. Whatever it was that he felt for Dale had, Lib knew, existed side by side with his love for her during all the years of their marriage.

The next car had come, and the next. It was stupid to watch for any more. She put her head back against the chair and stared up at the vast assembly line of stars moving so grandly past. When that bright star over there has moved behind the tip of the blue spruce, then I will go in. The star moved behind the blue spruce and appeared again before she got up and went into the house.

The illuminated dial of the alarm clock said five past ten when Lincoln's car turned in at their drive. She pretended to be asleep when he came into their bedroom, and for a while after she heard him in the kitchen rattling the dishes she did not move.

I might as well see what he has to say for himself, she thought. She got up and pulled on her old blue bathrobe. Even if it's only the old gag about a flat tire.

He turned from the sink, squinting around the smoke from his cigarette. "Thought you were asleep. Grab a towel."

She took a dish towel from the drawer. "Where have you been?" Never mind any more about Myrna Loy.

"Had a flat."

She wiped a handful of spoons and laid them in a row, with mathematical exactness. "Dale must have been distressed about missing the Hartnagles' dinner."

Be gentle with a queasy, uneasy, upset stomach. Take soothing PEPTO-BISMOL.

This pleasant-tasting preparation is non-alkaline, non-laxative, non-constipating. It spreads a soothing, protective coating on irritated stomach and intestinal walls, thus helping to calm and quiet common digestive upsets. Get a bottle from your druggist today. If you do not get prompt relief, consult your physician.

Pepto-Bismol
Norwich

CLEAN HAIR in 10 minutes WITHOUT WATER

★ No soap • No rinsing • No drying
★ Removes oil, dirt, hair odors
★ Retains wave; restores sheen
★ Grand between water shampoos
★ Ideal during colds and illness

30 SHAMPOOS WITH MITT 1.00 Plus tax
At all good drug and department stores.

MINIPOO
DRY SHAMPOO

COSMETIC DISTRIBUTORS, INC., NEW YORK 17, N.Y.

DO YOU WANT $25
Show lovely Bluebird All-Occasion Greeting Cards, Correspondence Notes, Gift Wrappings—to friends, neighbors, co-workers. 16 different assortments. You make $25 profit on only 50 $1 boxes. NO EXPERIENCE NEEDED. Write for 2 sample boxes on approval. If friends don't snap them up return at our expense. BLUEBIRD STUDIOS, Dept. J 12, Fitchburg, Mass.

Bluebird Cards
Birthdays • Gifts
Get Well • Baby
Anniversaries
Sympathy
Notes

Stop CORNS!

nstant Relief

NEVER wait! Promptly protect sore toes from tight shoes with Dr. Scholl's Zino-pads. Pain vanishes—corns are stopped before they can develop! But—if you have corns, callouses or bunions — instant-acting Dr. Scholl's will relieve them almost like magic!

CORNS, SORE TOES

CALLOUSES

BUNIONS

Remove Corns, Callouses

You'll marvel, too, how the separate Medications included speedily remove corns, callouses. No other method does all these things. Cost but a trifle.

Look for the familiar yellow box

Dr Scholl's Zino-pads

Warning!

THIS IS

head cold

WEATHER!

Be prepared with . . .

Mistol Drops with Ephedrine! Use them the minute you feel those drippy, stuffed-up miseries of a head cold coming on! Just a few drops in each nostril bring instant soothing relief!

Caution: Use only as directed

OOD MONEY IN WEAVING

n money at home weaving rugs from old or new yarn—in your community. 31,000 doing it with easy running looms. Less than $50.00! Send for our free booklet today!

ON LOOM WORKS, 44 Factory St., BOONVILLE, N. Y.

51 GAUGE
NYLON HOSIERY

Write for Dame

E FASHION CO., 366 Fifth Ave., Dept. A way home."

"The jack wasn't in the car. Naturally. So I had to walk all the way back to Whitaker's. Sat around. You know how Whit is. Talk your arm off." He dried his hand and took the cigarette out of his mouth and put it on the shelf over the sink. "Just once, Lib, I'd like to find my jack in the car when I need it. I don't see why you have to let the kids play with it."

Her anger, which had almost drained away, came flooding back. To think that he'd have the nerve to bawl her out after the sort of day she'd had! "It was your idea to have her out here, don't forget that!"

He turned and looked at her blankly. "What's that got to do with it? You didn't mind, did you?"

"Mind? Who, me?" She swept the spoons into the drawer and banged it shut. "I was but enchanted. Looking the way I do just now in my clothes. The house a mess. The silver not polished. Everything wrong."

"She thought you were wonderful." He glared at her. "She thought everything about the place was just swell. And why shouldn't she? Last time she saw this place there were only three rooms, falling in. She hadn't seen any possibilities in it at all. She hadn't thought it was a good buy. That's why I invited her up here today. Just to show her."

Incredulously Lib stared at the man she had married. He hadn't thought he was going to make Dale sorry she hadn't married him, had he? No help. Not any too much money. Three kids, bang, bang, bang.

Linc stirred the dishwater for a while and

> I have learned that success is to be measured not so much by the position that one has reached in life as by the obstacles which he has overcome while trying to succeed.
>
> —BOOKER T. WASHINGTON:
> Up From Slavery
> (Doubleday & Company, Inc.)

then gave her a tight-lipped, rather sheepish grin. "I never told you. But—Dale threw me over."

"No!" Lib widened her eyes. "Really?"

"Yeah." After a pause he gave a little laugh. "Thank heaven."

Lib, putting the peanut-butter glasses away, sneaked a glance at him and suddenly it dawned on her: The fact that Dale had jilted him had stuck in his craw all these years. Today he had got rid of it. She could even place the exact moment: when he had taken his shoes off. This is my castle, he had said. See, my wife lets me do as I please. I have exactly the kind of life I always wanted. The kind I said I'd have.

In a burst of love and contrition Lib said, "Look, darling. Leave those pans."

"I hate to leave them for you," he said. But the water was already sucking loudly down the drain, and he was taking his apron off. He wiped his hands and put his arms around her and gave her a husbandly smack. "Let's go to bed. I'm sleepy."

Lib hunched the pillow up under her head while Linc made preparations for bed. She was going to miss Dale MacLaren in her life. Because now she knew that Dale, as a menace, was very definitely out of it. No doubt, she thought, now that I no longer have to worry about her, I shall get to be one of those horrible examples cited in magazine articles. Sometimes I shall go to bed with cold cream on my face. She contemplated the future with satisfaction. And I will have so many children he can't leave me.

Linc sat down on the edge of the bed to wind the alarm clock.

"Darling," Lib said, "I really was crazy about Dale. I think she is just the loveliest thing I ever saw. I hope you knew I didn't mean what I said about minding"—she gave a little laugh—"about you bringing her out here. I was glad." She raised guileless gray eyes to his.

"Silly." He grinned down at her. "Think I didn't know that? Why, honey, after all these years I can read you like a book!"

BESTFORM

"ma says you get double the wear... with a good wool!"

And Mother's right. She knows what makes a good yarn. It's the soft, supple resiliency of specially selected wools that spring beautifully into shape after wearing and washing. Good wool shows up in deeper, purer colors, in soft-as-a-lamb texture. Be sure it's Fleisher's, the very best in yarns, for all hand knits. Vol. 77, "Children's Classics" gives instructions for these and other sweaters. Send 30¢ to Fleisher Yarns, 230 Fifth Avenue, New York 1, N. Y. Dept. JF-27.

Fleisher's Yarn

GOOD WOOL IS THE FOUNDATION OF GOOD KNITTING

Such a tantalizing starter for meals!
Such a tangy in-between treat for friends! You can just tell Mott's Apple Juice is made from tree-ripe apples bursting with flavor!
MOTT'S
APPLE JUICE
You'll love 'em all—try 'em all!
Mott's Apple Cider—Mott's Apple Sauce
Mott's Fine Vinegars
Mott's Jellies
Sunsweet Prune Juice
Recommended by Good Housekeeping
MOTT'S apple juice
NOW RICH IN VITAMIN C

FOLLY COVE FAVORITES

(Continued from Page 173)

up chicken. It isn't an inexpensive dish, but nice to have when you want to splurge a bit.

BAKED CHICKEN AND MUSHROOMS

Cover a 5½-pound fowl, hen or roasting chicken, with water. Add a few celery leaves, 1 onion, 1 bay leaf, 1 teaspoon salt and a few pickling spices. Simmer until tender. Lift out. Remove meat from the bones in large pieces. Strain stock. Skim off fat. Slice 1½ pounds mushrooms and sauté in 3 tablespoons butter or margarine. Place alternate layers of cooked chicken mushrooms and sliced ripe olives (1 cup) in an uncovered baking dish. Make gravy with 2 cups chicken broth and 3 tablespoons flour. Pour over all. Top with rounds of bread fried in the pan in which you sautéed your mushrooms, or ¾ cup rolled cracker crumbs. Sprinkle ½ cup grated Parmesan cheese over top. Bake 1 hour in moderate oven, 350° F. Serves 6–8.

Note: Leftover chicken can be used for this dish.*

After a busy day in the studio, waffles are a big treat for supper. If the cupboard yields some honest-to-goodness maple sirup, so much the better.

JAMES RIVER WAFFLES

Separate 3 eggs and beat the yolks until light and thick. Then add 2 cups sour milk or buttermilk. Sift together 2 cups flour, ½ teaspoon salt, 3 teaspoons baking powder and ½ teaspoon baking soda. Combine with the yolk mixture. Beat smooth. Stir in 6 tablespoons melted shortening or salad oil. Fold in the 3 egg whites, beaten until stiff but not dry. Bake in hot waffle iron. Serves 6.

Our grandmothers raised their bread in big yellow crockery bowls with brown stripes. We have one in the JOURNAL kitchen that's never been used for anything else but bread and rolls. It belongs to Ann Batchelder, and she's put more batches of rolls to raise in that bowl than you can imagine. Homemade bread, fresh from the oven—so fresh that it gives to the knife when you cut it—is just the thing to serve when the main dish is a good fish chowder. If you have one of these wonderful old bowls awasting on the top shelf of your cupboard, get it down and put this good brown oatmeal-molasses bread to raise. It's old-fashioned and terribly good. We found it in the Annisquam Cook Book—changed the proportions slightly to make it easier to handle. Here it is:

OATMEAL-MOLASSES BREAD

Cook 1½ cups quick-cooking rolled oats in 1 quart milk about 10 minutes, stirring constantly. Add ¾ cup molasses, 2 teaspoons salt and ¼ cup shortening. Cool to lukewarm and add 1 cake fresh yeast dissolved in ¼ cup lukewarm water. Work in 7¾–8 cups flour. Turn out on lightly floured board. Knead until smooth. Place in greased bowl. Cover and let rise in warm place until doubled in bulk. Punch down. Divide dough into thirds. Shape into 3 loaves. Place in greased bread pans. Let rise in pans until almost doubled again. Bake in hot oven, 400° F., 10 minutes. Reduce heat to 375° F. Bake 40 minutes more. Remove from pans. Brush with shortening and cool. If you don't want to make all the dough into bread, shape part of it into rolls. Bake at 375° F. until done.

Fish dinners call for a salad. Mrs. Kenyon grows her own herbs, dries some, pots others to snip fresh for salad bowls during the winter. While green salads are most popular with her menfolk, she often makes this jellied salad when she has morning time in the kitchen. It's a Folly Cove version of the old-fashioned Perfection Salad.

JELLIED-CABBAGE SALAD

Soak 2 tablespoons unflavored gelatin in ½ cup cold water. Add 2 cups boiling water and stir until dissolved. Add ½ cup sugar, ½

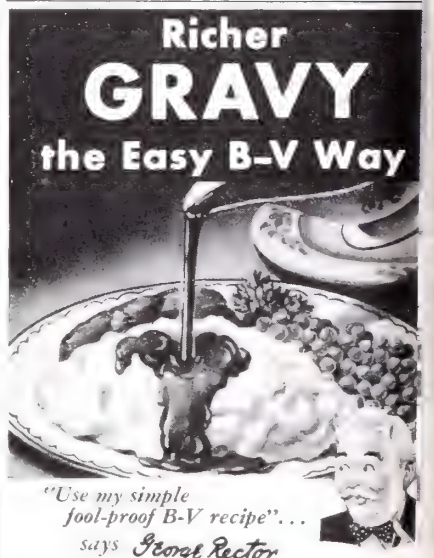
Chocolate Pudding that's My-T-Fine

Easy recipe for Chocolate Sundae Pudding: Prepare My-T-Fine Chocolate Pudding according to simple directions on the package. Top each serving with a mound of vanilla-flavored whipped cream, centered with maraschino cherry. Yum! Yum!

5 delicious My-T-Fine desserts

Chocolate
Butterscotch
Vanilla
Nut Chocolate
Lemon Pie Filling

Richer GRAVY the Easy B-V Way



"Use my simple fool-proof B-V recipe"... says George Rector Food Consultant to Wilson & Co.

Melt 2 tbsp. fat or drippings, add 2 tbsp. flour, bler well. Add 1 cup water, milk or vegetable water; st until smooth. Add 1 tsp. B-V dissolved in sma amount of the hot mixture. Cook until thickene

Wilson's B-V is a delicious blend of concentrate meat extract and selected vegetable flavors.

TABASCO
"The Seasoning Supreme"
ONE DASH WORKS WONDERS

cup cider vinegar, 1 tablespoon lemon juice, ¾ teaspoon salt, ½ cup chopped green pepper, ½ cup chopped celery, 1 cup finely shredded cabbage, 1 cup chopped apple and a little grated onion. Pour into square pan. Chill until firm. Cut into squares. Serve on bed of lettuce with old-fashioned boiled dressing. Serves 8.

All New Englanders are loyal to apple pies and puddings, crisp crusted sugary sour-milk doughnuts and Indian pudding. Apple desserts are Kenyon favorites. On winter nights, when the wind whistles in the fireplace chimney and the dry maple branches scrunch against the eaves, the Kenyons sit a little closer to the fire and feast on an old-fashioned codfish supper with boiled potatoes, beets and coleslaw. Dessert is worth anticipating: apple pudding with lemon sauce; or if the apple barrel is nearly empty, as it is sometimes this time of year, orange-marmalade pudding with custard sauce. Here are two ways of making New England apple pudding, with different tops.

APPLE PUDDING

Peel, core and slice 5–6 tart apples. Arrange in bottom of baking dish or casserole. Sprinkle with ¼ cup sugar, ½ teaspoon cinnamon and ¼ teaspoon nutmeg. Dot with 2 tablespoons butter or margarine, and pour ¼ cup hot water over all. For the batter, beat 1 egg, add ½ cup sugar gradually, beating until thick. Stir in 2 tablespoons melted shortening. Sift ⅓ cup flour with 1 teaspoon baking powder and a pinch of salt; add to batter. Spread batter on top of apples. Bake 30 minutes in moderately hot oven, 375° F. Reduce heat to moderate, 350° F., and bake 10 minutes more. Serve hot with lemon sauce. Serves 4–6.

> Since both men and women are good judges of their own sex and bad judges of the other, I would say to a young man who is thinking of marriage, "Choose a girl who has nice women for her friends, and pay no attention to what other men think or say of her." And to a girl, "Have nothing to say to a man who is not liked and trusted by other men."
>
> —WILLIAM RALPH INGE
> More Last Thoughts of a Dean, Putnam & Co.

YANKEE APPLE JOHN

Slice thin 6 or 7 peeled and cored apples and arrange in bottom of a rectangular baking dish. Mix ¾ cup sugar with ¾ teaspoon cinnamon and 1 teaspoon nutmeg. Sprinkle over the apples. Dot with 2 tablespoons butter or margarine. Make a rich biscuit dough as follows: Sift 2 cups flour with ½ teaspoon salt and 3 teaspoons baking powder. Chop in ½ cup shortening. Add ⅔ cup milk all at once. Mix with fork just enough to blend ingredients. Knead lightly for 1 minute on lightly floured board. Roll out to fit baking dish. Gash to allow steam to escape. Fit dough over apples. Brush top with milk. Bake in hot oven, 425° F., 25 minutes. Reduce heat to 350° F. and bake 20 minutes more until apples are done. Serve warm with nutmeg sauce. Serves 6.

Nutmeg sauce: Mix 1 cup sugar, ¼ teaspoon nutmeg, 3 tablespoons flour and a pinch of salt together. Stir in 2 cups boiling water. Cook until thickened, stirring constantly. Remove from heat. Add 1 tablespoon vinegar and 1 tablespoon butter or margarine.

ORANGE-MARMALADE PUDDING

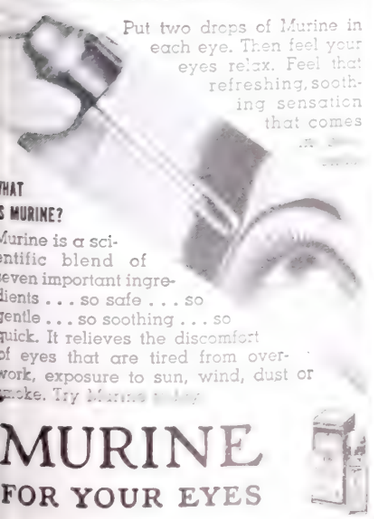
Beat 4 egg whites until stiff but not dry. Gradually add 4 tablespoons sugar. Fold in 3 tablespoons orange marmalade and 1 teaspoon orange extract. Place in top of well-greased 2-quart double boiler and cook, covered, 45 minutes over boiling water. Loosen and turn out. Sprinkle with chopped walnuts and serve with chilled custard sauce.

Custard Sauce: Beat 2 egg yolks well. Fold in ¼ cup sugar, then gradually add 1 cup scalded light cream. Cook in double boiler or over very low heat until thickened. Add 1 teaspoon vanilla. Cool.

KEEP ADORABLE!
Yodora checks perspiration odor
the SOOTHINGEST way
It's New! Made with a face cream base.
It's Gentler! Yodora is actually soothing to normal skins.
It's Effective! Gives lasting protection.
Won't Rot or Fade Fabrics. Better Fabrics Testing Bureau approved.
No Irritating Salts. Can use right after under-arm shaving.
Stays Soft and Creamy. Never gets grainy in jar.
Economical. Tubes or jars, 10¢, 30¢, 60¢
You'll adore Yodora! Try it today!

McKesson & Robbins, Inc., Bridgeport, Conn.

MAKE Spare Time PROFITS
Sell EVERYDAY GREETING CARDS
SEND FOR SAMPLES on Approval
...s, make up to 100% cash profit. 12 other ...
PHILLIPS CARD COMPANY
704 HUNT STREET - - NEWTON, MASS.

You Can Get Quick Relief for Tired Eyes
MAKE THIS SIMPLE TEST TODAY


Put two drops of Murine in each eye. Then feel your eyes relax. Feel that refreshing, soothing sensation that comes ...
...HAT ...S MURINE?
...Murine is a scientific blend of seven important ingredients . . . so safe . . . so gentle . . . so soothing . . . so quick. It relieves the discomfort of eyes that are tired from overwork, exposure to sun, wind, dust or smoke. Try Murine today.
MURINE FOR YOUR EYES

YARN BUY DIRECT SAVE MONEY
BARTLETT YARN MILLS, Box R, Harmony, Maine.

Gas on Stomach
Relieved in 5 minutes or double your money back
... sour stomach and heartburn, doctors usually prescribe the fastest-acting medicines known for symptomatic relief—
Bell-ans brings comfort in a jiffy or double your money ...

INGROWN NAIL
Hurting You?
Here's Fast Relief!
A few drops of QUIGRO in the crevice of the toenail bring blessed relief from tormenting pain of ingrown nail and so toughens the tender skin underneath the nail that it resists the ingrowing nail. When clipped, the toenail should grow naturally. QUIGRO is available at drug counters.
Whitehall Pharmacal Company, New York 16, N.Y.

WHEN COLDS...SORE THROATS THREATEN MOST...
GLYCO-Thymoline
● Delicate membranes of the nose and throat can be quickly and effectively soothed with gentle, pleasant-tasting GLYCO-THYMOLINE. Keep a bottle handy for those times when colds and sore throats annoy. And you'll appreciate it as a daily mouthwash and gargle, too.

MANY DOCTORS RECOMMEND IT!

BACKACHE RELIEF

USE THE SAFE HEAT OF CASCO
WETPROOF ELECTRIC HEATING PAD
Constant, soothing, safe heat is yours at the flick of a switch. Safe with wet packs. Exclusive Nite-Lite switch, dial in the dark any one of 30 constant temperatures to suit your need. Removable washable cover. Underwriters Laboratories approved for your protection. Thousands of Casco pads are used in hospitals and by doctors.
Casco heating pads from $4.90 to $9.80 plus Fed. tax at Drug, Department, Electrical and Hardware stores.
In cases where pain persists consult your doctor
CASCO PRODUCTS CORPORATION • BRIDGEPORT 2, CONN.

SURPRISE! SPRING A

Chateau Rabbit ON 'EM!

CHATEAU RABBIT

Just taste what Borden's Chateau can do for a simple dish!

½-lb. package Chateau
1 teaspoon mustard
½ cup milk
½ teaspoon salt
Dash of Worcestershire sauce

Cut Chateau (Borden's modern cheese food) in cubes; place in top of double boiler. Slowly add milk and seasonings. Stir till cheese is melted. (Chateau melts as smoothly as it spreads and slices!) Turn off heat. Let stand 5 minutes. Serve hot over toast, and garnish with chutney, if desired.

Chateau gives your rabbit its specialness—the zest and zip that comes from a special blending of aged and mellow-mild American Cheddar cheese. Borden's Chateau is packed with protein nourishment—perfect for sandwiches, snacks, omelets, souffles, sauces! Available in ½ lb. package and 2 lb. loaf.

Chive on rye—My O My!

Rye bread—slathered with Borden's CHIVE WEJ-CUT Cream Cheese! Borden's starts with the creamiest cream cheese and blends in quantities of tender fresh-chopped chives, parsley, and green peppers. Borden's Wej-Cuts stay fresher longer—thanks to a special tight-sealed wrapper.

IF IT'S BORDEN'S—
IT'S GOT TO BE GOOD!

© The Borden Company

Borden's Fine Cheeses

Tune in the Ginny Simms Show! Music! Comedy! CBS, Friday—9 P. M., E.S.T.

QUICK AND EASYS for Two

BY LOUELLA G. SHOUER

THERE'S more than one way of making cooking for two quick and easy. If you're the kind of person with a flair for efficiency, "cooking double" should appeal to you. Certainly it's just as easy to cook twice as much or more of some foods as just enough. And the next night you really reap the profits—dinner goes together in double-quick time.

Cooking ahead doesn't mean brewing up a refrigeratorful of uninspiring leftovers that you're going to look at and wonder, "Now what am I going to do with that?" Rather, it means taking stock of your meals for the week and deciding what you could prepare double of, just as well as not. Refrigerator dough made up on Saturday or an evening when you are in will give you hot rolls all week. That's what we mean by letting your head save your meals.

Having an indigenous enthusiasm for food and no more time than any other businesswoman to prepare meals, Constance Holland, a member of our staff, uses the doubling-up system to give much more variety in her meals than she would have otherwise. Winter week ends she goes in for cooking and baking sprees after she has done the greater part of the week's shopping. She purposely plans, for the two week-end nights, dinners that include favorite dishes she couldn't possibly have for hurry-up dinners on week nights. Since she is going to be in the kitchen more on week ends—and wants to be, for that's the kind of person she is—she goes full steam ahead and makes up a backlog of essentials that will make dinner-getting easy during the week.

FOR instance, if her week-to-come meals are going to include fruity desserts and an occasional casserole, she makes up a pint of custard sauce and one of a basic cream sauce which will keep well in jars in the refrigerator. A jar of French dressing is a weekly habit. A cake and a batch of refrigerator-roll dough are on her program for Saturday or Sunday too.

If she cooks farina for breakfast, she cooks more than enough. What is left after breakfast goes into custard cups; this, when chilled, makes a good dessert with maple sirup and cream or sliced canned peaches—or when poured into a small loaf pan can be sliced when chilled, and fried like corn-meal mush for another breakfast. Wonderful with bacon, she says.

Prunes soaked overnight are cooked in quantity while the coffee perks. She knows how to use them—wouldn't think of having them every morning as just stewed prunes. For a dinner dessert she likes them puréed, with cinnamon and sour cream. Pitted and stuffed, with cream cheese, they provide a dessert-salad. Extra egg whites make her think of a prune whip as a quick dessert.

In between breakfast and putting on make-up she has time some days to make a dish of coffee jelly from the coffee left in the pot (she makes more on purpose), or to start a tray of refrigerator ice cream made from one of the packaged mixes. (The ice cream may be quite hard by night, depending on the refrigerator, but by scraping it into a bowl when you get home and whipping it up with a beater, the texture will be just right for eating.)

IF there is time before the bus leaves in the morning, she starts a casserole for dinner in the time it takes another person to sort the laundry or tidy the living room.

It's you who have to decide what is most important in the time you have. But if you're a businesswoman, you certainly do have to sort out your minutes, as you don't have hours as the woman at home does. And here's an idea I hadn't thought of. If your husband is a potato-and-gravy man, as so many men are, you don't plan potatoes into the dinner menu—you just go ahead night after night and prepare them as a matter of course.

If you're going to peel and cook potatoes—monotonous job—cook enough for two or three days. Mrs. Holland says she always does. The boiled potatoes will appear again, creamed, au gratin, fried or in casseroles. Mashed potatoes will have a second chance as potato cakes, croquettes, or as a topping for meat pies and casseroles.

Entertaining is the most fun when it's casual. "Give them barbecued spareribs, a green salad and big wedge of apple pie for Sunday supper," Mrs. Holland says, "and everybody's happy. Provide bibs or big aprons and it couldn't be formal." Unless she invites folks for Sunday supper, the only other type of entertaining that she believes is easy and casual is to have a few people in for bridge. And she always feeds them! Guests never go hungry. Men don't like the same food women do at such times. When the party's mixed, waffles, a Welsh rarebit or big wedges of chocolate cake, with plenty of coffee, are more welcome than a salad or whipped-cream dessert. And I think you will agree.

Week-end Bridge Party

Mushroom-and-Olive Rarebit

or

Devil's-Food Cake

Coffee

If you want to fuss with a real start-from-scratch rarebit, go right ahead, but the ready-quick kind is good. Serve it heated with crisp bacon and toast, or add the fixings suggested. The chocolate cake is easy to make, and a good one. It wouldn't necessarily need to be frosted if you're short of sugar, as the filling is quite rich. Better plan to make the cake the night before if you're having company on a week night.

MUSHROOM-AND-OLIVE RAREBIT

Sauté ½ pound mushrooms in 2 tablespoons butter or margarine. Add ⅔ cup sliced stuffed olives. Combine with 2 jars Welsh rarebit. Thin with ¾ cup milk. Heat and season to taste. Serve on freshly made toast. Serves 4–6. (Cut quantities in half for a quick supper for two.)

DEVIL'S-FOOD CAKE

Cream ½ cup shortening. Add 1¼ cups sugar gradually. Cream together until light and fluffy. Add 1 teaspoon vanilla and 2 egg yolks, well beaten. Beat mixture until blended. Melt 2 squares unsweetened chocolate over hot water. Sift 1¾ cups cake flour with ½ teaspoon salt, 1 teaspoon baking powder and ½ teaspoon baking soda. Add alternately to first mixture with 1 cup milk, beating well after each addition. Beat in the melted chocolate. Beat 2 egg whites till they stand in fluffy peaks. Fold into batter carefully. Pour batter into 2 greased 8-inch layer-cake pans. Bake in moderate oven, 350° F., 25–30 minutes. Remove from pans. Cool. Put layers together with sour-cream filling. Ice if desired, with a fudge or boiled icing.

SOUR-CREAM FILLING

Heat 1 cup thick sour cream just a little. Mix ¼ cup sugar and 1½ tablespoons flour together. Add to 1 slightly beaten egg yolk. Add sour cream gradually. Return to range and cook over low heat, stirring constantly until thickened. Add a pinch of salt, a pinch of cinnamon and ½ teaspoon vanilla. Stir in ¼ cup chopped nuts. Cool and spread on one layer of cake. Top with the other layer.

Supper Specialty

Veal-and-Ham Hungarian

Green Salad — French Bread

Rhubarb Betty

Coffee

You may or may not like sauerkraut, but if you do, this is your dish. It's easy to make and can be made one night and served the next or started in the morning and finished at night. The rose-pink rhubarb is in the market now, and rhubarb Betty can be put together in only [illegible] minutes. Serve it hot or cold, for you [illegible] it both ways.

VEAL-AND-HAM HUNGARIAN

Cut meat from 2 veal chops (½ pound thinly sliced veal cutlet, diced, may be used too). Cut into pieces. Sauté with ½ pound pork luncheon meat, diced, or ½ pound boiled ham (bought in the piece—unsliced—and 2 onions, sliced or chopped, in 2 tablespoons shortening or salad oil until brown. Add 1 tablespoon paprika, ½ cup water and ½ pound sauerkraut. Cover and simmer about 30 minutes or until meat is tender. Season with salt and pepper to taste. Add ½ cup sour cream and simmer until veal is tender and mixture well flavored. Serves 2. This dish may be prepared up to the simmering stage in the morning if you have time. Finish just before dinner while the rhubarb Betty is baking.

RHUBARB BETTY

Measure ½ cup stale bread crumbs. Put half in buttered baking dish. Add 2 cups diced rhubarb (about 1 pound) and ½ cup raisins. Sprinkle with ½ teaspoon orange rind, ½ cup sugar and remaining crumbs. Bake 20 minutes in moderate oven, 350° F.

From Your Two-Foot Shelf

Spaghetti-and-Clam Casserole

Green-Bean-and-Cucumber Salad

French Dressing

Delmonico Applesauce

Toward the end of the week your refrigerator begins to look rather empty of makings for a meal if you haven't been able to do very much shopping evenings. Cans of this and that on your cupboard shelf, cached for just such emergencies, provide some mighty good meals when tricked up a bit. Mrs. Holland evolved the clam-and-spaghetti casserole on just such an occasion. The salad could be made with the canned Frenched green beans. The dessert is a shelf specialty too.

SPAGHETTI-AND-CLAM CASSEROLE

To a 15-ounce can or jar spaghetti and tomato sauce add 1 can condensed clam chowder. Thin to right consistency with a little water. You don't want it to be too soupy. Grate 1 small onion. Add ½ teaspoon curry powder. Stir into mixture. Pour into buttered casserole. Top with buttered cracker crumbs and bake in moderate oven, 350° F., 20–25 minutes.

DELMONICO APPLESAUCE

Put ¾ cup canned applesauce in a small shallow baking dish, or divide it into 2 large custard cups. Sprinkle with chopped nuts and ¼ cup crushed macaroons or other cookies. Add another ¾ to 1 cup applesauce and top with ¼ cup more crushed macaroons. Dot with butter or margarine. Bake in a moderate oven, 350° F., just until well heated through.

LEND YOUR EARS TO THESE Lenten ideas

THERE'S ZESTFUL appeal in a meal like this . . . to perk up appetites, to give hearty nourishment. The crisp and pretty salad has a clever new dressing calling for chopped pimiento. The meatless spaghetti sauce is rich, expertly seasoned. As you might expect, both dishes are easy and economical to fix with MAZOLA—America's most versatile Salad Oil, pure, bland, delicate . . . fine for frying and sautéing as it is for salads. All grocers sell MAZOLA in bottles or in tins.

[illegible]

SALAD FLORENTINE

Line salad bowl with assorted greens. Pile crisp, thinly sliced carrots in center. Around these arrange a ring of cooked, cut green beans, then a ring of raw cauliflower broken into flowerettes. Garnish with thinly sliced onion rings. Serve with Florentine Dressing.

FLORENTINE DRESSING

1⅓ cups MAZOLA Salad Oil
½ teaspoon dry mustard
¼ cup finely chopped spinach
¾ cup vinegar
1 teaspoon sugar
1 clove garlic
Few grains cayenne
1 teaspoon onion juice
1½ teaspoons salt

Measure all ingredients into a bottle or jar. Cover tightly and shake well. Chill several hours, then remove garlic, if desired. Shake thoroughly before serving. Makes 2⅓ cups.

© C F R Co 1947

MUSHROOM SPAGHETTI SAUCE

¾ pound fresh mushrooms, sliced
2 medium onions, chopped
1 clove garlic
½ cup MAZOLA Salad Oil
2½ cups (No. 2 can) tomatoes
¾ cup (6-ounce can) tomato paste
1 cup water
1 tablespoon salt
½ teaspoon pepper
1 tablespoon sugar
Few grains cayenne
6 whole cloves
6 peppercorns

Cook mushrooms, onions and garlic in MAZOLA Salad Oil 15 minutes over moderate heat in uncovered heavy kettle. Add remaining ingredients. Then cook over low heat 1½ hours, stirring occasionally. Remove garlic. Serve hot over spaghetti. Sprinkle with Parmesan cheese, if desired. Makes 5 cups.

Note: One 8-ounce can sliced mushrooms may be substituted for the fresh mushrooms.

Clam Spaghetti Sauce: Follow above recipe, omitting mushrooms. Five minutes before serving, add ⅔ cup finely chopped clams, fresh or canned together with liquor drained from clams (about 1 cup).

NOW! YOU CAN MAKE Real CHILI CONCARNE AND OTHER DELICIOUS MEXICAN DISHES

WITH THIS Original GEBHARDT SEASONING

Genuine Flavor-Rich ANCHO CHILI PEPPERS are grown and sun-dried in Mexico especially for Gebhardt

Now you can have that real Mexican flavor in your South-of-the-Border dishes because GEBHARDT brings you a complete and authentic, ready-to-use seasoning for Chili con Carne and other tasty treats famous in Mexican cookery. Gebhardt's exclusive process blends genuine, imported Mexican ancho chili peppers and other spices into an original seasoning that has no equal for piquancy and tang. Try it in the famous Gebhardt Mexican recipes packed with every bottle. Use it in your stews, sauces, gravies and spaghetti.

MADE IN Sunny SAN ANTONIO SINCE 1896 BY GEBHARDT CHILI POWDER CO.
Write for Free Recipe Book

Famous MEXICAN RECIPES PACKED with EVERY BOTTLE

Gebhardt's EAGLE CHILI POWDER

They'll Look THE SAME and Cook THE SAME for my Grandchildren

A LIFETIME OF WEAR WITH A MINIMUM OF CARE!

Carlton Ware STAINLESS STEEL

A modern heirloom! That's Carlton Ware, the cooking utensil that lasts for generations.

THERMO-PLY STAINLESS STEEL

The modern miracle metal... THERMO-PLY ...combines efficiency and beauty like nothing known before! Tough, shining stainless steel sheathes the efficient heat-conducting core metal like this ⇨ to make a quick-cooking, easy-cleaning utensil. Foods and beverages can't react in stainless steel, you know. Invest in health and kitchen convenience. Get Carlton Ware.

CARROLLTON MFG. CO.
Carrollton, Ohio

If stores in your community can't show you Carlton Ware, write to us, giving names of stores where you like to buy.

The cockers love to chase snow flurries and jump the snowdrifts, but they need a good warm house the same as you and I.

Diary of Domesticity

By Gladys Taber

NOW, no matter how the wind piles the snowdrifts round the house, there is a different feeling about the whole business. It is a kind of second-act-curtain feeling. The third act, now coming, will be violent, fierce, catastrophic, but some of the spectators are already reaching around for dropped gloves, lost hats and Christmas scarfs. Any way you look at it, winter's play has a happy ending!

I think of this when I go to the kennel to look at the heaters. The afternoon bowls of milk steam in the sharp air. Melody and Hildegarde and Silver bound in and out. The cockers love the snowdrifts. They like racing along the edge of a deep drift, then suddenly bouncing in it. Then they like to come into the house and drip on the hearth, melting down like sugar frosting.

Dogs need a warm place to sleep in winter. I often wish the folk who happily sit by the fire at night while Rover sleeps in an unheated doghouse could spend a night in the doghouse themselves.

The cats are endlessly curious. The dogs tend to withdraw from a strange thing, and think it over. The cats poke their faces in everything. The paper hanger has been here for a week, painting and papering. Esmé is forever walking up and down on the rolls of paper, peering under the canvas and mounting his ladder.

Fresh wallpaper is one of the great delights in life. True, the house is a nightmare for a time, and plaster dust seeps into every drawer, but the lovely look of a newly done room is wonderful. When we first moved into Stillmeadow, we papered the whole house ourselves. We had no idea even how to mix paste, and we had to use scissors to cut the lengths. But we managed.

Now we have Mr. Finlay, a Scotchman, who can paper a room so that it looks as if the wallpaper grew there. He is very scornful of workmen who "overlap." He matches even the finest flower tendrils. He is a delight to watch. On a cold afternoon, we all stop work and have hot tea and cinnamon toast. Mr. Finlay and I recite Scott to each other, and how I wish I could roll it out the way he does. "As chief, who hears his warder call, 'To arrms! The foemen storrm the wall,' The antlerred monarrch of the waste Sprrung from his heathery couch in haste ——" We also have a mutual love for Sir Harry Lauder.

We always look forward to Mr. Finlay's arrival with especial pleasure. I wish there were more men making artistry out of their work. Mr. Finlay says he served a long and careful apprenticeship in the old country, which is as it should be. Now he says anyone can go out and pass for a paper hanger with no training at all.

I believe that there is a real need in America today for a revaluing of all jobs. Almost any job has the possibility of being done with artistry. Watch a good carpenter smooth and fit boards together, and then watch another nail things up any old way.

There are wallpapers and wallpapers. Any woman doing over a room should consider the type of furniture, the amount of light, the kind of atmosphere she wishes. And then the colors in the room must harmonize.

My room looks like a flower garden instead of a rather uninspired bedroom. The paper is a copy of an English chintz, with several kinds of flowers climbing all over it. The only ones I can identify are moss roses and bluebells. The blossoms are soft blue, deep rosy pink and, oddly enough, gray. I wonder where gray flowers grow? The leaves are a glossy green. The curtains are blue, and the bedspread is gray. All the colors appear again in the rugs. The ceiling is a heavenly morning pink, enough to cheer one on the darkest winter day. The woodwork is white, like all the rest of the house.

On the mantel I have mother's blue monkey pitcher, a milk-glass goblet, and the pair of cranberry-glass finger bowls. The only picture hangs above. I had to take down all the rest when the flowers grew on the wall, for pictures like a plain background better. The picture is a water color of the Sconset lighthouse by Mabel Dwight. There is the blue sea, a bit of the green, and the lighthouse has a cranberry-colored roof and a gray top! It might have been painted for the room.

(Continued on Page 228)

For pancakes yes!

Pancakes with an extra UMPH!

Try them this way: When pancakes are done—stack 3 on a plate, cover with butter and Sweetose—put in the oven for a few minutes, before serving.

VANILLA ICE CREAM

CHERRY PIE

RAISIN BRAN MUFFIN

AND 100 OTHER USES TOO!

This new-type syrup—sweet enough to do things with!

Science now brings a wonderful new home sweetening agent. For luscious desserts, and mousses, and frozen custards. For muffins and shortcakes, for freezing fruits and making pies—and 100 other uses.

It isn't a substitute. It isn't a "stretcher". It is something new, that stands on its own. Thousands of women who have tried it, prefer it to sugar for many uses.

The name of this new food invention is Sweetose. Sweetose is a new type of syrup made from corn. BUT not like any corn syrup you ever tasted before. It's new! It's different—so different, that the Government has granted us a basic patent.

We think you will be in for a surprise when you use it. It mixes very quickly, blends well, and gives a really satisfying sweetness that men and boys really like. You owe it to yourself to try it.

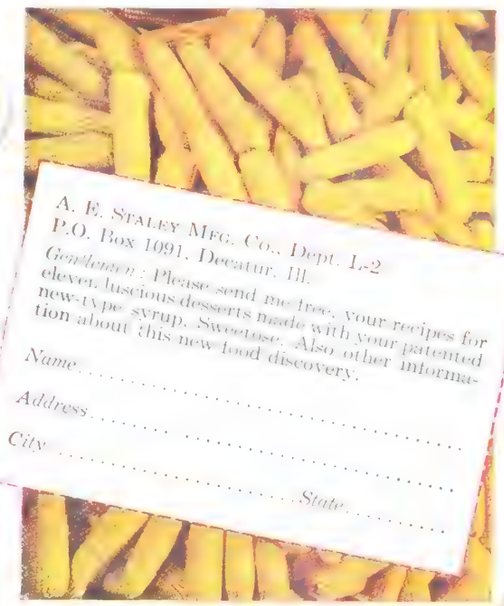
So just as a starter, mail the coupon below, and we will send you eleven new modern recipes for eleven wonderful, quick desserts, together with other information about this new modern miracle made from corn.

Just fill in and send the coupon to us today . . . you will be glad you did. A. E. Staley Mfg. Co., Decatur, Illinois.

CREAM CARAMEL PUDDING

FROZEN ORANGE PRUNE WHIP

Sweetose* IT'S REALLY SWEET!



A. E. STALEY MFG. CO., Dept. L-2
P.O. Box 1091, Decatur, Ill.

Gentlemen: Please send me free, your recipes for eleven luscious desserts made with your patented new-type syrup, Sweetose. Also other information about this new food discovery.

Name .....

Address .....

City ..... State .....

What's Cookin'?

Plenty—right at the moment. We're busy serving more people than ever before in telephone history. And here's the recipe we try to follow to keep that service the world's best:

RECIPE FOR GOOD TELEPHONE SERVICE

Take four Ms and a W: Men and Women, Money, Management and Materials
Stir well with Efficiency
Season with Experience
Add a dash of Enthusiasm
Serve with Courtesy and Understanding

BELL TELEPHONE SYSTEM

(Continued from Page 226)

The rest of the room is furnished well with cockers and cats. I learned to use only cotton materials with old-fashioned wallpaper and a country-house background. Silk belongs to modern or formal settings.

When we got the materials for upholstery, we added enough to make extra seat covers. These can be lifted off and cleaned. This is a good tip for anyone who has animals. Simply hem up the extra length of the material and lay it over.

For the bedspread we took an old white chenille and dyed it. We used eight boxes of gray powdered dye for this. We put the spread in the washing machine and let the motor run until the water stopped coming in. Then we poured the dye in through the soap opening, after dissolving it well in about a quart of water. We ran the machine ten minutes and through one rinse, then turned to dry. The main problem of dyeing is to prevent streaking; and if the material is well soaked, it is less apt to be uneven. You can dye old faded curtains, tableclothes or almost anything this way. Some nice summer day I plan to renew a lot of old sheets and pillowslips with a bath of color.

My room looks rather like a valentine now, and I have always loved valentines. I like valentine parties too. Valentine's Day is such a gay holiday. Table decorations are easy and pretty, for valentines themselves make a frilly, lovely centerpiece and place cards. Little frosted heart-shaped cakes belong in a lacy-edged dish on the table.

For a main dish, a platter of broiled baby chicken garnished with mushrooms is very elegant. Frozen peas in pastry cases are nice, and you can make the cases on the wrong side of muffin tins. Cranberry sauce adds the right color and spiciness.

Little potato balls dusted with paprika may be piled around the chicken. For the rest, green salad, and plain vanilla ice cream dredged with frozen rosy strawberries. This is easy enough to do, and is good.

We have our own cranberry sauce, and it brings such nice memories of the day we picked the berries down in the bog. Wild cranberries are lighter in color, and make a more translucent sauce.

Jill loves the cranberries so much that when frost seemed imminent, she lugged old rugs all one afternoon to spread over the bed. The meadow looked like a gypsy encampment when she got through, but she saved the cranberries.

On a cold February night, we like to look at the color pictures of autumn, thrown on a screen at the end of the room. Jill got some perfect ones this year when the coloring was more dazzling than we had ever seen it, and now when the leaves are packed down under the snow, I like to think they still glow as perfect, as lovely as ever in the pictures. Jill being a perfectionist, if the colors are even a shade off, she tosses the whole film away, but I have a sneaking fondness for some of the overexposed ones. They have a soft legendary glow about them.

Photographers have troubles. She sent a roll to an expert at the company for criticism and waited so breathlessly for the comment. When the films came back, they were all pictures of two angry little girls with palm trees sprouting from their heads. She is still hoping to get her own back someday—of the New England country road and the old church.

We made two discoveries this winter which are a great help. One is that a cabbage shredder can be used to shred bars of soap when flakes are scarce. It can be set so the flakes will be paper-thin.

When Pyrrhus was about to sail for Italy, Cineas, a wise and good man, asked him what were his intentions and expectations.

"To conquer Rome," said Pyrrhus.

"And what will you do next, my lord?"

"Next I will conquer Italy."

"And after that?"

"We will subdue Carthage, Macedonia, all Africa, and all Greece."

"And when we have conquered all we can, what shall we do?"

"Do? Why, then we will sit down and spend our time in peace and comfort."

"Ah, my lord," said the wise Cineas, "what prevents our being in peace and comfort now?"

—From Those Nerves by George Lincoln Walton. (J. B. Lippincott Company)

The other is that an electric fan should never be dusted and put away behind the summer hats. If the range fire gets too low, or smokes in the early morning, we set the fan on a stool and turn it so it blows a nice breeze under the firebox. The fire takes a new lease on life. Or if the Franklin in my bedroom does not want to start, the fan goes on the floor facing it. I direct the air at the draft opening and the fire crackles happily.

For defrosting the refrigerator, nothing is better. I turn the fan so it blows directly on the ice chamber, and leave the door of the chamber open. This not only defrosts the box in a hurry, but gives the interior a nice fresh-air bath. And finally, we use the fan to defrost food from the freezer. In fact, an electric fan is one of the most versatile of all kitchen aids.

On these icy mornings, we like a good breakfast. I think with nostalgia of the breakfasts of the early Americans who lived in this house. I know what they had: they had pie! Good, robust, flaky, rich, spicy apple pie. Aside from this, they ate only ham, eggs, pickles, cheese, sausage, pancakes and sirup, and, for Sunday, codfish balls.

I remember, even in my grandmother's day, I loved to visit her in West Springfield, for we always had meat and potatoes and pie for breakfast. Wheat cakes too. At my Aunt Grace's we had creamy delicate golden-brown codfish balls every Sunday morning, and Uncle Walter had a pot of leftover baked beans from Saturday night. Then we had cereal, too, of course, piles of hot toast, and coffee with thick cream frosting it.

At home, we had a "light" breakfast. Papa and I had big bowls of hot cereal with brown sugar and cream. Then we never had anything else except eggs and bacon or thin fried ham, or waffles and maple sirup, or wheat cakes. Hot blueberry muffins in season. If the meal was too slim, papa went out and fried a big panful of potatoes with onion to supplement it. We all drank four cups of coffee, and we were the healthiest family I ever saw.

My great-grandfather, or my great-great grandfather, was a minister in Boston, and among the relics in his little haircloth brass studded trunk I found this week something which pleases me much. I had forgotten about it, during the terrible war years, and now it seems a new discovery. It is a small yellowed box labeled "Comfort Powders." The fading flowing script says, "Take on every morning with a generous draught of cheerfulness and thanksgiving. Good for the mind and heart, will promote love, joy peace, long-suffering, gentleness, goodness faith, meekness and temperance." Inside are thirty folded papers such as were used for powders by the old family doctors folded at the ends to keep the medicine from spilling. On each folded paper is a message to be read for the day.

This is a lovely idea, I think, and bear repeating. For starting a new day with a beautiful thought might help us all. Grandfather's Comfort Powders were Biblical naturally. "Peace I leave with you, my peace I give unto you: not as the world giveth, give I unto you. Let not your heart be troubled, neither let it be afraid." That is one I like.

In a world still uneasy, these are good words to hear. And as we hear the daily news, we might feel a world of peace was a most vain illusion. But under the snow the violets sleep, and in the world there are still love, gentleness and goodness.

"Let not your heart be troubled, neither let it be afraid."

Printed in U.S

Ladies' Home

JOURNAL

The Ladies' Home Journal • March 1936 • 10¢

SUELINGAME
PUBLIC LIBRARY

The Miller's

COMPLETE NOVEL

By William Manning

Humor the man!

He'd love rings like these—no folding, no fuss, simply loop towels through!

World-of-tomorrow note for today's new bathrooms—complete with Cannons in modern multi-stripes. Only such huge and fluffy towels could drape so effectively—dry you so fast. Here in brilliant new designs, textures, florals, borders—eleven bouquet colors! From about 59c to $2.95.

CANNON MILLS, INC., 70 WORTH STREET, NEW YORK 13, N. Y.

P.S. PRICED SO YOU CAN AFFORD PLENTY

AUG 21
APR

p is for pie

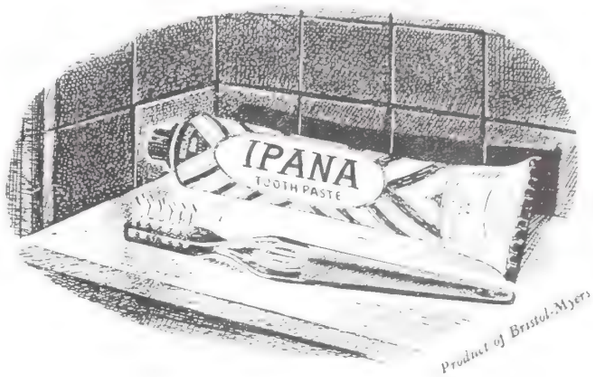
Delicious, nourishing. But typical of today's soft food diet -- almost no chewing to it. Little exercise to help keep gums firm. Yet strong, healthy gums are so important to sparkling teeth, a radiant smile.

a is for appointment

With your dentist. At first sign of "pink tooth brush." Let him decide whether it's serious or just another case of tender, unexercised gums. If so, he may suggest "the helpful stimulation of Ipana and massage."

i is for Ipana

Ideal for home care of smiles. Cleans teeth thoroughly and is specially designed, with massage, to help your gums. (7 in 10 dentists recommend gum massage, national survey shows. And dentists themselves prefer Ipana 2 to 1 for their own use!)



Product of Bristol-Myers

b is for beauty

Which goes with a radiant smile. So follow the popular dental routine of regular brushing with Ipana, then gentle gum massage. Helps your teeth -- your smile -- to brighter, more appealing charm.

Wake Up lazy gums with Ipana and Massage

Doctors Prove 2 out of 3 Women can have Lovelier Skin in 14 days!

"It's true!" reports Mary Connolly of San Francisco. "The 14-Day Palmolive Plan really worked for me! You need just one quick look at me to know it. Why, when I look in my mirror now, I can hardly believe that only 14 days ago, my complexion was coarse-looking, dull and oily!

"In 14 days, the change in my complexion was definite—noticeable! And I'm only one of many. You know, 36 doctors—leading skin specialists—tested the Palmolive Plan on 1285 women and proved it can bring a lovelier complexion to 2 out of 3 . . . in just 14 days!"

YOU, TOO,

may look for these skin improvements in only 14 days!

Less Oily—Clearer

"Less oily," Clara Duncan of Chattanooga, reports. Dry cream outlines often leaves skin blotchy-looking. Robs it of pert, clear, lovely look. The Palmolive Plan brought definite [illegible] of the women who had oily skin!

Less Coarse-looking—Smoother

"Skin less coarse-looking in 14 days!" reports Edith Dehli of Chicago. The 36 doctors reported almost two-thirds of all the women tested had smoother—actually finer looking skin! See what Palmolive can do for you!

Fewer Tiny Blemishes

Tiny blemishes—small blackheads—due to improper cleansing, respond to the 14-Day Palmolive Plan. "My complexion improved a lot," reports Elizabeth McGervey of Pittsburgh. The doctors found over half the women got clearer looking skin!

Fresher, Brighter Color

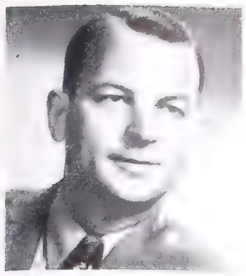
"Skin brighter, actually less sallow!" says Bessie Long of Seattle, after testing the 14-Day Palmolive Plan. The 36 doctors report this same improvement for 2 skins out of 3. Start your Palmolive Plan today!

Here's all You do!

1. Wash your face with Palmolive Soap!
2. Then, for 60 seconds, massage with Palmolive's soft, lovely lather. Rinse!
3. Do this 3 times a day for 14 days. This cleansing massage brings your skin Palmolive's full beautifying effect.

DOCTORS PROVE PALMOLIVE'S BEAUTY RESULTS!

P.S. For Tub For Shower Get the New, BIG, Thrifty Bath Size Palmolive!



WILLIAM HENNING

The author of The Heller tossed a coin to choose between two careers, painting and writing—and made up his mind to try painting first. "Under the influence of Grant Wood and other Iowa painters, I did several works which have been exhibited in leading art galleries," says Mr. Henning, a native Iowan. "But when fine art didn't pay off as well as I expected, I took up writing again and decided to try a novel about a teen-age character who had been growing in my mind for some time. The Heller is the result."

ANNEMARIE EWING

"I grew up with a violin and a dictionary," says the author of Call Me The Heart." "And as a result my career has seesawed somewhat irrelevantly between piano lessons and poetry at college, further music study in Paris, and radio and magazine work in New York. Writing is my first love, but like Whistler's butterfly and Hitchcock's anonymous appearance in each of his movies, my musical alter ego always manages to sneak in—especially when I'm least expecting it."

GIL NETHAWAY

Mr. Nethaway's favorite subject is women—as long as he doesn't have to associate with them too often or too long. From the island of Cyprus, where he's working for an American mining company, the author of Outside the Gates writes: "My main contention is that no woman is worthy of more than fifteen minutes' conversation unless she is over thirty, and then only if she doesn't put her make-up on in public. Gratefully a bachelor, I'm tall and lean, and slightly worried that I find dogs more understanding than most people."

JOURNAL CONTENTS

MARCH, 1947

NOVEL CONDENSATION COMPLETE IN THIS ISSUE

		PAGE
THE HELLER	William Henning	34

FICTION

THE VISITORS	Jane Homer Warner	36
CALL ME "THE HEART"	Annemarie Ewing	10
OUTSIDE THE GATES	Gil Nethaway	12
MARY HALLAM (Conclusion)	Susan Fritz	16
DATE GIRL	Hoc Rackonce	58
THE POEM	Emanuel Evans	70
MRS. CHRISTIANSEN'S HARVEST	May Sarton	72

SPECIAL FEATURES

OUR SCHOOLS ARE IN DANGER	Dorothy Thompson	11
NEVER UNDERESTIMATE THE POWER OF A WOMAN	Struthers Burt	11
THE SCRIBBLE GAME	Scott Cookling	23
IF YOU ASK ME	Eleanor Roosevelt	26
AMERICAN ART	John Walker	38
LET'S BE REALISTIC ABOUT DIVORCE	Mary Fisher Langmuir, Ph.D.	39
AFTERMATH	Laurie Flagg	44
THERE IS A WAY OUT	John C. Knox	45
IT'S TIME TO VOLUNTEER AGAIN	Margaret Hickey	56
THE VOLUNTEER WORKER, 1947 STYLE	Joan Younger	57
READ YOUR CHARACTER BY THE STARS	Barbara Benson	76
HOW AMERICA LIVES: MEET A SOFT-COAL MINER'S FAMILY	Betty Hannah Hoffman	225
THE HARD PRICE OF SOFT COAL	Joan Younger	233
CHEF EXTRAORDINAIRE	Alice Osborne	238
MY CONSCIENCE AND THE GREEKS	Hylda Mignon Pike	256
ROMANCE IN TEEN TIME	Gladys Denny Shultz	270
THERE'S MAGIC IN A GOAL	Donald A. Laird, Ph.D.	287

GENERAL FEATURES

OUR READERS WRITE US		4
UNDER-COVER STUFF	Bernardine Kielty	14
REFERENCE LIBRARY		24
WHY ARE YOU BLUE? (The Sub-Deb)	Edited by Maureen Daly	28
IS THIS LOVE?		31
FIFTY YEARS AGO IN THE JOURNAL	JOURNAL ABOUT TOWN	33
THE NOTION COUNTER	Elizabeth Metcalf	114
TO KEEP A STURDY HEART	Dr. Herman N. Bundesen	208
THIS IS A SILLY SHOOTER	Munro Leaf	212
BRINGING UP PARENTS	Dr. Barbara Biber	222
DIARY OF DOMESTICITY	Gladys Taber	244
ASK ANY WOMAN	Marcelene Cox	289

FASHIONS AND BEAUTY

ON CHOOSING A HAT	Wilhela Cushman	60
WARDROBE IN A WHIRL	Josette Daly Lutz	61
THERE'S SOMETHING ABOUT HER	Wilhela Cushman	66
FOUR WAYS TO LOOK THIS SPRING	Nora O'Leary	68
BEAUTY FOR YOUR BOSS . . . YOUR BEAU	Dawn Crowell	284

INTERIOR DECORATION AND ARCHITECTURE

BUCKS COUNTY, PENNSYLVANIA	Richard Pratt	48
COLOR SCHEMES ARE BRIGHTER	Henrietta Murdock	118

FOOD AND HOMEMAKING

IN THE GROOVE	Ann Batchelder	74
VISITORS WELCOME	Gladys Taber	78
LINE A DAY	Ann Batchelder	80
QUICK AND EASYS FOR TWO	Louella G. Shouer	184
REPORT TO THE HOUSEWIFE	Judy Barry	186
NEVER A DULL MEAL	Irma S. Rombauer	204
GIVING HOUSEWORK THE BRUSH-OFF	Judy Barry	234
TOP IT OFF	Louella G. Shouer	236
CONVERSATION PIECE	Ruth Mills Teague	248

POETRY

FOR MARCH'S CHILD, Edythe Hope Gence, 12 • MINE, ALL MINE, Ursella Wadleigh, 82 • HILLS, Mary Maxtone, 107 • THE FOOLISH HEART, Elizabeth Coatsworth, 110 • I CAN REMEMBER, Bessie Saunders Spencer, 123 • THE HOUSE UNDIVIDED, Georgie Starbuck Galbraith, 130 • MODI OPERANDI, Ethel Jacobson, 145 • WHEN FIGHTING MEN RETURN, Mildred Louise Boie, 158 • FAREWELL, Patricia McDonald, 171 • REPRIEVE, Alma Roberts Giordan, 191 • WAKE, Charline Martin Moore, 201 • A GAYER HOUR WILL COME, Meryle Moore Simpson, 214 • FOR AN OLD FAMILY SERVANT, Joseph Auslander, 263

Cover Design by Leslie Gill

LADIES' HOME JOURNAL, copyright 1947 by The Curtis Publishing Company in U. S. and Great Britain. All rights reserved. Title registered in U. S. Patent Office and foreign countries.

Published on last Friday of month preceding date by The Curtis Publishing Company, Independence Square, Philadelphia 5, Pa. Entered as Second Class Matter May 6, 1911, at the Post Office at Philadelphia under the Act of March 3, 1879. Entered as Second Class Matter at the Post Office Department, Ottawa, Canada, by Curtis Distributing Company, Ltd., Toronto, Ont., Canada.

Subscription Prices: U. S. and Possessions, Canada, Newfoundland, Labrador, Costa Rica, Cuba, Nicaragua, Dominican Republic, Guatemala, Haiti, Mexico, Panama, Republic of Honduras, Salvador, Spain and South America except the Guianas, 1 yr., $3; 2 yrs., $5; 3 yrs., $7; 4 yrs., $9. Other countries, 1 year, $4. Remit by money order or draft on a bank in the U. S. payable in U. S. funds. All prices subject to change without notice. All subscriptions must be paid for in advance.

UNCONDITIONAL GUARANTY. We agree, upon request direct from subscribers to the Philadelphia office, to refund the full amount paid for any copies of Curtis publications no previously mailed.

The Curtis Publishing Company, Walter D. Fuller, President; Fred A. Healy, Vice-President and Advertising Director; Mary Curtis Zimbalist, Vice-President; Cary W. Bok, Vice-President and Treasurer; Lewis W. Trayser, Vice-President and Director of Manufacturing; Benjamin Abel, Vice-President and Director of Circulation; Robert E. MacNeal, Secretary; Richard Ziesing, Jr., Manager of Ladies' Home Journal. The Company also publishes The Saturday Evening Post, Country Gentleman, Jack and Jill, and Holiday.

CHANGE OF ADDRESS: Send change of address (naming magazine) to

THE CURTIS PUBLISHING COMPANY
Independence Square, Philadelphia 5, Pa.

At least 30 days before the date of the issue with which it is to take effect. Send old address with the new, enclosing if possible your address label. The post office will not forward copies unless you provide extra postage. Duplicate copies cannot be sent.

The names of characters in all stories are fictitious. Any resemblance to living persons is a coincidence.

METRO-GOLDWYN-MAYER'S
LION'S ROAR

Published in this space every month

The greatest star of the screen!

There have been many memorable moments in movies that have rolled us into the aisles with laughter, but nothing compares with the big one in "Love Laughs at Andy Hardy".

To say this picture is the best of the Hardy series would be an understatement. It is, indeed, one of the most entertaining comedies that has ever been produced.

★ ★ ★ ★

When Mickey, five-foot-five, tangles with Dorothy Ford, six-foot-six, the stage is set for a merry field-day. And director Willis Goldbeck makes the most of it.

★ ★ ★ ★

That's the short and the long of it. But the story itself is sure-footed and solid. It is a real reflection of certain aspects of American life.

★ ★ ★ ★

BONITA

A true descendant of a tradition once started by the late Booth Tarkington, Andy Hardy and his trials and tribulations, his affaires d'amour or even du coeur, as the French would say, are superbly contrived in this picture from producer Robert Sisk.

★ ★ ★ ★

Mickey Rooney's back in his famous role and no doubt about it, this artist is a master of all the keys. He can be funny as they come and as serious as the soul.

★ ★ ★ ★

LINA

His blind dates, his romance with Bonita Granville, his rhumba interlude with the talented and alluring Lina Romay, his tragi-comedy episode when he is locked out of the house in a lady's wrapper, all are so deftly interwoven into story that the total is a film fan's delight.

★ ★ ★ ★

You may thank the expert acting of Lewis Stone, Sara Haden, and Fay Holden for much of the effective entertainment.

★ ★ ★ ★

You may—and you will—thank M-G-M for bringing it to the screen.

★ ★ ★ ★

The writers deserve to be in the billing. A hand to Harry Ruskin, William Ludwig and Howard Dimsdale's original story.

★ ★ ★ ★

And an extra hand to you. You'll want it to applaud with.

★ ★ ★ ★

Love Laughs at Andy Hardy. Love is you.

—Leo

(Top) The Puff, $5.50
(Center) The Lure, $6.00
(Bottom) The Frou Frou, $8.00

All of rayon-satin in Heaven Blue, Blossom Pink, Cherry, Royal Blue, Wine, and Black.

AT BETTER STORES EVERYWHERE

Daniel Green
COMFY SLIPPERS
Famous since 1882... they stay in shape

Our Readers Write Us

Why Editors are Difficult to Live With

Milwaukee, Wisconsin.

Dear Editors: I have been wanting to write to you for a very long time. It seems to me that to edit a magazine such as yours requires more than human wisdom.

Most sincerely,
BLANCHE COLEMAN.

This is an opinion in which most editors concur, despite ample evidence to the contrary. ED.

Future Renewed

Sierra Madre, California.

Dear Editors: I am now 93 years old, but I have taken the JOURNAL for many years, so am taking a risk. [She renewed for two years.] My, how the magazine has improved through the years, especially the last seven or eight. I especially like Dorothy Thompson, and some of the newer writers on various subjects.

The JOURNAL is the best woman's magazine.

Sincerely yours,
ELIZABETH M. MOORE.

We think we will get many renewals from her. Anyone who at 93 likes the "newer writers" has discovered the fountain of youth. ED.

Quick and Easy

Atlanta, Georgia.

Dear Miss Adams: Am a war bride with a new baby, started housekeeping when I returned from the maternity ward. Loathe cooking, with a husband who loves good food. Recently spotted your Quick and Easy for Two wonderful! Instant hit!

All L. H. J. seems to assume one adores housekeeping. It may be un-American, but I hope my children (?) think of me as terribly attractive, terribly gay and terribly interesting - arts, letters, savoir-faire, and what have you.

V. T. yours,
MIMI BOOTH

You can be sure "they" will, if they're well fed. ED.

Canine Cover Girls

Madison, Wisconsin.

Gentlemen: I am enclosing this for your consideration as a cover. These two dogs are truly "mother and daughter."

Very truly yours,
ROSELLA K. PAULSON.

Veteran Protest

Fort Ann, New York.

Dear Editors: I happen to be a veteran's wife and have had experience with both the "52-20 Club" and the G. I. Bill of Rights. When my husband came home from the Army, we went to Long Island, where he attended a school. Food and transportation by bus between my job and his school took every bit of money we had. We came away with nothing to start on. Therefore, while my husband was looking for a job we still had to live, and we became a part of the 52-20 Club.

Now, really, Mr. Editor, what veteran do you think really wants to belong to the club? We didn't, but we had to! You say there are plenty of jobs around—well, would you accept a backbreaking job for the same amount as you would get for staying at home? However, that was not the reason for our doing so. We had no money at all, and my husband needed his time to look for a job.

Sincerely,
Name withheld by request.

That was the purpose of the benefit. The few who exhaust their benefits are the real idlers. ED.

"Rusty" Counterpart

Canajoharie, New York.

Dear Editors: Rusty is fine—very husky and happy. I have the Parker cover with the redhead baby, mother and daughter appearing on it. I have decided to keep a record of all the baby's appearances to compare with Rusty's development. I only wish the artist would show more than the back of his head and two chubby fists.

The Journal helped.

We are still convinced that Rusty's a very superior baby, due, of course, to the JOURNAL'S influence on his birth.

R. P. C.

The writer cited June cover as a prenatal influence on "Rusty's" hair. Neither parent is a redhead. ED.

Mother Waits the Day

Cincinnati, Ohio.

Dear Editors: I would like to get in touch with Mrs. E. P., of Chicago. I am sure we would have a lot in common, for I, too, have two little stinkers, and my only consolation is that someday they will grow up and marry, and I can sit back and enjoy watching them lead the same hectic existence, if I live that long.

Before they were born, I took a prenatal course, read every available book and article on child raising, but have come to the conclusion, after eight years of civil war, that the authors either didn't have children, or had someone else to raise them. If you raise them yourself, you don't have time to write about it.

Sincerely,
MRS. CHARLES LEBER.

Better read Doctor Hohman's book. ED.

Need Not be Dying

Los Angeles, California.

Dear Editors: I noticed in the JOURNAL a letter written by a doctor's wife regarding a yearly checkup for the discovery of cancer. I happen to be dying of cancer myself and I'd like to impress upon the public that the best way to detect it early enough for a cure is to go to a cancer specialist twice a year or oftener. I went to six practicing physicians and my cancer was not detected in time. After it was detected by myself, the cancer specialists did everything in their power. They gave me six lovely years, but I could have been cured if a physician had admitted he could be wrong and sent me to a tumor specialist.

There were two symptoms I knew I had which could have prolonged my life if recognized.

I want to live, but if I could impress upon the public that their safeguard lies in a cancer specialist every six months, I would gladly give every hope I have for living the next year and a half.

The general practitioner is fine, hard-working and conscientious. But he should say, "I can find nothing wrong, but be sure

(Continued on Page 6)

Baby-gentle care: Baby Alice Wallace Smith knows she's made a hit with every girl for the sheer innocence of a baby doll! She has every feature but. Blue eyes, a mere smidgin of pink cheek. And you can bet those pink cheeks are gentle. That's sure. A baby's satiny, tender skin needs a soap that's pure and mild. And when you talk of purity and mildness, you're talking Ivory talk. For Ivory's 99 44/100% pure and so very, very mild.

Now this Young Softie is an Old Smoothie!

Way above par for beauty: Alice grew up in sunny California, which some people say is enough to make a gal pretty super. But Alice says, "A girl has to be smart about skin care. When I was a 'teen-ager, I used Ivory because it seemed sensible to choose a soap that's pure and mild enough for a baby's skin." Two things show that Alice was right: her lovely complexion and the fact that more doctors advise Ivory than all other brands of soap put together.

Cover-girl glamour: Alice Wallace is now a leading model, appears frequently on the covers of popular publications. Alice says, "A radiant complexion is a must for me. And that means regular Ivory care is a must for me, too." If you want a smoother, younger-looking complexion, don't be careless about your skin. Change now to regular care with pure, mild Ivory Soap. In just one week you can have That Ivory Look. Think of it! In just one week you can have That Ivory Look!

More Doctors advise Ivory than any other soap

YOU DON'T Cream Shortening

YOU DON'T BEAT EGGS!

Betty Crocker of General Mills

Yet amazing Betty Crocker Double-Quick New Method with Softasilk will give you lovelier cakes than any other method, any other flour!*

- Uses only 1 bowl!
- Cuts mixing time to 4 minutes!
- So sure, brides, too, turn out light, tender, fresher-tasting, wonderful cakes! Every time!
- Betty Crocker Softasilk is cake flour—made for cakes and cakes alone. The kind of flour leading cook books specify. The only cake flour Betty Crocker recommends for her new method Softasilk recipes.
- Get Softasilk. In one box you get the cake flour and the Betty Crocker Double-Quick New Method recipes that spell cake-making magic!

*See guarantee on package.

A Betty Crocker Double-Quick New Method Recipe

Fresh Orange Layer Cake

Have ingredients room temperature (70° to 75°). Shortening soft, not melted. Preheat oven to 350° (mod.). Grease and flour two round layer pans, 8-in. diameter, $1\frac{1}{4}$-in. deep. Sift Softasilk before measuring. Measure all ingredients accurately (level).

Sift together in bowl: $2\frac{1}{4}$ cups sifted SOFTASILK Cake Flour; *$1\frac{1}{2}$ cups sugar; 2 tsp. double-action baking powder; $\frac{1}{4}$ tsp. soda; 1 tsp. salt

Add: $\frac{1}{2}$ cup high grade vegetable shortening; grated rind of 1 orange (about 1 tsp.); and $\frac{2}{3}$ of 1 cup liquid ($\frac{1}{4}$ cup unstrained orange juice, $\frac{3}{4}$ cup water or milk)

Beat vigorously with spoon for 2 min. by clock (150 strokes per min.). You may rest a moment when beating by hand; just count actual beating time or strokes. Or mix with electric mixer on slow to med. speed for 2 min. Scrape sides and bottom of bowl frequently.

Add: remaining $\frac{1}{3}$ cup liquid; $\frac{1}{3}$ to $\frac{1}{2}$ cup unbeaten eggs (2 medium)

Beat 2 more minutes—Pour into prepared pans.

Bake about 30 minutes in mod. oven (350°).

When cake is cool, spread filling between layers, frost top and sides.

CREAMY NUT FILLING AND FROSTING

Into $2\frac{1}{2}$ tbsp. Softasilk gradually blend $\frac{1}{2}$ cup milk. Cook to very thick paste (about 10 min.), stirring constantly. Cool to lukewarm. Meanwhile, cream $\frac{1}{2}$ cup shortening (half butter) with $\frac{1}{2}$ cup sugar, $\frac{1}{4}$ tsp. salt. Add lukewarm paste. Beat with rotary beater until fluffy. Fold in $\frac{1}{2}$ tsp. vanilla, $\frac{1}{2}$ cup coarsely chopped nuts. Use $\frac{1}{3}$ amount for filling. To remainder, blend in 1 cup sifted confectioners' sugar.

To Save Sugar in cake use $\frac{3}{4}$ cup of sugar and $\frac{3}{4}$ cup corn syrup. Use the $\frac{1}{4}$ cup orange juice, and reduce milk to $\frac{1}{2}$ cup plus 1 tbsp. Add syrup with liquid to dry ingredients in first mixing period.

8 CAKE RECIPES, 6 ICINGS, SUGAR SAVING HINTS WITH PKG.

SOFTASILK CAKE FLOUR
A Product of General Mills

BARGAIN! AMAZING OFFER OF 14-PIECE CAKE-MAKING SET WITH PACKAGE!

(Continued from Page 4)

and see a cancer man." When he says that, we'll save more lives.

Respectfully,
(Name withheld by request).

The Truth About Lawrenceburg

Columbia, Tennessee.

Gentlemen: In the January, 1947, issue of LADIES' HOME JOURNAL beginning on page 6 and continued on page 118, there appears an article under the heading Lawrenceburg Verdict, which in its assertions is false from beginning to end, and which is characteristic of the reports of this case written by the communistic and subversive elements in the nation.

It is unfortunate that publications with wide circulations, such as yours, will stoop to reproduce such nauseating libels. It is stated just under the article that it was reprinted with the author's permission from the New York Herald Tribune; therefore, since you went to the trouble of getting his permission, you must have desired to publish it; at any rate you did publish it.

The article, with the author's customary disregard of truth, refers to my closing argument to the jury in the Lawrenceburg trial as a "farrago of sectionalism" and "a really terrifying flood of hatred," and "the kind of racism and sectionalism that flowered so luxuriantly in that courtroom."

It so happens that I have before me a verbatim transcript in full of my closing argument to the jury, made by the court reporter who was employed both by the defendants and by the State to report the trial, and every sentiment expressed in my argument, every proposition advanced, every thought presented, was just the reverse of the picture of my address attempted to be made by the article in your magazine.

For instance, I stated this to the jury in my closing address, in this exact language:

"Gentlemen of the jury, I was raised among colored people. I have no feeling whatever against a person because of his color. I think the most cruel and one of the most foolish things a human being can do is to condemn or blame another for something he cannot help.

"If I remember correctly, I was not consulted about the color of my skin; and I remember this—when I was an infant my mother was away during the day teaching school; there was an old Negro woman who looked after me. And as long as the breath stays in my body, as long as my lips can respond to the devotion of my soul, I shall continue to thank Almighty God for the lullabies she once sang.

"I have nothing against them. I am not here trying to have a legal lynching."

Again, I said:

"And we wouldn't give one good, intelligent, patriotic Negro like the lawyer who wrote me from Jackson, for all the 'Browskis,' 'Grontskis,' 'Eleanorskis' and 'Stinkskis' they can inflict upon a law-abiding people."

And again:

"There must be a regeneration of the spirit of America; and tolerance and the brotherhood of man must rise triumphant against the forces of unrest.

"Local patriotism is a grand and wholesome sentiment, but local prejudice and sectional hatred constitute a millstone about the neck of human society.

"Every man worth his salt thinks his own section and his own home the finest place on earth; it was principally this feeling of love for home that made this nation strong and great. Of course, no community, no state, no section of the country, and for that matter, no race of people has any monopoly on genius, on courage, or on patriotism."

Certainly these expressions are not "whole farragoes of sectionalism" or "terrifying floods of hatred" or "racism and sectionalism."

In regard to the case itself, the simple truth is that six police officers went to a Negro business block in Columbia, located a very short block from the public square, to investigate some shooting that occurred there around 9:40 P.M. on Monday, February 25, 1946. When they reached this section, they were at once fired upon by a group of armed Negroes, who continued to shoot at the officers while the latter were leaving the scene and even after they had gotten in automobiles to be

(Continued on Page 8)

OH, MOM, THE BRIDGE CLUB WENT WILD
ABOUT THAT TUNA SOUFFLE YOU SUGGESTED I SERVE!

I KNEW THEY WOULD LIKE IT SUE—
IT'S ONE OF THE PARTY-EST DISHES I KNOW OF!

That's the wonderful thing about thes famous brands of tuna... you can u them both for dainty "party" luncheo for "the girls" and for hearty, he-ma "main dishes" for your hungry famil

These tunas are always delicate a delicious, for only the tender lig meat is packed. Economical, too. every can chuck full of quality tu ...no bones...no waste!

VAN CAMP SEA FOOD CO., INC.
Terminal Island, California

THE BRANDS

THAT MADE

TUNA famous!

Buy EITHER Brand... the quality is the sa

Florida's 3 Luscious Juices

that have changed the Breakfast Habits of the Nation!

Here's the Helping Hand you get when you just open the can and pour!

1. REFRESHING DELICIOUSNESS. Florida has found the way to capture the luscious sweetness and flavor of orange and grapefruit juice freshly squeezed from plump, tree-ripened fruit at the peak of its deliciousness. Taste the quality of Florida fruit juices TODAY!

2. THE VIGOROUS HELP OF NATURAL VITAMIN C. These juices are veritable gold mines of the vitamin C needed daily to help fight colds and fatigue—and to help restore vigor from head to foot.

3. ECONOMY. Because these healthful juices are such money savers, enthusiastic families everywhere are enjoying good big glassfuls every day of the week . . . at breakfast, between meals, and at any time they want a refreshing, thirst-quenching drink.

4. TIME AND LABOR-SAVING. All the squeezing has been done. You just open the can and pour. No wonder these healthful fruit juices have become the daily stand-by in millions of homes! To combine health, pleasure, convenience, and economy is 100% good sense!

FOR VARIETY
A Different Juice Each Day!

Order a supply of FLORIDA GRAPEFRUIT JUICE, FLORIDA ORANGE JUICE, and FLORIDA BLENDED JUICE (Orange and Grapefruit Juices deliciously combined).

Canned

FLORIDA FRUIT JUICES

● FLORIDA CITRUS COMMISSION
Lakeland, Florida

I never should have said...

"What kind of Kleenex do you want?"

NOW I've heard everything! jeered the little woman. Maybe you think all tissues are Kleenex, but my skin says different! If you had a faceful of makeup to wrestle with, you'd insist on a plenty soft tissue—and you'd know there's no other kind of Kleenex!

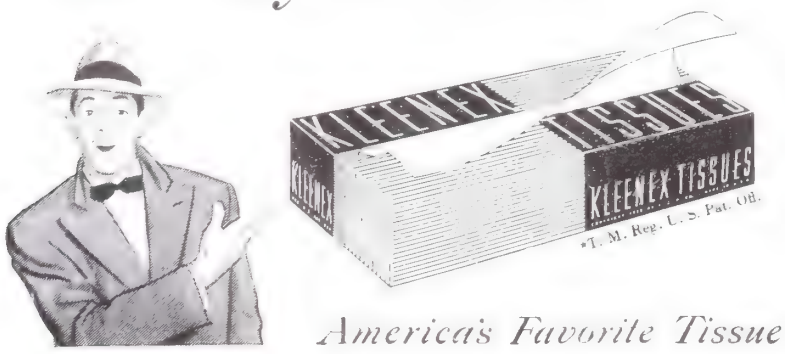
Clowning again snorted Sue's mother. And with me sneezing cold germs all over. Young man, to hear you talk a body'd think Kleenex was just like any tissue. Well, my nose knows there's only one Kleenex. You'll learn—when these sniffles catch up with you!

It's a greenhorn you are about tissues, sir—meaning no offense! our Nora whispered. Now what other tissues comes poppin' up so handy-like—one at a time? None but Kleenex! 'Tis by that fine Kleenex box you'd be knowin' there's only one Kleenex. But whish-h-t!—there's still another way . . .

Your eyes tell you! Hold a Kleenex Tissue up to a light. See any lumps, or weak spots? Divil a bit! You see Kleenex quality come smilin' through—pure-as-an-angel—so you're sure that Kleenex must be heavenly soft. And husky, too. Faith, your own eyes tell you there's no other tissue just like Kleenex!

Now I know better...

There is only one KLEENEX



America's Favorite Tissue

(Continued from Page 6)

carried to the hospital. All of this was entirely undisputed. One of the officers was quite seriously injured, and none of the officers ever drew their weapons or offered to harm the Negroes in any way, and no one claimed any of them did so.

It was clearly established by the State in the trial that the defendants, with one or two exceptions, were all armed and present in the group that fired upon the police officers, without warning and without excuse.

While your article states that there were only two of the defendants against whom the State "brought any kind of proof" connecting them with the shooting, there is not a state in this Union that does not have many prisoners in the penitentiary who were convicted on far less proof than the State presented against all these defendants.

Naturally, by those who believe in the assassination of lawfully constituted officers, who are trying to perform a public service and preserve the peace, the verdict of the jury acquitting those guilty of such a heinous crime will be applauded as "magnificently proving the mettle" of the jurors.

But by loyal Americans who desire to see our Government and its institutions perpetuated, no jury will ever be praised for freeing men guilty of such vicious and inexcusable crime.

I am writing this with the request that you publish it, in order that the truth of this case may have the same wide publicity accorded the utterly false account contained in your January issue. If you desire your readers to hear from both sides of a question you will gladly publish this; and if you do not publish it, your failure will speak for itself.

Yours very truly,

PAUL F. BUMPUS

District Attorney-General
11th Judicial Circuit of Tennessee
Columbia, Tennessee

Will I or Won't I?

Concord, Massachusetts

Dear Sir: The problem of premarital chastity among the nation's youth has progressed to a critical stage.

I am nineteen years old. I have the results of no polls at my finger tips, nor have I toured the nation to sound youth's opinion. I simply know, from the normal contacts which are common to all young Americans, that the esteem in which virginity is held by the rising generation is dropping—and dropping fast. Among teen-agers the pressure which the mores exert in defense of chastity has decreased almost to the vanishing point.

American mothers and fathers have been berating themselves and each other for this state of affairs. The present adult generation has admitted that its parental control has been lax, the examples of promiscuity it has provided have been shameful, its conscientious sex instruction has been woefully meager. Now the task reverts to us.

I know that it is the fashion today to lay all social ills among young people to a faulty home environment. I realize that current theory maintains that most premarital intercourse is brought on by a preparation of minor sex play and/or alcohol which break down or by-pass the normal inhibitions.

The fact is that the persons who are responsible for a premarital sex experience are the participants. The great majority of us who have had or will have premarital intercourse go into it deliberately and consciously, because we have failed to see what is wrong with it.

I am simply trying to point out that if we refuse to accept the moral code handed down from our parents, the responsibility then devolves upon us to create a mature and courageous and honest one of our own.

When I admit that this is not easy, I know what I'm talking about. I have been engaged for two years, and it will be three years more before my fiancée and I can marry. I am painfully acquainted with the fact that economics and nature are out of step, that the physical requirements and the desire are present far in advance of the economic status which makes for a happy start in marriage. The persistent question has haunted me more than once, sometimes tending precariously to slip from "Will I or won't I?" to "Why

(Continued on Page 178)

Revolutionary New Curler Avoids Broken Hair Ends

New curler guards against split, frizzy en

No matter how beautiful your permanent matter how natural your wave, broken h ends can cause ugly, unmanageable frizz

The revolutionary new GAYLA "Ea Lock" curlers "baby" brittle hair-ends, t them smoothly, gently—thanks to unique "open-end" feature. No wonder y hair looks so lovely, so soft, so natural, becoming!

Get a whole set of these new, safer curlers today

Gayla

"EASY-LOCK"

CURLER

by the makers of the famous GAYLA Hold-Bob bobby pins and hairpins

COPYRIGHT 1947 © GAYLORD PRODUCTS, INCORPORATED © CHICAGO 16,

When a COLD threatens to run through a family...

It's LISTERINE ANTISEPTIC

Quick!

...for Everybody

IT's all too easy for a cold, once it starts, to spread from one member of the family to another . . . with troublesome results. That's why it's so sensible to enlist the aid of the Listerine Antiseptic gargle early and often!

This pleasant antiseptic reaches way back on throat surfaces to kill millions of threatening germs called the "secondary invaders."

Although many colds may be started by a virus, it is these "secondary invaders," say many authorities, that are responsible for much of the misery you know so well. Listerine Antiseptic, if used frequently during the 12 to 36-hour period of "incubation" when a cold may be developing, can often help forestall the mass invasion of these germs and so head off trouble.

Listerine Antiseptic's remarkable germ-killing action has been demonstrated time and again. Tests showed germ reductions on mouth and throat surfaces ranging up to 96.7% fifteen minutes after a Listerine Antiseptic gargle, and up to 80% an hour later.

This germ-killing power, we believe, accounts for Listerine Antiseptic's remarkable clinical test record against colds. Tests made over a period of 12 years showed that those who gargled with Listerine Antiseptic twice daily had fewer colds and usually had milder colds than those who did not gargle . . . and fewer sore throats.

So, whenever there's a cold in your family, prescribe Listerine Antiseptic for everyone. It's a wise thing to do.

LAMBERT PHARMACAL COMPANY, St. Louis, Mo.

Threatening "Secondary Invaders" which Listerine Antiseptic attacks

You can see by their names that they're nothing to fool with. Millions of them can live on mouth and throat surfaces, waiting until body resistance is lowered to strike. You can realize the importance of the regular use of Listerine Antiseptic to try to keep their numbers reduced.

LISTERINE ANTISEPTIC REDUCED GERMS UP TO 96.7% IN TESTS

"Pass the confetti! I'VE GOT SOMETHING TO CELEBRATE!"

"Just think — little inexperienced me — making a rich, light, yummy cake! And gee, I'll admit I never could have done it if I hadn't made a tremendous discovery.

"I mean it—it was terri'ic! I used Crisco and a wonderful new Crisco Success Cake recipe. Why, the combination's fabulous! You get better cakes on every count—richer, lighter, tenderer, moister! You see, with Crisco you get cakes such as no other type of shortening can give you, because Crisco has a baking secret. And Crisco's new Success Cake recipes take special advantage of that secret.

"Just wait 'til you try it! Why, in 4½ minutes you can mix a Crisco Success Cake that's super—better than any you could ever make the old-fashioned way. Pure, all-vegetable Crisco is perfect cake shortening with any recipe, but Crisco plus this new, quick Success Cake method is truly magic.

"I—of all people—should have known that Crisco would be ideal for baking. Why, it's always been my standby for frying. 9 out of 10 doctors, you know, say Crisco is digestible. From now on I'll depend on it for everything—cakes, pies and fried foods—Crisco improves all 3."

CELEBRATE AT YOUR HOUSE, TOO. TRY THIS WONDERFUL NEW CRISCO SUCCESS CAKE

Confetti Cake

SUPER GOOD AND A CINCH TO MAKE

But we can't promise success unless you use Crisco—it has a baking secret.

You'll get better cakes on every count—lighter, richer, moister, finer-textured—with Crisco and new Crisco recipes like this. Just measure ingredients exactly . . . follow the simple directions carefully . . . and be sure to use Crisco.

CONFETTI CAKE

Measure into mixing bowl (All Measurements Level):

2 cups cake flour (sifted before measuring)
2 cups sugar • ½ cup Crisco
1 tsp. salt • 1½ tsp. soda
3 squares melted bitter chocolate • ¾ cup milk

Blend vigorously by hand or with mixer (medium speed) 2 minutes. Now stir in (yes, all by itself):

¾ tsp. baking powder

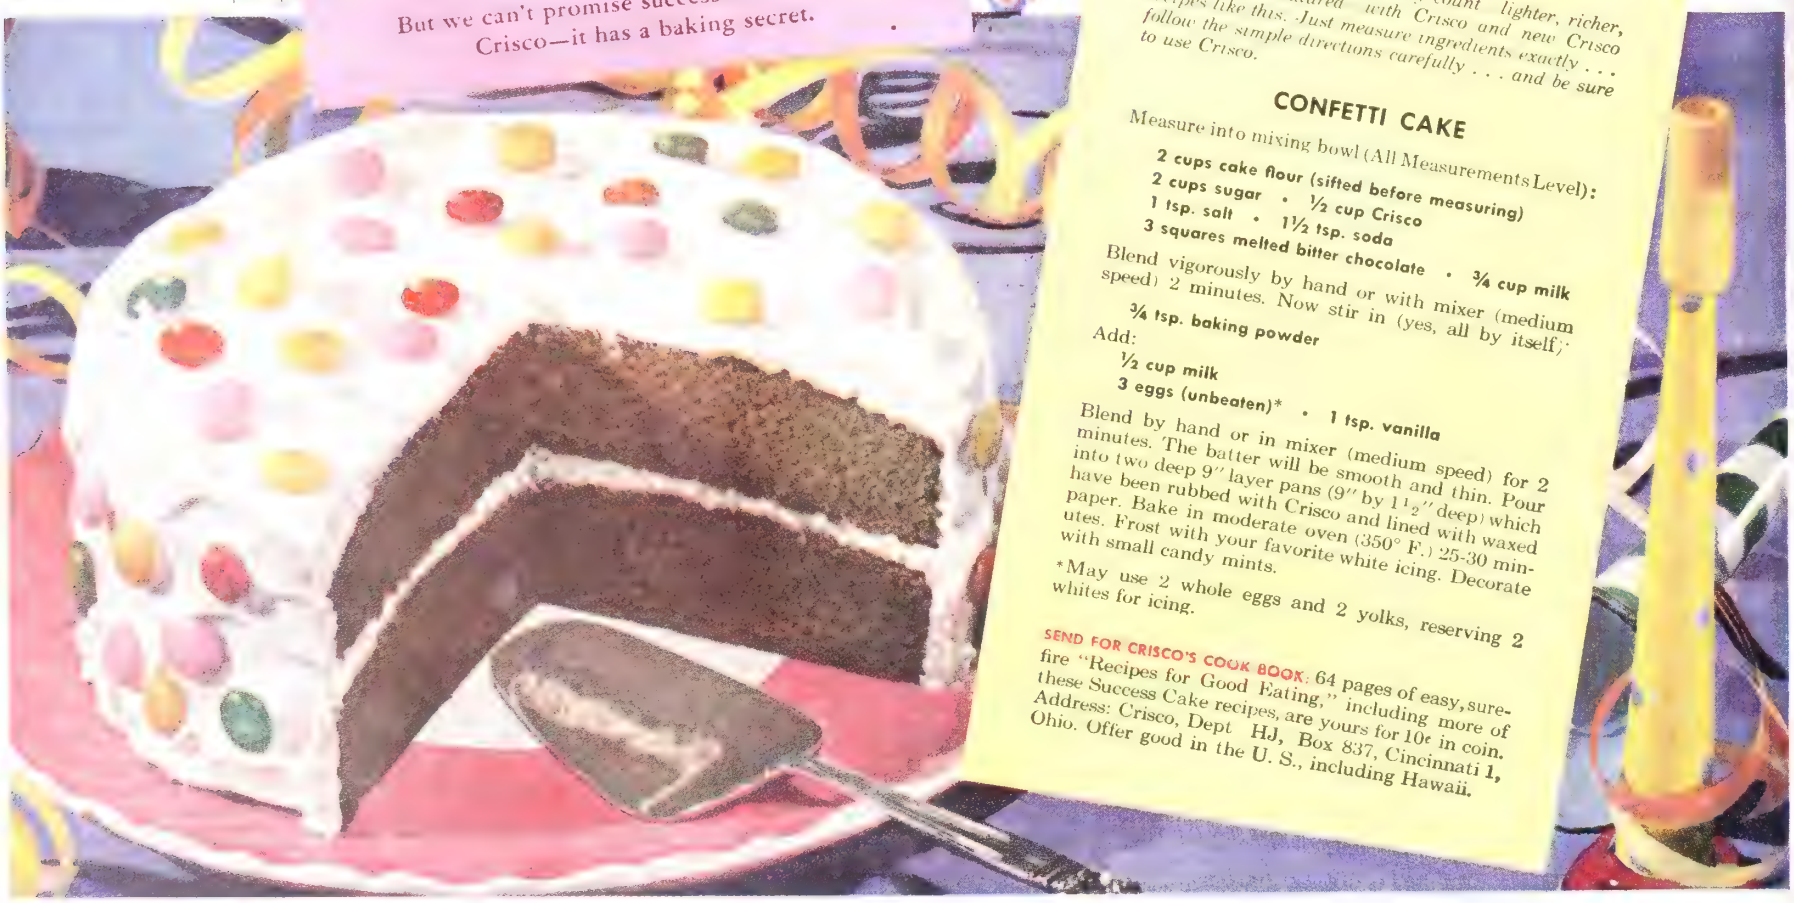
Add:

½ cup milk
3 eggs (unbeaten)* • 1 tsp. vanilla

Blend by hand or in mixer (medium speed) for 2 minutes. The batter will be smooth and thin. Pour into two deep 9" layer pans (9" by $1\frac{1}{2}$" deep) which have been rubbed with Crisco and lined with waxed paper. Bake in moderate oven (350° F.) 25-30 minutes. Frost with your favorite white icing. Decorate with small candy mints.

*May use 2 whole eggs and 2 yolks, reserving 2 whites for icing.

SEND FOR CRISCO'S COOK BOOK: 64 pages of easy, sure-fire "Recipes for Good Eating," including more of these Success Cake recipes, are yours for 10¢ in coin. Address: Crisco, Dept. HJ, Box 837, Cincinnati 1, Ohio. Offer good in the U. S., including Hawaii.



KENNY BAKER
with all-star cast on
"GLAMOUR MANOR"
Fun! Music! Surprises!
A brand new kind of daytime show
12 noon E. S. T.

In everything you fry or bake

use Crisco

...it's digestible!

LIGHTER CAKES

FLAKY PIE CRUST EVERY TIME

DIGESTIBLE FRIED FOODS

Journal

MARY BASS, Executive Editor LAURA [illegible], Managing Editor

Associate Editors: HUGH MACNAIR KAHLER, BERNARDINE KIELTY, ANNE BATCHELDER, WILHELA CUSHMAN, FRANK ELTONHEAD, ALICE BLINN, RICHARD PRATT, HENRIETTA MURDOCK, LOUELLA G. SHOUER, MARY LEA PAGE, MAUREEN DALY, DAWN CROWELL, JOHN MORRIS. ● Contributing Editors: GLADYS TABER, LOUISE PAINE BENJAMIN, GLADYS DENNY SHULTZ, BARBARA BENSON, MARGARET HICKEY. ● Assistant Editors: JOHN WERNER, CHARLOTTE JOHNSON, ROBERT ATHERTON, DONALD STUART, RUTH MARY PACKARD, RUTH MATTHEWS, NORA O'LEARY, ALICE CONKLING, MILDRED ARNOLD, JUDY BARRY, JUNE TORREY, MARJORIE LEDERER LEE, EVELYN G. SAGER, LILY GLENDINNING, DOROTHY COUNSELMAN SELBY, JOAN YOUNGER. ● Editorial Assistants: BETTY NILES GRAY, KATHERINE WEST MILLER, SELMA RUTHERFORD BURGESS, ALICE KASTBERG, ANNE EINSELEN, DOROTHY VOORHEES, FRANCES RODMAN, JAN WEYL, EMILY ELMORE MACY, JOSEPH DI PIETRO, MARGARET WINSLOW O'NEILL, JOSETTE DALY LUTZ, IRIS WILKEN.

NEVER UNDERESTIMATE THE POWER OF A WOMAN

BY STRUTHERS BURT

I NEVER have. That is, not since I was a callow youth. Having recovered from that almost inevitable green sickness which afflicts most men, for a shorter or longer period when they are young, and from which the wise recover but, unfortunately, the majority doesn't—hardly a day has passed but I have come to admire and like women more and more. I mean as a sex, which is quite different from admiring or liking an individual here and there. Also, "like" is a far more enduring and all-embracing word than "love," and not the slightest hint of a pun is intended.

There are bad women. Naturally. There would be. There are a lot of women scattered about the world. There are cruel women. There are silly women. Plenty. And so on down the list of all the opprobrious words you can apply to the human race. A considerable list, as you will find, if you look it up. Half of man's time through the centuries has been taken up by inventing derogatory adjectives for his own species, and not without reason. Furthermore, the cruelty and foolishness of women, because they are not its own especial kind, are especially irritating to the male mind. The male mind doesn't always understand them. In fact, it hardly ever does, and mystery is invariably irritating. On the other hand, the male mind gets used to its own brand of folly and inhumanity, private or public, and after a while wears it with comfort and forgetfulness, like an old pair of shoes.

When I hear a woman say she doesn't like women, I suspect her. When I hear a man say he likes and admires women, my respect for him increases. I say to myself, "There's a fellow who's learned something."

Now, I haven't time to relate in detail the reasons for my attitude, which has grown through the years. That would take a book, and the subject has already been pretty exhaustively treated, pro and con. I'll confine myself to just one angle, although I'll state, to begin with, that that angle is the cornerstone of my admiration. Also, oddly enough, it is the very vice which is my sex's favorite charge against the other half of the species.

MEN say women are "too personal." Exactly. And that's, to me, not a vice but a virtue—an immense virtue. In other words, in the beginning was psychology; the hidden and often tortuous motives and workings of the human mind, and when we're really grown up, if that ever happens, that's where we'll start, and nowhere else. What makes one man do this? And another that? What makes one man a Nero or a Hitler, and another a Saint Francis of Assisi? When we learn to start at the very start, and nowhere else, we'll come close to reading the riddle of war, of panics, of politics, of personal success and failure, and of almost everything else, including a large share of illness.

Men begin too high up with their reasoning. They like to use big words and assign large-sounding terms; actually (Continued on Page 100)

Our Schools are in Danger

By Dorothy Thompson

READERS of these editorials know that I, like many other women, feel that we have been failing as citizens in the very matters that are of greatest concern to us as women. In this connection I have written of juvenile delinquency and the chaos of American divorce laws. Now, I think, it is high time to consider the state of American education.

Repeatedly, since the war ended—and especially during the past six months—warnings have come from various quarters that we face a real crisis in our schools. This is due to several causes—some immediate, and others of longer development—which I shall list, not necessarily in the order of their importance.

First, pressure on the schools and teaching personnel because of a rising birth rate; on the colleges by enormous numbers of youths whose education was interrupted by the war and who are resuming education at a later-than-usual age, under the G. I. Bill of Rights, together with the normal number of younger men and women, and by a high standard of income and employment, encouraging parents to keep children in school longer.

Second, the low standard of pay for teachers at all levels of education, public and private, in comparison with incomes commanded in other fields by educated or even uneducated persons.

Third, the radically diff[illegible] education in hig[illegible] states. [illegible] minim[illegible]

Four [illegible] standin[illegible]

Fifth, [illegible] from a la[illegible]

THE resul[illegible] elements is a serious sh[illegible] become far [illegible] services has i[illegible] persons willing [illegible] port of the Nat[illegible] cation Associati[illegible] year's end stat[illegible] "with a normal [illegible] ment of about [illegible] teachers each year [illegible] inadequate numb[illegible] the present enrollme[illegible] "350,000 trained te[illegible] ers had quit the [illegible] fession since 1939."

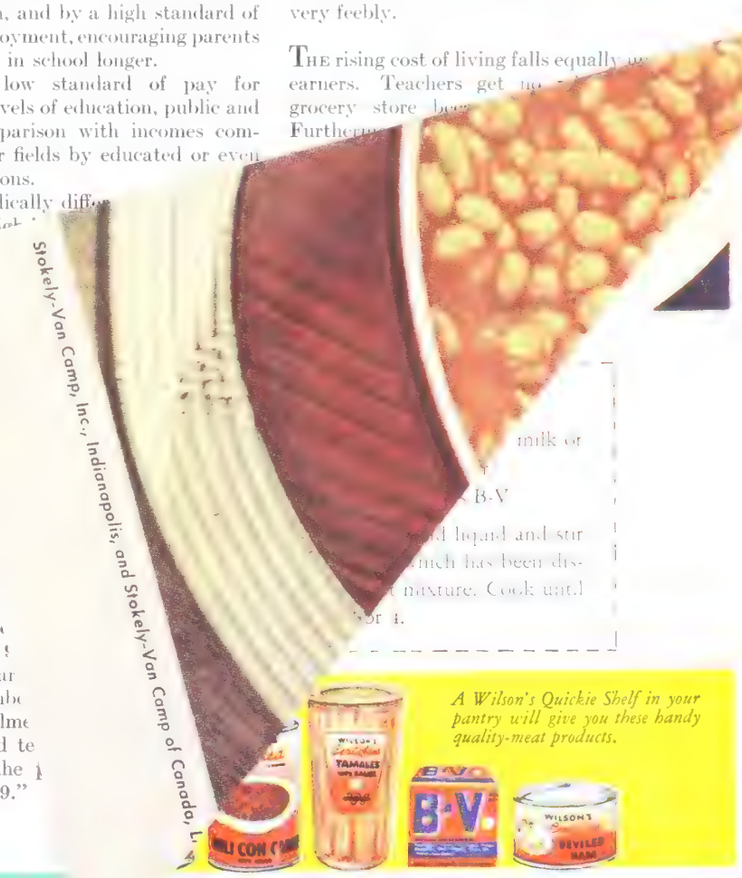
The turnover is also prodigious. "Many thousands of teaching positions have been maintained only by the employment of three or four different persons in succession during a single year."

The report points out that such instability would wreck any business and has already weakened the public-school system. And the weakening effect is cumulative, for as teachers drop out the load has to be carried by those who remain, and the heavier load leads them in turn to drop out.

The economic reasons are obvious. "In 1919," says the report, "the average salary of schoolteachers was $16 less per year than the average of all employees in private business. In 1944 it was $464 a year less." In other words, the remuneration for every other form of job has risen hundreds of per cent faster than for schoolteachers.

Now, no one goes into schoolteaching primarily for the money in it; but when remuneration becomes so radically disproportionate, even the call of a vocation sounds very feebly.

THE rising cost of living falls equally [illegible] earners. Teachers get [illegible] grocery store bec[illegible] Furtherm[illegible]



Stokely-Van Camp, Inc., Indianapolis, and Stokely-Van Camp of Canada, L[illegible] milk or
B-V
TAMALES
B·V.
WILSON'S
DEVILED HAM
A Wilson's Quickie Shelf in your pantry will give you these handy quality-meat products.

"No one would know I had a * Mastectomy

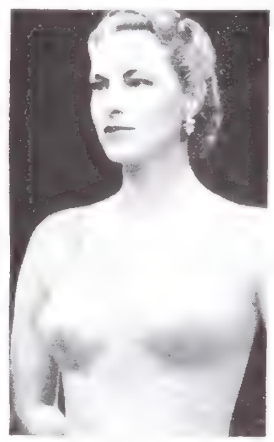
Mastectomy patient wearing the Spencer Breast Support and Breast Form made especially for her.

MY SPENCER
Breast Support and Breast Form have restored my normal appearance"

* Mastectomy is the doctors' term for a breast removal operation. Patients are grateful for the natural, smart effect of a Spencer Individually Designed Breast Support. Into the breast pocket is fitted a soft, light, porous, washable breast form, sculptured to an exact likeness of the natural breast. Each Spencer is created especially for the person who is to wear it.

IF SAGGING BREASTS ARE YOUR PROBLEM...

In brassiere she was wearing



In her Spencer Breast Support

We shall design a Breast Support [illegible] to hold your breasts in a position to improve circulation and thus aid nature to restore tone to tissues. Your doctor will tell you that healthy breasts are less likely to disease.

For Maternity and Nursing Wear, Too
Spencer Designers create special, individually designed breast supports for maternity and nursing wear. Yet they cost no more than ordinary brassieres!

Spencer Designers* Also *Create Surgical-Medical Supports
For the many thousands of doctors who prescribe them, Spencer Designers create special supports to meet the doctors' requirements for such conditions as: back derangements and following spinal, abdominal or breast operation; dropped abdominal organs; movable kidney; maternity and after childbirth; certain hernia cases; heart conditions where abdominal support is helpful.

Send Coupon for Free Information
Send coupon below for fascinating booklet or ask any dealer in Spencer Supports to show you how a Spencer can help you. Spencer dealers are expert, specially trained corsetieres. Look in telephone book under "Spencer corsetiere" or "Spencer Support Shop."

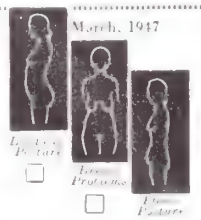
Do You Want to Make Money in a professional type of business? Experience not needed—we train [illegible] interested. Check here ☐ for information.



March, 1947

TO: ANNE SPENCER — SEND TODAY
Spencer, Incorporated
141 Derby Avenue, New Haven 7, Conn.
Please send your free booklet. I have marked my posture problem at left.

NAME (Please Print)
ADDRESS
City & State

Also made in Canada at Rock Island, Quebec.

SPENCER INDIVIDUALLY DESIGNED SUPPORTS
Reg. U.S. Pat. Off.
FOR ABDOMEN, BACK AND BREASTS

"If you can't lose fifteen pounds by next Friday you'll just have to invite your brother."

UNDER-COVER STUFF

By Bernardine Kielty

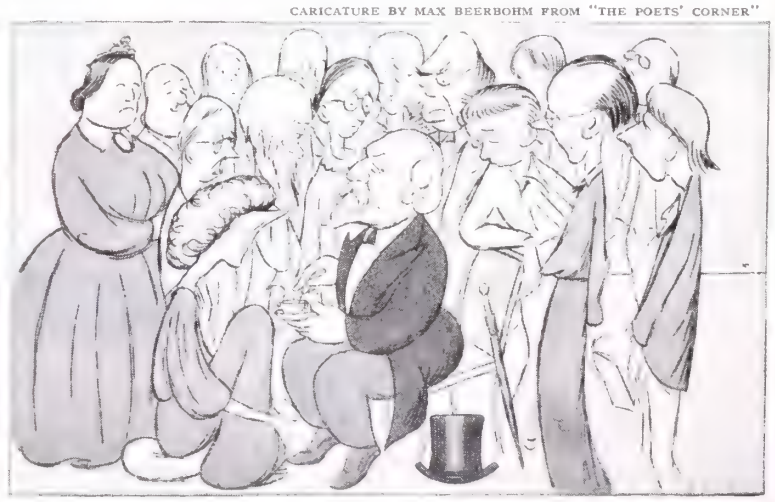
TWO fugitives from the daisy chain, as they call themselves, have done a book of hilarious cartoons on the female student, EVERYTHING CORRELATES. Anne Cleveland and Jean Anderson are graduates of Vassar of a few years back, and they have not forgotten how they and their kind dressed, how they "knew life," how they adapted to their own use the great truths of the literature and science which they allegedly studied. It is a devastating critique through the medium of line drawings and snappy captions. The faculty, we hear, loves it, but not the student body!

Every now and then, in this hard-boiled, scientific, practical age, we come upon some graceful survivor from a gentler day. Maybe an elderly uncle who still waxes his small white mustache, or a trio of sisters grown old together in their lovely New England parlor and Persian-rug garden. Such a one is Sophie Chantal Hart, ex-professor of English at Wellesley—slender, willowy lady out of another age, a figure out of Rossetti, a drawing by Aubrey Beardsley, but living now, incongruously enough, in a most modern of our up-to-date cities. She knew and loved the Romantics—Shelley, Keats, Byron. She also loved the poetry of their spiritual successor, Francis Thompson. In her distant, ephemeral way, she loved Francis Thompson himself. To love and revere a poet in those earlier days was no laughing matter. One took one's crushes with a heartbreak. But Miss Hart has a sturdy sense of humor and can now tell the story of her passion with complete objectivity.

To get the picture, you have to visualize the turn of the century in England. Thompson, worn down by TB, and unable to sell his poetry, had come to the end of his rope when Alice Meynell, herself a poet and essayist, and at that time the toast of the aesthetes—of Ruskin, Chesterton, Meredith—rescued him from his despair, befriended him, got his poetry published, and gave him a home with herself and her husband. Knowing how deeply Sophie Hart, who had never met him, felt about Thompson, Mrs. Meynell once invited her, with some others, to meet him at tea. The party assembled in a fever of anticipation, notably Miss Hart. But the guest of honor was missing. Only when it was practically bad tast

(Continued on Page 16)

CARICATURE BY MAX BEERBOHM FROM "THE POETS' CORNER"



Robert Browning taking tea with the Browning Society.

Selby ARCH PRESERVER Shoes

PHOTOGRAPH BY JOHN RAWLINGS HAT BY MME. HENI

Selby ARCH PRESERVER shoes make a pretty fuss over your feet! By giving them extra smartness. By freeing them from foot fatigue as only genuine Selby ARCH PRESERVERS can, these three ways:

- steel arch bridge for firm support
- individually placed metatarsal pad for comfort
- perfectly flat innersole for comfort-plus

Most Styles

$13.95 to $16.95

Slightly Higher in Western States and Canada

SELBY FIFTH AVENUE at 38th Street, New York City, and your Leading Shoe and Department Store • Manufactured for women by THE SELBY SHOE COMPANY, Portsmouth, Ohio ... for men, E. T. WRIGHT & CO., Rockland, Mass. • IN CANADA, MURRAY-SELBY, LTD., LONDON, ONT. • IN ENGLAND, SELBY SHOES, LTD., LONDON • IN AUSTRALIA, SELBY SHOES (Aust.) LTD., SYDNEY • IN NEW ZEALAND, SWINTON & OATES, LTD., AUCKLAND • IN ARGENTINA, ALBERTO GRIMOLDI, BUENOS AIRES • IN PERU, EL AGUILA AMERICANA, LIMA • IN SOUTH AFRICA, GOODWEAR SHOES LTD., JOHANNESBURG • IN URUGUAY, SASSI, S. A., MONTE[illegible].

SELBY SHOES THE WORLD OVER—ESTABLISHED 1877

Copr. 1947, The Selby Shoe Company

FOR Happy days
...HERE AGAIN

It's good to be expansive again! When it comes to crystal, you can be, even on a careful budget. For instance, Fostoria's handcraft Colony is surprisingly inexpensive; affords so much for so little! You'll love its swirling contours . . . its antique simplicity . . . its sparkling charm for family or informal occasions. See Colony at the better stores everywhere.

Fostoria
MADE IN U.S.A.

FOSTORIA GLASS COMPANY • MOUNDSVILLE, WEST VIRGINIA

(Continued from Page 14)

for them to stay longer did he put in an appearance. He had been walking, his shirt was open at the throat, he was at his most romantic. Mrs. Meynell greeted him in the hall and asked him cordially if he wouldn't like to come in to meet her friends. Thompson stepped to the doorway, and after an almost imperceptible pause which only heightened the effect, answered—simply and irrevocably—"No." He then walked deliberately up the stairs to his own room, and the party was over.

• • •

Francis Thompson reminds us—by an obscure train of thought—of one of the most interesting anthologies to date: I WISH I HAD WRITTEN THAT, a collection of stories and poems which various well-known writers of today "wish they had written." Many forgotten and many unknown bits are unearthed, and the choice gives you a double take: on the piece itself—which in most cases is well worth reading—and on the chooser. Saroyan, for instance, wishes he had written The Pooka and the Good Fairy, by Flann O'Brien—a delightful story which we'd never before heard of, but which started us off on an O'Brien debauch. James Thurber wishes he had written Farewell, My Lovely, by Lee Strout White; Robert Nathan, Glamour, by Stephen Vincent Benét; Willa Cather, The Mary Gloster, by Kipling; S. J. Perelman wishes he had written Katie Wins a Home, by Ring Lardner, and two writers chose works of Francis Thompson (which is where we came in): Conrad Aiken, An Anthem of Earth; and Clare Boothe Luce, The Hound of Heaven.

• • •

Incidentally the one-hundredth anniversary of the wedding of two of the Victorian Immortals is being celebrated by a new edition of some of their works: THE LOVE POEMS OF ELIZABETH BROWNING AND ROBERT BROWNING, edited by Louis Untermeyer. Unlike Francis Thompson, Robert Browning preferred not to be temperamental, not to be known primarily as a littérateur. The son of a bank clerk, he looked like a banker himself, and never talked poetry or books if he could help it.

• • •

Rosamund Marshall, who has put DUCHESS HOTSPUR behind her, and is deep in her new and more serious book, writes from Vancouver Island: "This is an ideal place to work. The climate is soft—cedars,

These didn't get away!

waterways, mountains make scenery as fine as any I have ever seen. There is good salmon fishing too. As you know, the salmon is the fish that breaks a man's spirit! He is tricky, unpredictable and a fighter to the backbone." The salmon apparently did not break Rosamund's spirit—if you can believe fish pictures!

• • •

We don't want to seem chauvinistic, but as the years roll by (and digestive processes weaken) we find ourselves turning away from the Hungarian, the French and the German cookbooks, in favor of what is now

(Continued on Page 18)

THE famous Wat-a-set label on a curtain means safe and easy washabilit without starching, without distortion weave, and without excessive shrinkag (Wat-a-set does not eliminate shrinkag entirely, but does reduce it!)

"I washed my Wat-a-set Nylon Ma quisettes 12 times and they still look new says one New England cheerlady. She's di covered how easy washing Wat-a-set nylo curtains is. She just dips them in suds few times, then rinses, and they're don Long wearing nylon and the Wat-a-s finish make a combination that's pret hard to beat. The colors are lasting, too for all Wat-a-set curtains are dyed wit fade resistant colors.

You'll find the Wat-a-set label on a wid range of well-known brands of curtains all prices. If you live in or near one America's 50 largest cities look in th "Where-to-buy-it" section of your tel phone directoty under "CURTAINS — Wat-a-set" for the name of the store nearest you selling Wat-a-set Curtains.

REDUCES SHRINKAGE Wat-a-set A DURABLE WASHABLE FINISH

MT. HOPE FINISHING CO.
North Dighton, Massachusetts
Wat-a-set Trade Mark Reg.
A LASTING Finish
for Rayon, Nylon and Cotton Curtain Fabrics

COPR. 1947, THE INTERNATIONAL SILVER CO., MERIDEN, CONN.

Prized possession in 1847

Prized possession in 1947

1847 Rogers Bros. brings you 100 years of beauty

Fashioned like expensive coin silver of the period, 1847 Rogers Bros. thrilled its owner's heart with pride 100 years ago.

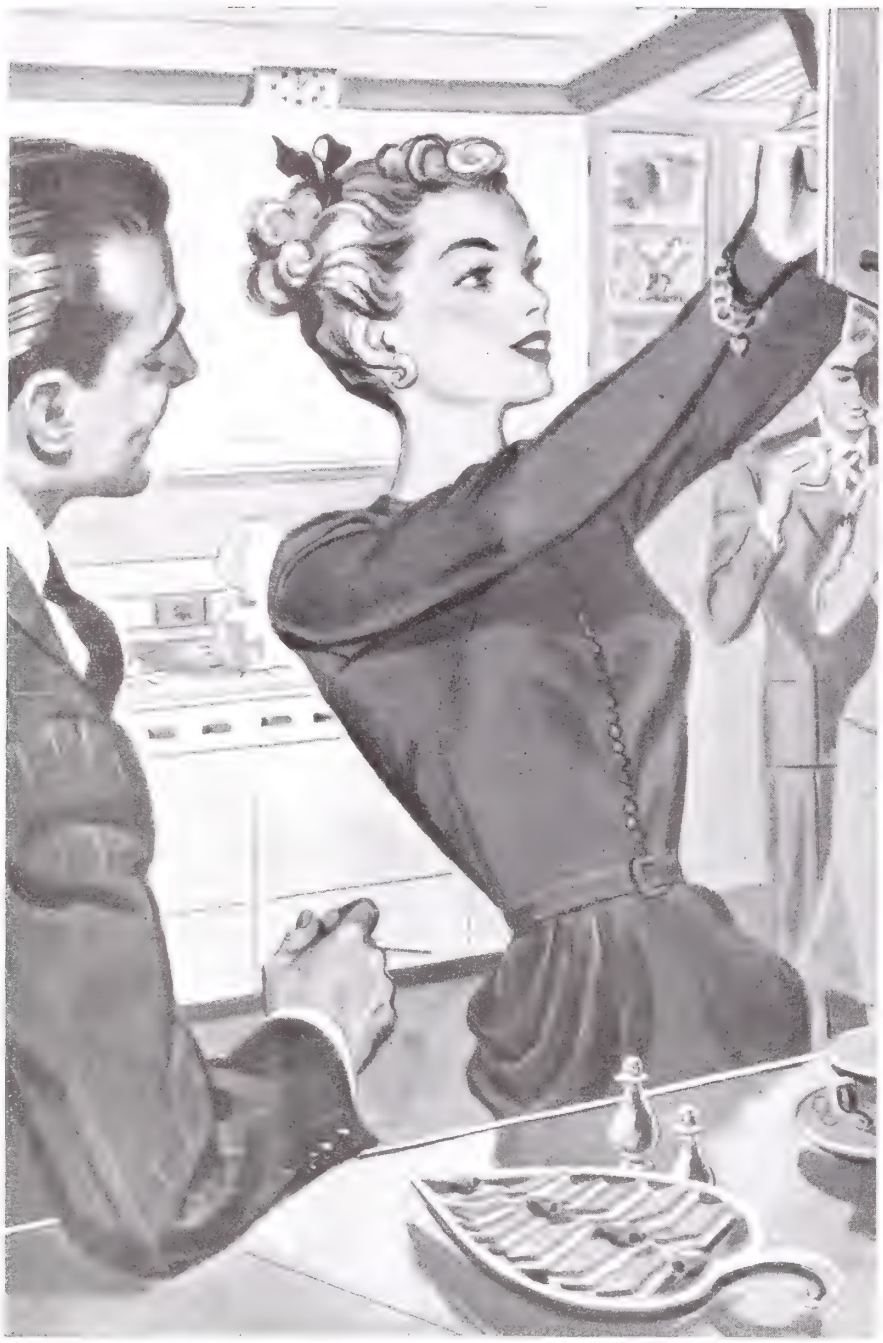
In gracious homes today, 1847 Rogers Bros. with its century-old heritage of craftsmanship is still a cherished possession. Each design has an extra height and depth of ornament no other silverplate has . . . richness found only, as a rule, in solid silver.

Select your favorite from the patterns owned and loved by more women than any other . . . the only patterns with the yearmark "1847." America's finest silverplate . . . same quality, no increase in price since the war. No federal excise tax. 52-piece service for eight, $64.75, with chest.

1847 ROGERS BROS.

100th Anniversary

TUNE IN: "THE ADVENTURES OF OZZIE AND HARRIET," SUNDAY, 6 P.M., E.S.T., CBS.



3 out of 5 times
Somebody's looking!

Plenty to do when you're hostess . . . and three out of five times somebody's looking! No matter if you do get a bit flustered . . . let them look . . . Kleinert's Dress Shields will always protect you from tell-tale underarms!

. . . Protect your pretty dress, too, from the triple threat of perspiration, strain, and underarm cosmetics. Be sure to ask for Kleinert's Dress Shields by name at your favorite notion counter.

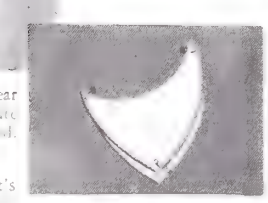
Deep Sleeves? Then wear

In a rush? Rely on Kleinert's



Oh! Kleinert's! OK!

Kleinerts
T. M. Reg. U. S. Pat. Off.
GUARANTEED PROTECTION SINCE 1871

(Continued from Page 16)

known as "the vanishing American"—THE BOSTON COOKING-SCHOOL COOK BOOK, by Fannie Merritt Farmer. A new edition is now out. It is the fiftieth anniversary of the original edition, and in the fifty years it has sold 2,531,000 copies. We regret to see that although Boston Baked Beans remains, Brown Bread and Indian Pudding are missing.

Another practical book recently out is MODELING FOR MOTHERHOOD, by Doris Hale Heinz and Katherine Smith Bolt. It is lighthearted but sound—about choosing the doctor, about the baby's initial needs, the right kind of clothes for the expectant mother herself, and those important exercises for getting back to that almost forgotten slimness.

Then there is THE COMPLETE HOME-DECORATOR, by Catherine Klock. The two items that sold us this book were the Color Harmonizer, which has six different color ensembles for room interiors, removable so that you can take it along on color matching shopping; and the Room Plotter, also removable, which contains reproduced miniature furniture models to be used as cutouts in planning the layout of your room.

Items about Gus, the cat, still come in. Gus' real name, in the Bellows and Co. days, was Gussie. We took liberties with it purposely, so that there would be no false implications about his sex. But a reader who knew Gussie intimately couldn't bear to have anything of his personality changed, and wrote in with some indignation. Also, a man connected with Bellows tells us that when he worked late Gussie would climb onto his lap or sit on his desk top to keep him company. (Of course we believe, knowing cats pretty well, that it was he who was keeping Gussie company.) And then there was "Papa," the Frenchman who was keeper of the wine cellars of the concern, and who always fed Gussie shrimp, caviar or boned shad. If we're not mistaken, it was the death of "Papa" that affected Gussie so deeply that he, too, in a short time, passed away. We hadn't known, however, about the boned-shad angle.

REPRINTED COURTESY THE SATURDAY EVENING POST

"He's such a darling. May I hold him?"

Irwin Edman, the fair-haired boyish-looking philosophy professor at Columbia University, the one who made philosophy sparkle in PHILOSOPHER'S HOLIDAY, has a delightful companion book now out, PHILOSOPHER'S QUEST. "To be a philosopher in New York," he says, "has always seemed like trying to sing in a boiler factory." Well, he stays on in New York in spite of tempting invitations elsewhere. He has singlehandedly made philosophy comprehensible, and the Columbia students, with a penchant in that direction, line up for his classes. Though he looks like a boy himself, he is definitely the absent-minded professor. Two boys from one of his classes met him one early afternoon on Riverside Drive. He was walking fast, coattails out in the breeze. "By the way," he said when the boys caught him, "what direction am I walking in?" Somewhat surprised, they told him that he was walking south. "Oh, then I've had my lunch!"

Mark Twain was absent-minded too. His niece tells about his going out one day, also for a brisk walk. When he started, he was wearing a sealskin cap. When he returned home the

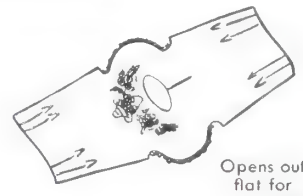
(Continued on Page 21)

Spring flowers captured in real lace to make your suit look fresh as a garden! Like all Maison France blouses, it opens out flat, cuts laundering time down to a twinkling. One magical size fits sizes 32 to 38. In a petal-smooth, washable white

Stonecutter rayon crepe. $7.98



Opens out flat for laundering

Find it at better stores, or clip and mail coupon for your "Flower Basket" and it will be mailed to you from the store nearest you.

Maison France
242 West 55th Street
New York 19, N. Y.

Please send me....."Flower Basket" Blouses at $7.98 each, for which I enclose $.....

NAME.....

STREET.....

CITY.....ZONE.....

STATE.....

palomino

the stocking color for Spring '47 borrowed from the sun-soaked gold of a stallion's satin coat . . .

Palomino, the color that's pure sensation in breath-taking Berkshire Nylon* stockings . . . Berkshire's famous 51's and Berkshire's Nylace Kantruns! Palomino . . . the stocking color that will sweep you into Spring '47.

Sheer... Sheer... Berkshire

C. 1947, Berkshire Knitting Mills

Nylon Yarn by Du Pont*

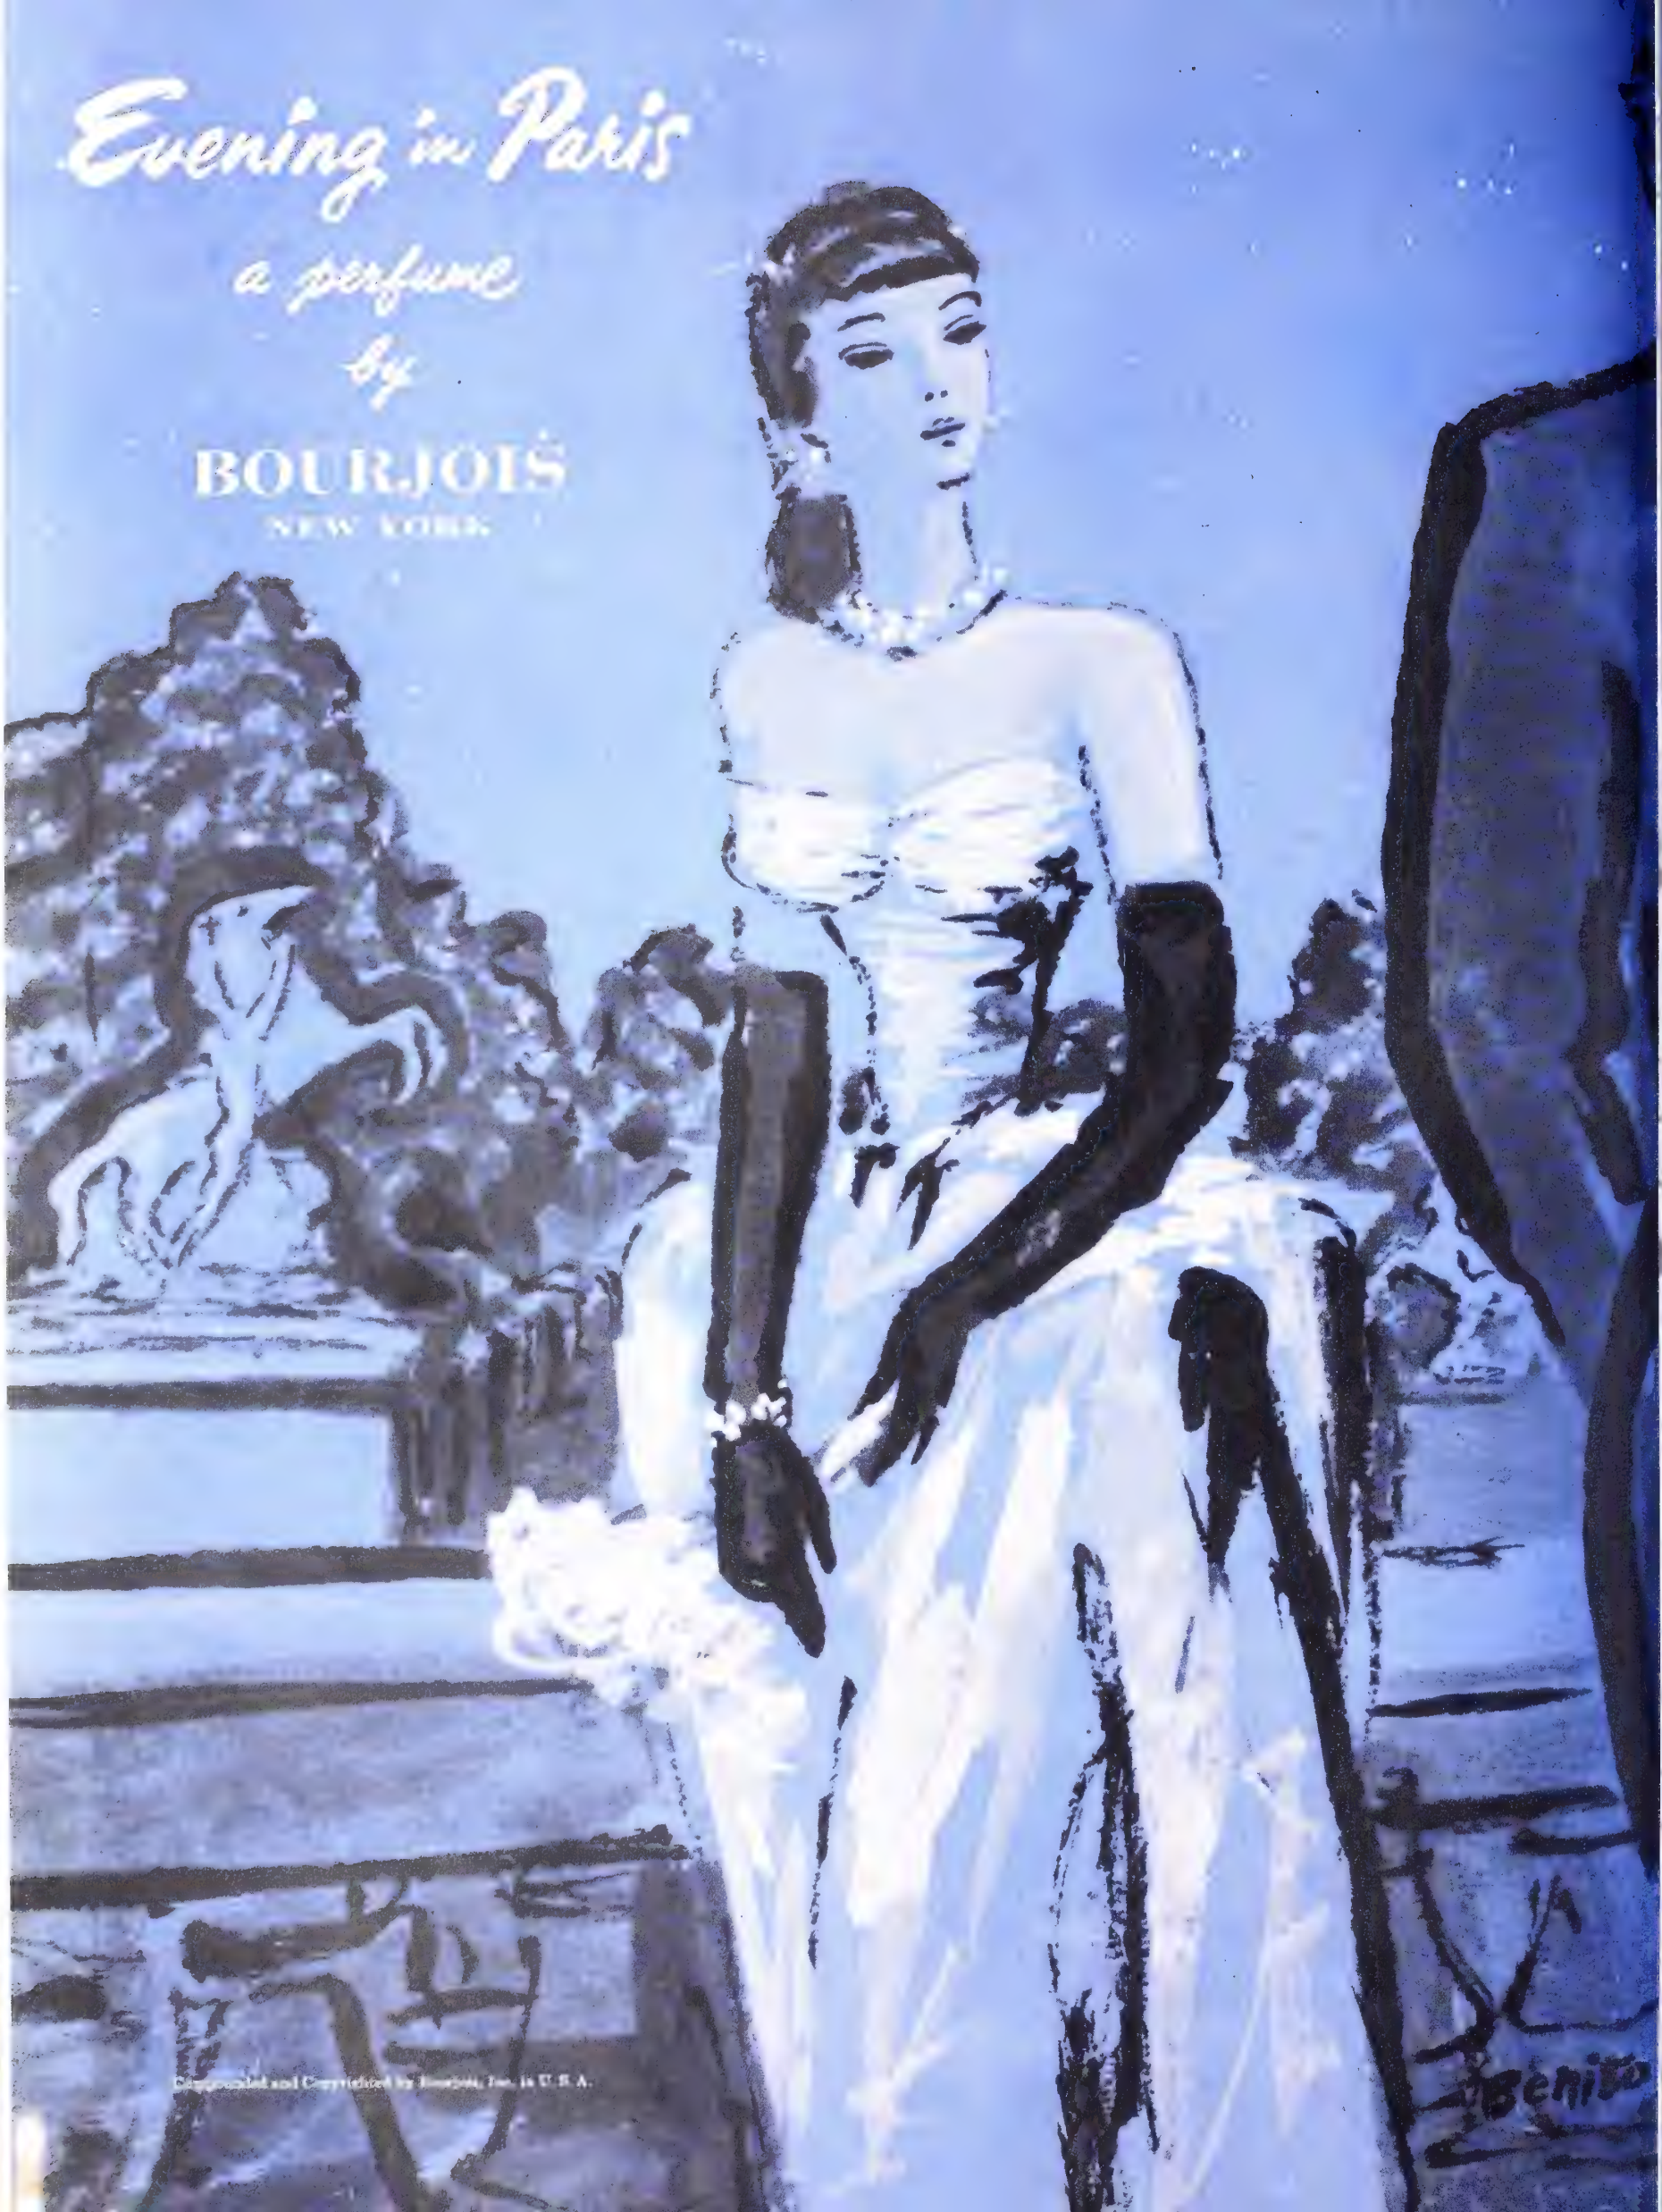
For the loveliest legs in the world . . . by the world's largest manufacturer of full-fashioned stockings

Costume and accessories by Neiman-Marcus



Compounded and Copyrighted by Bourjois, Inc. in U. S. A.

don't let Dry Skin give you aging lines

new Woodbury Special Dry Skin Cream

- discourages tiny dry-skin lines
- gives a fresher, younger look
- softens winter-chapped skin

CAREFUL! Weather-dried skin looks so dry, flaky . . . and may deepen old-looking lines!

Here's a cream with proven powers to combat dryness. Rich in lanolin's skin-softening benefits. Contains four more rich oils, especially smoothing to dry skin. Apply overnight, or for just 15 daytime minutes.

Woodbury Special Dry Skin Cream is a "must" if you're 30-or-over . . . a wise investment for under-30's. See its beautifying benefits yourself. Send for your free sample today.

Free Sample

See beautifying results!

I want to try FREE sample of Woodbury Special Dry Skin Cream. [illegible] ing action on my skin. (Print name and address clearly. Paste coupon on penny postcard.) Mail to Box 45, Dept. 100, [illegible] O.

Name .....

Street .....

City .....

(Sorry, offer good in U. S. A. only.)

(Continued from Page 18)

cafe was mine. He said the only thing that he remembered something happened was we got pinched, and that, whatever it was, he blame it away.

* * *

Damon Runyon is dead. Donald Meek. W. C. Fields—a deep bow to those who liked to laugh. Born William Claude Dukenfield, W. C. Fields shed his name when he reached the stage. He had already shed his family at the tender age of eleven, and for the four years when most boys are just waking up to life, he was living it the hard way in Philadelphia alleys sleeping in doorways, cheating at cards to make a nickel to buy a glass of beer to get the free lunch that the saloons of that day offered, and defending himself against rival kid gangsters. All the rest of his life he never could get over the joy of sleeping in sheets, and he retained an honest fear of all dogs. He could fool people, he always said, but dogs always knew he was a tramp. The fist fights, he claimed, accounted for his bulbous nose.

He had to be quick on the trigger those days, and the artful dodging stood him in good stead when he finally reached the stage. Once when Fields was about to make his entrance in a musical show, the scenery picturing the sky-scrapers of New York fell down. "They don't build houses these days the way they used to," was his ad lib remark, which rocked the audience. After that they had to build the scenery collapsible. Another time he inadvertently dropped his cigar and hat while juggling, and managed to get both his hat back on his head and his cigar into his mouth, which got such a laugh that he incorporated the routine into his act. But what we shall remember longest about W. C. Fields was that faraway look in the eye and the inconsequential chatter, while he was plotting to rifle a pocket or lift someone's watch—the confidence man supreme.

Hard enough to believe, he played in DAVID COPPERFIELD, ALICE IN WONDERLAND and MRS. WIGGS OF THE CABBAGE PATCH.

* * *

The plain daughter of a very pretty mother starts out with a terrific handicap. This psychological mother-daughter tie-up is admirably dealt with in Joan Charles' latest novel, THE WRONG TURN. Paula, the mother, is a selfish, aging beauty. Faith, the daughter, is a determined child. And every step in Faith's education, each emotional awakening, is marked by a battle. She goes to a progressive college, she makes new friends, she falls in love, but in each situation the relationships are ruined by her mother. It is an excellent picture, and might well give pause to many a mother.

Joan Charles is exceptionally deft in all her studies of woman, particularly those just bordering on the neurotic. You may remember THE DARK GLASS, SON AND STRANGER and AND THE HUNTER HOME.

CARNIVAL By Dick Turner

"Under 'past experience' do you mean just work?"

Hardly ever...such a treasure

A slip sleek like a pearl! A shimmer of knitted Celanese† rayon ...so smooth...so body-beautiful, it's a shame to keep it under cover. Such a treasure are Munsingwear's "Supersmoothers"* ...lushed with lace...cut with a precious skill wise in women's ways. At better lingerie departments.

†Reg. U. S. Pat. Off.
*Reg. Trademark

MUNSINGWEAR
Reg. U. S. Pat. Off.

Underwear • Sleeping-and-Lounging Wear • Foundation Garments • Hosiery

For more than fifty Easters...

"Personalized" Easter Eggs in Mashed Potato Nests! Brown potato nests in oven. Tint eggs with edible coloring; use cream cheese, softened with a little milk, for names.

Swift's Premium Ham

BROWN-SUGAR-CURED!

● At Eastertime, as all year round, one particular ham is traditionally the choice. Swift's Premium! For half a century and more those words have signified the finest . . . through all those years its quality has been unfailingly maintained. Yes, you know you can count on perfection when you get Swift's Premium Ham. So . . . make early arrangements with your dealer for Easter.

Swift's Premium HAM
Swift's Premium HAM
A SWIFT QUALITY FOOD
Cooked-Ready to Eat
PREMIUM
Available in 2 styles: Blue label —for easy cooking at home; Red label—ham that's cooked and ready to eat. In buying a slice, look for the word "SWIFT"

The Scribble Game

BY SCOTT CONKLING

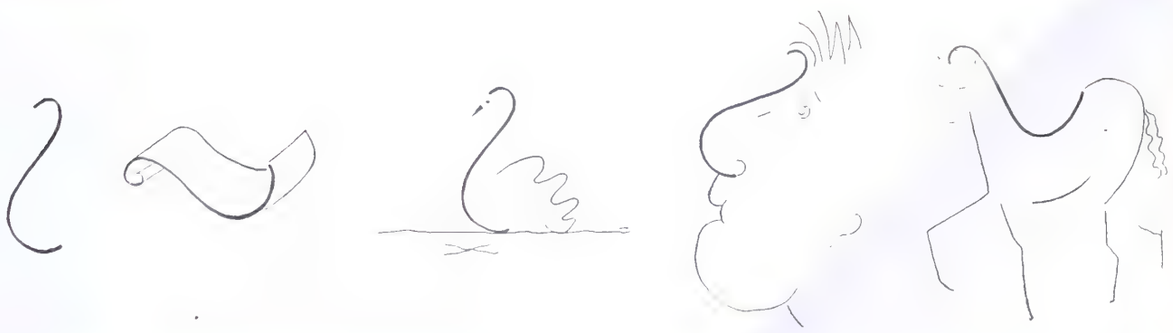
DURING the war I was a radio operator in the Air Transport Command. There were long stretches flying the ocean or the Hump, when the plane was on automatic pilot and there was no trouble in sight, when there was nothing for the crew to do. Noticing a bored pilot must have caused me to remember a game I had learned years before from a café artist in Veracruz. Making a scribble on the back of a radio log, I handed it to the pilot: "Make a picture from it."

The game turned out to be perfect for the air; it didn't require shouting over the noise of the engines or removing oxygen masks. Watching ingenious pilots turn a scribble of snarled circular lines into a kitten playing with a ball of yarn, or a scribble of jagged lines into stalactites and stalagmites, and adding some spectators to make it Carlsbad Caverns, the idea suggested itself that someday an interesting article could be made from scribble solutions.

Anticipating trouble with the censors, who might have believed the scribbles were secret maps, I waited until I was released from the Army and then mailed a scribble to several distinguished people I knew or suspected had a nice sense of humor. The results were amazing; the world is full of potential scribble players. They are all famous people, but they are not famous for their drawing ability. Oddly enough, artists are not always the cleverest at solving scribbles. Perhaps in their solutions psychologists will find some deep significance. Perhaps ponderous philosophers will see in the desire to bring reason to a meaningless line the wish to solve a senseless civilization, for even the atomic bomb turned up in these answers. Or perhaps a game that several of us played between layers of clouds all over the earth will become a rage. In any case, not having invented the game, I accept no responsibility. Below is the scribble and the finished drawings by these noted people, and an example which uses an easy scribble.

EXAMPLE:

Start with any simple scribble. Turn it any way—and add to it. Here a reversed S winds up as a horse.



PROBLEM:

A more complicated scribble will lead to a more complicated drawing. Here are some master scribbles by famous folk.

Will Cuppy

Dr. James F. Chapin

Robert J. Casey

John Kieran

H. Allen Smith

Morris L. Ernst

Lily Pons

TELL ME, TILLIE WHAT'S YOUR WASH GOT THAT MINE HASN'T?
OOOOOO- that OXYDOL SPARKLE!
OXYDOL WASHES ALL YOUR LINENS SPARKLING WHITE!
OXYDOL WASHES YOUR COLORED THINGS SPARKLING BRIGHT!
OXYDOL WASHES WORK AND PLAY CLOTHES SPARKLING CLEAN!

1. OXYDOL ACTUALLY WASHES WHITER and cleaner than lazy soaps ever can. Tests prove it!

2. SURE, WASH COLORS AND RAYONS SPARKLE! Because Oxydol gets 'em so sparkling clean so safely!

IS THAT ALL? US OXYDOL SUDS ARE STILL LATHERY ENOUGH TO WASH A COUPLE MORE LOADS SPARKLING CLEAN!
GOT ANOTHER DOZEN TOWELS YOU WANT SPARKLING WHITE?
... OR SOME MORE WASH COLORS OR RAYON YOU WANT US TO GET SPARKLING BRIGHT?
OXYDOL

3. OXYDOL'S "HUSTLE-BUBBLE" SUDS LIFT OUT DIRT that lazy suds leave behind! It's easy to give your wash "That Oxydol Sparkle"!

2215 5c

2299 5c

2200 5c

1937 5c

2289 5c

2256 5c

2313 25c

2315 25c

REFERENCE LIBRARY

Spring Fever!

Garden growers, gather round. This is the time of the year to start planning that garden you'll be planting. 1663, How to Prepare Your Garden Soil (5c); 1662, Your Garden of Annual Flowers (5c); 1664, Your Garden of Perennials (5c); and 1666, Trees and Shrubs for the Garden (5c), are just what you need. If this is your first garden, 1667, Planning and Building the Garden (10c), will help you with your problems.

And there can be more to a garden than just plants and grass. 1427, Garden Pieces (10c), gives you directions for making a simple arbor, sawbuck table and matching benches, and a paddle pan for the children. And the children will rank you with Santa Claus if you order 1426, Make Your Own Playground (25c). Plans are included for a swing, seesaw, horizontal bars, sand box and slide.

Spring and summer will mean wiener roasts and barbecues. Think how many more you could have with your own back-yard fireplace. All the instructions are included in 1883, How to Make Your Own Fireplace (25c).

Or if your family makes animals its hobby, how about starting a housing project for their benefit? 1424, Build Animal Houses (25c), and 1428, Chicken House (25c), will take care of the rabbits, pheasants, dogs, chickens and goats.

Spring Fashions!

And with all these thoughts of spring and outdoor fun, you'll want something new in accessories to keep in tune with your good spirits. Six different neckwear patterns are included in 2074, White Neckwear Pattern Sheet (10c): a Puritan collar-and-cuff set, a square-neck collar with ruffles and cuffs, jabots to slip over the buttons or to pin on the front of a dress, an organdy neck-bow, shirred collar-and-cuff set, and instructions for making over last year's blouse. 2077, Six-in-One Dickey (10c), gives you six ideas for your suit; while Blouses, 2310 (25c), 2313 (25c) and 2315 (25c), are whiffs of spring itself. They come in size 12, 14, 16, 18 and 20.

2256, Shirred Gilet Front (5c), is just the thing for a basic dress. Or perhaps 1822, Knitted Short Suit Scarf (5c), or 2131, Crocheted Short Ascot Scarf (5c), would add that extra-gay note to your ensemble.

Make a bright pair of gloves in a new spring color. 2215, Shortie Glove Pattern (5c); 2137, Knitted Glove (5c); 3014, Crocheted Gloves (5c); or 2166, Glove Pattern (5c), mid-elbow length in size 6, 6½ and 7, offer variety. And 1937, Basic Pattern for Long Gauntlet Gloves (5c), includes three patterns in three lengths.

Matching bags are a gay twosome with bright gloves. 2187, Round Shoulder-Strap Bag (5c); 2184, Half-Moon Pouch Bag With Handle Strap (5c); and 2183, Shoulder Box Bag (5c), are just made for bright colors. 2200, Mammoth Wool Yarn Bag (5c), is a crocheted favorite.

And you'll want a new sweater for that first balmy day. Now is the time to make it. 2004, Argyle-type Cardigan (5c), and 1758, Classic Cardigan Set (5c), are basics. 2299, Rib-stitch Cardigan (5c), is ideal for outside. 2289, Cardigan (5c), can be worn over 2290, Striped Vest (5c). Hat is included in 2290.

Make this a useful month—be ready for spring.

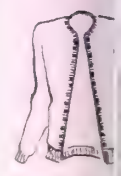
Other Journal Features

Lists giving the titles, numbers and prices of all our booklets and patterns will be sent free upon request.

2008. List of Departmental Booklets.
1660. List of Journal Hat and Bag Patterns.
2076. List of Things to Wear Patterns.
1571. List of Knitting and Crocheting Patterns.
1752. List of Make-It-Yourself Patterns.

We will gladly send any of these booklets if you'll order by name and number. They will be mailed anywhere in the United States and Canada upon receipt of stamps, cash, check or money order. Do not send stamped, addressed envelopes or Savings Stamps. Readers in all foreign countries should send International Reply Coupons, purchased at their post office. Please address all requests to the Reference Library, Ladies' Home Journal, Philadelphia 5, Penna.

2184 5c



1758 5c

2183 5c

2290 5c

2187

2249

2310 5c

3014

Signs of Spring

Homes as fresh and bright as Pepperell Sheets on a line!

PICTURED FOR ADVERTISING BY RUTH HOWARD, WHOSE SHARP EYES SHOW US THE WAY WE LIVE.

Pepperells . . . those lovely, lovely sheets that wear and wear

EN SPRING ARRIVES, we plant, paint, clean . . . n out every cupboard . . . count those lovely perell Sheets. And if now's the time you need sheets, of course you'll want to Pepperells so very sure you get real quality for your money! pperell makes fine percale and muslin sheets you t, at prices you want to pay. Pepperells are quality ets, famous for firmly woven yarns that wear. r. WEAR. Pepperell Percales combine fluffy ile strength with smooth, lustrous texture—

Luxury Muslins have up to four extra threads per inch for extra sturdiness. Yes, if it's value you want, you're sure to ask for Pepperell Sheets!

• • •

Look for the Buy-Guide Box. The [illegible] Pepperell Sheets [illegible] Percale [illegible] Muslin [illegible] Pepperell Sheets [illegible] Buy-Guide [illegible] Percale [illegible] Muslin [illegible] Pepperell Sheets

If You Ask Me

By Eleanor Roosevelt

I have found that there are difficulties when one tries to follow the splendid advice of Polonius: "This above all, to thine own self be true." Do you believe that, for a young wife and mother who wants to live at peace with her neighbors and community, it is sometimes wisest to avoid voicing a belief which, though she may feel strongly about it, would differ so from what is "accepted" locally that it would cause comment or worse? I refer to such things as race prejudice and topics involving basic ideas on labor and capital. Often I've been part of a group when these topics came up and, though I knew the futility of trying to change others' views, couldn't help speaking my own, leading me only into the feeling of being looked down on or set apart. For one who wants to live a quiet home life, do you think that the hypocrisy involved in keeping quiet is justified?

It seems to me that it is not hypocrisy to keep quiet unless you are asked a direct question. If you are asked a direct question, then I think it is better as briefly as possible to state your own point of view, doing it in as conciliatory a way as possible. If you live in a neighborhood where the ideas of your neighbors differ radically from your own, it is probably better for you and your husband if you try not to force your ideas down others' throats. Live your life according to your own lights and they will come to know how you feel, and in the end they will respect you.

What you have said about accepting Europe's displaced persons here is, theoretically, a very wonderful and humane suggestion. But, practically, where will we house them?

At the present moment housing is an extremely difficult question; but if we were to accept a certain number of people to go into, let us say, agricultural work, I think we would find that the agricultural areas to which they were assigned on arrival would not find it too difficult to find housing. It might not be very adequate at first, but many of these people are handy with tools themselves and they might take some pretty bare barracks and make them livable.

A recent article by a former White House housekeeper stated that when Mme. Chiang Kai-shek was a guest at the White House she requested that the sheets on her bed be changed several times a day after each of a number of naps, thus greatly increasing the housekeeper's labor as well as the laundry bills. Is this true? I could not imagine an American-educated woman with the madame's democratic views being so pernickety.

I have no knowledge of whether this is true or not, but I do know that Mme. Chiang did not, as a rule, sleep in linen sheets during the day at least, but used her own crepe de Chine sheets, which were sewed over the blankets and folded in a particular way by her own private nurses. On almost every occasion when she was in the White House she was an invalid, and I would imagine that requests for sheets had come from her nurses and she probably knew nothing about it.

Letters should be addressed to Mrs. Roosevelt, c/o the Ladies' Home Journal. It should be understood that Mrs. Roosevelt's answers reflect only her own opinions, and are not necessarily the opinions of the Editors of the Journal.

I envy you your disposition on being able to keep quiet when annoyed. In my case, I blow off my top. Then I'm sorry; and I don't like to do anything I'm sorry for, either. I have noticed that many people send you some awful digs. You answer them so nice and polite. How can you do it?

REPRINTED COURTESY THE NEW YORKER
© THE F.-R. PUBLISHING CORPORATION

I suppose because they really do not annoy me. When you have lived to my age and have been in the public eye for so long, it is only the people whom you love who can really hurt or annoy you. You may be influenced by what other people say if you think their criticisms are reasonable and valid, but you do not get either hurt or annoyed. You also know that many things are said for political reasons or out of jealousy or ignorance or spite. Time disproves them and usually they carry little weight.

Don't you think some control should be established by the Government over freedom of the press when this freedom is abused and used for political propaganda to the extent it is in this country? What part can the individual citizen play in achieving this control?

I am afraid if we started trying to control the press, we might really do away with an essential freedom. It is true that this freedom is often abused, but I think the basis of democracy is that we educate people sufficiently well so that they can be trusted, in the long run, to judge political propaganda and the type of news that is slanted by certain types of interests. The individual citizen can best control the press by insisting always that the papers in his own home environment write uncolored news stories.

I am seventeen, a senior in high school, and have spent every one of my teen-age years in misery because of self-consciousness. I cannot look a person in the eye even to say "Hello" without getting a funny expression on my face, and to give an oral report in school is almost torture. Whenever anyone as much as glances at me, I feel as though he is criticizing me. This bashfulness not only causes me great unhappiness, but affects my marks. The one and only thing I am looking forward to in life is marrying and having a large family. I really love kids more than any other thing in this world. And I realize my dream will remain a dream if I do not snap out of this present condition. Please, Mrs. Roosevelt, is there any way I can do this?

Surely. If you will just stop thinking about yourself and begin to think about other people, you can make them and yourself happier. You can help them if you can find something to do for them. If you like children, get some fun out of being with them and do not think about whether people are watching you or not. Believe me, when you think people are criticizing you, they probably haven't even given you a thought. It is remarkable how unconscious most people are about other people. If you can just remember that, in starting out to do the kind things that any human being does who lets himself be natural, you will soon make friends.

If you knew that your children had been going through periods of unhappiness and felt that they suffered because of mistakes in your previous upbringing of them, how would you meet the thought? With what philosophy would you accept your share of the blame for suffering you would like to wipe out or alleviate but were unable to? How should a mother meet such thoughts?

I rarely have known children who, at some time in life, did not feel that they were made unhappy because of the type of upbringing that they received. As children grow older, they often realize themselves that their home had nothing to do with the unhappiness that may come to them. Perhaps you brought them unhappiness by the effort to prepare them for life. All parents, I think, feel that they haven't always been wise and that they are in some way responsible if their children suffer later on because of traits of character which might have been obliterated when they were young. The only way I think that parents can meet that is to accept the fact that no human being is all-wise; no human being always lives up to the best that he is capable of, all the time. Failures come to all people. It is sad if they affect those whom we love, but all we can do is to be very humble and, as we gain wisdom, try to help all those who suffer and show our children where we made our mistakes.

Is it true that you are a Catholic?

I was born a Protestant and I am still a Protestant.

I like a certain boy and I don't know what I can do to make him like me a little more than he does. Could you tell me what to do?

Not knowing either you or the boy, I am afraid my advice will have very little value; but I would advise you to be yourself, and if in that way you do not make him like you better, then you are just not very well suited to each other.

BETTER MEALS —AND HOW!

by

Virginia Coates

Here comes spring — and here's a new idea for cooking green vegetables. Add your vegetables to melted margarine. Sprinkle on just a little water and salt. Cover tightly—shake occasionally. That smooth, delicious flavor will turn every vegetable into a success story for the family. Happy thought!

• • •

A-a-h, home-baked rolls! Everybody loves them and here's a recipe for making elegant ones. But first, a helpful little tip: When the rolls are done and piping hot on the table, let the family use lots of Durkee's Margarine on them. Margarine is so economical, you know, and so tasty. It's nutritious, too, with its standardized Vitamin A. Now for the recipe:

Clover Leaf Rolls

2 tbsp. margarine, 1½ tbsp. sugar
1¼ tsp. salt, 1 cup warm milk
1 yeast cake, ¼ cup tepid water
1 egg, 3 cups sifted bread flour

Add margarine, sugar, salt to milk. When mixed, add yeast dissolved in tepid water. Add egg, well beaten. Add flour gradually to form a soft dough. Cover and let rise in warm place until double in bulk. Knead gently on floured board. Shape into small balls, placing 3 in each greased muffin tin. Bake in hot oven, 450° F., 15-20 minutes. Makes 1½ dozen rolls.

• • •

Good food with the right seasoning is something to sing about. And to enjoy! Star performer with baked ham, hot or cold, is Durkee's Dressing.

Serve this grand dressing in salads, too, with your favorite mayonnaise or French dressing. It will lift the heart! And if a meat sandwich is your dish, give it bracing goodness with this tangy dressing.

• • •

Can she bake a cherry pie? Yes, indeed! And you can make it more delicious next time if you use the grated rind of a lemon and 1¼ tsp. cinnamon in the dry ingredients of the pastry. Use fresh spices always. And use Durkee's Cinnamon—that clean, spicy fragrance will tell you at once that it's a recent import. And, naturally, Good Cooks, you'll store your spices covered to help them stay fresh.

• • •

Write for lots of other interesting recipes to Durkee Famous Foods, Elmhurst, Long Island, N. Y.

Get a new idea of margarine flavor!

Try Durkee's—the Margarine with the delicate taste! Mild and fresh as a May morning. Smooth, perfectly blended. Pure, nutritious vegetable oils are churned with fresh, pasteurized skim milk. Each pound is enriched with 15,000 units of Vitamin A. Glorify all your cooking with Durkee's. Thrifty, too!

SO MILD . . . SO SWEET . . .
SO COUNTRY-FRESH IN FLAVOR

Durkee's
VEGETABLE OLEOMARGARINE
(MARGARINE)
DURKEE FAMOUS FOODS
ENRICHED WITH 15,000 UNITS OF VITAMIN A

© The Childs Company

A little lively dressing is a big idea!

Put a halo on simple dishes! Use Durkee's—the rich, golden dressing with the lively, tempting flavor. Made of a combination of rare spices, Durkee's gives tang to meats, zest to salads, verve to fish. This spirited dressing is a good mixer, too. Combine it with any of your favorite salad dressings for added gusto!

DRESS IT UP WITH DURKEE'S DRESSING

Durkee's
FAMOUS DRESSING AND MEAT SAUCE

WHY ARE YOU BLUE?

MISS LONELYHEART

Everyone gets lonesome once in a while; but when a girl gets lonesome all the time and right in the middle of a crowd of friends, that's a problem! And that was Lily Ann. Almost every fellow and girl in school liked her. Most of the girls thought she was fun—friendly, loyal and good for a Friday-night date with the rest of the Sub-Deb Club. Most of the boys liked her too—she was a good dancer, laughed a lot and didn't mind at all if someone called her at seven-thirty for a last-minute scavenger hunt. She had dates one or two nights a week, spent party evenings about once a month and wrote to three boys in service all during her sophomore year—but she just never felt sure that anyone liked her.

She had to be patted on the head and kissed on the cheek twice a day to keep her confidence bolstered. She wasn't content with one date a week with a boy; he had to call her every day. She wasn't happy with a quick smile from a friend; she needed a handshake and ten minutes' conversation. She wasn't satisfied with one red rose to pin in her hair; she wanted a vaseful and an extra bud to press in her diary. She needed constant compliments to keep contented. Her mother had to tell her she was a helpful daughter for making her bed in the morning. Her father had to add an occasional fifty cents to her allowance because her grades were good. Her teacher had to ask her to read her theme aloud for the whole class. The girls had to tell her that they liked the new red dress. And the boys had to tell her she was the best dancer this side of Rita Hayworth—otherwise life was just full of long, gray days for Lily. She never learned to be sure of herself.

To keep those blue moods away, she demanded constant interest and affection from her friends. And most of the time she forgot to give those things in return. So one by one, her friends began to get bored with her moods and to decide that Lily Ann thought too much about herself and wasn't much fun after all. For even the best of friends get tired of trying to hold a girl's hand and pat her on the back at the same time.

THE WINNAH

And one of the most attractive juniors you could meet in any high school was a teen-aged character named Mary Ann. She was a tall, neat blonde who rated good grades, had a date about twice a week and as hobbies collected Perry Como records and made up little schemes to get ahead of all the other girls. But to be more accurate, she wasn't really a winner, because she tried too hard to get ahead. And she never knew just where she stood—not even with herself.

She wanted to be better than everyone else at everything—or else she worked up a big case of the blues. She didn't want just a date for the dance; she wanted to be queen of the prom. She didn't want to be nominated for a class office; she wanted to be president by a majority vote. She didn't want just an A in English; she wanted to be head of the class. Once she even turned down a frat pin, because it had been pinned on some other girl's sweater a couple of seasons before!

And so it happened that Fred, one of the local smooth boys, asked for a date for a big spring dance. Mary Ann schemed and dreamed about that evening for weeks in advance. Naturally, according to her daydreams, she would be the loveliest girl in the room. She would wear a pink tulle formal with small silver sequin stars dotting the skirt. Her hair would be in a glamorous upsweep, rhinestone combs holding the curls. And there would be a pink camellia. A bright pink lipstick. And silver sandals. And, just as in a movie, the band would strike up A Pretty Girl is Like a Melody when she walked into the room. It would be a big evening, all tied up in a bright package just for Mary Ann . . . but when she actually got to the dance she found out that the other girls had lost that "daytime" look, too, and were just as glamorous as she was!

So she pouted through the first half of the evening and went into the powder room for a straight twenty-minute sulk. She didn't enjoy the music, she didn't want to dance and she didn't even want to talk to Fred. She was finding out the hard way that no one can be the "only girl in the world," because every gal has the right to be pretty and attractive too. Some girls learn early that good times must be shared with everyone; maybe Mary Ann found it out before she got out of high school—or maybe she even found it out that evening. But Fred never knew if she did. Because that dance happened to be the last date he and Mary Ann had together!

THE SHEEP COUNTER

Homework was hard on Helen—not because her teachers gave her too much to do and not because she needed a ten-hour workday to get her assignments done. But Helen had to set aside at least half her day for straight, uninterrupted worry. She didn't "work" her way through high school; she just worried her way through.

If Helen had ten pages of history to read that night, she'd start worrying about half past six, harass her mother and father all through dinner, squirm in the big armchair all during her two favorite radio shows, drip chocolate round the kitchen making a hurried batch of fudge, and then rush off at eleven to bed, nervous and exhausted, with the alarm clock set for six-forty-five in the morning. If she knew there was an exam coming up in math class on equations, she would never think of "studying." But she used up valuable time calling up her girl friends to discuss it, complaining to her mother and fretting that she might fail.

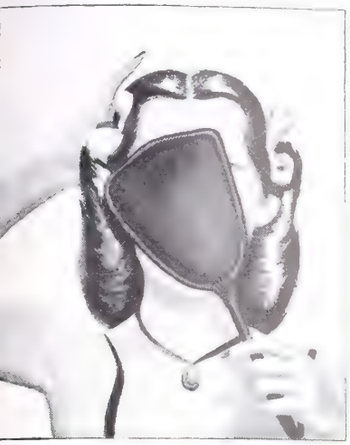
And it wasn't only homework that gave Helen the blues; it was just everything. She worried about whether or not the next day's dental appointment was going to hurt, whether that favorite boy in the Navy would answer her last letter and whether the girls would wait for her in front of the movie theater if she was four minutes late. She worried about what her mother and dad would say if she got a B on her report card.

Nothing was fun for Helen. She never tried to figure out calmly how she could get her homework done on time. She never stopped to make herself think that most of the things she worried about in the past had never even happened at all! She got a "melancholy baby" reputation round school with all the fellows and girls and soon they just didn't try to include her in their fun any more. Because a girl who thinks so much about herself can never find out how much fun high-school life can be!

IT'S A FACT

. . . that you can still do something about your figure! Write for the new Sub-Deb booklet, FACTS ABOUT FIGURES, No. 2277, for helpful suggestions on exercise and diet. Just 5c from the Reference Library, LADIES' HOME JOURNAL, Independence Square, Philadelphia 5, Pennsylvania.

About Rosalie...who started from scratch...



NOW ROSALIE HAD...

MAGNETIC EYES...

A SENSATIONAL SMILE...

AND LOVELY LEGS!

BUT IN SPITE OF ALL THIS, ROSALIE WASN'T DOING SO COSILY, AND HERE'S WHY...

HER HANDS WERE SO DRIED OUT AND ROUGH THAT THEY SCRATCHED LIKE A PUSSY CAT!

RESULT? HER BEAUX FELT DISAPPOINTED AND LET DOWN — AND SO DID SHE!

THEN ONE DAY SALLY LEE TOLD ROSALIE ABOUT AN ENTIRELY NEW AND DIFFERENT HAND LOTION! THE BEFOREHAND LOTION... TRUSHAY!

SO ROSALIE SMOOTHED CREAMY, FRAGRANT TRUSHAY ON HER HANDS BEFORE SHE TACKLED DISHES...BECAUSE TRUSHAY GUARDS HANDS EVEN IN HOT, SOAPY WATER!

AND SHE ALSO PUT TRUSHAY ON HER HANDS BEFORE SHE LAUNDERED HER PRETTY-PRETTIES! AND TRUSHAY'S SPECIAL "OIL-RICHNESS" HELPED PREVENT DRYNESS AND ROUGHNESS.

WELL, ROSALIE IS DOING QUITE COSILY NOW...FOR TRUSHAY IS KEEPING HER HANDS SOFT AND SMOOTH...THEY'RE NOT SCRATCHY ANY MORE.

TRUSHAY

The "Beforehand" Lotion

PRODUCT OF BRISTOL-MYERS

P. S. Trushay's grand for softening hands at any time. Wonderful, too, for rough, dry elbows and heels...as a powder base...before and after exposure to weather. Trushay contains no alcohol, is not sticky. Begin today to use Trushay.

A FAMILY TRADITION

"fresh up" WITH Seven-Up!

PLAN REGULAR REUNIONS

BE A "FRESH UP" FAMILY!

Although 7-Up is relatively young in years, it has become a part of family life in millions of American homes. That's not surprising —because wholesome 7-Up is the happy home drink . . . the friendly family drink. Brisk-flavored, crystal-clear, sparkling...that's 7-Up!

Be a "fresh up" family. Join the millions of Americans who daily "fresh up" with 7-Up as they work and play together. Let 7-Up have a regular spot in your refrigerator. Look for the striking 7-Up signs and order your supply.

YOU LIKE IT···IT LIKES YOU!

IS THIS LOVE?

AN DEAREST:

Your letter just came, and I am sitting wn at once to answer it. Of course I'm shocked, hurt or worried. On the con-ry, I am honored that you have brought ir problem to me, and grateful that you giving me a chance to help.

My only regret is that I didn't give you an portunity to bring it up when I was with at school. I noticed that you were a bit et, and should have asked whether there s something on your mind. The fact is t we modern parents—if you will permit to apply that term to myself—get pretty roughly intimidated. We are so afraid of ng thought possessive and intrusive that haps we go to the opposite extreme.

Well, now let's see what this is all about. u and Tim, your newly acquired beau dear, that word does date me, doesn't Must I learn to say boy friend?), had a ely time at the dance, and afterward you ked. Tim took you in his arms and started sing you, and before you knew it both of were swept away. Feelings were aroused you that bewildered and frightened you. u realized that Tim might have done any-ng he liked with you, and that you would ve had no power to stop him. You wonder you are a bad girl, you ask me why I ven't told you about such things—why it indeed, that we older folks never tell you ng ones the things about sex and your n natures that you want and need to ow. You and the other girls, many of om are in a similar state of confusion, 't even find them in books, you say.

One reason, I suppose, is that it's hard to these things to persons who haven't yet perienced any of the emotions involved. ey can't understand, and are likely to get ong ideas. Second, anyone who tries to al with sex frankly and straightforwardly ns the risk of incurring opprobrium, if not rse. (For instance, did you know that e woman who wrote, for her own son, an position so fine that it was generally dis-buted, was sentenced to the Federal pen-ntiary and would have gone there if a gher court had not reversed the decision?) ird, it's a kind of information you don't nt to force on anyone; it just about has to asked for. So don't be too hard on us der folks.

I agree with you heartily, though, that ople old enough to make love are entitled the fullest and most forthright information this subject, and you can count on me to my very best.

F course you aren't a bad girl! (Whatever at is—I'm not sure that I know. But I'm ry sure you aren't one!) What happened you is what happens sooner or later to y normally sexed person who is mature ough to experience passion. Perhaps this s come to you a little later even than to ost girls, because you were so shy through-t your high-school years, and didn't get notionally involved with any boys.

It's upsetting indeed to learn how one's dy can take charge of things against one's vn intentions and better judgment. But at's how we are made and that's the reason r many of the taboos society has placed out the relations of the sexes. But on the ther hand, not to be normally sexed is one f the tragedies of life. To be normal, but nder control, is the goal.

So let us rejoice that you are normal. And lso that Tim did not press his advantage as e might have done. Score one for Tim's haracter and self-control, and score one also r your own innocence. It still has an ap-eal for decent men, and I believe it always vill have. It's too bad so many girls can't ppreciate what an asset and protection it is ntil they lose it.

As it turned out, I'm not at all sorry this happened. I don't worry about you for a minute, for I know too well what innate good sense you have. And I realize that you were bound to go through a difficult adjustment in breaking out of the tight little case in which you had been keeping your emotions. Waiting so long possibly made it harder. It would take an effort for you to overcome your inhibitions at all, and the very force of it might carry you a little far on the other side. But you'll soon find your balance.

You wonder darkly whether you will dare to have anything to do with men, or at least to kiss them. Mercy, yes! Getting out of that stiff, tight-locked strait jacket of the emotions into which you had clamped yourself was necessary and desirable. I'm grateful to Tim for bringing it about, if he is the one who is entitled to the credit. You know the danger signals now. Next time you'll be more careful.

THERE'S no reason why you should feel ashamed to face Tim or afraid to go out with him again. I think it's quite possible that he was as surprised at the incident as you were; and from what you tell me of him, I doubt that he'll make any trouble about falling in with your ideas for preventing a repetition of it. If he should, of course, it will be wiser not to see him again. But on his past performance I should say he deserves another chance, and there is no reason why you should feel humiliated or unhappy in his company.

On the other hand, I don't think you would be justified in taking this incident as proof that Tim and you are meant for each other. Perhaps you are, but there are many things to be taken into account besides biology. I had a very similar experience when I was about your age, and like you, I wondered whether it was an indication of true love. Fortunately for me, the boy in the case recognized more clearly than I did that it would never work, as it certainly wouldn't have. What a life I would have had if we had been married! My pride was hurt a little, but my heart was undamaged, and I thought I was in love quite a few times after that before the emotion came along that turned out to be the real one.

If this is love, it will develop through happy companionship. If it isn't, you'll soon know it. In that case, put the incident down to experience, and figure that you are none the worse for it.

So much for the past. Now about your conduct in the future. You have reached an age where some yielding to genuinely affectionate impulses is right and proper. (Though don't let anyone ever sell you that moth-eaten line that a girl should yield to every impulse!) As a guiding precept, I'd give you this: Kissing and hugging, yes, if it's a boy who truly likes and admires you, if you indulge in moderation—and if you want to kiss him.

In your case, I think some kissing and hugging would actually be good therapy, if you can control the situation, as I know you can, and stop it the moment it begins to get too passionate. It's part of your development into the warm, attractive, outgoing personality you have it in you to be.

Always remember, however, that this is something the girl must control. The man's whole instinct is to keep on and on. Some, it's true, like Tim, will stop of their own accord. But you can never count on it, and it's your job to stop them if they don't.

And I certainly would never kiss a man I didn't truly like, whatever the local custom may be. This should be dictated by affection, not routine or a deliberate attempt at sex stimulation.

Continued on Page 102

No Sugar Needed

in this NEW, QUICK, EASY recipe for a delicious cake

"It's made in a saucepan, folks, for easier mixing, less dishwashing!"

Brer Rabbit

ALL MIXING DONE IN ONE SAUCEPAN!

Much simpler, much easier and fewer dishes to get out, wash, and put away.

A HANDLE TO GRASP AS YOU MIX!

No wobbling or slipping out of your hands as with a bowl. You don't get your thumb in the batter!

SUGARLESS RAISIN LOAF CAKE

½ cup shortening • 2 cups sifted flour • ¼ tsp. salt
2 tsps. baking powder • ½ tsp. baking soda
1½ tsps. cinnamon • ¾ cup Brer Rabbit Molasses
2 eggs, unbeaten • grated rind of 1 lemon
½ cup milk • 1½ cups raisins

No creaming of shortening. Just melt it in 3-quart or 4-quart saucepan over very low heat. Remove from heat; let cool. Mix and sift dry ingredients.

No beating of eggs. Just add molasses, unbeaten eggs and lemon rind to cooled shortening and mix until well blended. Add sifted dry ingredients alternately with milk, mixing well after each addition. Lastly, stir in raisins. Bake in well-greased loaf pan in moderate oven (350° F.) 45 minutes or until done.

A real treat—anytime! Its delicious flavor comes from Brer Rabbit New Orleans Molasses.

Over 60% Natural Sugar! That sugar in Brer Rabbit Molasses comes straight from the juice of the freshly crushed sugar cane. Real sugar—in its natural form.

Rich in Iron! Brer Rabbit New Orleans Molasses is one of the richest food sources of iron that the body needs for building good red blood.

TWO TYPES: Gold Label, highest quality fancy light molasses—mild and sweet. Green Label, rich-flavored dark molasses.

FREE!* New, Quick, Easy Sugarless Recipes

Send me your leaflet giving new, quick and easy recipes for sugarless desserts—made in a saucepan. Also valuable 52-page cook book of 116 fine molasses recipes; washable cover. BOTH FREE.

Name_____
(Print Name and Address)

Address_____

Paste this coupon on penny postcard and mail to:
BRER RABBIT, c/o Penick & Ford, Ltd., Inc., New Orleans, La., Dept. J3-7

MRS GERROLD WESTON HART
the former Shirley Humphreys of New York
Bridal portrait painted by Sam Hall

HIGHLIGHTS FROM THE HART STORY:

The Harts' romance began when Gerrold came to tea at Shirley's family's apartment in midtown New York. He's an aspiring industrial production man—she's an alumna of the Cameron School for Girls. Her soft peach-bloom complexion is really something to see!

Just One Cake of Camay Brings Your Skin a Lovelier Look

"People are always commenting on my skin", confesses Shirley. "I've been getting the nicest compliments ever since I went on the Camay Mild-Soap Diet. Why, the first cake of Camay I used seemed to bring out a new smoothness . . . a radiant glow. Camay's wonderful!"

After their June wedding at a picturesque church an hour out of town, the Harts honeymooned in Oklahoma. They were in the audience at the Indian tribal dances, where Shirley's "little-girl" loveliness nearly stole the show. P.S. Shirley promises she'll stay on the Camay Mild-Soap Diet!

All eyes admire the girl whose skin is beautiful. Compliments come to you when your complexion's right. And you can possess a softer, smoother, lovelier skin with just one cake of Camay! Renounce all careless cleansing! Start today on the Camay Mild-Soap Diet! It's no trick at all. Twice daily fingertip Camay's lather over your face. Massage. Rinse warm. For oily skin, splash cold. Camay—so mild it cleanses without irritation—can make your skin so much smoother, lovelier!

Fifty Years Ago in the Journal

IN March, 1897, William McKinley, who was to die from an assassin's bullet, became President of the United States, Sousa got $90 for his famous march, The Stars and Stripes Forever, and the first movie of a prize fight was made. Jeweled girdles belted around tea gowns were all the rage and "in more fashionable New York circles," according to Harper's Bazaar, "it is considered almost essential to belong to a sewing class, no matter how unskilled one may be with a needle."

In the March, 1897, JOURNAL, ex-President Harrison writes, "The mail that comes daily to the White House is enormous, as many as 800 letters being sometimes received in a day." One asked the President, "What was the greatest thought that ever passed your mind?"

March breakfast suggestion: "Grapefruit, wheatlet, smelts and stewed potatoes."

For a red nose: "Melt some borax in water and add a teaspoonful of cologne. Dabble this on the nose with a bit of old linen and let it dry. If the nose should get red again, or begin to burn, give it another treatment."

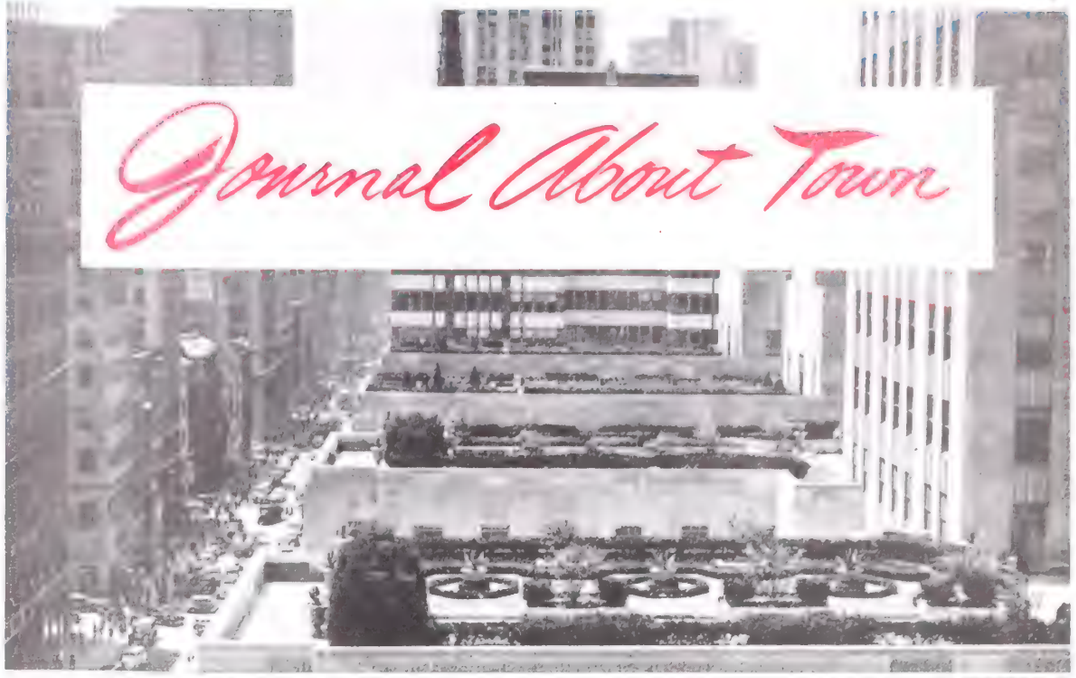
"It is artistic, though not expensive—this $2000 house of ten rooms besides bathroom, toilet room, halls and pantries," architect Walter Keith describes a house of his.

"V. A. M.: A girl of 14 should not wear stays. She may, however, wear a soft-boned bodice."

"The pajama has been adopted as the most sensible night dress," states Walter Germain in his column What Men Are Asking.

"There are thousands of girls who need to be told just what 'fast' means when applied to a man, with no mincing of words," admonishes Mr. Bok in an editorial called The Moth and the Candle. "There is too much license given our girls with men who are looked upon with distrust by their brothers and fathers."

"Hothouse and Southern vegetables may be procured in every city the year round," explains JOURNAL cooking expert Mrs. Rorer, "but such things are considered luxuries and do not take any part in the ordinary diet."



Journal About Town

Roof-top gardens delight the eye of higher-ups at Rockefeller Center.

GOSSIP ABOUT PEOPLE YOU KNOW, EDITORS YOU LIKE AND WHAT GOES ON IN NEW YORK

YOU look down from the Workshop on more gardens than you can throw a stick at: in fact, terraces and gardens together number easily a hundred; and the thing you notice is that nobody is ever in them. That's because there's a very strict rule; and the reason for the rule is just that stick, which might conceivably fall on one of the gardens from a garden fifty stories higher in the air—and Rockefeller Center takes no chances. Actually, they tell us it's very rare that anything more harmful than paper ever falls, and that's only when the city gets excited about something. Doesn't hurt anything—just makes a mess.

Over in Brooklyn there's a new limousine service that specializes in rushing expectant mothers to hospitals. For a $2 fee they'll take the wife, along with the husband, and any relatives that may be around, although the drivers have all had appropriate first-aid instruction. Their slogan is, "We beat the stork."

Lionel Barrymore has been in the movies 38 years.

From dog pound to movie stardom overnight is the success story of Shag, 3-year-old French sheep dog used in It's a Wonderful Life.

If you burn your fingers when you're peeling your soft-boiled eggs, you'll be glad to know that Gertrude Lawrence has invented a little device to prevent that pain. She won't tell us any more about it until it's patented.

EUROPEAN

Gertrude's found a new stage.

At the wartime peak, 19.5 per cent of U.S. women were employed.

Hens used in barnyard scenes during the filming of The Egg and I, laid 36,000 eggs.

The other day, while standing near the jewel counter of a very chic shop on Fifth Avenue, Wilhela Cushman was startled when the hush was broken by a clerk calling across the store to one of the buyers, "How long does it take an oyster to make a pearl?" Seems a customer wanted to know; but the buyer couldn't say, nor could anybody else, which left Mrs. C. so curious she phoned the Museum of Natural History the minute she got back to the office. Well, for an average-size pearl it takes an oyster five years; for a big one, ten. And they aren't the kind of oysters you eat, either.

Diabetes, which ranked twenty-seventh as a cause of death in the U.S. in 1900, now ranks third.

Whenever we think of March we think of Ann Batchelder, partly because it's her birthday month, and partly because it's the month when sugar-maple sap starts running up in her beloved Vermont. We asked her how her supply of sirup was holding out. "As a matter of fact," she said, "I thought I had about a gallon, but my butler just told me it was all gone. So I said to him, 'Joseph, how many waffles do you eat for breakfast every morning?' 'Only fifteen, Miss Batchelder,' he told me."

Robert Frost, great New England poet, once was a cobbler.

A hockey goalie gains 50 pounds when he puts on his skating clothes.

"I never wear a hat," Ann Clem told Dawn Crowell when Dawn was getting ready to photograph Ann for this month's cover. But when Dawn opened the box and showed Ann Sally Victor's brand-new spring bonnet trimmed with taffeta, the model took advantage of a girl's privilege, and changed her mind. The first hat she ever wore, and her first cover too. It turned out later that Ann belongs to a Sub-Deb Club—the JUGS: Just Us Girls.

This may be the atomic age, but a recent survey revealed that at least 3000 work horses still are in harness in Boston.

One of the busiest men we've seen lately is Fred Astaire, who just opened his new studio up on Park Avenue, the first of an international chain that will stretch from Hollywood to Paris. Won't have time to teach anyone but his own teachers, he told us, in case you've been hoping to get his personal instruction. Even before he opened up, he said, more than five thousand people had signed up for lessons, the youngest of them seven, the oldest sixty-one. Figures the most popular new step with his pupils will be the "Astaire," for which he got the idea in a Chicago ballroom, watching how the dancers started walking when the music got too fast. "This will keep them dancing," he said—dashing off.

Fred now teaches teachers.

Out of every dollar a guest pays in a first-class hotel, 6 cents goes to cover the cost of soap, washcloths, razor wipers, stationery, music, flowers, and so on.

Remember Mrs. Gladys Pfeiffer, of Durango, Colorado, whose household was celebrated a few years back in How America Lives? Well, she's now co-author of a large, impressive and most informative book called America's Fabrics; and we're reminded by Henrietta Murdock of what we never told you at the time: that Mrs. P. wore out two wedding rings, doing the family wash.

THE JOURNAL'S COMPLETE-IN-ONE-ISSUE NOVEL

THE HELLER

Editor's Note: The Heller is a novel—about an adolescent girl growing to maturity—which will shock many people. The JOURNAL prints this story because the editors feel that this story illustrates many of those problems of youth lying close to the borders of juvenile delinquency, and hence will assist in their understanding solution.

AT seven o'clock in the evening Anne Karlan locked herself in the bathroom. With facial tissue and polish remover, she rubbed off the chipped paint from her toenails and fingernails, then she repainted her nails Passion Red. With her toothbrush she scrubbed a worm of smokers' toothpaste into a wintergreen-tasting froth; as she was doing this, she leafed through Screen Love magazine. This magazine had conducted a poll to determine the most beautiful starlet in Hollywood, and Anne had discovered a life-sized portrait of the winner, Loma Belle Cummings. Anne plucked her eyebrows, and after applying her mother's foundation cream to her face and then three shades of face powder, including one that belonged to her sister, Mary, Anne redrew her eyebrows in imitation of Loma Belle's. She brushed her eyelashes thick with mascara, painted her lips with fuchsia lipstick. Then Anne, house coat flying, clattered down the steps to her room at the end of the downstairs hallway. She was still twisting her silk hose to get the seams straight when Tony Kruper arrived to take her to the movies.

Anne had met Tony at Shadowland Ballroom. He was short, fat, and partly bald at the crown. This was their first night out together.

They attended a double-feature movie at Westrom's Paramount Theater. Then they drove to the Westport Inn, and Anne studied Tony's bald crown as he fed nickels into the record-playing machine. He must be at least thirty-five. In the booth he smiled and told her about his sign business: "Lots of fellows think it's a tramp business, but when you've got a shop like I've got ——"Anne wished he'd shut up about his sign business. She wished he'd quit smiling as long as there was nothing to smile about. She wondered why she had thought him cute.

Then Tony drove Anne to a hill just outside the city. He parked, and made love to her. But Anne's feelings toward Tony did not change. She wished she were with Fred Halper.

Finally Tony drove her home. "There are a couple things I want to talk to you about, honey," he said as he parked in front of Anne's house.

"Make it snappy," she said.

"I just wanted to say you're the prettiest, the swellest-looking girl I've ever seen."

"I'm going in, Tony. I'm sleepy," Anne complained. "Good night."

"Just a minute!" he called after her. She had reached the sidewalk. "When are we going to see each other again?"

Anne shrugged her shoulders, but her gesture was lost in the darkness. She slammed the house door with relief.

In the corner of the sofa lay Pritchard's American Government, precisely as Anne had flung it ten hours before. Tomorrow—no, in just seven and one half hours, for it was now two-thirty in the morning -she was to be given a crucial test in American Government, a test that might well determine whether she were to pass from eleventh to twelfth grade. And she was totally unprepared. She began to leaf through the pages of her textbook.

Anne Karlan –Fred Halper; these two names were joined by interlocking hearts on numerous pages. Some minor wag had drawn them in red ink, and Anne, far from trying to erase them, had reinforced the outlines with blue ink.

Fred was an enormous dunce in the schoolroom, a man of heavy wit in the drugstore, a charging giant on the football field, and a tender lover in a parked car. In Anne's mind at this moment Fred's merits were thrown in relief by the fresh memory of the almost middle-aged Tony Kruper.

Anne stared at the pages of Pritchard's American Government and saw only Fred. Her love, she was certain, was as profound as it was unique; she would forswear all other men for him, although she considered it better psychology to let him think he had rivals, and dated Fred about three times a week and other fellows four. But no one could take her away from him, and no one could take him away from her.

For three days Fred had not been in school, and circumstances had somehow prevented the two from seeing each other. Anne closed her book and tiptoed to the telephone. She dialed his number. I as then three o'clock in the morning. For a full minute Anne h the receiver to her ear, listening to the recurrent buzzing at the o..er end of the line. But there was no answer. She sadly replaced the receiver on its hook. She went to bed.

At seven-thirty Anne's mother grasped her daughter's arm and shook her with enough vigor to dislodge a clothes post. Anne turned her face to the wall. Vague thoughts of her American Government examination guarded the borderline between sleep and waking.

"Go away," she told her mother.

Mrs. Karlan shook Anne again, more vigorously. "You're going to school!" commanded Mrs. Karlan.

Anne was more awake to her peril. She perceived a small pain shooting through her head above her eyes. "I am not going to school," declared Anne. "I have a splitting headache." (Continued on Page 120)

★ 1947 by William Henning. This is a condensation of the novel soon to be published by Charles Scribner's Sons. ★

The step was a big one. Anne wasn't too sure just where it was to lead, but she did know she was going to take it. ★ BY WILLIAM HENNING

She sat there, savoring the taste of freedom. Leonard was away, and for the first time in her life there was no one to watch her.

ILLUSTRATED BY

The

There was something different about her. You couldn't tell what—yet.

THE telegram was dictated over the phone, at eight-thirty that morning. Linda wrote it down on a pad, then came back and faced Bill in the dining room.

"It's a wire from the Fentons," she said. "They're going through Saybrook on their way to New York, and they want to see us tonight. They already have reservations at the Garland Inn."

"The Fentons!" Bill stopped buttering his toast. And then he laughed. "They certainly timed it well! How long since we've seen them?"

"Six years at least," Linda said slowly. She was just beginning to realize the implications of this thing. And she didn't like that disagreeable, sardonic laugh of Bill's. They had made their decision, and they were going to be civilized about it. "Diana was three when they left for Denver," she said, "and we haven't seen them since."

Bill picked up the toast again.

She said impatiently, "Bill, we have to do something!"

"I could go into the city on business," he suggested. "I was going to anyhow."

"And leave me to make explanations!" Her voice rose accusingly. That was Bill's way—shoving all the responsibility off on her. It was one of the things that made their marriage impossible. One of the many.

Bill frowned. He said quietly, "Don't fly off the handle. I didn't tell the Fentons to pick this particular moment to renew the good old days. Though you may choose to think so."

Linda recognized the tone. It was like all the other times this past year when some problem would result in a mounting tension, and then a sudden flare of anger. But now there was no point to it, none at all. Just last night they'd decided, finally and irrevocably, on a divorce. They'd made the decision at first in anger, and then with devastating calm. Today she'd planned to go in town and see a lawyer.

She said uneasily, "Everyone will have to know, but it would be much simpler to write the Fentons. We see them so seldom."

"And they have such rosy memories of us," Bill added.

But she could see that he was troubled too. The Fentons had been their closest friends during the first early years of their marriage. And to greet them—after such a long separation—with news like this was unthinkable.

Bill said uncertainly, "If they're just going to be here tonight, I could stay over, and we could put on an act for them."

"That might be best," Linda agreed.

"So be it, then," Bill said. He bolted his toast and coffee, and left the house without another word.

Linda went upstairs and changed from her house coat to a gray skirt and yellow sweater. She ran a comb through her short, curly brown hair. And she thought, What shall I give them for dinner? Chicken, maybe, if I can manage it. . . . They'll be terribly shocked later, when they find out.

And then she thought, with a kind of vague astonishment, how strange it was that you could break up a marriage without any of the heroics that you read about in books. No one had had to dash out

THERE'S DYNAMITE IN EVERY MARRIAGE, JUST WAITING TO BE TOUCHED OFF.

Visitors

You could act your way through; it would last only a few hour...

NICE, EVERYDAY PEOPLE...LIKE LINDA AND BILL.

BY ANNE HOMER WARNER

ILLUSTRATED BY ANDREW LOOMIS

into the night, to hurl things into a suitcase, or make one final, dramatic appeal. Perhaps that was because the decision was mutual, and not unexpected. They'd been drawing nearer to it over the past year—after each bitter, implacable quarrel. It was, Linda thought, rather like the waves of the ocean on an incoming tide. Each wave of disagreement had brought them closer to the rocks before it receded. There had been a mounting intensity—a kind of pattern, so that the basis of their incompatibility became more sharply defined each time.

The quarrels themselves had had a pattern, too, and no possible means of adjustment. They had quarreled about money, and about each other's neglect, and about friends and acquaintances on whom they couldn't agree. Lately she had taken up with a new crowd of artistic friends. But Bill didn't like them. He refused to entertain them pleasantly; he said he was too tired to go to their homes. He became angry when he got home from work and found her out, and nothing cooked for dinner.

On the other hand, Bill thought it was quite all right when he stayed on at the club after a game of golf while the dinner she had cooked spoiled on the stove. He was critical as well as inconsistent. He nagged her constantly for her extravagance about the house; yet he'd sunk half their savings in his new business. Never once had he made the slightest effort to compromise, or see her point of view.

And so their quarrels had continued—culminating finally in a deep-seated antagonism that nothing could gloss over. By this time they had mentioned divorce so frequently that they were accustomed to the idea. And they both realized it would be better for Diana, who was nine years old and away at camp. Anything would be better for Diana than these endless cat-and-dog fights between her parents.

Linda went downstairs and out to the kitchen. It was a jolt having the Fentons turn up right now—one of those cruel little inconsistencies that life was constantly throwing in your path. But they had to make the best of it, and a proper setting would help.

In the old days when they were with the Fentons, they were forever turning their celebrations into informal picnics or outings of one sort or another. And she wondered suddenly if they couldn't do that tonight. The tension would be less noticeable if they were sitting around an open fire, instead of staring at each other across a table.

She went out in the garden and inspected the grill. It seemed to be all right, and the garden was very pretty. There were a low stone wall bordered by perennials, three shade trees, and several comfortable chairs and benches which Bill had made one summer. Linda considered. They could broil the chickens here, and she'd make a salad, thin cucumber sandwiches, and some kind of summery dessert. They'd have big cups of hot coffee. Sam Fenton was a perfect fiend about coffee.

Remembering that, she began to remember other things. The time she and Bill had moved, for instance. The Fentons had been right there, shoving beds and bureaus into place, and providing a basket of food to eat, picnic-fashion, in the wonderful, bare, promising new living room.

(Continued on Page 210)

REPRODUCED COURTESY WHITNEY MUSEUM OF AM

Runaway Horse • • Painted by an Anonymous Artist

DURING the first seventy-five years of the nineteenth century, America produced a large number of "folk" painters. Many were simple craftsmen whose main activity was painting houses, coaches or signboards. Their pictures were simple, usually quite abstract, but often with a fine sense of design. It is very rare for such "primitives" to evoke a mood or to suggest a thought; yet in looking at the Runaway Horse, by one of these untrained craftsmen, a curious speculation suggests itself. For in this visionary world which the artist has created, the center of attention is not a human being, but a stallion, moving swiftly with an exultant strength. The manikins in the two boats seem oblivious of the magic of this scene, of this "unsubstantial faery place," and are merely rather ugly bystanders. Did the forgotten artist who painted the picture mean to suggest that human beings were grotesque creatures beside the dark, certain grace of the horse or the ebullient vitality of his companion, the spotted dog? It seems as if he did, as if these serenely moving animals symbolize the beauty and poetry of nature running away from the civilization of the little human figures, too busy in their boats to notice the flight. "Getting and spending, we lay waste our powers; Little we see in Nature that is ours," might express the painter's thought.

Whether or not so romantic, and perhaps prophetic, a concept was in the mind of the artist, he has shown himself an able craftsman, more accomplished than most primitive painters. For almost all primitive pictures lack an enveloping atmosphere, so that every object from foreground to background is rendered with unnatural clarity and distinctness; whereas in the Runaway Horse, mist fills the valley, wrapping the distant town in a golden haze. The poetic mood of the scene and the unity of the atmospheric effect make this canvas unique among paintings of its type. —JOHN WALKER,
Chief Curator, National Gallery of Art.

Let's be Realistic ABOUT DIVORCE

BY MARY FISHER LANGMUIR, PH. D.

Professor of Child Study and Director of the Vassar Summer Institute for Family and Community Living, Vassar College

DIVORCES are at an all-time high in postwar America—along with juvenile delinquency, traffic accidents, death from cancer, and the housing shortage. If the present trend continues, we can expect that one out of every three—or possibly one out of every two—marriages in the United States will end in divorce in 1975.

"If the present trend continues!" If is always conditional. The present increase in divorces need not continue. If we can be realistic and constructive about the total complex of divorce, the "trend" can be stopped and its direction reversed.

Fortunately there are no mysterious or immutable laws directing social change. Societies are man-made. Whenever social change is directed and controlled, the change is achieved by men and women who know where they are, where they want to go, and how to get there. Changes are being made on many fronts today. A few are being planned. Others, like the increase in divorce, are taking place against our will and almost without our knowledge.

It is a hopeful sign that we are both sensitive and confused about social changes that affect the family. Confusion can be a prelude to clarity. Marriage and the family are one and the same thing in most of our minds. If marriage fails, it seems that the family has failed. In the light of divorce figures it is hard not to jump to the conclusion that family life is doomed and that the family itself is disappearing. We are alarmed as well as sensitive and confused. Those of us who are most alarmed see the complete moral collapse of our society on a near horizon, if not just around the next corner.

In our alarm and concern about the welfare of the home and family, we confuse causes and results. Because divorces are increasing, because the United States has the highest divorce rate of any country in the world, we reason that divorce itself is causing our troubles. We feel that if we could only "go back" somehow to predivorce conditions, or pass a law prohibiting divorce, the American home would be saved, or at least safer.

Neither solution offers hope or help because neither has anything to do with the real facts. "Going back" is as unrealistic as "making people good by passing laws" is impossible.

What Do Divorce Figures Tell Us?

Generalizations based on statistics are frequently unsound and misleading. The evidence in the cumulative figures on divorce, however, is representative enough, and consistent enough over a sufficiently long period, to justify the following statements:

Divorces increase after wars.

Divorces increase during times of prosperity, decrease in depression.

Divorces are more frequent in urban than in rural areas.

Divorces are most frequent in the states (or countries) having the highest standard of living.

Divorces are most frequent in states (or countries) where women enjoy the greatest economic, legal and political equality with men.

Divorces occur most frequently during the first five years of marriage.

Divorces are least frequent in those states (or countries) which prohibit divorce or have passed the most strict and limiting divorce laws.

If these facts are true, do they tell us what to do? Since we must "do something about divorce," does it follow from these facts that we must:

Abolish cities? Work for depressions? Lower the standards of living to that point where the figures show that the divorce rate is insignificant? Restore male supremacy? Put women back into positions of economic dependence? Withdraw political and legal rights from women? Pass a national law prohibiting divorce? Pass a national law that strictly limits the grounds for divorce?

Obviously, the solution of our divorce problem cannot lie in these directions. To do so would mean sacrificing most of the social gains we have made and the progress we have fought and struggled for since the founding of our nation. A high standard of living and equality between men and women are essential in a real democracy. Our cities, too, symbolize our progress. With all their faults, cities reveal our creativeness, our resourcefulness, our energy, our industry, our wealth, our vitality and our high degree of technical development.

Even the apparent success of prohibitive or restrictive divorce legislation offers no real help. If we look below the surface of social life and consider the many facts and conditions which contribute to divorce, we shall see that passing a law to stem the tide is as useless as abolishing our cities. It is the future of the family that worries us. Our real concern about divorce reflects our fear for the integrity and sanctity of the home.

In our preoccupation with divorce we forget that many other signs and social conditions tell us that all is not well with the home. To be specific, whenever and wherever the venereal-disease rate is high, illegitimacy increases and formal and informal prostitution flourishes, we can be sure that family life is threatened—that moral and ethical standards are at low ebb. If prohibiting divorce, or passing restrictive legislation, really safeguarded the home, the incidence of venereal disease, illegitimacy and prostitution would be significantly lower in those states or countries where such laws exist. Such is not the case. In fact, there is convincing and sobering evidence to the contrary.

A realistic examination of the facts and figures reveals that "clamping down" on divorce or prohibiting divorce does not solve any real problem. Instead, restrictive laws tend to drive large groups in our population into naive or cynical evasion.

Our divorce laws can be improved, without question. A uniform, realistic and liberal national law might be helpful. The necessary discussion in trying to come to agreement would in itself be of value. But our divorce problem cannot be solved by laws. At best, our laws can only reflect sound and realistic social values and attitudes.

What is Divorce—Really?

Divorce is not an instrument of social disintegration, although in periods like our own it may reveal what looks like disintegration. Actually divorce is a social invention made many times and in many places in human history to safeguard individual rights in marriage. And safeguarding individual rights in marriage has been considered essential in all civilized societies. Individuals must be protected in that human relationship which means most and in which they are most vulnerable. For marriage is the closest, most private, most personal and most demanding of all human relationships. The intention behind divorce is to safeguard the institution of marriage as well as the individual. Divorce is not a perfect invention, granted. It has been misused in all societies and in whatever forms it has taken. In our own time divorce is not only misused, but it is carelessly, thoughtlessly and cynically misused. However, misuse or even dangerous use of any invention requires education and appropriate safeguards—not destruction or denial of the invention itself.

What are Real Reasons Behind Divorce?

Divorce statistics can tell us from year to year the number of divorces granted. They can also tell us the official reasons and still not reveal the true story of failures in marriage. "Adultery," "Desertion," "Cruelty" and "Incompatibility"—the four most common grounds in our country—are actually technical terms or categories under which the human dramas or tragedies back of all divorce are filed for legal purposes. The true reasons rarely appear in the records. They may be hidden from the plaintiffs or defendants themselves.

Lawyers, family doctors, clergymen, psychiatrists, marriage counselors, friends or drinking companions are (Continued on Page 240)

"Call Me The Heart"

AT four o'clock, the phone rang. Martha did not want to answer it. She was down on the floor on her knees, manipulating Lucifer and Francesca, a brown alligator and a red fox, respectively. Lucifer was made out of an old handbag—alligator, naturally—and Francesca out of the collar of an old coat—red fox, of course. Both had been created for the private amusement of Martha Sherman and they were serving their purpose admirably at the moment.

"Nuts!" said Martha, tangling all eight of the strings that made Lucifer and Francesca move. Then, "Imogene!"

But Imogene seemed to be doing the marketing, or something; and besides, there was always the possibility that the studio was calling her back to work. So she got to her feet and adjusted her state of mind from that of a girl who was improvising dialogue for a marionette production of The Alligator and the Fox to that of a girl who was in thirty-second place on the star list of TNT pictures. Then she went over and picked up the phone.

"This is Hank Welcher, TNT publicity," said a clear and forceful baritone.

"Oh, hello," said Martha. "How're things?"

"What things?" the clear and forceful baritone voice asked.

"Oh, things that go bump in the night," Martha told him.

"What?"

Martha made a clucking noise with her tongue against her teeth. Lucifer talked more sense than this person with the "I-can-move-heaven-and-earth" voice.

"Skip it," she said. "I hope Mrs. Welcher is well."

"Excuse me," said the baritone. "I'm calling to tell you, Miss Sherman —— You are Miss Martha Sherman, aren't you?"

"Oh, yes. Yes indeed."

"Well, get dressed up fancy and formal and meet me at the Ambassador at seven."

"What for?" Martha started to say, when she realized that he had hung up. She made a tentative gesture to call him back, then shrugged and hung up too.

She strolled languidly toward the kitchen.

"Imogene," she said, poking her head through the door and taking in the homey view of Imogene and the stacked-up packages from the marketing, "I won't be home for dinner. Will that upset you?"

"Yes, ma'am. . . . No, ma'am," said Imogene worshipfully.

IT'S FUN TO LIVE IN A GOLDFISH BOWL—UNTIL YOU WANT TO PU

DOWN THE SHADES

★ BY ANNEMARIE EWING

ILLUSTRATED BY

Imogene was very pretty and blond and cuh-razy about movies. Therefore, she was also cuh-razy about her mistress, who was in them, with certain reservations about that one's sanity.

Martha went back to the sun porch and disentangled Lucifer and Francesca before going upstairs to face the problem of dressing fancy and formal for publicity pictures.

You would have liked to see her, standing and stretching in her enclosed shower of pink glass, for she was very beautiful indeed. Even when she came out, wrapped in yards of bright red Turkish towel, and shook her red-brown hair free of its rubber cap, she was beautiful. Her face was delicately elliptical and her eyes were full and round and blue-black.

She sat down at her dressing table to do very professional things to her face. Suddenly she sat erect, huge powder puff at her throat.

"I am going to marry the King of France," she said in a ringing, triumphant voice. "But what" — here a suspicion of fear crept in — "is that trumpet sounding in the court below?"

There was nothing at all in the court below but a banana tree and Imogene hanging out towels. But Martha Sherman had become, on the spur of the moment, Marguerite of Savoy.

"I will marry the King of France in spite of Cardinal Mazarin"—her tone boded ill for Cardinal Mazarin—"or his clever niece who speaks Italian. And I will marry him even in spite of Maria Theresa, heiress to the throne of Spain!"

She paused thoughtfully.

Then a page comes in to tell Marguerite that the trumpet was to announce that the Queen of Spain had given birth to a Spanish heir. This makes a marriage between the King of France and Maria Theresa possible and puts an awful crimp in Marguerite's plans. What would she say? "Zounds"? No, she'd cry, being a beautiful weak sister.

Martha accordingly began to cry, but this interfered with the professional things she was doing to her face, so she stopped being Marguerite of Savoy and went on with her dressing.

She had been accustomed to play-act like this all through her childhood, right up to the day of her mother's death. Often her father was their only audience. But his lone presence, in their enthusiastic eyes, constituted an SRO house and in no way dimmed the exuberance of their impromptu performances.

The money her father had left her disappeared before Martha knew just what happened to it. (Continued on Page 110)

OUTSIDE THE GATES

IT was at the top of Mulberry Hill, where generations of kids had been accustomed to gather for sliding, that they first saw him. He was with his mother and he had a new sled. Brand-new—the kind that could be steered, beautifully varnished, and painted on its top with an American eagle. His sled's runners were red, and their bottoms not shiny like those on most of the other kids', for theirs were old and home-made affairs, and looked for the most part like ugly turtles.

He stood beside his shining sled smiling and holding his mother's hand. He wore a blue Mackinaw with a small belt, and a red stocking cap, and leggings which buttoned up the side and had straps under the arches of his shoes. His brown eyes were dancing with pleasure, and when any of the kids looked toward him his smile broadened, though each time he drew closer to his mother's side. She was laughing, seemingly as glad as the kids that the snow had finally come, and it was sledding time at last.

None of the kids took much notice of him except to recall he must be the new kid that had just moved into the small house back of Stevenson's on Linden Street, and as yet hadn't come to school. When they did steal quick inventories of him, it was with the caution small animals have in sniffing a new creature, though they envied him his new sled, and would have been glad to sit on it, had he not been so shy and evidently afraid to speak. From the first they sensed something different about him; and responding to the instinct of the herd, they experienced a streak of antagonism toward him, and if his mother had not been there, they might have shown a bit of nastiness. Maybe pushed him into the snowbank, or taken a try at his new sled, leaving him to stand alone at the top of the hill.

They were all sliding belly-bottom fashion. Most of the boys, even the smallest ones, ran a few lengths holding aloft their sleds, and then where the slope of the hill began, sled and boy fell to the ground united, and sped down across Third Street, then Second Street, past the Central House, across Main Street, coming to a stop alongside the deserted and stripped old buggy outside the battered door of Stranberg's blacksmith shop, and perilously close to the Northern Pacific tracks.

But the new kid's mother put him sitting upright on his fine sled, tucked in one flapping strap of his leggings, seated herself behind him, took into her own hands the rope which guided the sled, and thus the two of them went skimming down the hill. Coming back up, the new kid's mother laughed and laughed as though she were a kid herself and the snow was something she had been waiting for all fall, and Christmas was only ten days away. Once she scooped a handful of snow and pelted the new kid, who only tried to hide his face in his muffler and did nothing more about it. The other kids would have given her a dose of her own medicine, and if it had been their mother she would surely have felt some chapped paw shoving snow down her neck.

But the new kid did nothing about it, and those who saw this fed on his defection, and their dislike grew stronger. Then near the top of Mulberry Hill, when his mother grabbed the new kid up in her arms and hugged and kissed him, as though there were so much happiness in her she could no longer hold it, a wave of disgust swept the other kids, and this time they displayed visible signs of it. But only to themselves.

They stood in silent groups watching the new kid and his mother. Watched her as she tucked his leggings in again, seated him once more upright on his sled, gave him the rope and shoved him off to go scooting down the hill. Alone this time. Bounding and bouncing on his beautiful sled like something tied and strapped—not flat on his belly, kicking his heels in the air, nor steering his sled by dragging his feet behind. Only a few of the more timid girls rode a sled the way he did. Now they began to look at one another, passing and exchanging their anger as kids do. In silence. Kicking the ground. Nudging one another.

When he was halfway back up the hill, his mother said, "My little boy's name is Yates. We're just new here. His birthday's Christmas. And that's his birthday present. The new sled. Yates will let you slide on it if you ask him."

Then she went down the street, but she stopped at the corner by the Methodist church and waited until Yates had reached the top of Mulberry Hill. She called to him and waved, and was lost from sight as she turned homeward up Linden Street.

THE kids turned their ferocity on the new kid and his sled, alone now and unprotected. Heinie Bernstein, who had been a new kid himself a year or so previous and had had to surmount the added barrier of his race, was rich with intolerance.

"You're a sap and a mamma's boy," he announced belligerently. "For two cents I'd take that sled and never let you have it again. Give me that rope!" And he yanked the cord out of the small boy's hand. Under the impact the sled turned on its back, and the smell of its varnish was fresh and irritating.

The new kid stood quiet. Those near him could smell him. He smelled like new bread. Clean, and as though he had been warmed against the stove. The soapbox in Reiss' drugstore smelled like that too. And so did the drawer where they kept the cloves and those long sticks which they ground when you had a prescription, and you put it on a burn, or a cut, and all night the odor crept around you, warm in bed, and healing.

Still the new kid said nothing. Nor moved. The look of shock on his face passed, and his brown eyes warmed. Once he wet his lips as he continued to search the hostile faces about him. Even the girls were stirred, for had their sleds been so violated, they would have run home bawling, or more likely flown at their tormentor, scratching and biting.

Heinie Bernstein jerked the new sled upright. "Get on that sled," he said pugnaciously, "and belly-bottom like a man."

But first the new kid brushed clean the top of his sled. With his mittened hand. Then obediently he stretched belly-bottom down on his sled. "Like this?" he asked, and his voice, which they heard for the first time, was soft. As soft as Miss Gray's, who taught the eighth grade and who had—well, almost a mustache—and who sang contralto Sundays at St. John's.

"Yes. Like that. We don't like sissies."

"ONE, two, three," yelled Heinie Bernstein. "You're off!" And he gave the sled a rough push with his foot, and sled and rider slid over the crest of the hill and downward.

Heinie ran with his sled in hand in pursuit. Then flopped down on his belly, soon catching up with the new kid, whose sled was moving slower because its runners were new. The other kids followed suit and soon, too, they caught up until they surrounded the new kid like beetles, weaving toward him, darting away, digging their feet into the snow, causing small, biting blizzards to fly into his face, to blind him. Looking back, or looking sideways, wherever they chanced to be, they could see his mounting fear, and it exhilarated them. They saw the whiteness of his face, the terror in his eyes, and they shouted their discovery and their glee.

Finally the new kid could stem his fear no longer. With a small cry, he slipped off, rolled over several times, his sled slewing sideways from the force of his release, bounding over the heaping gutter, shooting straight up over the sidewalk, up the snow-covered lawn and banging to rest against the storm door of Julia Armson's.

The latter lady—old, bundled heavily with the discards from an ancient wardrobe—hearing the commotion, came whooping from the rear of her house where she had been shoveling a path to the henhouse. Began, too, before she was ever in sight, to curse all reproductions of the human race and, once in sight, invoked the mayor, the whole board of education, even the governor of the state, to lay rod on these vandals.

The new kid, Yates, in the meantime was getting to his feet. The rest of the kids were farther down the hill, where, arrested by this turn of events, they sat on their sleds or stood listening quietly to the old lady's harangue in the manner of athletes disgraced before their coach.

Then just as the new kid stood erect, Nelson Poole, who was tall for his age, and fiercely tormented by the fear he had lately witnessed on the new kid's face—Nelson Poole, the runner, (Continued on Page 197)

WHAT CAN YOU DO WHEN THE WHOLE WORLD CARRIES A CHIP ON ITS SHOULDER AND YOU'RE THE GUY WHO HAS TO KNOCK IT OFF? ★ BY GIL NETHAWAY

"You're a sap and a mamma's boy," he announced belligerently. "For two cents I'd take that sled and never let you have it again."

ILLUSTRATED BY HARRY S. ANDERSON

PHOTOS BY J. DI P

Aftermath

BY LOWRIE FLAGG

THE wounded were flown to Mitchel Field from the European, and sometimes from the Pacific, theaters of war. They were evacuated, after a few days, to general hospitals which specialized in their types of cases. I worked in two hospitals on the field as a nurse's aide, a rich and rewarding experience for which I shall always be grateful. This seemingly endless procession, remarkable achievement of the Air Transport Command, continued to arrive in gradually diminishing volume until spring of 1946, when its landing base was changed to another location.

Both hospitals are enormous, sprawling, one-storied buildings, the large wards connected by a labyrinth of corridors. The distances in these halls are great and the traffic is heavy: ambulatory patients in their maroon dressing gowns, the officers in blue ones; boys in wheel chairs; nurses, doctors, Wacs and hospital personnel. These faces and figures are so young that an occasional elderly, high-ranking officer or civilian employee looks almost senile.

It is all different from civilian hospitals with their hushed atmospheres and odors of disinfectants. The loud-speaker blares into every cranny of the building, with its raucous "Your attention, please," followed by an announcement or a message for an individual. Every ward rings with a radio turned on full tilt.

At 6:30 A.M., the first day, I was introduced to the nurse in charge of an evacuation ward, an oblong wing divided into three squarish rooms without doors, accommodating ten or twelve beds each. The iron cots were not in rows, but at right angles and against the walls, which gave an informal, unsymmetrical effect. The men were in all stages of dress and undress and in various stages of ability to walk about. The radio was on loud. Two German prisoners were sweeping the floor, wearing jackets and trousers with the letters PW printed large on the backs. Stretcher-bearers carried out three patients to load them into waiting ambulances for air evacuation.

The first thing I was given to do was to bathe an unshaved, haggard man, addressed as "North Carolina" by his neighbors. While collecting the (Continued on Page 261)

The wounded are challenging us! So proudly they served at Anzio, Bastogne, Iwo Jima. . . . Now it's our turn for service.

THERE IS A WAY OUT

We must end labor warfare, warns one of America's distinguished judges. An angry, critical public is weary of paying the bill for chaos and confusion. Here is a solution to our No. 1 problem by John C. Knox.

NOT long ago, when, for a time, sugar was as hard to obtain as at any time during the war, tens of thousands of tons of it filled the holds of ships that lay in New York harbor. The ships wanted to be rid of it so as to proceed with their voyaging. Refineries were badly in need of it in order to keep their workmen employed and their equipment busy. Grocers everywhere wanted it so as to fill the empty spaces on their shelves. Housewives, unable to obtain it, were forced to turn to other forms of sweetening. And all this occurred because the truckmen of New York and the sailors of our merchant fleet were out on strike. And more recently, the unnecessary strike of the United Mine Workers darkened our cities, closed our schools, reduced the service of our railroads, shut down steel mills, and interfered with the welfare and convenience of every community and almost every individual in the United States.

Strikes, in other words, are no longer "harmlessly" confined merely to industries that are remote from you and me. They have entered the lives of all of us, and their effects often come forcibly into our very homes. Everyone is called upon, these days, to pay in higher costs and inconvenience some portion of the immeasurable bill that arises from strikes. And in my opinion there is no sound reason why such conditions should be permitted to continue.

No system of justice ever developed in the history of the world surpasses in fairness, impartiality and lack of passion the one we have developed under the Constitution and in the courts of the United States. But it is a strange and incongruous fact that the major problems of American labor are not permitted to come under this highly perfected system. The result is that uncertainties, injustices, labor warfare and vast economic loss nowadays frequently bedevil us when confidence, impartiality, industrial peace and the most equitable justice of which we are capable should prevail.

As a people we have more and more come to see the necessity for a change in our labor laws; but because of recent widespread labor excesses, there is more than a little danger that punitive rather than constructively helpful legislation will be written. And if such laws as are adopted are prepared in that spirit, it seems obvious to me that we shall merely have entered upon another phase of harmful struggle. Surely it must be plain by now that labor is most intimately a part of our economy, and that one-sided laws written with only labor in mind, whether they are intended to benefit or to restrain, are likely to result in harm to labor itself, as well as to management, the public and the nation.

For the most part, such labor legislation as has been adopted in this country in the past has been hit-or-miss, piecemeal, experimental and partisan. Furthermore, in what seems to have been a sincere desire to aid labor in the realization of its aims, we have deliberately kept the most important of labor's problems from coming under the control of our courts of law. No other American institution has ever been singled out for this type of special treatment. Collectively, as well as individually, all other Americans are responsible for their actions under the law and before our courts. But not so labor.

And it is my belief that labor's greatest difficulties have arisen because of this. Even the growing criticism on the part of the public, which is the greatest danger that labor faces today, is largely traceable to the fact that labor is not held responsible under the law, as all other American institutions and individuals are.

PRESS ASSOCIATION

JOHN C. KNOX, senior United States district judge of the Southern District of New York, is one of the nation's top jurists. When he was appointed in 1918 by President Wilson, Judge Knox became the youngest Federal jurist of his time. During the twenty-nine years he has served on the bench, he has frequently been called upon to preside over important cases both within and outside his district. These include the trials of Samuel Insull, Joseph W. Harriman, Willie Bioff, and Walter Van Riper, attorney general of New Jersey. Judge Knox is a registered Democrat; during the controversial New Deal era he sided with many Roosevelt measures, but disagreed with what he believed was "concentration of power."

In our attempts, then, to solve the problems that arise in the field of labor relations, it seems to me that Congress would be wise were it either to broaden the authority of our present Federal courts, or to establish a new court, so as to enable the one or the other to evoke, to hear and to decide all matters affecting labor in interstate commerce.

Because labor's friends and leaders have differed so widely in stating labor's claims, there is a widespread idea that the basic problems at issue are immensely complicated. But after having dealt as a Federal judge for twenty-nine years with problems that are frequently very much more complicated than those having to do with the relations between labor and management, I have come to realize that labor problems usually arise for the very simple reason that our present methods of dealing with them rarely bring true justice to all those who are involved.

That, then, should be our goal: justice to labor, to management, to the public and to the nation.

It is not an impossible problem. As a matter of fact, contention in this field, as in others, frequently arises merely because some one of these interested parties has ideas of justice that, to the others, appear anything but just. And in order to resolve that very understandable and very human difficulty, it is merely necessary to find, or to create, a just means of balancing these conflicting interests.

It has been with this in mind that arbitration, mediation and conciliation have so frequently been proposed in the past. Each, now and again, has served a useful purpose, and no doubt will again. Obviously, if any problem is really solved by such methods it need be carried no farther. But these methods are not invariably flawless.

Usually, in labor disputes involving arbitration, three arbitrators are chosen. One is selected by labor, one by management, and the third, who is supposed to be utterly impartial, is either appointed by the Government or is chosen by the other two. Almost without exception, consequently, the decision handed down by the three is determined by this third member of the board. And it is widely felt, by management at least, that the "impartiality" of this third member is too frequently weighted with labor favoritism. Thus arbitration is held in less esteem than the uninitiated might imagine. And when, as sometimes happens, stubbornness or selfishness on one side or the other causes this method—and other thoughtful ones—to fail, our present system offers no solution except the essentially uncivilized reversion to force that we call a strike.

Strikes, as everyone knows, are neither appeals to reason nor sound methods of arriving at justice. Instead, they are the very opposite. If management can starve the workers out, management—perhaps for that reason alone—will "win." If the workers are able to force their will upon employers by causing unbearable economic losses, then—perhaps regardless of right or justice—labor will "win." But such victories all too often ultimately defeat even the victors, for they are almost certain to create or amplify the only phase of labor-management relations that is not readily susceptible to solution—the suspicion and prejudice, the distrust and animosity that each side all too often feels for the other, and that frequently lead to other and more bitter quarrels.

IT is here, in fact, that labor disputes cause some of our greatest losses. Usually discussed in purely economic terms—in increases in pay, in higher costs, in loss of output or of time—strikes far too frequently result also in hatreds and other social damage that is not susceptible to measurement. They tend, even here in America where individual freedom and personal equality were once looked upon with almost religious reverence, to create class feeling and class hatred. And in recent years they have often been accompanied by such subservience to labor leaders as bodes no good for the ideals of individual freedom upon which the greatness of America has been built. Friends turn against each other. Property is inexcusably damaged or destroyed. Even lives are sometimes far from safe, for clubs, bricks, fists and, on mad occasion, bullets are sometimes used in order to force the acceptance of "agreements" that are binding on only one of the parties that "agree."

No land in all the world is more opposed to the idea of dictatorship than ours, yet our laws are such that, in effect, we force vast numbers of American citizens to bow to the almost unchecked will even of such labor leaders as have frequently demonstrated their lack of any real sense of civic responsibility. What better illustration of this could there be than the coal strike of last November and December?

Nor does the matter end there. The autocrat who so recently and unwisely ordered half a million workmen from our mines has long had it in his power to turn the furnace fires on or off in millions of our homes almost at his individual will. Thereby he has been able to use the cold as a threat to the housewives, the children and the infirm of countless families, and on more than one occasion he has not only called the members of his own union from their work, but has thereby thrown out of employment hundreds of thousands of other workmen, and stopped production in scores of vital enterprises all about our land.

Many weighty studies have been made of these grave matters, and many cold economic facts have been compiled. But there are (Continued on Page 180)

III

THE next day she walked a little on the promenade. The weather had changed and it was too cold to sit on the beach. She tried not to mind being an object of special interest to the other people in the hotel who crowded round, congratulating her on her recovery. She was glad when Garstin came and took her down to the promenade, where she walked unsteadily, her arm through his.

"They're all watching us," she said, embarrassed.

"What's it matter? You'll never see any of them again."

The next day she went for a short ride on the back of his motorcycle. "Hold on to me," he said, "and if you get tired, say so." They went inland and stopped at a restaurant for a cup of tea. "I like this country," he said. "It suits me, somehow. And I like their cafés. It's all friendlier than with us. I never go into a pub at home. When I finish work I go home."

"Don't you lead a rather lonely life?"

"Maybe I do," he said, and was silent. Presently he said, "About your going back with me. There's something I want to say." He ran his fingers through his thick hair and without looking at her asked, "Are you one of these girls who think every man is after them?"

She gave a little start and cried, "Good heavens, no! I never think anyone—I mean I'm very far from being like that."

"Because," he said, "going back together, we'll be staying at the same inns and all. I just want you to know that as far as I'm concerned you might be my sister. There's nothing wrong with you, mind, but that's how I feel about you."

She said, in a low voice, "I'm very glad."

"Well," he said, "that's all I wanted to say about that."

Later Garstin asked if she thought anyone was looking for her. She said she didn't know. He remarked that it ought to be easy to trace anyone; visitors to France were always signing their names.

"Suppose they come here after you've gone," he said. "Do you want them to know you left the hotel on the back of a motor bike?"

"I don't care if they do know."

"All right. I just wondered."

He told her she could take with her only what she would need on the journey. He had an extra knapsack she could have. As for the rest of her things, it would be safest, he thought, to make several parcels of them and send them by post.

"There are all those books I saw in your room," he said. "Send those by post too."

"I can't send them to your home, can I?"

"Send them to the post office at Burley," he told her. "We'll pick them up later, when we get home."

She knew at once what he meant. "I don't want to take you there," she said.

"We've got time. Where was it?"

She gave him a pleading look which he ignored.

"Show me," he said.

They walked down the beach and at last she stopped and said, "It was here. He was behind that little sand hill where the driftwood is."

He went forward and picked up a piece of the wood; it was dry and gray and shaped like a shinbone.

He stooped over a smooth patch of sand and she saw that he was making letters. He spelled out her name, Mary Hallam, and then his own, Alan Garstin. He worked silently, seriously, forming the letters with care.

"There we are," he said, and straightened himself.

She felt the blood rush to her cheeks. "Why did you do that?"

"Just a fancy I had."

"The tide will wash it out soon," she told him.

He stared at the printing in the sand. "I like seeing them there," he said. "It ought to mean something here, in this place. It's something I'll remember."

"I'll remember too," she said.

He tossed the stick away. "We'll leave them there for the tide to smooth out." He looked at his wrist watch. "Time we were starting, I suppose. The end of my holiday."

They said no more, but walked back to the hotel. As they walked she was thinking, Why? Why did he do that? What did he mean me to understand by it?

He wheeled the motorcycle out of the shed and strapped on their knapsacks. His movements were deliberate and unhurried and there was something boyish in his absorption as he worked. He gave her the impression of knowing very well what he was about, of taking always the long-range rather than the short-range view, and taking it after inner deliberation. He would not be a person, she felt sure, to ask or take advice. He would consult only himself.

"Are you ready?" he asked, when she had settled herself behind him.

"Quite ready."

"Well, here we go."

The route he had chosen lay inland and passed through Pontivy and Dinan. He thought that if they reached Dinan the first night they would be doing well, but the noise of the motorcycle and the shaking were too much for her and forty miles or so before they reached Dinan she confessed that she was too tired to go farther. They found themselves in a small town containing a single inn of no pretensions, least of all to cleanliness. She said she didn't care. She was so tired she could sleep anywhere. He praised her and said she had done very well. Tomorrow she would do even better.

At the inn she was reminded of Maud's comments at the hotel in Paris, for the proprietor offered them a double room, saying there was only one single room vacant. After Alan had refused the double room, however, he said that there was a small single room over the kitchen where his son slept. The son was accommodating and offered to sleep elsewhere.

"Don't let it worry you," said Alan. "They'll always offer us a double room." He looked to see if her door had a key. It had, and he said, "You'd better lock your door."

"I always do lock my door in hotels," she said.

She slept well until dawn, then her eyes flew open and she wondered, in a sudden panic, where she was. After this she lay awake, her brain feverishly busy with her situation, and heard all the sounds of stirring life. But they fell on her ears agreeably. Life, she thought; why had she been so eager to throw it away? She felt now that a hand had been held out to her, held out because she was an unhappy human being; an impersonal but kind hand. Bitterly aware, in the dawn, of her own cowardice, of her own quick despair, she compared herself and her trouble with Alan Garstin and his trouble, and abased herself.

I ought to sleep, she thought, but she did not know, except by guess, what time it was, as she had no watch. He had promised to knock on her door at seven-thirty, and she lay inventing pictures of his home and of her life in it until he came. And, once up, she forgot her worries and was absorbed in the coming day.

Along their swift passage they collected villages one after another, like beads on a string for their memories to play with; some old and beautiful, others a straggle of small houses beside the road. Chiefly her impressions were of the odd and elaborately ornamented churches, of dignified people, of black-gowned women wearing, sometimes, the Breton headdress, and of stretches of wild, strange and lovely country. Frequently he stopped to buy a French newspaper and she translated the main items of news for him. At Dinan, when he stopped at a garage for oil and petrol, she vanished, and when he was ready to start he couldn't find her. She presently returned, her arms full of parcels.

"What have you got there?" he asked. "You told me you had no money left."

"I went into a jeweler's and sold a ring," she confessed. "It's all right, it's one I didn't like. My stepmother gave it to me. I spent some of the money on things for lunch. I thought we could have a picnic instead of going to a café." She held up a half bottle of wine. "I bought this too."

She put it into her knapsack, and the other things were tied on to the machine. She thought she saw an approving look on his face.

"All right," he said, "if it was something you didn't want. Tell me when you see a place where you want to stop and eat."

THEY had their lunch in open, rolling country, left the motorcycle by the road, where they could keep an eye on it, and climbed a turfy hill from which they could see, for many miles, the country over which they would presently travel. She opened the parcels and brought out long, crisp rolls, fresh butter, lettuce, sausage, sardines, some thinly sliced ham and some cheese. He opened the bottle of wine and filled the two unbreakable cups.

"Sure you don't mind about that ring?"

"I was glad to see the last of it," she told him. "Now I'm in funds for a while."

"Was she one of your troubles?"

She nodded.

"When are you going to tell me the whole story?"

"When you have time to listen," she said. She had taken off her beret, and in the soft, warm wind her hair blew about her face, on which the tan deepened day by day.

"Do you mean that?"

"Of course I mean it."

She broke the rolls, and he asked if she wanted a knife. She told him that French bread should be broken, not cut.

"There's a lot you can teach me," he remarked, and then added, "There isn't much you can't do with that hand, is there?"

"I can't do the only thing I want to do."

He suddenly rolled over on his stomach and said, eyes and fingers busy in the grass, "Are you glad or sorry that chap pulled you out?"

She had known he would ask that question; she had been expecting it and, in a way, dreading it, for it would require an unequivocal reply, and such a reply would not be easy to make. She knew it was not an expression of

(Continued on Page 82)

Mary Hallam

"I'm costing you a lot of money," she said unhappily.

"I'll get by."

On the day of departure, Monday, Mary put on her tweed coat over a cotton dress, and her red beret. She was sitting, waiting, in front of the hotel when Garstin came out.

"Ready?" he said. "Come down to the beach. We needn't start for ten minutes or so."

They walked along the sand in silence. The tide was coming in and the small waves were laced with foam. The coarse grass among the dunes was vivid in the morning sun.

"Where was it?" Alan Garstin asked suddenly.

Copyright, 1947, by Susan Ertz. The complete novel is soon to be published by Harper & Brothers.

"TWO NAMES TOGETHER," ALAN SAID, "THEY OUGHT TO MEAN SOMETHING HERE IN THIS PLACE."

By Susan Ertz

ILLUSTRATED BY AL PARKER

BUCKS COUNTY

Pennsylvania

THE Bucks County stone houses rise from the red earth like friendly fortresses in peaceful fields. Their deep-set windows reveal the thickness of their walls of weathered masonry, in browns, reds, yellows, grays and blues; many covered with a plaster coat of white. And because the buildings have indeed grown out of the ground, this very becoming architecture and the cultivated landscape to which it is set go together like words and music, making about six hundred square miles of the most harmonious countryside I know. From it, the glows you can sometimes see at night reflected in the sky show how near at hand New York and Philadelphia are; yet in spite of that nearness, the old homes, that are so strongly constructed and evenly distributed, keep the county miraculously rural. And although most of them are lived in now by people from town, these homesteads still retain their farmlike flavor—taking time and people in their stride. A county of colorful variety, the colors are quieter in the lower part where the Quaker influence is felt, and brighter above where the region of the Pennsylvania Dutch begins. But no matter where, in farmhouse or manor, from one end to the other, the same substantial unassuming style carries unmistakably through. So if among the places which fill the following pages you find a marked family likeness, you can lay it to the locality. ★

BY RICHARD PRATT
Architectural Editor of the Journal

LESTOWN. You can see the county seat from miles around. the fields farms filtering into its back yards, and giving it the flavor of the country- It began as a Revolutionary crossroads, right in the center of the county, for all its growth and spreading since, it still retains that crossroads quality.

BY PRATT

PHOTO B

This mellow old manor house is Bucks County at its best. Built of what the county people call "tailored" stone, carefully cut and laid, its flat-arched windows and doorway, and its flanking wings at lower level, are signs of its pre-Revolutionary period, when stone houses began to replace the log cabins of the locality's earliest settlers. It is about a mile from New Hope and the Delaware, on the road to Doylestown, and in the section now most heavily resettled by many well-known newcomers from Broadway, Park Avenue and Wall Street, northeast some sixty miles—a geographical fact made hard to believe by such houses, so faraway-looking in time and place.

AQUETONG • The walls and woodwork of Ingham Manor reflect the finest features of Bucks County architecture

The great feature of the dining room at Ingham Manor, and a characteristic feature of most Bucks County houses built between 1750 and 1850 (which might be called Bucks County's period), is what they call the "walk-in" fireplace; the wide opening supported by a massive lintel log of oak which is faced by a simply molded mantel. A room such as this would originally have been the kitchen, too, of course, and the winter living room as well; the cooking done above and beside a wood fire on the hearth and in a cavelike oven in the chimney's back wall. The floor of Pennsylvania tiles is typical, and the homespun Swedish table cover is set with country ironstone.

It is altogether possible that the extraordinary pine paneling of the living room at Ingham Manor is the work of the shipwrights who settled along the Delaware in the early days, and who turned their hands to house carpentry when boatbuilding was slow, for it has many of the earmarks of their craftsmanship: its simplicity and robust scale, which match so well the sturdy cabinetwork of the big Pennsylvania Dutch wardrobe. Very appropriate in this somewhat primitive room are the two "country Chippendale" chairs, so called because they follow the famous style in almost rustic fashion. The figures are Pennsylvania "chalk"; the plates, Bucks County slip ware.

PHOTO BY POWERS

PHOTOS BY PRATT

SOLEBURY • Nobody built better in Bucks County than the Quakers, and the meetinghouses of the Friends are models of beautiful masonry and simple, generous proportions, as you can see.

NEW HOPE • One of the oldest and most colorful Bucks County towns along the Delaware, long famous for its painters, New Hope's color now is even heightened by its summer-theater atmosphere.

OUNTY LINE • An unusually fine example of the white-plastered Penn-lvania stone house, this one has four distinct roof levels in line, in all likeli-ood denoting different stages of construction. Note fine rooster weathervane.

PLEASANT VALLEY • Buildings like this old farmhouse in the upper part of the county, recently restored, and like its magnificent masonry barn beyond, were all constructed of the stone from their immediate vicinity.

HLERSTOWN • Up until twenty years ago, hundreds of barges a month, lled by mules, passed under this bridge and through the lock beyond, d hamlets like Uhlerstown were leisurely ports of call, with inn and piers.

UPPER TINICUM • Now showing signs of occupation by settlers from the city, this plain white farmhouse, like many in its neighborhood, was plastered so as to keep the rain from seeping through its porous stone walls.

CKINGHAM • Only a Bucks County stone house could take the Victo-n period in its stride, and wear so well an 1860 cornice above its 1790 ls, keeping its essential character intact. This one was restored recently.

SPRINGFIELD • The farther up the county you go, the more red barns you meet (and green and yellow too), with witch signs decorating their sides to ward off lightning, fire and other ill fortune, increase their picturesqueness

Papered, paneled and painted, the walls of the dining room give background variety to the Empire table, chairs and sideboard, together with an effect of greater size in which the large square sheet of mirror plays its part. While outside, from across the lane, as you can see below, size requires no assistance. The barn has typical Bucks County bigness and beauty, the house it belongs to, a very special stateliness along with its distinguished stonework.

MECHANICSVILLE

• The forthright simplicity of Bucks County interiors provides an ideal background for contemporary color schemes like those shown and for furniture that ranges from Early American to modern.

Here in the high-ceilinged hallway of the Mechanicsville house it takes strap hinges of really prodigious size and strength to carry the weight of the heavy full-height doors, whose whiteness is a wonderful foil to the olive-colored walls.

s you can see by the mantel of the Mechanicsville living room, early Bucks ounty carpenters had access to handbooks of Georgian details, which, as here, ey often simplified. Note how well the room takes to gilt valances and lace.

The guest bedroom is furnished with effective simplicity: Sleigh bed and cloth-draped bedside table, plus two unseen chairs, and chest of drawers. The portrait is a primitive, and by the window are two Pennsylvania Dutch "Fracturs."

IT'S TIME TO VOLUNTEER AGAIN

By Margaret Hickey
Editor, Public Affairs Department

EVERY ONE of us has a public career as a private citizen. During the war we experienced a genuine sense of public responsibility. Most of us sought out a post of duty even when our Government did not assign us to it. We volunteered for service. We put the needs of the community and nation and the world ahead of everyday affairs.

It's time to volunteer again. It's time to become as excited about community problems as we are about our own personal affairs, because, after all, these problems are our very own! If they remain long unsolved, the consequences—want, disease, ignorance, and eventually war—will press hard against the windows of our homes. Ultimately they will destroy the personal lives of men and women everywhere.

The American woman is concerned about her home and her children. Now is the time to extend those concerns to a larger family. The community family from "Yourtown" to Capetown, from next-door neighbors to "next-day" neighbors by jet plane.

A great resurgence of community spirit is needed if we are to hold the gains in understanding and tolerance achieved during the war years. Then we learned to work with people we didn't know as we had not done since the days of the wagon train and the pioneer community. We learned that we can do things together that we never dreamed possible. By pooling our resources and our efforts, we find again the real spirit of neighborhood so necessary to our community and world well-being.

The wartime story of the work of 11,000,000 volunteers is a stirring saga. During one year alone the Red Cross reports that more than 21,000,000 hours were given in Army, Navy and civilian hospitals by Red Cross nurses' aides; 41,000,000 meals and snacks were served the armed services; 680,000,000 surgical dressings were made by white-garbed women. Amazing numbers and amazing achievement in which millions of you shared.

Announcing the Public Affairs Department

To the JOURNAL'S long history of interest in, and support of, the citizenship activity of American women, is now added this department concerned with public affairs. The Public Affairs Department wants to help you and your community move from the outside fringes where people talk about "doing something" to actual achievement.

Bruce Gould and Beatrice Blackmar Gould

But after victory the feeling of emergency slipped away. The habit of giving time and talent to activities outside the home was broken. Many became the "tired women of peace."

As a result, brave postwar plans are still on paper. We still talk of access to good schools as the birthright of the American child, but actually only 30 per cent of the children from lower-income homes go through high school. The million and a half youngsters who left classroom safeguards during the war are not picking up their broken study courses. To help 16,282,000 youths between 14 and 20 "grow into their best selves" will require wise counseling and sound vocational preparation.

Community advisory centers number 3000, but fully 5000 are needed. Veterans and their families total some 52,000,000, or approximately 37 per cent of our population. The second wave of veterans' problems are long-term ones—housing, employment, education. A recent Census Bureau survey shows that 2,000,000 married veterans are living in trailers or rented rooms or doubled up with other families. Close to 2,000,000 are not yet drawing pay checks or school credits: 830,000 are unemployed; another 1,080,600 (October, 1946) lean upon $20 weekly unemployment benefits.

The Public Affairs Department will make it possible to share knowledge and experience gathered from those who are working on these great community problems. It will report to you on outstanding work being done—for one page of actual community experience is worth volumes of plans on paper. It will bring you the story of people working out specific problems. It is far more effective to go to the mayor's office with a petition from your neighborhood for a new playground than it is to talk to him about juvenile delinquency.

The Public Affairs Department will devote itself primarily to the story of well-planned community housekeeping. It will bring you the work of women's clubs, civic education, veterans', farm and labor organizations. It will not neglect informal beginnings. When groups of neighbors and friends start out to work for a new youth center or a child-guidance clinic, these efforts many times lead to the best results. There will be a consultation service. Treatment for common community ills of uncommon importance to every citizen will be outlined in helpful reprints and articles.

The Public Affairs Department will help you to volunteer again—your leadership, your interest and your skill—in the battle ahead for a decent and peaceful world. The task is a continuing one. It's action from the bottom up that counts—through working with people.

On This I Stand

As a citizen of the United States,
I WILL DO MY PART:

To realize that hope for world peace lies in justice and equality for all;

To assure to every individual personal dignity and freedom in all things, at all times;

To promote the solid foundations for peace and security in my own community;

To free the world from the threat of future wars.

AND FOR THESE ENDS:

I will be a good neighbor;

I will perform some personal service for my community;

I will unite my strength with others working for the improvement of community living;

I will insist that my Government's representatives adopt these standards for national and international relations.

MEET MISS HICKEY

MARGARET HICKEY, Editor of the JOURNAL'S new Public Affairs Department, has earned many titles in an active professional career. Who's Who in America lists lawyer, businesswoman, educator. In practice she places first emphasis on the importance of duties to her home and community. In private life Mrs. Joseph T. Strubinger, wife of a St. Louis attorney, her civic activities in St. Louis, where she lives, are many. She is a member of the Y. W. C. A. board of Washington University, the Legislation and Public Affairs Committees of the Chamber of Commerce, the Social Planning Council, the Veterans' Demobilization and Reemployment Committee.

Miss Hickey began, in the twenties, to prove to herself that women could and must do something more than talk about their newly won privilege of full citizenship. The depression years drove home to her the importance of superior training for women—if they were to win the fight against unemployment. As a personnel consultant, her clients number both Government officials and private businessmen.

Miss Hickey was "drafted" for wartime duty in August, 1942—her assignment, Chairman of the Women's Advisory Committee of the War Manpower Commission. Her committee formulated the national policy used in the recruitment of several million women for war work. V-J Day found her in Great Britain studying what that country was doing in the redirection of women into peacetime industries.

Miss Hickey was president of the National Federation of Business and Professional Women's Clubs, 1944–1946. Visiting America's "grass roots" centers, she has talked with their community leaders. Their problems—poor and insufficient housing, the shortage of doctors, dentists, hospitals, nurses and teachers, conditions of employment—she has made her own. To the JOURNAL'S newest department, Margaret Hickey brings a stimulating knowledge of social values plus years of experience in practical good government.

The Volunteer Worker, 1947 Style

BY JOAN YOUNGER

THE four children scampered like squirrels across the park. Joyce, who was just five and knowing about such matters, fell behind the others to pick up a baby leaf. Carl, egging his brother David on, yelled, 'I'm the leader, I'm the leader!" Behind them Mrs. Ruth Bowen moved at a dignified trot. In the distance the snow-capped Rockies were haloed in clouds; here in the park, the lake, set like a diamond in a ring of grass, lay at peace in the Denver-sharp sunlight.

Nothing about the scene spoke of work or high-mindedness. To all intents and purposes, Mrs. Bowen was simply a woman enjoying herself, the children and the dappled city park. To all intents and purposes the children were simply children, on an outing. Yet, not too far away, in the musty-brown building which houses all Denver's welfare organizations, this outing was neatly catalogued under the B's. Mrs. Bowen was listed as: 'volunteer—nursery trained," while the children were listed: "orphans, Denver Orphans' Home." This outing, indeed, was Mrs. Bowen's Friday afternoon stint for her community, at once her chosen chore and her pleasure. No one seeing her could guess at the drive, the training, the discipline that made these outings successful. Just as an expert musician makes piano playing appear to be child's sport, so the soft smile and relaxed rhythm of Mrs. Bowen's slim body belie the functional value of her contribution in terms of community welfare today.

It was that card in the office—the Volunteer Community Services office—in downtown Denver which proved Mrs. Bowen's worth. The fact that she enjoyed her work was symptomatic of the spirit of that office and of her city; but in the highly organized, machine-ruled civilization in which we live, spirit is no longer enough. The type of volunteer who was once described as "a person with a lump in her throat and nothing in her head" is today as out-of-date as the buttonhook.

Volunteer work today, to be effective, requires not only sincere interest in the job to be done, but this too: a businesslike approach to the job and a willingness to accept the necessary training and supervision demanded for it.

In short, Lady Bountiful is out and the volunteer worker—with the accent on worker—is in. Mrs. Bowen may look like Lady Bountiful as she saunters through the park, but Lady Bountiful would never have taken the two years of nursery-school training Mrs. Bowen underwent, would never have come rain or shine every Friday to pick up three, four, five or even six orphans for the park or museum, would never have let the Girl Scouts invade her home two nights a week—and never, never would have been encouraged in her efforts by the hardheaded business men and women who, when all is said and done, bedrock the welfare organizations of today through their support of the Community Chest.

It was the Community Chest and its partner, the Council on Social Planning, which brought community co-ordination and streamlined efficiency to Denver's welfare volunteers five and a half years ago. Those were the days, remember, when in each city the threat of war drew hundreds and thousands of men and women out of their homes into the life of their communities and country asking, "What can I do to help?" There was a danger to the community that these volunteers would be swallowed up in inefficiency and the red-tape machinations of huge, highly geared plans. Before these dangers could become more than small warning shadows, however, the Denver Social Planning Council stepped in and created the Volunteer Community Services office—a three-way liaison office for the volunteers, the agencies and the organizations, an office which would eliminate overlapping of energies, and serve as a casting office to match the volunteer's dreams and abilities to the work crying to be done.

With Mrs. Lon T. Fidler, veteran civic leader and past president of the League of Women Voters, as its first chairman, the office began to function on a business basis. It was decided that a trained social worker should direct its operations, and Marjorie Gallaher was selected. Her training qualified her for membership in the American Association of Social Workers, but her background also included volunteer community work, and, as a crowning touch, she was a native Denverite.

Under Miss Gallaher's careful but quick hand the office soon provided practical answers to the never-ending volunteer cries of, "What can I do?" To the community, it gave assurance that what the volunteer did do would be needed work. To the agency and club—the highly organized Red Cross and the local, earnest Proto Club alike—it gave an understanding of what other agencies and clubs were doing, checked references of volunteers, maintained standards and in general created the businesslike atmosphere without which welfare work becomes well-intentioned nonsense.

It had as guide the veteran St. Louis Central Volunteer Bureau. It had as examples scores of other similar organizations developing throughout the country. It had as support the Local Council of Social Planning, the Community Chest and, back of them, the benign national daddy of these groups, Community Chests and Councils, Inc., with its advisory service to volunteer offices headed by Dorothy de la Pole. The Community Chest—spearheaded by businessmen—first pulled together diverse welfare groups into a common budget and set the seal of business approval upon their activities; it was both economically and socially sound that this same group should now support the need to convert willing eagerness into an asset, instead of a liability.

After the war, it would have been relatively easy for Denver to close its office. There was, as always after the storm, the lull of apathy, the rest after work. The hundreds of phone calls answered by, "Well, I thought I'd just skip it a bit"; "Later on, maybe, but, right now—no." But those who looked clear-eyed at the lost seventeen-year-olds roaming the streets; the crowded, dingy rooms in the juvenile detention home; the climbing cost of living and the descending figures on available nurses, teachers, doctors—they knew that now, more than ever, the volunteer's hand and heart were needed desperately. The Denver office never thought of closing.

Today Denver is one of the ninety cities throughout the nation with a central casting office for volunteers. Because of its activity and the feeling-touch of its director, the office provides a fine basis for study. It is by no means perfect, but like a healthy newborn baby, it's alive and kicking. And, growing solidly, it is now in the process of fulfilling the seven-point blueprint of a good volunteer agency, as laid down by Miss de la Pole.

A good volunteer office, Miss de la Pole says, should be prepared to:

1. RECEIVE REQUESTS FOR VOLUNTEERS FROM AGENCIES THAT NEED HELP. Eighty agencies call upon the Denver volunteers' office. The "request book" runs like a diary, lists each request. They include: "State Society for Crippled Children wants 10,000 envelopes stuffed with Easter seals"; "Girl Scouts need two leaders"; "Detention home wants room decorated"; and so on. Miss Gallaher and her secretary, Mrs. Electa Ziegler, handle all requests, fulfilling them swiftly, or checking back with the agency on delay. (Continued on Page 290)

Businessmen approve of good women volunteers, say, "Where would the community be without them?"

What good are clinics if the ill cannot attend? Volunteer chauffeurs are in demand to transport them.

Denver's young fry are volunteers: these make dolls and toys for sick and poor children.

Two years' nursery training makes Mrs. Bowen child-care expert. Here, four orphans exhibit their approval.

The at-home volunteer makes phone calls, keeps records and checks lists, makes maps and sews.

Volunteer Mrs. Hathaway has weighed babies at well-baby clinic Thursdays for four years.

JOHNNY WAS DRIVING STRAIGHT TOWARD HIS GOAL,

UNTIL PENNY POINTED OUT A PLEASANT DETOUR

Date Girl

BY ALEC RACKOWE

PENELOPE AMES was the prettiest girl at Midwest U., but it wasn't Penny who brought about the revolution in Johnny Mason. She was just one of the kids the G. I. men and women looked upon grimly. Their motto was "Life is Real; Life is Earnest," and they had no commerce with the lads and lassies embarked upon the four-year loaf.

It wasn't Penny. Maybe it was the spring and Penny merely symbolized all that Johnny had missed by going to war.

He'd had almost a year of Midwest. He had another semester before he would be ready for State Law. He could have wangled entrance into State, possibly, but he didn't want a mere admission to the bar. He wanted a grounding in the classics; in ancient and medieval history, so that he would have an understanding of the economic, ethical and political reasons for the laws and statutes that men live by.

He was at Midwest with the Government footing his fees and handing him sixty-five a month for subsistence. He had a job at the Greek's that brought him more than the Government allowed him. He had a room on a side street near the business section where Mrs. Sullivan was too busy with her family and her outside work to bother him, even if she was also too busy to make up his bed very often. He took a bus from Mrs. Sullivan's paint-flaking frame house or the Greek's to catch his classes and took a bus back.

He never hung around the campus. He didn't see the kids much, so they didn't concern him; and as far as feminine companionship went, there was Myra.

Myra Stock had been a WAC sergeant. She wasn't a dowdy bluestocking either. She was a big girl with jet hair and dark-blue eyes and a firm, well-shaped chin. She didn't have to look up to Johnny. She came well past his shoulder, and Johnny was six-one and something the football coach sighed over.

There were quite a few G. I. men and women. In their early twenties, but quietened by what they'd gone through; made sober by the feeling that the years they had lost would never come back and they had to live a little more seriously, a little more earnestly in order to catch up.

It went pretty well that first autumn and winter. Work and classes and then meeting at Si & Flo's grill in the evenings to talk over current problems and local conditions in Fall City. Serious stuff. Johnny never said much. He'd sit, chin in hand, his curly brown hair glinting in the amber light of the booth; his blue eyes attentive while Sid Cohen or Dan Poling held forth and Myra put in with her crisp comments. But when he did speak in his deep voice they listened, never impatiently. They got along well together. They all had the same singleness of purpose.

Therefore, what happened was inexplicable. There wasn't any reason for it. The gang would have looked at him in amazement if he'd tried to explain, and Myra would have laughed her clear laugh and said it was something out of Freud and what was she around for.

Myra was a swell comrade. No feminine nonsense, and yet she was a woman and wanted you to know it. She made that plain to Johnny. You treated sex on a down-to-earth basis and then it didn't mess you up. It was even possible that he and Myra would get married. They were both going to be lawyers, and Johnny never doubted for a moment that Myra was right when she said she was going places in law and politics both.

So he didn't say anything when the mood first hit him, and if it hadn't been for Penny Ames perhaps the mood would have passed. The spring would have gone and the mood as well.

Because spring must have had something to do with it. Fall City was a solid, stolid place. In summer it was hot and dusty; in autumn, wet and dank; and in winter the snow lay blackened where the street men pushed it aside until they had time to cart it away. But in spring it became something else again.

It happened to Johnny even before Nick decided that since it was some Greek saint's day he should close and paint the café. It happened one morning when he woke in his room that looked out on a littered yard and heard the youngest Sullivan kid bawling. There were the same sounds of the city there had always been, and yet it was different. A softness; a change in the dank air that came through the open window.

He got up and dressed and went downstairs to see if Mrs. Sullivan was around. She wasn't, and Johnny went back upstairs to where the baby was still yelling. Little Normy Sullivan, not quite two, stopped his clamor and made sobbing noises at Johnny. The room was dark, the bedclothes gray, and the kid had a musky smell. He stared at Johnny with round eyes and Johnny said, uncomfortable, not liking the kid and not knowing what to do:

"Hey, give over."

The baby raised grimy fists to his eyes.

Johnny heard the sound of the door downstairs. He said, "This will be your mother, son."

He didn't tell Mrs. Sullivan about Normy. She'd know soon enough. He went out of (Continued on Page 188)

ILLUSTRATED BY COBY WHITMORE

PHOTO BY CUSHMAN-O'LEARY

Biggest little suit of the year—the blue-black wool with knife-pleated skirt and tight bolero, by Adele Simpson. Accent it with the clean sweep of a piqué-faced bicorn by Lilly Daché. Also for a black suit: Panama bonnet-cloche, taffeta ribbon.

On Choosing A Hat

Watch for a pretty profile. Look at the side and the back of your hat. Other people will. John Frederics' natural toyo with ruby-pink taffeta ribbon.

Stocking cap of crocheted raffia trailing blue cornflowers, by John Frederics .... to wear with a black dress, or a print with a blue design.

A spring hat, above all, should give you delight. It should make you pretty and provocative. It should please your husband. It should go supremely well with at least one suit or dress, and reasonably well with one or two others. (Don't expect too much of it, or you will rob its spirit and reduce it to pointlessness.) There are times when you are so enchanted with a hat and what it does for you that you buy it for its own sake—then the dress or suit that goes with it. When the costume comes first, the hat completes it, and adorns it like a flower. ★ BY WILHELA CUSHMAN

Fashion Editor of [illegible]

On Choosing A Hat

Try on the newest hat, the gayest hat, and arrange a meeting with its intended suit or dress. (Try not to buy both separately.) And let a good fitter show you how to wear the new hats . . . some way back on the head, some pulled straight down over the brow.

Let the color of the straw or its trimming pick up a color in your print. This blue, white, green and beige printed suit by Omar Kiam is right with a beige Milan sailor with a bright green quill by Madame Reine. (The hat could also be white.)

The lovely big-brimmed natural Milan is a perfect hat for a shantung suit in any color—trimmed with twisted silk to match . . . and right for a summer print as well. The suit and hat by Hattie Carnegie. Bag in straw-colored calf, by Phelps.

Shirtwaist and skirt—doubly adored fashion in a new, very black and very white version, worn with young oth-the-face cuff-hat in white with black-and-white ribbon. The shirtwaist by Arpad is white crepe with black cutout embroidery.

Hat with a heart appeal—intriguing bonnet that ties under the chin, by John Frederics—fashion for the new longer black or navy afternoon dress. The prettiest possible gloves are shantung and match the taffeta ribbon on the hat.

The wonderful new planter's hat in paper-light toyo by John Frederics—the pale beige pure-silk shantung suit by Omar Kiam, matching gloves. Earrings the color of the hat's satin ribbon. And carry a scarf in a second brilliant shade.

My new spring suit has what is known as back interest: belt, pleat and dipping line in the jacket. It's my best going-to-town outfit, but the skirt goes to school—with sweaters.

I do wear a hat now a then. This is my new Panam

PHOTOS BY MICHAEL ELLI

WARDROBE IN A WHIRL···

I'm a Sub-Deb, 1947. Naturally I go to school, as well as to parties and club meetings and a movie now and then. So my life is a constant whirl, though I wouldn't call it dizzy as some people do. For the last year, I've paid a lot of attention to my clothes—which my mother calls the Great Reformation. I like the simple kind. Not the cluttered-up ones. I've arrived at the suit stage, which leads into the doing-things-with-it act. The main thing now is wearing sweaters and shirts with the skirt, so I look at the skirt with that in mind. I like a dress which lasts through spring and summer, and a coat that goes to school or to a party—because my allowance is not exactly endless. I've found out about party dresses too. White is the thing—to stand competition, and to wear several times in a row. With a fresh gardenia—from Bob, I hope! ★ BY JOSETTE DALY LUTZ

My navy-blue bolero suit with a jersey shirt for sch o rushing around; short white cotton gloves spruc i

My gin-rummy print will go places all spring and summer: divinely full skirt, divine small waist.

See what I mean by a white party dress? Ankle-length organdy with eyelet trimming, black velvet ribbon sash. By Ceil Chapman—for me.

My navy-blue knuckle-length coat by Emily Wilkens with the smoking-jacket collar, goes over absolutely everything.

My blue wool has a pleated skirt, and top shaped like a sweater—one piece. Jan Sloane designed the mesh hat.

THERE'S SOMETHING ABOUT HER

. . . the way she wears color

BY WILHELA CUSHMAN
Fashion Editor of the Journal

Mrs. Fernand Fonssagrives, who lives with her husband and six-year-old daughter, Tia, in a white cottage on Long Island not far from NewYork, her time divided between country and city.

PHOTOS BY CUSHMAN-O'LEARY

She can take an almost-classic beige-and-brown-checked suit and make it as personal as her own name with a piece of antique jewelry tied with a bowknot of gold ribbon where most women would wear the usual (and perhaps more expensive) pin or clip. She can put a wide-brimmed knitted sailor or a close-fitting russet felt cloche on the back of her head . . . then . . .

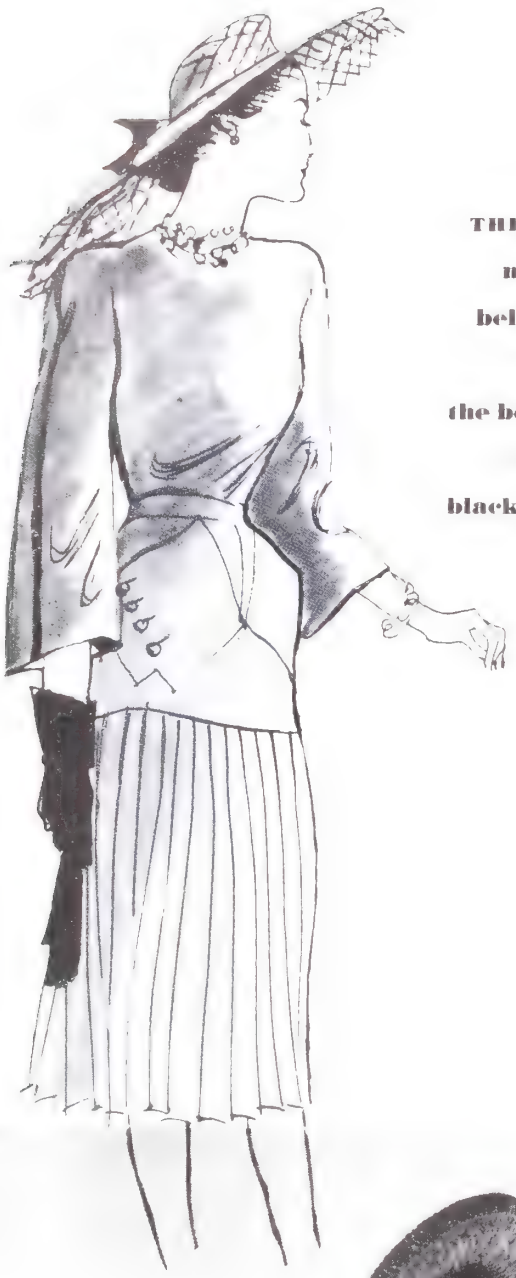
As a climax of color, she chooses a turquoise tweed straight coat and a big russet suède-and-calfskin bag. Who else would dream of a turquoise coat for the one and only, or guess that it could be so right or so exciting, to wear for town or country with a beige suit, brown accessories and her important gold silk dress?

She seeks out the new and unusual, but never makes the mistake of an extreme or exaggerated fashion. She prefers a new neckline to an elaborate drape in the skirt; a simple shantung dress in honey-gold to an overbold print, and accents it with turquoise jewelry.

For dinner and evening she likes long skirts better than dresses, and will keep one she loves for years. She wears a striped beige slipper satin with the cocoa crepe blouse of her suit, or an off-the-shoulder black crepe—always repeating her beloved turquoise jewelry.

At home, she adores dinner pajamas, usually in the beige and gold shades that go so well with her hair. For spring and summer she has this crepe tunic with sharkskin slacks. Summer and winter, she also wears brown velveteen trousers with white or gold blouses.

FOUR WAYS TO LOOK



THE OVERBLOUSE AND PLEATED SKIRT . . . the new narrow knife-pleats, the change to an inch-narrow belt. You can take this beige wool by Pauline Trigere, wear it with a rough red straw to match the belt, or piqué hat and gloves to match the collar, or change for afternoon to a big black hat, black belt and gloves.

SUIT WITH A RULER-STRAIGHT JACKET . . . an straight, slim skirt. A silhouette that is perfect for new close-fitting hats, bags large or smal A skirt that looks wonderful without the jacket, with a pretty blouse. This is Hattie Carnegie's ribbed gray wool with shantung blouse to match the jacket lining. Phelps bag.

THIS SPRING By Nora O'Leary

THE FASHION OF NAVY WITH WHITE . . . suit or dress, your navy blues probably will come with a touch of white this spring. Wear still more white—in hat and gloves. For a gay change, try striped or plaid taffeta scarf and gloves to match a hatband or bow. This dress with the overblouse look is by Rose Barrack, miniature sailor by Sally Victor.

THE PRINT WITH A NEW SILHOUETTE . . . the short bolero, the swathed hipline, the fan-pleated skirt by Adele Simpson. A dress with the best possible look and one you can wear in many ways, with or without its bolero; with Frederics' little white sailor, or a picture hat for afternoon.

PHOTOS BY B.L.N.
DRAWINGS BY DEUPA

The Poem

BY TWANET EVANS

ILLUSTRATED BY ALEX ROSS

SHE always went straight upstairs when she came home from school, stopping only long enough to forage in the kitchen for a few cookies or cinnamon buns if her mother happened to be out. Once inside her room, she would close the door quietly, feeling then secure, content. She never felt lonely or at loss for companionship, although Elaine had once heard her mother remark to her father, "Doesn't it strike you as odd that she rarely wants to bring her friends home to play?"

For ever since she had turned thirteen and had been in the eighth grade, her last year at Hilltop School, she had been lost in a world of poetry, and nothing had quite been the same. She would sprawl across the bed on her stomach with an anthology of verse open before her, captivated by all the magic and melody of the words. No one had ever told her that poetry must be read aloud, but somehow from the beginning she knew. And the lovely words were to her intimate and understandable, even if, at times, they seemed beyond her comprehension and depth. They were always there, infinitely satisfying! Once when she was reading aloud a poignant thought struck her: Was all the world of beauty contained in poetry, was none left over for the here and now?

But today was different! Today she ran pell-mell up the gravel driveway of their green-and-white-shuttered home where she lived on Pinetree Road, a magical lightheartedness tingling inside her, dancing even in her feet. She didn't open the front door with her customary quiet caution, nor step gently into the front hall and listen.

Generally, she liked to come home and find the house to itself; she loved the protective quiet of the late afternoons when her mother was still at bridge or at one of her numerous church bazaars, when only Dodo, their gray cat, padded stealthily about, swishing her gigantic tail. For it always bothered her, in a way she could not satisfactorily explain, to be met with, "Oh, Elaine, you home? What did you do in school today?"

For at first she had tried wholeheartedly to tell her mother, to recapture some of the fascinating wonder of the school. But if she tried to tell about Miss Wilson, her teacher, who was almost perfection, like Silvia in one of Shakespeare's poems; or about Mr. Brooks, the headmaster, who at one moment made you laugh with one of his unexpected sallies, and the next set you back on your heels with serious thinking, all the intimacy and satisfaction went out of the day, leaving her with a flat, horrid feeling.

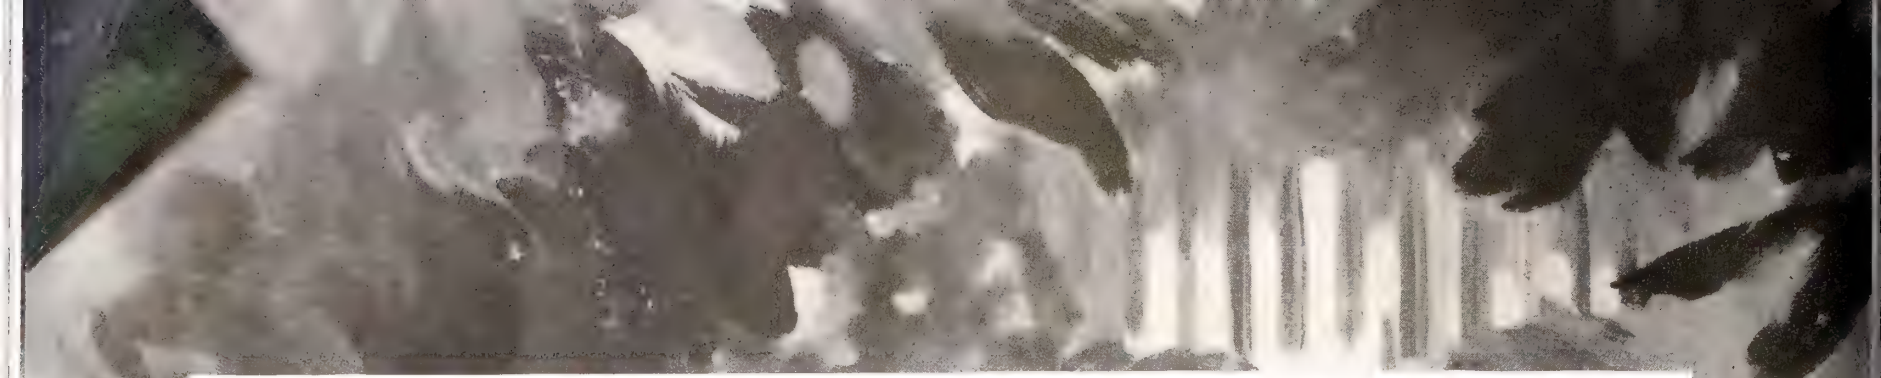
Yet today, when she opened the front door, she knew that her mother was home. Her hat with the lovely turquoise feathers was on the hall table. Unexpectedly she was glad, very glad, for she had something unbearably beautiful bursting inside her that she had to share. She hurried toward the den, not stopping to detour toward the kitchen. Her mother was there sewing. She wasn't so pretty as Miss Wilson, Elaine knew, for Miss Wilson had hair the color of warm sand on a summer's day and her eyes were like wood smoke, shadowy and changeable. Yet today, seeing her mother sitting in the yellow chintz chair with the winter sunlight falling on her smooth black hair and ever-busy hands, Elaine felt that she must understand.

"Hello, mother." She stood in the doorway expectantly, with just a faint trace of uncertainty in her voice. "I've something to read you," she said. Then she waited.

"Oh, Elaine!" Her mother looked at her, sighing unconsciously.

Elaine didn't have to look into the oval mirror above her mother's head to know what the unfinished sentence meant. Automatically she stuffed her protruding shirttail deep into her blue jeans and with one hand tried to smooth her tangled brown hair. Yet this time she wasn't (Continued on Page 274)

In one shining moment, she discovered all that she had been seeking.



Mrs. Christiansen's Harvest

EVERY morning from early spring to late autumn Selma Christiansen got up with the sun, laid her husband's breakfast ready for him and went out while everything was still drenched with dew, to work in the garden. At that hour there was no one to stop and buy—the garden was hers alone. She did not talk to the flowers, but she communicated with them in her own way, savagely attacking the weeds, gently breaking off the dead flowers, clearing away the withered stalks—and, best of all, picking the splendid bunches her regular customers had ordered the day before. Now she could take her time, crossing half an acre to find the single spray of coral-bells she needed to put beside the saffron snapdragons and the pale-blue larkspur and the strange greenish-white zinnias she especially loved. She worked over these bunches with the solitary passion with which a poet chooses words for a poem and she was never satisfied—quite. But by the time it was hot in the garden the cellar would be full of cool pails of water and large newspaper cornucopias of flowers.

Did the summer people who bought them for a dollar a bunch quite realize that they were paying that paltry sum for a poet's eye as well as for the backbreaking labor? Perhaps they didn't, but no one could fail to look twice at the straight, slim, brown figure with white hair and clear blue eyes, stooping among her flowers, intent, silent, her smiles rare as are the smiles of people consumed by a passion. And most of them felt that it was in some way a magic field. It seemed as if there had never in all the world been so many different kinds of flowers in one plot. All summer long the cars stopped at the gate and the people exclaimed. And in the autumn art shows in New York and Philadelphia and Boston there were everywhere portraits of Selma—it was her eye that had chosen the strange, delicate and sometimes violent combinations of color. She looked out invisible from the walls.

Only now in her late fifties Selma was in pain a great part of the time. She would not admit it at first even to herself. But at the end of each summer she promised herself, "This is the last year I'll do it," because by autumn her back felt as if a sword were thrust up it. But then after a winter's rest when the earth began to smell damp again, when the last frost was gone, she took down the packets of seeds and went out to sow. She had to go on. What would her life be, sitting on the porch without her flowers?

Her husband, an engine driver on the Boston and Maine, was away all day. He helped her with the hard digging in the spring, but that was all he could do. He came home tired at night and needed a good hot meal. And he teased her about the flowers.

"They'll be the death of you, Selma," he would say. "Can't you settle this year for a little garden just for us?" Or he would tease her, "The Government wants you to plant vegetables, Selma—there's a food shortage, you know."

Selma only smiled her rare fleeting smile, because he knew well enough she would never kill herself like this for a mere cauliflower or a few heads of lettuce! The idea! Or, if she got really upset, she would answer with a flash of fire, "God made the flowers, Jan, just as well as the vegetables."

But there came a year when in the middle of the summer she felt almost unable to go on, and as she sat on the steps in the early morning trying to find courage to stand, she was haunted by a strange ghost, her Finnish father. She could hear him almost as if a voice came out of the air. He was a man hardened and angered by the struggle to maintain a family of ten on a poor bit of soil, angry at all luxury because he could afford none. She could hear his voice as cold as iron saying, "Never did I think to see a child of mine wasting herself on such foolishness, killing herself for a bunch of flowers." To him such a life would have seemed sinful. But always as she thought of him she managed to get up and to go out into the garden as if it were a gesture of pride and of defiance.

Back there in Finland when she was a little girl everything they did must be useful work. There was no time, no energy for "luxuries." Their only luxury, their only release from labor, was church on Sundays: to Selma the long hours of sitting still in the plain Lutheran church were the best times of the week. She was not a religious child, but she enjoyed having on clean clothes and being allowed to do nothing, her hands folded in her lap for once, for once able to think her own thoughts in peace.

Once when she was a tiny child she had been taken to visit an aunt in Helsingfors, and there she had seen cultivated flowers for the first time in her life. She did not know their names, but she thought of them as the antithesis of everything she hated at home—of the heavy woolen clothes she wore in winter, of the porridge in the morning and evening, of her father's gnarled ruthless hands. Flowers were beautiful and fragile and gay. They became the symbol of all she wanted in life.

As she grew older, the dream of a garden became an obsession. Her aunt one Christmas, perhaps hearing of this childish dream, sent her a package of seeds. She slept with it under her pillow all through the long winter months till the days grew light again and there was sun and the earth began to unfreeze and it was time to carry the manure pile down to the fields.

The farmhouse was set on rocks, as if the builder could not bear to use one foot of arable land, even for a house site. The tiny overcultivated fields where her father and brothers worked all day, and where she often worked,

(Continued on Page 175)

He saw the old look cross her face. As if a cloud had come over the sun and chilled her.

ILLUSTRATED BY WALTER BAUMHOFER

It was years before
Selma told Jan her secret.
He only knew that something had happened, long ago, and it left a mark that would never go away.

By May Sarton

MENU

Anchovy Cheese-Melba Toast
Tomato Juice
Beef Goulash With Noodles
Hot French Bread
Pickled Onions
Asparagus Tips and Celery Hearts Vinaigrette
Spiced-Coffee Jelly
Custard Sauce
Orange Crumbles
Coffee

(Serves 8)

In the Grove

BY ANN BATCHELDER

THIS is the month of all months that gets me down. I can't abide it. Take the wind, for instance. Having been forced, against my better judgment and for reasons best known to myself, to buy a hat, let me tell you one thing. If I couldn't tie the thing down with what amounts to a length of hemp, that hat would have reached Northwestern Ontario by this time. Or the Great Salt Lake.

Then the slush. I step out on what looks like the w. k. terra firma and where am I? Right up to my knees in mud and shell ice and last year's discarded old garden rakings that fell off the wheelbarrow on the way to the dump.

Deceit rampant. Also, it is cold. It's colder than it was way back. You get all ready for a good old thaw and begin to go over the birdhouses hanging by one nail and thrashing against the tree trunks, or you get real sprightly thinking that maybe an early crocus will show its head in a day or two, and presto—it starts to snow, the wind catches up with itself, and it turns cold. I mean cold. I mean way down. Small comfort it is to me to read that up in Vermont it's right on the edge of being grand sugar weather. I know about that. It takes warm days and cold nights to start the sap running. And where I am I don't believe the trees ever heard of sap. They're shut up tighter than a spinster's reticule. And by the time this is over we'll hear that it was

(Continued on Page 175)

READ YOUR CHARACTER BY THE STARS

THE next time you are discussing movies, if someone asks "Who are your favorite stars?" beware of answering! Beware, that is, unless you are willing to take a chance on revealing a good many bits of rather personal information about yourself—your age, for instance, and your income! "Man is known by the company he keeps," says the adage. Well, a person—be it man, woman or child—can also be known by the movie stars he chooses as favorites; given a list of your favorite stars, it is possible to describe you. For your tastes reflect yourself, and your preferences in movie stars reveal many of your personal characteristics.

Suppose you write on a piece of paper the names of your favorite stars, six or eight or even ten. In addition to your age and income, the list tells your sex, whether you live in a city or a small town, how well educated you are, and how often you go to the movies! And these things together give hints about your personality—whether you are humorous or inclined to be serious-minded, sophisticated or naïve, homebody or gadabout.

To be sure, to most people your list wouldn't reveal anything except what it is supposed to—the names of your favorite stars. But to a group of specialists in Princeton, New Jersey, your list describes you pretty accurately. They can't read your character from the stars—but they can read your characteristics from the movie stars you like!

Neither crystal-gazers nor fortunetellers, these perceptive individuals are staff members of Audience Research, Inc., a polling organization specializing in studying people's likes and dislikes in motion pictures, and using techniques originated by Dr. George Gallup, founder and head of the company. To them, "reading people by the stars" is no parlor game, but is simply one of many demonstrations that people's tastes are predictable—a phenomenon without which their business wouldn't exist.

What, exactly, could they tell from your list of stars? Well, suppose these are the names you have written on your paper:

Ingrid Bergman	Rex Harrison
Joseph Cotten	Dorothy McGuire
Bing Crosby	Ray Milland
Joan Fontaine	Rosalind Russell

What does the list tell us about the person who wrote the list? Well, the writer is a woman. She is in her late twenties or early thirties; well educated, and enjoying a good income. A city dweller, perhaps a New Yorker, she's a sophisticated person, and she keeps up with what's going on—to be frank, she takes some pride in knowing about the latest books, the current hits on the radio, and having read the magazine article everybody is talking about. She goes to the movies pretty regularly—about once a week—but she picks and chooses a bit; she isn't a real fan.

If the list of stars closely resembles your own, then the chances are the description pretty nearly fits too.

How can anybody tell all this, just from the names of those eight stars? To understand the answer to that question, you have to know something about how Audience Research operates. Though their business is movies, their source of information is people. To find out why a particular movie was a success or a failure, they don't consult financial statements—they ask people why they went or stayed away. They ask them about their tastes, generally and specifically, in stories, titles, stars—in all the complex of ingredients that make a motion picture.

And, as we said before, tastes reflect people. So, when you tell them who your favorite stars are, you tell them a lot about your self too.

"How, exactly? To get down to cases—how could anyone tell that our list was made by a woman?"

That's easy! Of the eight stars named, four are women. If this were a man's list of favorites, not more than two or at most three feminine names would appear, perhaps only one. For, contrary to general belief, most men don't go to the movies to watch their dream girls on the screen—they go to see their masculine heroes! Images of themselves as they would like to be? Perhaps, perhaps not; but it is a fact that men choose their movies mainly by the male stars, rather than by the feminine names on the marquee.

So when around half the names on a list of favored stars are those of actresses, it's a safe bet that the list was made by a woman.

Make a list

income bracket, sec

Interesting side light: Of some seventy leading Hollywood actresses, fewer than a dozen are more popular among men than among women! Perhaps the names of some of the feminine stars who appeal even more to men than to their own sex will give you a clue to masculine psychology· among them are Betty Grable, Dorothy Lamour, Veronica Lake, Jane Russell, Ann Sheridan and Betty Hutton.

"But what about age?" you are wondering. "Surely that list could belong to anyone between fifteen and fifty—those are all big stars. Bing Crosby, for instance—everybody loves Bing."

You're right about Bing Crosby. While every star, Crosby included, is more popular among some kinds of people ("population groups," to use the formal term) than others, Bing Crosby is almost equally well liked by young and old, rich and poor, city dweller, farmer and the suburbanites whose lives are regulated by the commuting timetable. Crosby's name on a list doesn't tell much of anything about the identity of the person who made the list.

But the other names are more revealing. Almost without exception, they enjoy their greatest popularity among young women between eighteen and thirty.

Why? Glance at the list again; then, in your mind, try to form a composite picture of the screen roles you associate with these stars. How old is your imaginary screen character? Late twenties or early thirties, probably. That's the clue.

People, particularly women, are attracted to stars whose personal traits are closest to their own or to their ambitions—or, more important, who play screen characters with the traits they share and admire.

Smart young housewives like to see stories about smarter young housewives on the screen—people like themselves, but with glamour added. Their kid sisters in high school look for the prototype of the party girl!

So stars who play characters in their late twenties or early thirties are likely to be most popular with movie-goers of the same age, just as those who play the more youthful roles—Judy Garland, June Allyson, Diana Lynn—are generally favorites of the teen-agers.

But again why? Perhaps you believe that people go to the movies to get as far away from themselves as possible. Why, then, do they seek their counterparts on the screen? Remember that glamour has been added! Perhaps the most alluring escape from reality is the chance to imagine yourself, not as a fabulous princess remote from your own experience, but yourself as you would like to be—leading a life you can imagine living, and hope someday to attain!

For people have a trick of imagining themselves in the role, or of associating themselves with the story in some way. And it's easier for a housewife to pretend to be another housewife—even the fashionable, wealthy and suave version often portrayed by the glamorous Greer Garson—than to imagine herself in the shoes—or sarong—of a tropical-island beauty!

This trick of putting yourself in the story, incidentally, is a familiar phenomenon to psychologists, and is the subject of considerable attention under the general term, "projection." (Audience Research calls it "self-identification.")

One word of caution, in case you want to try stargazing yourself: you can't arrive at a movie fan's own age simply by computing the average age of his—or her—favorite stars. There are lots of quirks to complicate this guessing game. Margaret O'Brien, for example, is a particular favorite of high-school girls—and of women old enough to be her mother! Perhaps that's the explanation, incidentally; the older women see in Miss Margaret a reflection, not of themselves, but of their daughters. Associating themselves with the story again, but in a different way.

In case you miss from our list some stars you consider favorites of young women, be reassured; we haven't named them all, by any means. Jennifer Jones, Robert Walker—these and more might well have been included, though the combination suggests a slightly younger woman than our imaginary character.

"Now this business about living in a city—what's the clue there? Those stars play in small-town theaters too."

They do indeed, and to enthusiastic audiences. But it happens that three of those stars in particular, Joseph Cotten, Ray Milland and Ingrid Bergman, are special favorites in the cities; (Continued on Page 220)

WHAT STARS CAN YOU SEE?

Here are twenty-five stars who won top billing in a recent popularity poll. Next time you have company at home, ask them to list their favorite movie actors and actresses. You may be able to guess which list belongs to which guest—after you've read the accompanying article.

BING CROSBY
INGRID BERGMAN
VAN JOHNSON
GARY COOPER
BOB HOPE
HUMPHREY BOGART
GREER GARSON
MARGARET O'BRIEN
BETTY GRABLE
ROY ROGERS
WALLACE BEERY
RAY MILLAND
CLARK GABLE
ALAN LADD
BETTE DAVIS
RITA HAYWORTH
CARY GRANT
CORNEL WILDE
CLAUDETTE COLBERT
GENE TIERNEY
ABBOTT and COSTELLO
SPENCER TRACY
OLIVIA DE HAVILLAND
GREGORY PECK
ERROL FLYNN

our favorite movie stars. It will reveal your personality, mbitions, even your sex — it says here.

Friends and family are as welcome in this kitchen as the first day of spring. Covered in a plastic-coated fabric, the corner seat is gay, comfortable and cleanable. Trays on folding racks are practical, easy to use. Sturdy counter for serving hot dishes, radio at hand, room for books.

Visitors Welcome

WHEN I came into this kitchen, I felt like Kezia in Katherine Mansfield's exquisite story about the doll's house. Kezia never had a dollhouse, but she saw one through the window, perfect and magical, and when she was sent on down the road she spoke with ecstasy, "I seen the little lamp." Just seeing it was her satisfaction. And in this kitchen I just wanted to stand and touch the softly colored cabinets, move one tray just an inch—just to prove that it was real and that it wouldn't vanish.

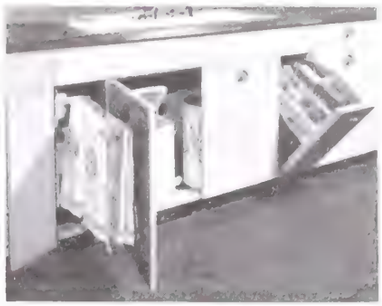
"I want a pretty kitchen," said one young woman the other day, "because my friends see me in my kitchen more than anyplace else. I want to look pretty in the kitchen, and I don't want to look out-of-place."

Of course no woman can just stand in her kitchen looking beautiful, and a good kitchen must be practical as well as attractive. The easier the work, the happier the young housekeeper.

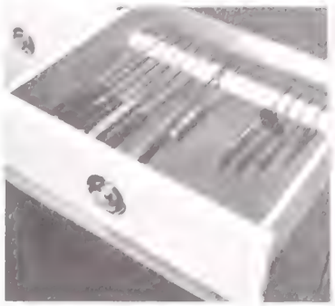
With a kitchen such as this, I am sure that if a neighbor drops in she can be asked to stay for a quick tray lunch with no fuss (Continued on Page 182)

COME OUT TO THE KITCHEN!
WE CAN TALK WHILE DINNER'S COOKING.

The tall closet holds cleaning aids.



Pull-out bin for soaps is good idea.



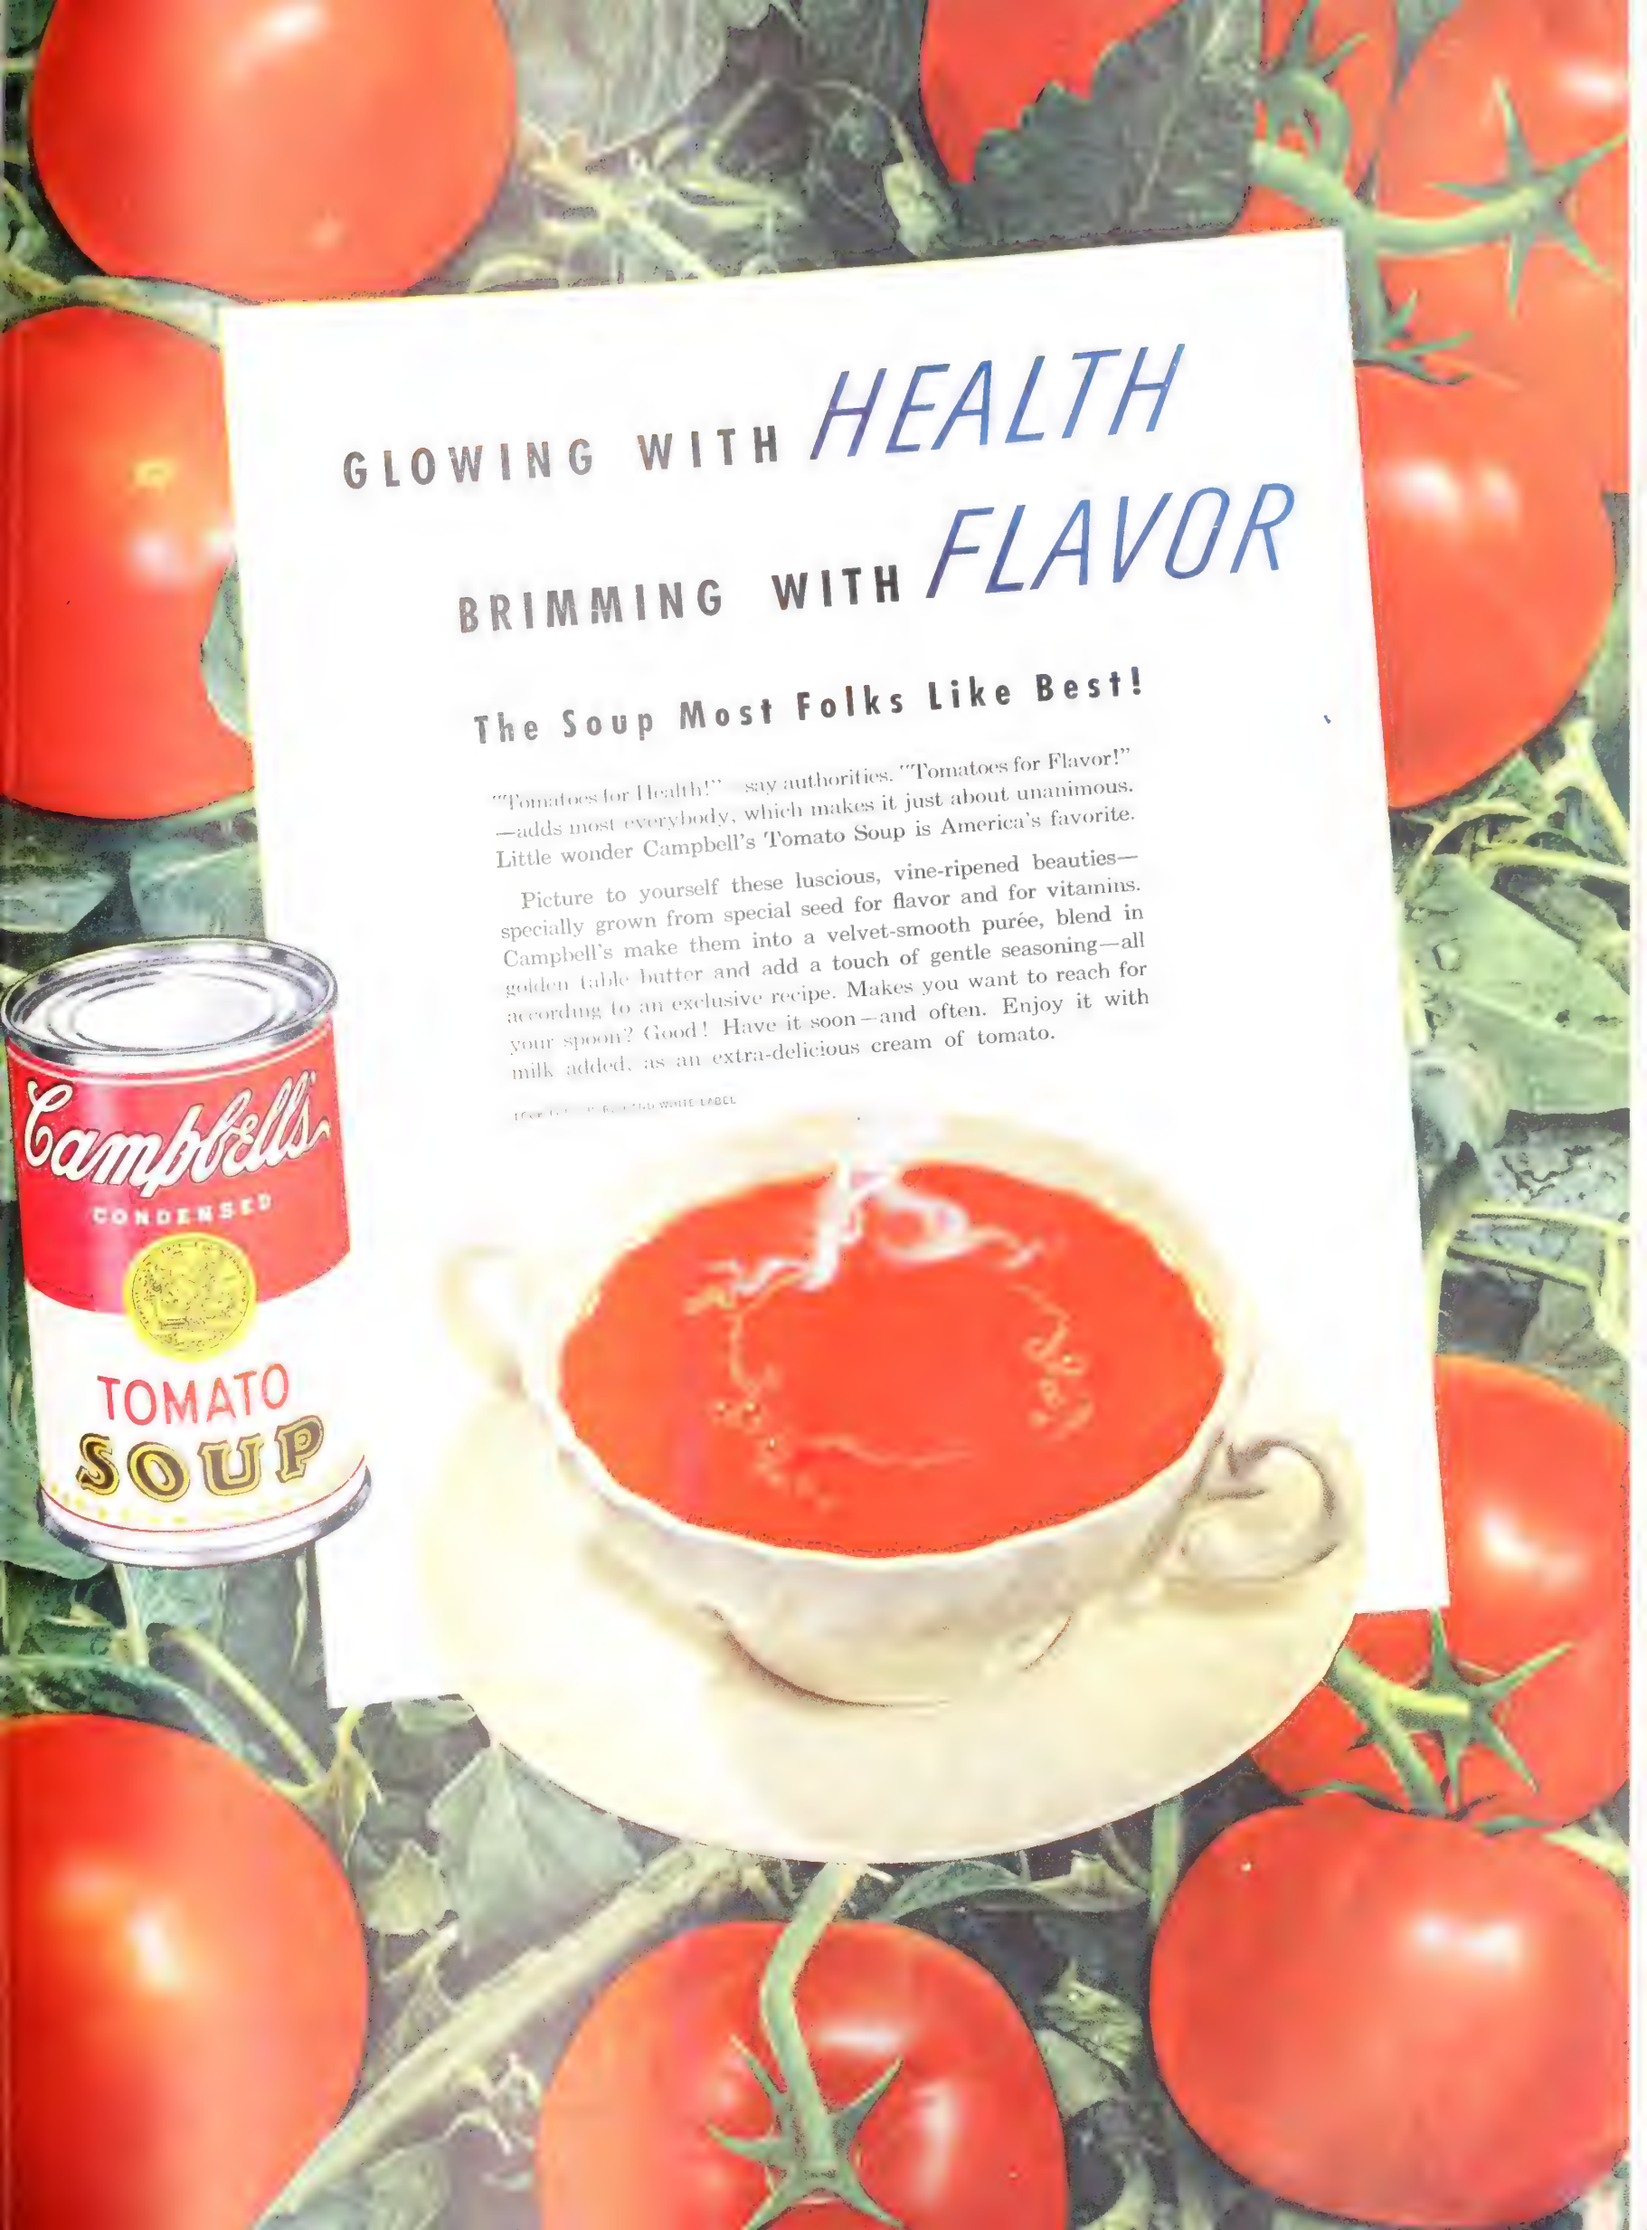
Knife rack protects edges.

Three roomy vegetable storage bins.

Carrousel holds pots, pans.

By Gladys Taber

You could never stand in your own light in this kitchen. Pleasantly concentrated light is directed downward on all working areas and the soft glow comes through "eggcrate" louvers." Fixtures and wiring are concealed behind soffits.*



GLOWING WITH HEALTH
BRIMMING WITH FLAVOR
The Soup Most Folks Like Best!
"Tomatoes for Health!" say authorities. "Tomatoes for Flavor!" —adds most everybody, which makes it just about unanimous. Little wonder Campbell's Tomato Soup is America's favorite.
Picture to yourself these luscious, vine-ripened beauties—specially grown from special seed for flavor and for vitamins. Campbell's make them into a velvet-smooth purée, blend in golden table butter and add a touch of gentle seasoning—all according to an exclusive recipe. Makes you want to reach for your spoon? Good! Have it soon—and often. Enjoy it with milk added, as an extra-delicious cream of tomato.
Campbell's CONDENSED
TOMATO SOUP

That feeling of health
. . . with your teeth so clean
. . . mouth so fresh!
"Johnny Mint" leaves your mouth tingling with refreshment. There is no dental cream like SQUIBB DENTAL CREAM.
